77849

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE, DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

77849

VOLUME CL

JANUARY 6, 1940 to JUNE 29, 1940

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE NATION, INC.
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

495

77849

INDEX TO VOLUME CL

JANUARY 6, 1940 to JUNE 29, 1940

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 28	January 6	433-460	April 6
29- 56	January 13	461-496	April 13
57- 84	January 20	497-524	April 20
85-112	January 27	525-552	April 27
113-120	February 3	553-580	May 4
121-234	February 10	581-608	May 11
235-264	February 17	609-636	May 18
265-292	February 24	637-664	May 25
293-320	March 2	665-692	June 1
321-348	March 9	693-720	June 8
349-376	March 16	721-740	June 15
377-404	March 23	741-768	June 22
405-432	March 30	769-788	June 29

A

- A. F. of L. See American Federation of Labor
- Abe Lincoln in Illinois. F. Hoellering; MP 372
- Abend, Hallett
  - Travels in China; C........ 110
- Aberdeen, Washington; Laura Law murder. H. Lundy; S....383; see also C, 496; C 523
- Abraham Lincoln brigade; raid on headquarters of veterans; EP......238; see also C........ 348
- Academic freedom; Montana university professors reinstated. M. Marshall; S.. 451
- Accidents, coal-mining. R. M. Stein; S.... 562
- Adams, Mildred
  - Spain, liberal and reactionary; on L. White's review of C. de la Mora's "In place of splendor"; C........ 56
- Agencies, governmental. See United States
- Agricultural department appropriation; EP.. 349
- Agriculture
  - Industrial farming—preview. A. Eggleston; S 96
  - Labor proletariat developing; EP....... 639
  - Relief, southern; E........ 353
  - Share-croppers week, national; EP..... 239
- Air power. See Aviation
- Aitken, Webster, pianist. B. H. Haggin; M. 345
- Alabama; anti-picketing law invalidated; EP 533
- Alien labor. See Labor
- Aliens; as human beings. R. Vambrey; C.. 765
  - Attacks on; EP......322; EP........ 694
- Allen bill for deportation of H. Bridges; EP 638
- Allen, Robert S.
  - Taft, Robert A.; S........ 649
- Alsop, Joseph, and R. Kintner; "American white paper." F. Kirchwey; S...... 558
- Altman, Irving B.
  - Browder, E., on Marxism; C......432; see also 329
- Altmark, steamship, rescue of British captives; EP 265
- Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
  - Italian entrance into the war; S....... 671
  - One year of Franco; S......418; see also E 408
- Amalgamated clothing workers' union; agitation in; EP........ 69
- America. See United States
- American civil liberties union; split over communism; EP 610
- American federation of labor; executive council, meeting at Miami; EP........ 238
  - War or peace with C. I. O. By H. Harris; S 194
- American hardware company; luggage workers' strike. E. A. Barker and C. A. Hall; C 460
- American institute of public opinion polls. J. Wechsler; S......64; see also C.. 263
- American labor party; right-wing victory in New York; EP......497; see also C......720; C 765
- American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
- American student union; rejection of resolution on Finland; EP........ 3
- American telephone and telegraph company; reduction in rates; EP........ 378
- "American white paper," by Alsop and Kintner. F. Kirchwey; S........ 558
- American youth congress; "citizenship institute"; EP 237
- Americas, fate of colonies if nazis win; EP 769
- Anti-lynching bill. See Negroes
- Anti-semitism. See Jews
- Anxious Father
  - Bertrand Russell and Benjamin Franklin; C 552
- Apex sitdown strike decision. I. F. Stone; S 705
- Arabs. See Palestine
- Argentina; breakdown in trade negotiations with United States; EP........ 58
- Armaments; military policy, American. O. G. Villard; S 47, 757
  - Roosevelt prepares message on defense; EP 611
  - See also United States—Navy
- Art
  - Dove, A., and the independents. P. Rosenfeld; A 549
  - In our town. C. Rourke; S........ 424
  - Independent artists' show. J. Sloan; C 460
  - Italian paintings; exhibit in New York. P. Rosenfeld; A........ 287
  - Mexican; exhibit at Modern museum, New York. P. Rosenfeld; A........ 661
  - Persian, exhibition. J. Mellquist; A... 577
- Asama Maru incident; EP........ 237
- Associated gas and electric company
  - Bankruptcy petition; EP........ 58
  - Hanes not to be trustee; EP........ 294
  - Hopson and associates indicted; EP... 610
  - Trustees appointed; EP......266; EP.. 322
- Austria; prologue to February. F. Hoellering; S 478
- Authors
  - In the wilderness. II. John Dos Passos. M. Marshall; S 15
  - III. K. A. Porter. By M. Marshall; S 473
  - Writers and scholars; irresponsibles. A. MacLeish; S......618; see also EP, 611; 678; C, 718; C, 765; C........ 766
- Automobiles; dealers can't win. R. Brindze; S 539
- Aviation
  - Air power against sea power, in war; EP 525
  - Civil aeronautics authority, plan for reconstitution; EP 581

B

- Baker, Florence M.
  - De Valera's dilemma; S......335; see also C 459
- Baker's wife, the. F. Hoellering; MP...... 372
- Baldwin, Geoffrey A.
  - Civil disobedience and the Indian army; C......691; see also EP........ 526
- Balkan states
  - And the war; E......116; EP........ 147
  - Divergent interests in; EP........ 406
  - Maneuvers, political; EP........ 57
  - Nazi moves; EP 769
- Baltic states
  - Occupation by U. S. S. R.; EP........ 741
  - Rivalries of dictators; EP........ 769
  - Russian lake. Low; Ct........ 39
- Banse, Ewald
  - How to invade England; S........ 616
- Barden amendments to wage-hour law; EP.. 498
- Barker, E. A., and Hall, C. A.
  - Luggage workers' strike; C........ 460
- Barrett, Richard
  - Ireland, trouble in; C......459; see also 335
- Barth, Theodor, and Die Nation. M. Schwartzer; C 348
- Bartolotti, Arthur; arrest in Canada. E. G.; C 28
- Basehart, Harry W., and S. Riklin
  - "Cultural" intimacies with Latin America; C......320; see also........ 170
- Battleships. See Navies
- Belgium; invasion by nazis; E........ 612
- Belles-lettres. See Literature
- Bendiner, Robert
  - Glossary for 1940; S........ 186
  - Wheeler, B. K., presidential possibility; S 532
- Bentley, E. Russell
  - Pacifist defense; C......263; see also 72; C 319
- Berg, Hans
  - German communists still repressed; C......111; see also........ 7
- Berryman, John
  - Winter miscellany—four poems, selected by Berryman 200
- Biddle, Francis, appointment as solicitor general; EP 29
- Birk, Louis P.
  - Conspiracy in the northwest; C.....496; see also 383
- Black, Justice Hugo L.; decision in case of four negroes of Pompano, Florida; E......269; see also letters........ 404
- Blinken, Samuel M., and E. P. Connolly
  - On American labor party progressives; C......720; see also EP........ 497
- Block, Harry
  - Mexico; does it face rebellion? S....... 332
  - Mexico's phantom conspiracy; S....... 703
  - Rivera's fantasies; C........ 55
- Block, Sara
  - Education, secular, in danger; C....607; see also EP........ 435
- Boden, C. R.
  - Medals for civilians; C........ 692
- Bogan, Louise
  - Horizon; defense of belles-lettres; S.... 480
- Bomar, Thomas P., Negro "double" of Lincoln; EP 115
- Bonnet, Georges, crime of R. Dell; S...... 99
- Bonneville dam power project; trouble over sale of power; EP........ 499
- Book and magazine guild; survey of salaries; E 642
- Book of Mormon defended. E. Hilton; C......788; see also........ 451
- Books
  - For Chinese students, needed. A. E. Kane; C 720
  - For southern workers. R. S. Hilborn; C 580
  - Nation, The, and the American novel. C. Van Doren; S........ 212
- Borah, William E., death; E........ 87
- Boulder dam. O. G. Villard; S........ 569
- Bowers, Claude G., on The Nation's honor roll for 1939........ 6
- Brazil; views of President Vargas on dictatorship; EP 742
- Bregstein, Herbert L.
  - On "The fight for peace," motion picture; C......692; see also........ 511
- Bridges, Harry
  - Allen bill for deportation; EP........ 638
  - Danger to America in deportation bill; EP 771
  - Decision in his favor by Landis; EP... 3
  - Deportation bill passed by house; EP... 743
- Brindze, Ruth
  - Automobile dealers and the companies; S 539
- Britain. See Great Britain
- Broadcasting. See Radio
- Brody, Alter
  - Socialism in the U. S. S. R.; C........ 55
- Brookings institution; report on governmental agencies; EP 294
- Brooks, Van Wyck
  - On "The irresponsibles"; C........ 718
- Brother orchid. F. Hoellering; MP........ 763
- Broun, Heywood; funeral oration by F. J. Sheen. T. S. Harding; C........ 111
- Browder, Earl
  - Reply to L. Corey's articles on Marxism; S......329; see also C........ 432
  - Sentence for passport fraud; E........ 117
- Brown, Constantine; story on British "invasion" of Holland; E........ 528
- Brown, Samuel H.
  - Seeks aid in compiling bibliography of Spanish civil war; C........ 376
- Budget, public. See Finance, public
- Bullitt, William C., on pages of German "white book"; E........ 435
- Bund, German-American; relief to members barred by WPA bill; EP........ 666
- Burke, Senator Edward R., defeat in primaries; EP 497
- Business
  - Defeatism, economic. K. Hutchison; S 597
  - Depression; spending policy as relief; EP 29
  - Everybody's. See Everybody's business
  - Financial control; EP........ 2
  - First quarter of year shows gain; EP.. 534
  - German aggression and American business. K. Hutchison; S........ 540
  - Industrial activity. December. EP..... 148
  - Profits without honor. K. Hutchison; S 364
  - Retrospect of 1939 and forecast of 1940. K. Hutchison; S........ 18
  - Trade, foreign, of the United States. K. Hutchison; S........ 755
  - Trade with Latin America, and the national defense. C. E. Noyes; S...... 726
  - Trade with Latin America, move for cartel; EP 770
  - See also trade agreements

C

- CCC. See Civilian conservation corps
- C. I. O. See Congress of industrial organizations; Lewis, J. L.
- Cabinet. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
- Caldwell, Erskine
  - End of Christy Tucker, the; S........ 673
- California; industrial farming—preview; S.. 96
- California, university of; reserve officers training corps. M. D. Glickfeld; C......524; see also............... 394
- Canada
  - Anti-fascist in Canada, an. E. G.; C 28
  - Blackout in. Rowe; C................. 403
  - Election, general; EP................. 434
  - Election, strategic. T. E. Wood; S.... 391
  - Politics in war time; EP............. 114
- Castle on the Hudson. F. Hoellering; MP.. 346
- Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
- Catholic journalism. See Roman catholic church—press
- Caviar riots. G. S. Kaufman; S.......... 192
- Censorship. M. Marshall; S.............. 131
- Census, attack on questionnaire; EP....... 322
- Chain gang, twilight of. W. Wilson; S......44; correction 111
- Chamberlain, Neville. See Great Britain
- Chapin, Katherine Garrison
  - And they lynched him on a tree; P.... 707
- Charlie McCarthy, detective. F. Hoellering; MP 25
- Chase, Stuart; address at The Nation's dinner to Mrs. Roosevelt............... 624
- Chattanooga Evening Tribune; publication by G. F. Milton; EP............... 434
- Chattanooga News, death of. G. W. McGill; S 13
- Chestnut, W. Calvin, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939...................... 6
- Chicago newspaper guild defeats Hearst newspapers; EP 555
- Children, refugee. See Refugees
- Children in a democracy, conference on; E.. 118
- China; cooperatives, industrial. N. Wales; S......509; see also C............. 523
  - Loan to, by Export-import bank; EP.. 351
  - Students need books. A. E. Kane; C.. 720
- Chinese-Japanese war
  - Agreement between Japanese and puppet government of Wang Ching-wei; EP.. 321
  - Blockade, extension to the Pacific; effects of; EP 462
  - Chinese victory north of Canton; EP.. 86
  - Japanese policy unchanged by change in government at Tokyo; EP 58
  - Japanese strategy, new; E............ 269
  - New phase. N. Peffer; S............. 180
  - Puppet government of Wang Ching-wei, plans for; EP...................... 377
  - Truce sought by Japan; EP........... 639
  - Wang Ching-wei, Japan's puppet; E.... 437
- Christian front
  - And C. E. Coughlin; EP.............. 85
  - And M. Dies. J. Wechsler; S........ 89
  - And M. K. Hart; EP................. 85
  - Arrests; E 59
  - Police membership; E......239; EP... 267
  - Conspiracy trial; EP......498; E...... 556
- Church, Roman catholic. See Roman catholic church
- "Citizenship institute" of the American youth congress; EP................ 237
- Civil aeronautics authority, plan for reconstitution; EP 581
- Civil rights
  - Dangers to, in proposed legislation; E.. 150
  - Dilemma of Attorney general Jackson. C. Malcolmson; S.................. 699
  - Reynolds anti-alien amendment to LaFollette bill; EP................... 694
- Civilian conservation corps, work; EP...... 59
- Clark, Grenville, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
- Clark, Kenneth
  - On The Nation and "The Grapes of Wrath"; C......291; see also...... 127
- Cloete, Stuart
  - The pope regrets; S.................. 777
- Coal; Italian protests to Great Britain; EP.. 321
  - Mining, accidents. R. M. Stein; S..... 562
- Coleman, McAlister
  - Willkie, W., candidacy; S......469; see also EP......................... 461
- Collier, W. Edwin
  - On Streit plan for federalization of democracies; C 83
- Commerce. See Business
- Committee to defend America by aiding the allies; EP 666
- Commonwealth and southern company; bond issue proposed. K. Hutchison; S... 74
- Communications commission. See Federal communications commission
- Communism; causes split in Civil liberties union; EP 610
  - Relief barred in WPA bill; EP........ 666
  - See also Marxism (for Corey articles, and replies)
- Communist party
  - Membership lists, publicity an issue; EP 434
  - Membership lists sought by Dies; E... 464
  - German, still repressed. H. Berg; C......111; see also................ 7
  - Influence and numbers; EP........... 3
  - Strachey, J., severs relations; EP...... 667
- Congress
  - And Roosevelt financial policy; EP..... 2
  - Message to. F. Kirchwey; S.......... 34
  - Program for legislation; EP........... 2
- Congress of industrial organizations; Lewis, J. L.; slump in stock; rise of S. Hillman; EP 695
  - War or peace with A. F. L. By Herbert Harris; S..................... 194
- Connolly, Eugene P., and S. M. Blinken
  - On American labor party progressives; C......720; see also EP.......... 497
- Conrad, Herbert S.
  - On "The irresponsibles"; C........... 718
- Conservation of land; EP................. 499
- Consumers' power company case. K. Hutchison; S 74
- Contracts, government, minimum-wage provision upheld; EP.................. 582
- Convicts, twilight of the chain gang. W. Wilson; S......44; correction...... 111
- Cooperatives, industrial, in China. N. Wales; S......509; see also C...... 523
- Copyright bill, new. T. Solberg; C......291; see also C......................... 432
- Corey, Lewis
  - Marxism considered; S......245, 272.. 305
  - Replies by critics........328, 375, 342, 579
  - Answers critics; C.................... 403
- Corporations; financial control; EP......... 2
- Couch, W. T.
  - Alternatives, imperfect, for United States, in European war; C......319; see also 72, C, 263; C................... 403
- Coughlin, Charles E.
  - And the Christian front; EP.......... 85
  - Anti-semitism; EP 3
  - Misquotations by; EP................ 295
  - Terror; Christian front arrests; E..... 59
- Crane, Hart; prose sought for publication. B. Weber; C........................ 404
- Crawford, Kenneth G.
  - Congress edits the budget; S........... 440
  - Dies committee; vote for continuance; S 119
  - Dies committee report, real; S......36; see also EP......................... 30
  - Election as Newspaper guild president; EP 59
  - European war and the presidential election; S 162
  - Labor's new friends; S................ 355
  - Lewis-Roosevelt feud; S............... 271
  - Washington letters; S......36 (see also EP, 30)............63, 119, 271, 355, 440
- Credit. See Finance, public
- Creel, George
  - Never a socialist; C.................. 376
- Crime trust. J. Freeman; S............. 645
- Culbertson, Ely
  - Defends B. Russell; starts defense fund; C......496; see also EP............ 461

D

- Daily worker, the; criminal libel case; E.... 613
- Dalai lama. See Tibet
- Dances of Mexico. V. Mishnun; S........ 107
- Daniel, Howard
  - Mass murder in Poland; S............ 92
- Davies, Ernest
  - Labor distrusts Chamberlain; S........ 302
- Davis, Elmer; on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
  - Radio commentator. M. Marshall; S.. 570
- Davis, George T.
  - Big navy; S.......................... 560
- Day's work, a. K. A. Porter; S.......... 205
- Debt, national. See Finance, public
- Defeatism, economic. K. Hutchison; S..... 597
- Defense, national
  - Economics. K. Hutchison; S.......... 708
  - Essentials of; E...................... 641
  - Harmony in Washington. C. Malcolmson; S 644
  - Lippmann, W., views. O. G. Villard; S 654
  - Measures, adopted and proposed; EP... 693
  - Program, democratic. F. Kirchwey; S. 723
  - Roosevelt address to congress. O. G. Villard; S......683; see also EP.... 665
  - Roosevelt's plans. O. G. Villard; S... 710
  - Roosevelt prepares message; EP....... 611
  - Twofold, military and social, needed; E. 668
  - Wages in defense industries; E........ 725
  - See also Armaments
- Dejong, David Cornel
  - My son; P........................... 655
- De Lima, Agnes A.
  - Seeks letter by L. Powys; C........... 376
- Dell, Robert
  - Article on French war aims criticized. E. Janeway; C, with reply by Dell... 83
  - British fascist case, the; S............ 566
  - Crime of Georges Bonnet, the; S....... 99
  - Finland, allies' obligations to; C....459; see also E.....................379; 385
  - Tale of two wars; S................... 441
  - War must not be adjourned; C.....290; see also 87, 101
  - Why Finland lost; S......385; see also E......379; C 459
- Democracy; fear as the enemy. E. Roosevelt; S 173
  - Versus totalitarianism. M. Marshall; S ......311; see also E, 149; 174; C, 347
- Denmark. See Scandinavia
- Deportation; Navarro case. C. McWilliams; C 580
  - See also Bridges, H.
- Depression, business. See Business
- Detroit; FBI raids; opinion of Senator Norris; EP 610
  - Report on raids; E................... 584
- Dewey, Ethel L.
  - Letter on The Nation anniversary...... 376
- Dewey, John
  - Case for B. Russell; S................ 732
- Dewey, Thomas E.; as aspirant for the presidency. J. Richmond; S.....356; see also C......496; C............ 551
  - Facts about. O. G. Villard; S........ 282
- Dies, Martin, and the Christian front. J. Wechsler; S.....89; see also EP..... 85
- Dies committee
  - Asks membership lists of Communist party; E 464
  - Connection with reactionaries; EP..... 147
  - Dies hints at GPU in government; EP 378
  - Hilly, Arthur J. W.; approves work; EP 323
  - Program, new; EP.................... 266
  - Report, real. K. G. Crawford; S....36; see also EP....................... 30
  - Tie-up with fascist elements; E........ 240
  - Vote for continuance. K. G. Crawford; S 119
- Diplomatic appointments; EP.............. 31
- Doctor Ehrlich's magic bullet. F. Hoellering; MP......346; see also EP..... 268
- Dodd, William E.; death; EP............. 268
- Doisy, Edward A., on The Nation's honor roll for 1939...................... 6
- Dominican republic; Sosua, refugee colony. F. Kirchwey; S 466
- Dos Passos, John. By M. Marshall; S..... 15
- Douglas, Melvyn; address at The Nation's dinner to Mrs. Roosevelt............ 625
- Dove, Arthur, and the independents. P. Rosenfeld; A 549
- Driscoll, Denis J., trustee for Associated gas and electric; EP.................... 322
- Dutch East Indies, and Japan; EP......... 526

E

- East, near. See War, European
- East Indies, Dutch. See Dutch East Indies
- Economic defeatism. K. Hutchison; S..... 597
- Economics of national defense. K. Hutchison; S 708
- Edison, the man. F. Hoellering; MP...... 763
- Education, militarism in. O. G. Villard; S......394; see also C............. 524
  - See also Schools
- Eggleston, Arthur
  - Industrial farming—preview; S....... 96
- Eggleston, Arthur, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939...................... 6
- Eire. See Ireland
- End of Christy Tucker, the. E. Caldwell; S 673
- End to illusions, an. R. Niebuhr; S....... 778
- Enemies within; E....................... 745
- England. See Great Britain
- Entente, Franco-British. Low; Ct.......... 443
- Entente cordiale. F. Hoellering; MP...... 25
- Estonia. See Baltic states
- Europe; federation of democracies, Streit plan. W. E. Collier; C............ 83
- European war. See War, European
- Evening Tribune, Chattanooga. See Chattanooga Evening Tribune
- Everybody's business......252; articles by K. Hutchison, 18, 74, 128, 308, 364, 421, 475, 540, 597, 652, 708, 755

F

- FBI. See Federal bureau of investigation
- FCC. See Federal communications commission
- Farm relief. See Agriculture
- Farming. See Agriculture
- Fascism and nazism
  - American; E 745
  - British. See Great Britain
  - Canadian; arrest of A. Bartolotti. E. G.; C 28
  - Freedom under, as seen by R. Ley. R. G. Swing; S 749
  - Italian activities in the United States; EP 743
  - Versus democracy; E......149; see also 174; C........................ 347

- Fear, enemy of democracy. E. Roosevelt; S ... 173
- Federal bureau of investigation
  - Check for Hoover; E ... 380
  - Lawless G-men; E ... 296
  - Norris, Senator, on Detroit raids; EP ... 610
  - Report on Detroit raids; E ... 584
  - Wire-tapping to be investigated; E ... 409
- Federal communications commission; and television. E. M. Jones; S ... 447
  - Ruling on procedure; EP ... 148
- Federation of musicians; demand on broadcasters; EP ... 30
- Feldman, Maurice
  - Sweden prepares for war; S ... 42
  - Sweden's Trojan horse; S ... 531
- Feuermann, 'cellist. B. H. Haggin; M ... 318
- Fieser, Louis F., on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 ... 6
- Fifth column, the. J. W. Krutch; D ... 371
- Fifth columns. F. Kirchwey; S ... 529
  - Danger in; E ... 772
  - Experts, nazi. R. M. W. Kempner; C ... 691
  - In Latin America; EP ... 694
  - In Mexico; phantom conspiracy. H. Block; S ... 703
  - Menace; and exaggeration and abuse; EP 694
  - Real; E ... 745
- Fight for life, the. F. Hoellering; MP ... 372
- Fight for peace, the, motion picture. H. L. Bregstein; C......692; see also ... 511
- Fighting 69th, the. F. Hoellering; MP ... 261
- Films. See Moving pictures; Hoellering, F. (for reviews)
- Finance, public
  - Agricultural department appropriation; EP ... 349
  - Budget edited by congress. K. G. Crawford; S ... 440
  - Budget, Roosevelt; EP ... 29
  - Congress and the Roosevelt program; EP 2
  - Credit, poor man's. K. Hutchison; S ... 308
  - Debt, national; public and private; EP ... 743
  - Gold and inflation ... 252
  - Gold hoard, American. K. Hutchison; S ... 128
  - Income tax, New York state; Lehman proposed increase; EP ... 114
  - Income-tax proposals, for lowering of personal exemption; EP ... 722
  - Inflation, Leffingwell remedy for economic ills; EP ... 114
  - Spending policy to fight depression; EP 29
  - Sterling, fears and facts. K. Hutchison; S ... 475
- Financial control of industry; EP ... 2
- Finland
  - American loan to; EP ... 86
  - And Scandinavia. J. Joesten; M. Feldman; S ... 41, 42
  - Axis over Finland; E ... 351
  - Defeat a victory for Germany; E...... 379; see also 385; C ... 459
  - Defeat, cause of. R. Dell; S......385; see also E......379; C ... 459
  - Fighting against odds; EP ... 147
  - Finnish reverses; EP ... 321
  - Invasion by soviet union, news of; EP ... 57
  - Nature's miracles in; C ... 110
  - Norway and Sweden, attitude of; EP ... 86
  - Soviet advances; EP......265; EP ... 293
  - Stands off soviet attacks; EP ... 1
  - Time against the Finns. L. Stowe; S ... 243
  - Weakness in face of aggression; EP ... 406
- Fischer, Louis
  - Soviet Russia today. II. Foreign policy; Geneva to Helsinki; S......7; see also C ... 111
    - III. Death of a revolution; S ... 37
  - Russia—twenty-two years after; S ... 183
- Fisher, Dorothy Canfield; address at The Nation's dinner to Mrs. Roosevelt ... 625
- Fitzpatrick, cartoonist, cited on contempt charge; EP ... 405
- Flag, refusal to salute. See Jehovah's witnesses
- Fletcher, John Gould
  - On "The irresponsibles"; C ... 766
- Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley; expelled from Civil liberties union; EP ... 610
- Food stamps, plan for. J. Whitbread; S ... 507
- Ford motor company
  - Brutality at Dallas plant; EP......526; E ... 557
  - Complains of NLRB order against distribution of leaflets; EP ... 639
  - NLRB decision against company, in Buffalo case; EP ... 611
- Foreign born, protection of. E. Hemingway; C ... 111
- Fortune polls. J. Wechsler; S......64; see also C ... 263
- Foster parents' plan for war children, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 ... 6
- France
  - Aims, war. E. Janeway; C, with reply by R. Dell ... 83
  - And Germany; crime of G. Bonnet; R. Dell; S ... 99
  - And the war. A. Werth; S ... 275
  - Collapse; EP ... 769
  - Defeat; EP ... 741
  - Defeat, and unfounded fears of effect. F. Kirchwey; S ... 743
  - Defeat, causes of; E ... 745
  - Economic cooperation with Great Britain. F. Sternberg; S ... 68
  - German refugees in France. M. Winkler; C ... 290
  - Refugees in; labor service. S. Strunsky; C ... 607
  - Reynaud cabinet; E ... 407
  - Spanish refugees in France. See Spain
  - War aims. E. Janeway; C, with reply by R. Dell ... 83
    - See also War, European
- Franco, General. See Spain
- Frank, Glenn, Republican program committee report; E ... 325
- Frank, Waldo
  - On "The irresponsibles"; S ... 679
- Frankfurter, Justice; opinion in case of Jehovah's witnesses; EP ... 723
- Franklin, Benjamin, and Bertrand Russell. Anxious Father; C ... 552
- Frazer, Spaulding, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 ... 31
- Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom.
- Freedom and youth, and the war. R. G. Swing; S ... 749
- Freedom of the press; Saint Louis Post-Dispatch and cartoonist Fitzpatrick cited; EP......405; EP ... 463
  - Threatened by Smith criminal-syndicalism bill; EP ... 771
- Freeman, Ellen A.
  - America and the war; C......403; see also 72; C......263; C ... 319
- Freeman, Joseph
  - Murder monopoly. I. Inside story of a crime trust; S ... 645
  - On "The irresponsibles"; C ... 681
- "Friends of the land"; organization of; EP. 499
- Friends service committee, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 ... 6
- Fur workers' union leaders; convicted on charge of violation of anti-trust act; EP ... 527

G

- G., A. F.
  - On McGeehan decisions; C ... 579
- G., E.
  - Anti-fascist in Canada; C ... 28
- G-men. See Federal bureau of investigation
- Gallup polls. J. Wechsler; S......64; see also C ... 263
- Gandhi, M. K. See India
- Gannett, Lewis S.
  - Villard's Nation; S ... 155
- Garner, John Nance, presidential possibility. A. A. Michie; S ... 299
- Gaston, William
  - Packing the labor board; C ... 432
- General motors corporation; collective bargaining elections; EP ... 527
- German-American bund. See Bund, German-American
- German Shakespeare society, meeting. M. Marshall; S ... 570
- Germany
  - Advances toward the channel; EP ... 637
  - Aims, war; E ... 324
  - And France; crime of G. Bonnet; R. Dell; S ... 99
  - Communists still repressed. H. Berg; C......111; see also ... 7
  - Fifth-column experts. R. M. W. Kempner; C ... 691
  - Hitler, opponents of; aid needed; R. Niebuhr; C ... 787
  - "Law," nazi. R. M. W. Kempner; C ... 375
  - Nazi technique. Low; Ct ... 8
  - Nazis; what they think. A. D. Pope; C 347
  - Nazism, horror of. T. Mann; S ......174; see also E......149; C ... 347
  - Pact, nonagression, with Russia:
    - Article by L. Fischer; S......7; see also C ... 111
    - Cause seen in abandonment of "appeasement"; EP....350; see also ... 360
    - Cooling off; EP ... 525
    - Italian opinion; E ... 351
    - Strachey, J., leaves communists on issue, EP ... 667
  - Refugees, in France. M. Winkler; C ... 290
  - Socialism, Wagnerian; E ... 270
  - 'White book"; E ... 435
  - White paper on invasion of Norway; EP ... 553
- Gibbs, Willard; biographical material sought. M. Rukeyser; C ... 692
- Girdler, Tom; "friend" of labor; EP ... 499
- Glickfield, Morris D.
  - Reserve officers training corps at California; C......524; see also ... 394
- Glossary for 1940. R. Bendiner; S ... 186
- Godkin, Lawrence, and The Nation, by O. G. Villard; S......152; by I. F. Stone; S ... 158
- Goebbels, Joseph, in pages of German "white book"; E ... 435
- Gold, Ben, conviction of violation of Sherman act; EP ... 527
- Gold. See Finance, public
- Good housekeeping; charges against, in Miracle whip poisoning case; EP ... 771
- Goodman, Henry
  - On "The irresponsibles"; C ... 718
- Göring's prophecy, on soviet-nazi pact. F. Kuh; S....360; see also EP ... 350
- Governmental agencies. See United States
- Grand Coulee dam. R. L. Neuberger; S ... 675
- Grapes of wrath, the. F. Hoellering; MP ... 137
  - Preview. M. Mok; S......127; see also C ... 291
- Great Britain
  - And U. S. S. R.; negotiations for trade pact; EP ... 293
  - Budget, war; EP ... 534
  - Cabinet; fall of Hore-Belisha; E ... 33
  - Cabinet change urged, after fiasco in Norway; EP ... 581
  - Cabinet changes; EP...462; EP...609; EP ... 638
  - Cabinet weakness. O. G. Villard; S ......599; see also C......633; C ... 765
  - Chamberlain distrusted by labor. E. Davies; S ... 302
  - Chamberlain's advice to neutrals; EP ... 85
  - Chamberlain's class-consciousness; E ... 297
  - Defense of the British. O. G. Villard; S ... 130
  - Dictatorship in war time; EP ... 665
  - Doomed? A. Viton; S ... 774
  - Economic cooperation with France. F. Sternberg; S ... 68
  - Economy, war; E ... 3
  - Escape from German trap; EP ... 693
  - Fascist case, the. R. Dell; S ... 566
  - Holding up of American mail; EP ... 86
  - Hore-Belisha, fall of; E ... 33
  - "Invasion" of Holland; story in Washington Star; E ... 528
  - Invasion threatened by nazis; E ... 667
  - Labor party enters government. H. J. Laski; S ... 643
  - Morale; E ... 436
  - Nazi infiltration checked; EP ... 665
  - Peril; E ... 667
  - Sterling; fears and facts. K. Hutchison; S ... 475
  - War economy; E ... 3
    - See also War, European
- Green, William; for amendments to Wagner act; EP ... 722
- Greene, Roger S.
  - Curbing Japan; C......375; see also E ... 151
- Guffey act; upheld by United States supreme court; EP ... 639
- Guild, newspaper. See Newspapers
- Gunther, John; address at The Nation's dinner to Mrs. Roosevelt ... 624

H

- Haggin, B. H.
  - Articles on music:
    - Aitken, W. ... 345
    - Brahms B-flat piano concerto, at N. B. C. Symphony concert ... 662
    - Conductors, three ... 458
    - Feuermann, 'cellist ... 318
    - Metropolitan opera house; campaign for......260; see also C ... 347
    - Milstein, Nathan ... 318
    - Mozart quintets ... 431
    - Mozart's mass in C minor ... 106
    - Petri, E. recital ... 662
    - Primrose quartet ... 318
    - Prokofiev ... 458
    - Reviewing music ... 224
    - Schnabel, A., concert ... 550
    - Vienna opera ... 106
  - Comments on music praised; C ... 608
  - Music, recorded; S......26, 54, 82, 136, 260, 288, 317, 345, 373, 402 (see also C, 607; C, 691); 492, 522, 550, 578, 606, 662, 717, 739, 764, 786
  - On the Victor leaflets; C......691; see also ... 402
- Hall, C. A., and E. A. Barker
  - Luggage workers' strike; C ... 460
- Hall, Frank A.
  - Replies to Southworth article on Catholic journalism; C, with reply by Southworth......27; see also ... 111
- Hamlin, Talbot
  - Real "irresponsibles," the; C ... 787
- Hanes, John W., trusteeship of Associated gas and electric; EP......266; EP ... 294
- Hanzlik, P. J., on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 ... 6
- Happy new year! F. Kirchwey; S ... 4
- Harding, T. Swann
  - Praises Fischer article on Soviet Russia and The Nation's rebuke of Sheen for Broun funeral oration; C ... 111
- Harris, Herbert
  - War or peace in American labor; S ... 194
- Hart, Merwin K., and the Christian front. J. Wechsler; S......89; see also EP 85

- Harting, Marinus, artist. C. Rourke; S... 424
- Harvard university, ROTC at. A. P. R.; C......524; see also 394
- Hastie, William H., on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
- Hathaway, Clarence; conviction of criminal libel; E 613
- Hats, women's; EP 149
- Hays, Will H.; denial of alleged remark; F. Hoellering; S 521
- Hearst, William Randolph
  - Chicago newspapers; aid needed in strike. H. D. Wohl; C 432
  - Loses to Newspaper guild in Chicago; EP 555
  - Newspapers distort statement by Senator Pittman; EP 533
  - Newspapers allege "plot" against J. E. Hoover; E 323
- Heavenly express. J. W. Krutch; D 577
- Heller, James G.
  - Praise for Haggin comment on music; C 608
- Heller, Victor
  - Refugee enterprises; C 319
- Hemingway, Ernest
  - Protection of the foreign born; C 111
- Henson, Francis A.
  - Praise and blame for The Nation; C ......347; see also EP 267
- Herzog, John H.
  - On review of biography of C. Coolidge; C......496; see also 342
- Hilborn, Rita S.
  - Books for southern workers; C 580
- Hillman, Sidney. See Amalgamated clothing workers' union; Congress of industrial organizations
- Hilly, Arthur J. W., on Dies investigation; EP 323
- Hilton, Eugene
  - In defense of book of Mormon; C ......788; see also 451
- His girl Friday. F. Hoellering; MP 80
- Hitler, Adolph. See Germany
- Hitlerism, and illusions of liberals. R. Niebuhr; S 778
- Hoan, Daniel Webster; defeated for mayor. A. P. Wiesner; C 523
- Hobson, John A., death. S. K. Ratcliffe; S 512
- Hoellering, Franz
  - Denial by W. H. Hays of alleged remark on motion pictures; S 521
  - Prologue to February; S 478
  - Reviews of motion pictures:
    - Abe Lincoln in Illinois 372
    - Baker's wife, the 372
    - Brother orchid 763
    - Castle on the Hudson 346
    - Charlie McCarthy, detective 25
    - Doctor Ehrlich's magic bullet 346
    - Edison, the man 763
    - Entente cordiale 25
    - Fight for life, the 372
    - Fighting 69th, the 261
    - Grapes of wrath, the 137
    - His girl Friday 80
    - Honeymoon's over, the 25
    - Human beast, the 346
    - Lights out in Europe 521
    - Lillian Russell 716
    - Mice and men 80
    - My son, my son 716
    - Our town 763
    - Pinocchio 261
    - Rebecca 521
    - Remember 25
    - Shop around the corner, the 262
    - Sidewalks of London 346
    - Torrid zone 716
    - Young Tom Edison 522
- Holding companies
  - Abuses in public-utility systems 322
  - Associated gas and electric bankruptcy petition; EP 58
  - Defended by Willkie; EP 349
  - Hopson and associates indicted in Associated gas case; EP 610
- Holland. See Netherlands
- Honeymoon's over, the. F. Hoellering; MP 25
- Honor roll, The Nation's, for 1939......6; correction 31
- Hook, Frank, and the Dies committee; EP.. 85
- Hoover, J. Edgar
  - Check on; E 380
  - Lawlessness; E 296
  - Methods to be investigated; E 409
  - "Plot" against; E 323
- Hopson, Howard C., and associates, indicted in Associated gas case; EP... 610
- Hore-Belisha, fall of; E 33
- Horizon. L. Bogan; S 480
- Housing, need for; E 241
- Huberman, M. A.
  - On the "irresponsibles"; C 768
- Hughes, Charles Evans, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
- Hughes, W. A. C., junior, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
- Hull, Cordell. B. Nover; S 729
  - Hull-Jackson ticket. K. G. Crawford; S 63
  - Note to Mexico on oil and land claims. B. D. Wolfe; S 537
- Hull trade program. See Tariff
- Human beast, the. F. Hoellering; MP 346
- Hutchison, Keith
  - Beyond the new deal; S 167
  - Blitzkrieg in Wall street; S 652
  - Economic defeatism; S 597
  - Everybody's business. See Everybody's business
  - Hitler's gamble, in Scandinavia; S 504
  - Securities and exchange commission, attack on; S 74
  - Trade, foreign; S 755
  - Writing praised. L. Bready; C....691; see also 571

I

- Idealists as cynics. R. Niebuhr; S......72; see also C......263; C 319
- In the wind, 19, 46, 75, 100, 129, 253, 281, 309, 337, 365, 393, 422, 449, 476, 513, 541, 568, 598, 627, 653, 682, 709, 733, 756, 781
- Income, national, in 1939; EP 295
- Income tax. See Finance, public
- Independent artists, and A. Dove. P. Rosenfeld; A 549
- Independent artists' show. J. Sloan; C 460
- India
  - Action, non-violent direct, decided upon by Gandhi. K. Shridharani; S...564; see also EP 555
  - Civil disobedience campaign on way, despite Gandhi; EP......555; see also 564
  - Hope for compromise fades; EP....526; see also C 691
  - Peaceful attitude of Gandhi; EP 406
  - Revolt; E 324
  - Struggle over civil disobedience; EP... 377
- Indo-China, in path of fascist aggression; EP 770
- Industrial farming—preview. A. Eggleston; S 96
- Industry. See Business
- Inflation. See Finance, public
- Insurance, old-age. See Old-age insurance
- Insurance, unemployment. See Unemployment insurance
- International incident, an. J. W. Krutch; D 492
- International fur workers' union; conviction of officers; EP 527
- International ladies' garment workers' union; agitation in; EP 695
- Investment trusts; Wagner-Lea bill for regulation; E 465
- Ireland; De Valera's dilemma. F. M. Baker; S......335; see also C 459
  - Eire's case against England. O. G. Villard; S 254
- Iron. See Steel and iron
- Irresponsibles; writers and scholars. A. MacLeish; S......618; see also EP, 611; 678; C, 718; C, 765; C, 766; C 787
- Italian fascist activities in the United States; EP 743
- Italian steamship lines, extortion by. A. P.; C 375
- Italy
  - Aims, war; E 324
  - And the soviet-nazi pact; E 351
  - Entrance into the war; EP 693
  - Entrance into the war. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 671
  - Entry, and Mussolini's timing. F. Kirchwey; S 585
  - Entry, announced by Mussolini; EP... 721
  - Mussolini as "non-belligerent." Low; Ct 567
  - Mussolini's margin in the war; E 556
  - Protests to Great Britain on coal; EP.. 321

J

- J., S. L.
  - War; same now as in 1914; C 376
- Jackson, Robert H.
  - Appointment as attorney general; EP.. 29
  - Dilemma over civil rights. C. Malcolmson; S 699
  - Dismisses indictment of recruiters for loyalist Spain; EP 267
  - Hull-Jackson ticket. K. G. Crawford; S 63
- James, Henry, on founding of The Nation. M. Marshall; S 570
- Janeway, Eliot
  - What does France want? C, with reply by R. Dell 83
- Japan
  - And the Dutch East Indies; EP 526
  - And the European war; Asama Maru incident; EP 237
  - Entry into war demanded by native fascists; EP 667
  - Balancing act. Low; Ct 279
  - Government, change in; EP 58
  - Political difficulties as result of war in China; EP 2
  - Totalitarian moves in southeastern Asia; EP 770
- Japanese-American relations
  - Appeasement talk dangerous; E 746
  - Discussion of relations resumed; EP.... 582
  - Hope for embargo by United States wanes; EP 294
  - Relations; E 151
    - See also C 375
  - Trade treaty expiration; EP, 2; E, 60; EP, 86; EP 113
  - Trade treaty expiration, and proposed embargo on Japanese goods; EP 31
- Japanese-Soviet relations; Japan's red flirtation. F. Utley; S 278
- Jehovah's witnesses; conviction reversed by supreme court; EP, 666; EP 723
- Jews; anti-semitism, United States; Murphy inquiry; EP 3
  - Polish, under Hitler. F. Kirchwey; S.. 61
    - See also Palestine
- Joads, neighbors of; E 353
- Job insurance. See Unemployment insurance
- Joesten, Joachim
  - Anti-nordic Germans; S 41
- Jones, Edgar M.
  - Television; S 447
- Journalism. See Newspapers
- Journalism, catholic. See Roman catholic church—press

K

- Kane, Albert E.
  - Books for Chinese students; C 720
- Kaufman, George S.
  - Great caviar riots, the; S 192
- Keep off the grass. J. W. Krutch; D 716
- Kempner, R. M. W.
  - "Fifth-column" experts; C 691
  - Nazi "law"; C 375
- Kennedy, Joseph P., in pages of German "white book"; E 435
- Kingdon, Frank; address at The Nation's dinner to Mrs. Roosevelt 626
- Kintner, Robert, and J. Alsop; "American white paper." F. Kirchwey; S 558
- Kirchwey, Freda
  - America is not neutral; S 613
  - "American white paper"; S 558
  - Defense program, democratic; S 723
  - "Fifth column"; S 529
  - Finland, aid for; S 34
  - French defeat, and unfounded fears of effect; S 743
  - Happy new year! S 4
  - Hitler triumph in Europe; escape and appeasement; S 773
  - Jews in Hitler's Poland; S 61
  - Mediation possible in European war? S........87; see also 101, C 290
  - Mussolini's timing, for entry into war; S 585
  - Nation, The, anniversary of; S 145
  - Nazi victory, possible, and America; S.. 695
  - Neutrality, American, in European war; S 503
  - Politics and peace; S 242
  - President's message; S 34
  - Puerto Rico; S, 327, 381, 409, 381; see also EP..........268; C 663
  - Refugees, plea for; S 669
  - Sosua, refugee colony in Dominican republic; S 466
  - Supposing Hitler wins; S 640
  - Tour of Puerto Rico, the Dominican republic, and Haiti; EP 268
  - Trade pacts; S 34
- Klan. See Ku klux klan
- Knox, Frank, appointment to cabinet; EP.. 770
- Kohn, Hans
  - On "The irresponsibles"; S 680
- Kraft-Phenix cheese corporation; Miracle whip poisoning case; EP 771
- Kranz, Henry B.
  - War on the short wave; S 123
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
  - On reviewing plays; D 222
  - Reviews of plays:
    - Fifth column, the 371
    - Heavenly express 577
    - International incident, an 492
    - Keep off the grass 716
    - Ladies in retirement 457
    - Lady in waiting 492
    - Liliom 457
    - Louisiana purchase 716
    - Love for love 739
    - Love's old sweet song 634
    - Male animal, the 81
    - Medicine show 549
    - Night music 316
    - Reunion in New York 316
    - Russian bank 716
    - Suspect 522
    - There shall be no night 605
    - Two on an island 136
- Kuh, Frederick
  - Göring's prophecy, on soviet-nazi pact; S........360; see also EP 350
- Ku klux klan rides again. R. H. Rovere; C. 445

L

Labor
  - Alien; Reynolds amendment to LaFollette civil-liberties bill; EP.......... 694
  - Barden amendments to wages and hours act; EP 498
  - Farm. See Agriculture
  - Friends, new. K. G. Crawford; S.... 355
  - Laura Law murder, Aberdeen, Washington. H. Lundy; S......383; see also C, 496; C.......................... 523
  - Mediation board, Wagner bill for; EP.. 295
  - Minimum-wage provision on government contracts upheld; EP................ 582
  - Salaries, white-collar; E............... 642
  - Wages, and the national defense; E.... 725
  - Wages and hours act; amendments, threatened; EP 405
  - Wages and hours act; enforcement, more funds needed; EP................... 433
  - Working for the wealthy; M. R.; C... 459

Labor party, American. See American labor party

Labor party, British. See Great Britain

Labor relations board. See National labor relations board

Labor unions
  - Clothing workers; agitation in; EP.... 695
  - Picketing; New York city police on. K. Weiss; C.......................... 692
  - Picketing upheld by supreme court; EP. 533
  - War or peace. H. Harris; S.......... 194
  - See also Strikes

Ladies in retirement. J. W. Krutch; D.... 457

Lady in waiting. J. W. Krutch; D........ 492

LaFollette civil-liberties bill. See Civil rights

LaFollette civil liberties committee, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939......... 6

LaGuardia, Mayor Fiorello H.; and the Russell case; EP....................... 461
  - And the transport workers' union; EP, 350; EP, 377; EP.................. 433

Lama, dalai. See Tibet

La Manna, Margaret
  - Russell, Bertrand, case; C............ 403

Land conservation; EP.................... 499

Landauer, Walter
  - Chinese cooperatives; C............... 523
  - see also 509

Lansbury, George; death. O. G. Villard; S.. 628

Lash, Joseph P.
  - Goal in the war struggle; C........... 787

Laski, Harold J.
  - Labor party, British, enters the government; S 643

Latin America
  - "Fifth-column" activities; EP.......... 694
  - Good neighborliness toward. A. MacLeish; S.......170; see also C...... 320
  - Situation in. O. G. Villard; S........ 734
  - Trade with, and the national defense. C. E. Noyes; S..................... 726
  - Trade with, Roosevelt move for cartel; EP 770
  - Turn against nazism; EP............. 742

Latvia. See Baltic states

Laughlin, James
  - When does the play begin? P.......... 202

Law, Laura, murder. H. Lundy; S....383; see also C, 496; C................ 523

League for peace and democracy, discontinuance; EP 149

Lee, Algernon
  - Reply to L. Corey's articles on Marxism; S 331

Leffingwell, R. C.; remedy for economic ills; EP 114

Left, the: End and beginning. M. Lerner; S 164

Lehman, A. J., on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6

Lehman, Governor Herbert H.; progressive program; EP 30
  - Proposed rise in income-tax rates; EP.. 114

Leland, Waldo G.
  - Defense of copyright bill; C........432; see also C.......................... 291
  - On "The irresponsibles"; S........... 680

Lerner, Max
  - Left, the: End and beginning; S....... 165
  - On "The irresponsibles"; S........... 678
  - Roosevelt and the presidency; S....... 752

Lewis, John L.
  - Address to American youth congress; EP 237
  - And the presidential nomination; E..... 115
  - Attack by J. C. Petrillo; EP........... 30
  - Feud with Roosevelt. K. G. Crawford; S........271; see also EP.......... 770
  - Lewis, Roosevelt, and the United mine workers of America. R. M. Stein; S.. 248
  - See also Congress of industrial organizations

Ley, Robert, on freedom. R. G. Swing; S.. 749

Liberalism, American: End and beginning. M. Lerner; S...................... 164

Liberals, illusions concerning the war. R. Niebuhr; S........................ 778

Liberties, civil. See Civil rights

Liggett case against C. Hathaway and the Daily Worker; E 613

Lights out in Europe. F. Hoellering; MP.. 521

Liliom. J. W. Krutch; D................ 457

Lillian Russell. F. Hoellering; MP........ 716

Lincoln, Abraham; a Lincoln nobody knew. I. F. Stone; S..................... 307
  - Negro "double"; EP................... 115

Lindbergh, Charles A.; advice to America; EP 741
  - On American isolation; EP............ 637

Lippmann, Walter, on national defense. O. G. Villard; S.................. 654

Literature; defense of belles-lettres; Horizon. L. Bogan; S 480

Lithuania. See Baltic states

Lockwood, Dean P.
  - On "The irresponsibles"; C............ 766

Logan-Walter bill. See United States—Agencies, governmental

Louisiana purchase. J. W. Krutch; D...... 716

Love for love. J. W. Krutch; D........... 739

Love's old sweet song; D.................. 634

Low, cartoons
  - Blitzkrieg, postponement 363
  - Entente, Franco-British 443
  - Hitler's "peace offers" 179
  - Holiday 596
  - Japanese balancing act................ 279
  - Mussolini as "non-belligerent"......... 567
  - Nazi offer of peace................... 506
  - Nazi technique 8
  - Radio propaganda 125
  - Russian lake 39

Luggage workers' strike. E. A. Barker and C. A. Hall; C.................. 460

Lundy, Herbert
  - Laura Law murder; S............383; see also C, 496; C................ 523

Lynching; bill held up in senate; EP...... 583
  - See also Negroes

M

M., R.
  - Working for the wealthy; C............ 459

Macdonald, Dwight
  - WPA cuts—or jail, in Minneapolis; S.. 120

MacLeish, Archibald
  - Art of the good neighbor; S......170; see also C.......................... 320
  - Irresponsibles; writers and scholars; S......618; see also EP, 611; 678; C, 718; C, 765; C, 766; C.......... 787

Madison oil trust, supreme court decision in case; EP 610

Magil, A. B., and J. North
  - New Masses, The; C, 348; see also EP.. 238

Mail, American, holding up by British; EP.. 86

Malcolmson, Charles
  - Defense harmony; S................... 644
  - Jackson, attorney general, dilemma over civil rights; C...................... 699
  - Republican convention; S.............. 747

Male animal, the. J. W. Krutch; D........ 81

Mann, Thomas
  - Two visions of peace; S..........174; see also E, 149; C.................. 347

Marks, John B.
  - Questions for Mr. Corey; C............ 375

Marshall, Margaret
  - Censorship; S 131
  - German Shakespeare society, meeting; S. 570
  - Montana university, professors reinstated; S 451
  - Nation, The, founding; opinion of H. James; S 570
  - Notes on volume one of The Nation; S.. 209
  - Porter, K. A.; S..................... 473
  - Radio commentators; S................ 570
  - Revision of Marxism; S...........451; see also C.......................... 788
  - Writers in the wilderness:
    - II. John Dos Passos; S............. 15

Marshall, Thurgood, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939......................... 6

Marxism, L. Corey; S......245, 272, 305; see also 328; C, 432; C............ 579

Marxism, revision. M. Marshall; S.... 451; see also C.......................... 788

Mather, Alan
  - Socialism in the U. S. S. R.; C........ 55

Mathews, Robert E.
  - On "The irresponsibles"; C............ 718

Maverick, Maury, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6

Maverick, Maury
  - Poll tax, southern; S................. 592

Mayer, Arthur L.
  - Movies, good, demand for; S......511; see also C.......................... 692

Mayer, Milton S.
  - McNutt, Paul V.; S..............415; see also C.......................... 496
  - Vandenberg, Arthur H.; S............. 587

McGeehan, Justice, decisions, in Russell case and another. A. F. G.; C.......... 579

McGill, George W.
  - Death of a newspaper; S.............. 13

McLaughlin bill, for education in religion; EP ....435; [illegible] also C......... 607

McNutt, Paul V. By M. S. Mayer; S..415; see also C.......................... 496

McWilliams, Carey
  - Case of F. Navarro; C................ 580

McWilliams, Carey, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939....................... 6

Medalie, George Z., not connected with beer barons. J. Richmond; C.........496; see also 356; C..................... 551

Medals for civilians. C. R. Boden; C...... 692

Mediation board. See Labor

Medicine show. J. Krutch; D.............. 549

Meehan, Thomas F.
  - Layman, not priest; C............111; see also 27

Mellquist, Jerome
  - Persian art exhibition; A.............. 577

Message to congress. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration

Metropolitan opera house, campaign for. B. H. Haggin; M..260; see also C... 347

Mexico
  - Art; exhibit at Modern museum, New York. P. Rosenfeld; A.............. 661
  - Dances. V. Mishnun; S............... 107
  - Oil question. B. D. Wolfe; S......... 537
    - Expropriation of companies; Hull offer to arbitrate; EP.................. 462
    - Settlement with Sinclair interests; EP 582
  - Phantom conspiracy. H. Block; S...... 703
  - Rebellion, possible. H. Block; S....... 332
  - See also Latin America

Mice and men. F. Hoellering; MP........ 80

Michael, Arthur A.
  - "Wagner act" for employers; S....387; see also C.......................... 524

Michie, Allan A.
  - Garner, presidential possibility; S...... 299

Militarism in education. O. G. Villard; S......394; see also C............. 524

Military policy of the United States. O. G. Villard; S 757

Miller, Perry
  - On "The irresponsibles"; S............ 681

Milner, Lucille B.
  - Pacifists in war time; C...........607; see also C.......................... 691

Milstein, Nathan. B. H. Haggin; M........ 318

Milton, George Fort. See Chattanooga Evening Tribune

Milwaukee; election of Zeidler. A. P. Wiesner; C 523

Mine workers. See United mine workers of America

Mining, coal, accidents. R. M. Stein; S.... 562

Minneapolis; WPA cuts—or jail. D. Macdonald; S.....120; see also EP...... 238

Miracle whip poisoning case; EP.......... 771

Mishnun, Virginia
  - Dances of Mexico; S.................. 107

Missouri extortion case; moving picture operators' union boss accused; EP....... 463

Mist, Ethel E.
  - Peace lovers versus war lovers; C..663; see also 599; C.................... 765

Moffett, Anne E.
  - Pacifists against society; C........691; see also C.......................... 607

Mok, Michel
  - Slumming with Zanuck; S.........127; see also C.......................... 291

Money. See Finance, public

Monopolies; Madison oil trust case decision; EP 610

Montana university, professors reinstated. M. Marshall; S...................... 451

Morgan, J. P., and company; becomes "Inc."; EP 266

Mormon, book of, defended. E. Hilton; C......788; see also................ 451

Moving picture operators' union, extortion case in Missouri; EP............... 463

Moving pictures
  - Censorship. M. Marshall; S.......... 131
  - Good, demand for. A. L. Mayer; S.511; see also C.......................... 692
  - "Grapes of wrath" preview. M. Mok; S.......127; see also C............ 291
  - Hays denial of alleged remark. F. Hoellering; S 522
  - Syphilis, film on ("Doctor Ehrlich's magic bullet"); EP................ 268
  - See also Hoellering, F. (for reviews)

Mozart. See Music

Murder monopoly. I. Inside story of [illegible] crime trust. J. Freeman; S................ 645

Murdock, Kenneth B.
  - On "The irresponsibles"; S............ 679

Murphy, Justice Frank. An inquiry into anti-semitism; EP 3
  - Appointment; EP 29
  - Decisions upholding right to picket; EP. 533

Music (articles by B. H. Haggin)
  - Aitken, Webster 345
  - Brahms B-flat piano concerto.......... 662
  - Conductors, three 458
  - Feuermann, 'cellist 318
  - Metropolitan opera house; campaign for ....260; see also C................ 347
  - Milstein, N. 318
  - Mozart quintets 431
  - Mozart's mass in C minor, by Schola cantorum 106
  - N. B. C. Symphony concert; Brahms B-flat piano concerto................ 662

  Petri, E., recital.................. 662
  Primrose quartet 318
  Prokofiev 458
  Reviewing 224
  Vienna opera 106
Music; federation of musicians' demand on broadcasters; EP 30
Music, recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
Mussey, Henry Raymond; death; EP...... 268
Mussey, Virginia
  Letters of H. R. Mussey sought; C.... 692
Mussolini, Benito. See Italy; War, European Muvaffak, Nermin
  Turkey is not neutral; S.............. 250
My son, my son. F. Hoellering; MP....... 716

N

N. L. R. B. See National labor relations board
Narvik. See Norway
Nation, Die, and T. Barth; letter by M. Schwartzer; C 348
Nation, The
  And the American novel. C. Van Doren; S 212
  Anniversary, seventy-fifth, issue of February tenth
    Greetings.....112, 139, 263, 291, 320, 376
  Award and dinner to Eleanor Roosevelt; addresses......623; EP 583
  Comments on 190
  Founding; views of H. James. M. Marshall; S 570
  "Free inquiry and free inquiry"; Godkin and The Nation. I. F. Stone; S..... 158
  Godkin's Nation. O. G. Villard; S.... 152
  Honor roll for 1939....6; correction.... 31
  Old and new. I. F. Stone; S.......... 158
  Praise and blame for. F. A. Henson; C 347
  Stand on European war. O. G. Villard; S 782
  Villard, Oswald Garrison; valedictory: S 780
  Villard's Nation. L. Gannett; S........ 155
  Volume one, notes on. M. Marshall; S.. 209
  Wechsler, J., leaves staff; EP......... 611
National defense. See Defense, national National labor relations board
  Attacks on; EP.................. 405
  Committee report on Wagner act and labor board; E.................. 501
  Decision in Ford case; EP............ 611
  Economic research division, funds restored by senate; EP................ 555
  Forbids distribution of anti-union leaflets by Ford; company complains; EP.... 639
  Packing of the board. W. Gaston; C.. 432
  Record in the courts; EP............. 148
  Republic steel case; victory for the board; EP 463
  Smith committee investigation; EP..... 30
  "Wagner act" for employers. A. A. Michael; S....387; see also C...... 524
  Wagner act amendment favored by W. Green; EP 722
  Wagner act interpretation by the supreme court; EP.................. 30
  Wagner act investigation by Smith committee; EP 30
  Whittling away the Wagner act; E.... 352
National park service. O. G. Villard; S.... 569
Naval power against air power, in war; EP. 525
Navarro, Frank, case of. C. McWilliams; C. 580
Navies; battleships, monster, proposed. O. G. Villard; S 76
Navy, United States. See United States—Navy
Nazi-soviet pact. See Germany—Pact, nonaggression, with Russia
Nazism. See Fascism and nazism; Germany
Near east. See War, European Nebraska; primaries, defeat of Burke; EP. 497
Nef, John U.
  On "The irresponsibles"; C............ 718
Negroes
  Anti-lynching bill, opposition to; EP ....434; EP 583
  End of Christy Tucker, the. E. Caldwell; S 673
  Four accused of murder in Pompano, Florida; supreme court decision for; E.....269; see also letters.......... 404
  Lynching; poem on. K. G. Chapin; P.. 707
  Slave markets in the Bronx. C. Offord; S 780
Netherlands; invasion by nazis; E......... 612
  Nazi governor appointed. R. M. W. Kempner; C 691
Netherlands East Indies. See Dutch East Indies
Neuberger, Richard L.
  Grand Coulee dam; S................. 675
Neutrality. See War; War, European
New deal, the. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
New masses, the. J. North and A. B. Magil; C......348; see also EP............ 238
New year, the. F. Kirchwey; S............ 4
New York city
  Police, on picketing. K. Weiss; C..... 692
  Police membership in Christian front; E......239; EP 267
  Relief, cost of, and cuts in WPA; EP.. 323
  Transit lines unification; EP......350; EP 694
    See also Transport workers' union
New York public library picture service; C.. 608
New York state
  Job-insurance system, weakness in; EP.. 350
  Progressive program, Lehman's; EP... 30
  Unemployment insurance law; amendment needed; EP.................. 238
Newspapers
  American newspaper guild
    Chicago, fined; EP.................. 405
    Crawford election as president; EP.. 59
    Strike against Hearst Chicago papers; aid needed. H. D. Wohl; C...... 432
    Victory against Hearst in Chicago; EP 555
  Ideal. V. S. Yarros; C.............. 56
  PM; new-style newspaper. R. H. Rovere; S......700; see also EP............ 611
  New York, on the Russell case; EP.... 555
    See also Freedom of the press; names of newspapers under names of cities
Niebuhr, Reinhold
  End to illusions; S.................. 778
  German opponents of Hitler, aid needed; C 787
  Idealists as cynics; S..............72; see also C......263; C............. 319
Night music. J. W. Krutch; D............ 316
Norris, Senator, on Associated gas and electric trusteeship; EP................ 266
  On FBI Detroit raids; EP............ 610
North, Joseph, and A. B. Magil
  New masses, the; C...............348; see also EP.................. 238
Northwest, conspiracy in. H. Lundy; S.383; see also C.................. 496
Norway
  Attitude toward Finland; EP.......... 85
  Betrayal to nazis; EP................ 497
  British defeat, and effect on campaign against England; E................ 583
  Fight against the nazis; EP.......... 525
  Fighting in; EP.................. 553
  German "white paper" on invasion; EP 553
  Narvik, importance of. F. Sternberg; S 590
  Nazi "fifth column" in. F. Kirchwey; S 529
  Occupation by Germans; EP........... 723
  Statement on war, by Pittman, distorted by Hearst newspapers; EP.......... 533
    See also Scandinavia
Novels. See Books
Nover, Barnet
  Hull, Cordell; S.................. 729
  United States and the war; S.......... 615
Noyes, Charles E.
  Trade with Latin America, and the national defense; S.................. 726

O

O'Donnell, George Marion
  Song: To exiled art; P................ 210
O'Dwyer, William, work against crime trust. J. Freeman; S.................. 645
Offord, Carl
  Slave markets in the Bronx; S........ 780
O'Keefe, Ruth
  Catholic press; C.......83; see also 27, 111
Oil
  And the good neighbor. B. D. Wolfe; S 537
  Madison oil trust case; supreme court decision; EP 610
Old-age insurance; Wagner bill for extension; EP 295
Olson, Culbert, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
Our town. F. Hoellering; MP............ 763

P

P., A.
  Italian steamship lines, extortion by; C. 375
P., H. G.
  Nature's miracles in Finland; C...... 110
PM; new-style newspaper. R. H. Rover; S......700; see also EP............ 611
Pacifism; defense of. E. R. Bentley; C......263; see also 72; C.......... 319
  Pacifists in war time. L. B. Milner; C......607; see also C............ 691
  Villard, O. G., leaves The Nation on issue 782
Pacts, trade, and tariffs; E............... 33
Paintings. See Art
Pan-American cartel, proposed, of Roosevelt; EP 770
Pan-Americanism and Pan-American union, fifty years of; E.................. 502
Palestine; sales of Arab land to Jews banned by House of commons; EP.......... 351
Park service, national. O. G. Villard; S.... 569
Passport, purge by; E.................. 117
Patriotism plus; E.................. 724
Pecora, Ferdinand; address at The Nation's dinner to Mrs. Roosevelt............ 626
Peffer, Nathaniel
  War in the east: New phase; S........ 180
Penn, Arthur
  Four Negroes, case of; C..........404; see also E.................. 269
Persian art, exhibition. J. Mellquist; A.... 577
Petersen, Arnold
  On Corey attacks on communism; C, 579; see also Corey, L.
Petri, Egon, recital. B. H. Haggin; M.... 662
Petrillo, James C., attack on J. L. Lewis; EP 30
Petroleum. See Mexico; Oil
Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.
Piatt, Marybelle
  War aims, real; C..347; see also E, 149; 174
Picketing. See Labor unions
Pickpockets, inc.; E.................. 465
Pike, Sumner T., appointment to SEC; EP. 666
Pinocchio. F. Hoellering; MP............ 261
Pittman, Senator, statement on war distorted by Hearst newspapers; EP.......... 533
Poems
  And they lynched him on a tree. K. G. Chapin 707
  Crime. R. P. Warren................ 655
  I remember the block party. O. Williams 202
  Memory. C. Sandburg................ 172
  My country. E. Swan................ 200
  My son. D. C. Dejong............... 655
  Song: To exiled art. G. M. O'Donnell. 210
  Vision of labor, a. W. C. Williams.. 200
  When does the play begin? J. Laughlin 202
Poisoning case; Miracle whip; EP......... 771
Poland
  Atrocities by nazis; EP.............. 113
  Jews. See Jews
  Mass murder in. H. Daniel; S...... 92
Police, New York city. See New York city
Politics; and peace. F. Kirchwey; S..... 242
  And polls. C. T. Watson; C......263; see also 64
Poll tax, southern. M. Maverick; S....... 592
Pollak, Walter H., trustee for Associated gas and electric; EP.................. 322
Polling America. J. Wechsler; S......64; see also C.................. 263
Polls, Gallup. J. Wechsler; S..........64; see also C.................. 263
Poor man's credit. K. Hutchison; S........ 308
Pope, Arthur D.
  What the nazis think; C.............. 347
Pope regrets, the. S. Cloete; S.......... 777
Porter, Katherine Anne
  Day's work, a; S.................. 205
  Porter, Katherine Anne. By M. Marshall; S 473
Porters, railroad, service. A redcap; C.... 765
Post-Dispatch, Saint Louis. See Freedom of the press
Pound and franc unite. F. Sternberg; S... 68
Powys, Llewellyn; letters sought. A. A. De Lima; C.................. 376
Pratt, Caroline, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
Presidential campaign of 1940
  Candidates for nominations, chances; EP 581
  Dewey, T. E.; facts about. O. G. Villard; S 282
  Dewey victories in Nebraska, Wisconsin and Illinois; Roosevelt in Illinois; EP 497
  Effect of the European war. K. G. Crawford; S....162; see also EP.... 638
  Hull-Jackson ticket. K. G. Crawford; S 63
  Men who would be president:
    I. John Nance Garner. By A. A. Michie; S 299
    II. Thomas E. Dewey. By J. Richmond; S..356; see also C..496; C 551
    III. Paul V. McNutt. By M. S. Mayer; S.....415; see also C..... 496
    IV. Wendell L. Willkie. By McA. Coleman; S...469; see also EP... 461
    V. Burton K. Wheeler. By R. Bendiner; S 532
    VI. Arthur H. Vandenberg. By M. S. Mayer; S 587
    VIII. Robert A. Taft. By R. S. Allen; S 649
    VIII. Cordell Hull. By B. Nover; S 729
    IX. Franklin D. Roosevelt. By M. Lerner; S 752
  Politics and peace. F. Kirchwey; S... 242
  Presidential possibilities. O. G. Villard; S 310
  Primary votes, both sides; EP........ 461
  Republican convention. C. Malcolmson; S 747
  Republican foreign-affairs plank; EP... 770
  Roosevelt third term vitally important. F. Kirchwey; S.................. 743
  Socialist convention and nomination of N. Thomas; EP.................. 462
Press. See Newspapers
Press, catholic. See Roman catholic church—press
Press, freedom of. See Freedom of the press
Price-fixing; Guffey act decision by United States supreme court; EP........... 639
Primrose quartet. B. H. Haggin; M...... 318
Profits, war; E.................. 724

- Progressives; letter by L. Rosner......765; see also 718
- Prokofiev. B. H. Haggin; M........ 458
- Prologue to February. F. Hoellering; S.... 478
- Propaganda; radio. Low; Ct........ 125
  - War, by radio. H. B. Kranz; S...... 123
  - See also "Fifth column"
- Public finance. See Finance, public
- Public utilities
  - Holding-company abuses; EP........ 322
  - Holding-company control defended by Willkie; EP 349
  - SEC rules for relations with investment bankers. K. Hutchison; S........ 421
  - See also Associated gas and electric company; Consumers power company
- Publishing houses, salaries; E........ 642
- Puerto Rico. F. Kirchwey; S..327, 381, 409, 438; see also C........ 663
  - Political and economic conditions; EP.. 115
- Pulitzer prize awards; EP........ 611

R

- R., A. P.
  - ROTC at Harvard; C......524; see also 394
- R., M.
  - Laura Lee murder; C......523; see also 383; C........ 496
- ROTC. See Reserve officers training corps
- Radio
  - Commentators. M. Marshall; S........ 570
  - Federation of musicians demand on broadcasters; EP 30
  - Propaganda. Low; Ct........ 125
  - War propaganda. H. B. Kranz; S..... 123
- Railroads; passenger fare reduction; EP.... 267
  - Sick. J. N. Rosenberg; C........ 110
- Ransom, Leon A., on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
- Ratcliffe, S. K.
  - Hobson, John A.; S........ 512
- Rebecca. F. Hoellering; MP........ 521
- Recorded music. See Haggin, B. H.
- Redcap, a
  - Friendly redcap service; C........ 765
- Refugees
  - Children, movement for; EP......407; EP 741
  - Enterprises. V. Heller; C........ 319
  - German, in France. M. Winkler; C.... 290
  - In France; peril from nazi occupation; E 773
  - In Scandinavia, fate of. O. G. Villard; S 542
  - Labor service, in France. S. Strunsky; C 607
  - Plea for admission to United States. F. Kirchwey; S 669
  - Sosua, colony in Dominican republic. F. Kirchwey; S 466
  - Spanish. See Spain
- Regler, Gustav, author, in French concentration camp; EP........ 321
- Relief, farm. See Agriculture
- Relief, unemployment. See Unemployment relief
- Remember. F. Hoellering; MP........ 25
- Republic steel; "friend" of labor; EP...... 499
  - Union victory in court; EP........ 463
- Republican party, and Lincoln. I. F. Stone; S 307
  - Philadelphia convention. C. Malcolmson; S 747
  - Program committee report, by G. Frank; E 325
  - See also Presidential campaign of 1940
- Reserve officers training corps at university of California. M. D. Glickfeld; C ......524; see also........ 394
- Reunion in New York. J. W. Krutch; D.. 316
- Reynaud, Premier. See France
- Reynolds amendment to LaFollette civil-liberties bill; EP 694
- Richardson, A. P., on The Nation's honor roll for 1939........ 6
- Richmond, John
  - Dewey, T. E., as aspirant for the presidency; S......356; see also C....496; C 551
- Rights, civil. See Civil rights
- Riklin, Seymour, and H. W. Basehart
  - "Cultural" intimacies with Latin America; C......320; see also........ 170
- Rivera, Diego; fantasies. H. Block; C...... 55
- Rivera, Rodolfo O.
  - Puerto Rico pays; C......663; see also Kirchwey, F.
- Rogers, Edith Nourse, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
- Roman catholic church
  - And secular and religious education; EP ......435; see also C........ 607
  - Appointment of Taylor as Roosevelt personal representative at the vatican; EP 1
  - Break with the nazis; EP........ 113
  - National catholic welfare conference statement on social order; EP....267; see also C........ 347
  - Press, real; letters by R. O'Keefe, F. A. Hall and H. R. Southworth....27, 83, 111
- Roosevelt, Mrs. Eleanor
  - Fear, enemy of democracy; S........ 173
  - Nation, The, award and dinner; addresses by Mrs. Roosevelt and others.....623; see also EP 583
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1939... 6
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
  - Administration:
    - Budget; EP 29
    - Cabinet; appointments of Stimson and Knox; EP 770
    - National defense; message being prepared; EP 611
    - Defense, national, Roosevelt address; EP 665
    - Defense, national, Roosevelt address to Congress. O. G. Villard; S....... 683
    - Defense plans. O. G. Villard; S..... 710
    - Diplomatic appointments; EP........ 31
    - Financial policy, and congress; EP... 2
    - Foreign policy. F. Kirchwey; S..... 558
    - Lewis, J. L., attack on the president; EP 770
    - Lewis, Roosevelt, and the United mine workers of America. R. M. Stein; S 248
    - Lewis-Roosevelt feud. K. G. Crawford; S 271
    - Message to congress. F. Kirchwey; S 34
    - New deal, beyond. K. Hutchison; S.. 167
    - Pan-American cartel, proposed; EP.. 770
    - Peace move; EP........ 1
    - Roosevelt and the presidency. M. Lerner; S 752
    - Third term vitally important. F. Kirchwey; S 743
    - Views, for and against. O. G. Villard; S 477
    - WPA appropriations; president's request on spending; EP........ 527
  - Anniversary congratulations to The Nation 145
  - Charlottesville address on the war; "stab in the back" address; EP........ 721
- Rosenberg, James N.
  - On The lights go down, by E. Mann; C......663; see also........ 574
  - Railroads, sick; C........ 110
- Rosenfeld, Paul
  - Mexican art; exhibit at Modern museum, New York; A........ 661
  - Paintings, Italian; exhibit in New York; A 287
- Rosinger, Lawrence K.
  - On Haggin comment on leaflets with Victor records; C......607; see also 402; C 691
- Rosner, Lester
  - Answer to the progressives; C, 765; see also 718
- Rourke, Constance
  - Art in our town; S........ 424
- Rovere, Richard H.
  - Klan rides again; S........ 445
  - PM; S 700
- Rowe, Harry
  - Blackout in Canada; C........ 403
- Rukeyser, Muriel
  - Biographical material on W. Gibbs sought; C 692
- Rumania; and the war; E........ 116
  - Pressure on, by nazis; EP........ 406
- Russell, Bertrand
  - And Benjamin Franklin. By Anxious Father; C 552
  - Appeal of case; EP........ 497
  - Appointment sustained by board of higher education; EP 377
  - Attack on, in New York; EP........ 350
  - Attempt to sidetrack issues; EP........ 461
  - Case for. J. Dewey; S........ 732
  - Editorial views on case; EP........ 555
  - Facts behind case; E........ 436
  - Fund for defense; EP......461; see also C 496
  - Legal fight impending; EP........ 526
  - Mathematics versus "morals." M. La Manna; C 403
  - McGeehan decision. A. F. G.; C...... 579
  - What I believe; S........ 412
- Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Russian bank. J. W. Krutch; D........ 716

S

- SEC. See Securities and exchange commission
- Saint Louis Post-Dispatch. See Freedom of the press
- Salaries. See Labor
- Sandburg, Carl
  - Memory; P 172
- Sandburg, Carl, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
- Saposs, David, attacks on; EP........ 55
- Saroyan, William, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
- Scalise, George, arrested on racketeering charge; EP 527
- Scandinavia
  - Defensive alliance proposed; EP....... 406
  - Extension of war to; E........ 500
  - German aggression and American business. K. Hutchison; S........ 540
  - Hitler's gamble in. K. Hutchison; S... 504
  - Nazi attack on. O. G. Villard; S..... 514
  - Next in European war? J. Joesten; S.. 41
  - Refugees in; fate of. O. G. Villard; S 542
  - Spread of war to; E........ 464
  - War in; E........ 464
  - See also names of countries
- Schachtman, Max
  - Reply to L. Corey's articles on Marxism; S 331
- Schnabel, A., concert. B. H. Haggin; M.. 550
- Schola cantorum. See Music
- Scholars and writers; irresponsibles. A MacLeish; S......618; see also EP, 611, 678; C........ 718
- Schools; education, secular and religious, and the catholic church; EP......435; see also C 607
- Schreiber, Georges, and others
  - New York public library picture service; C 608
- Schuman, Frederick L.
  - America's stake in Britain's war; S... 11
- Schwartzer, Martin
  - Barth, T., and Die Nation; C........ 348
- Sea power against air power, in war; EP... 525
- Securities and exchange commission
  - Attack on K. Hutchison; S........ 74
  - Attacks on, for rules governing utility companies; K. Hutchison; S........ 421
  - Pike, S. T., appointment; EP........ 666
- Servants, domestic; working for the wealthy. M. R.; C........ 459
- Shakespeare in Germany. M. Marshall; S.. 570
- Shanghai, Japanese defeated in elections; EP 499
- Share-croppers. See Agriculture
- Shasta county, California; anti-picketing ordinance invalidated; EP........ 533
- Sheen, Fulton J.; funeral oration for H. Broun. T. S. Harding; C........ 111
- Shiveley, Carlton; on excess war profits; E 724
- Shop around the corner, the. F. Hoellering; MP 261
- Shridharani, Krishnalal
  - Gandhi has decided; S......564; see also EP 555
- Sidewalks of London. F. Hoellering; MP.. 346
- Sitdown strikes. See Strikes
- Slave markets in the Bronx. C. Offord; S.. 780
- Sloan, George A.
  - Metropolitan opera, future of; C....347; see also 260
- Sloan, John
  - Independent artists' show; C........ 460
- Smith bill, against criminal syndicalism; EP 771
- Smith committee investigation of NLRB; EP 30
- Social order; Roman catholic statement on; EP......267; see also C........ 347
- Socialism, Wagnerian; E........ 270
  - See also Marxism
- Socialist party; and illusions concerning the war. R. Niebuhr; S........ 778
  - Convention and nomination of N. Thomas; EP 462
- Society of independent artists, show. J. Sloan; C........ 460
- Solberg, Thorvald
  - New copyright bill; C......291; see also C 432
- Sosua, refugee colony. F. Kirchwey; S... 466
- South, the
  - Books for workers. R. S. Hilborn; C.. 580
  - Farm relief in; E........ 353
  - Poll tax. M. Maverick; S........ 592
  - Twilight of the chain gang. W. Wilson; S......44; correction 111
- South Africa. See Union of South Africa
- South America. See Latin America
- Southern tenant farmers' union and farm relief; E 353
- Southworth, H. Rutledge
  - Catholic press; C......84; see also 27, 83, 111
- Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Spain
  - Conditions; land restored to grandees; EP 351
  - Franco, one year of. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S......418; see also E........ 408
  - Liberal and reactionary; L. White's review of C. de la Mora's "In place of splendor". M. Adams; C........ 56
  - Refugees in France; New York demonstration for; E......408; see also... 418
  - Volunteers for, arrests of recruiting officers; EP 238
  - Volunteers for, indictments of recruiters for loyalists dismissed; EP........ 267
  - War; aid in compiling bibliography sought. S. H. Brown; C........ 376
- Stamps, food, plan for. J. Whitbread; S... 507
- Star, Washington. See Washington Star
- Steamship lines, Italian, extortion by. A. P.; C 375
- Steel and iron; first quarter of year profittable; EP 534

Steel workers. See Republic steel corporation
Stein, Rose M.
  Lewis, Roosevelt, and the United mine workers of America; S............ 249
  Sudden death underground; S......... 562
Steinbeck, John, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
  "The grapes of wrath" preview. M. Mok; S......127; see also C........ 291
Sterling: Fears and facts. K. Hutchison; S. 475
Sternberg, Fritz
  Pound and franc unite; S............ 68
Stewart, Maxwell S.
  Looking toward the peace; S.......... 594
  Trade treaties and "realism": S....... 94
Stimson, Henry L., appointment to cabinet; EP 770
Stocks; effect on Wall Street of Hitler advance. K. Hutchison; S............ 652
Stone, Justice Harlan F.; opinion in case of Jehovah's witnesses; EP............ 723
Stone, I. F.
  Apex indecision, the; S............... 705
  "Free inquiry and free endeavor"; Godkin and The Nation; S............ 159
  Lincoln nobody knew; S............... 307
Stowe, Leland
  Time against Finland; S.............. 243
Stowe, Leland; scoop on fall of Oslo; EP.. 497
Strachey, John, leaves communists; EP..... 667
Streit, Clarence; plan for federation of democracies. W. E. Collier; C....... 83
Strikes, sitdown; Apex case indecision: I. F. Stone; S 705
  See also Luggage workers; Transport workers' union
Strunsky, Sheba
  Labor service for refugees; C......... 607
Student union. See American student union
Supreme court, United States
  Apex case indecision. I. F. Stone; S.. 705
  Guffey act decision; EP.............. 639
  Jehovah's witnesses; conviction reversed; EP 666
  Liberalism, return to; EP............. 148
  Madison oil trust case decision, on antitrust law; EP..................... 610
  Murphy appointment; EP............... 29
  Negroes, four, of Pompano, Florida; decision for; E......269; see also letters 404
  Upholds right to picket; EP........... 533
  Wagner act interpretation; EP........ 30
  Walsh-Healy act decision; EP......... 582
Suspect. J. W. Krutch; D................ 522
Swan, Emma
  My country; P........................ 200
Sweden
  Attitude toward Finland; EP......... 85
  Prepares for war. M. Feldman; S..... 42
  Trojan horse. M. Feldman; S.......... 531
  See also Scandinavia
Sweeney, Vin D.
  Wagner act for employers; C......524; see also 387
Swing, Raymond Gram
  Incitement to treason; S.............. 177
  Youth, war, and freedom; S.......... 749
Swing, Raymond Gram, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939................. 6
  Radio commentator. M. Marshall; S... 570
Syndicalism, criminal; Smith bill; EP...... 771
Syphilis, moving picture on; EP........... 268

T

Taft, Robert Alphonso. R. S. Allen; S.... 649
Tariff; and trade pacts; E................ 33
  Hull program; breakdown between Argentina and the United States; EP... 58
Taxation. See Finance, public
Taylor, Myron C., appointment as Roosevelt personal representative at the vatican; EP 1
Telephone rates, reduction in; EP.......... 378
Television. E. M. Jones; S................ 447
Ten Eyck, Barent
  Dewey, T. E., methods; letter, and reply by J. Richmond; C......551; see also 356; C 496
Theater, the; reviewing plays. J. W. Krutch; D 222
  See also Krutch, J. W., for reviews
There shall be no night. J. W. Krutch; D.. 605
Thinkers, see Irresponsibles
Thomas, Elbert, on The Nation's honor roll for 1939 6
Thomas, Norman
  McNutt, Paul V.; C......496; [illegible] also 415
  Reply to L. Corey's articles on Marxism; S 328
Thomas, Norman, nomination for president; EP 462
Thompson, Dorothy; unemployment figures; E 380
Thorp, Willard Long
  On "The irresponsibles"; S............ 682
Thorp, Willard Long, trustee for Associated gas and electric; EP............... 322
Tibet; enthronement of Dalai lama; EP..... 294
Torrid zone. F. Hoellering; MP.......... 716
Totalitarianism versus democracy. M. Marshall; S 311
Totalitarian states. See Fascism and nazism
Trade. See Business
Trade agreements
  And "realism." M. S. Stewart; S..... 94
  And tariffs; E....................... 33
  Extension; EP 498
  Upheld; E 297
Transit, rapid. See New York city
Transport workers' union; and Mayor LaGuardia; EP......350; EP......... 377
  Possible strike; EP.................. 433
  Strike averted; EP.................. 462
Treaties, trade. See Trade agreements
Trotsky, Leon; attack on. H. Block; S.... 703
Trusts, investment. See Investment trusts
Turkey; and the war. O. G. Villard; S......358; see also EP 237
  Not neutral in war. N. Muvaffak; S.. 250
Two on an island. J. W. Krutch; D....... 136

U

U. S. S. R. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Unemployment; figures, Dorothy Thompson's; E 380
Unemployment insurance
  Failure of; EP...................... 583
  New York state insurance law; amendment needed; EP................. 238
  New York state system, weakness in; EP 350
Unemployment relief
  Bill passed by house; EP............. 666
  Cut in Roosevelt budget; EP.......... 29
  Food-stamp plan. J. Whitbread; S..... 507
  President's request on WPA spending; EP 527
Union of South Africa; politics in war time; EP 114
Union of soviet socialist republics
  After twenty-two years. L. Fischer; S 182
  And Great Britain; negotiations for trade pact; SP.................. 293
  And the war; neutrality indicated; EP 433
  And the war; soviet views; EP........ 722
  Army command, reorganization; EP.... 609
  Baltic states, occupation by U. S. S. R.; EP 741
  Breach with allies probable; EP....... 293
  Diplomatic moves; EP................ 609
  Pact, nonaggression, with Russia. See Germany
  Socialism in. A. Brody and A. Mather; letters 55
  Today
    II. Foreign policy: Geneva to Helsinki. L. Fischer; S......7; see also C 111
    III. Death of a revolution. L. Fischer; S 37
  Views on the war; EP................ 722
    See also Finland; Japanese-soviet relations
Unions, labor. See Labor unions
United mine workers of America, Lewis, and Roosevelt. R. M. Stein; S.......... 248
United States
  Agencies, governmental; Logan-Walter bill for regulation; EP......294; E.. 528
  Agencies, governmental; ruling on procedure; EP 148
  And Argentina; breakdown in tariff negotiations; EP 58
  And Japan
    Hope for embargo wanes; EP........ 294
    Relations; E......151; see also C......375; EP......582; E..... 746
    Trade treaty expiration; EP......... 113
  And the war. F. Kirchwey; S........ 613
  And the war. B. Nover; S........... 615
    Alternatives, imperfect, for United States, in the war. W. T. Couch; C......319; see also 72; C.....263; C 403
    America is not neutral. F. Kirchwey; S 613
    American aid for the allies; EP..... 666
    America's stake in Britain's war. F. L. Schuman; S 11
    Entry expected by nazis. O. G. Villard; S 450
    German victory, possible, and America. F. Kirchwey; S.................. 695
    Isolation, according to Lindbergh; EP 637
    Neutrality, American. F. Kirchwey; S 503
    Presidential election and the war. K. G. Crawford; S......162; see also EP 638
    Profits, excess; E................... 724
    Roosevelt on America's position. F. Kirchwey; S 34
    Roosevelt's Charlottesville "stab in the back" address; EP............... 721
    Stake in Britain's war. F. L. Schuman; S 11
    Trade restriction by the war; EP.... 113
    What America can do to aid the allies; E 696
  Diplomatic appointments; EP.......... 31
  Enemies within; E.................... 745
  Foreign policy; "American white paper," by Alsop and Kintner. F. Kirchwey; S 558
  Income, national, in 1939; EP........ 295
  Military policy. O. G. Villard; S..... 757
  Navy; battleships, monster. O. G. Villard; S 76
    Big, for what? G. T. Davis; S...... 560
    Building program in Vinson bill; EP 58
  Tariffs and trade pacts; E............ 33
  Trade, foreign. See Business
    See also Japanese-American relations
United States supreme court. See Supreme court, United States
Untermyer, Samuel; death; EP........... 378
Utilities, public. See Public utilities
Utley, Freda
  Japan's red flirtation; S.............. 278

V

Vambery, Rustem
  On aliens; C......................... 765
Vandenberg, Arthur H. M. S. Mayer; S.... 587
Van Doren, Carl
  Nation, The, and the American novel; S 212
Vargas, President, views on dictatorship; EP 742
Vatican. See Roman catholic church
Vayo, Julio Alvarez del
  Italian entrance into the war; S....... 671
  One year of Franco; S......418; see also E 408
Vienna; prologue to February. F. Hoellering; S 478
Villard, Oswald Garrison
  "Hypocrisy" in praising efficiency? C......765; see also............599, 663
  Issues and men:
    Armaments; S 47
    Battleships, monster; S............ 76
    Boulder dam; S.................... 569
    British cabinet weakness; S......599; see also C......663; C.......... 765
    Criticized by reader; S............. 477
    Defense of the British; S........... 130
    Dewey, Thomas E; S............... 282
    Eire's case against England; S...... 254
    Hitler plan to smash England; S..... 366
    Lansbury, G; death; S............. 628
    Latin America, situation in; S....... 734
    Lippmann, W., on national defense; S 654
    Mediation in the war, possibility of; S......101; see also 87, C....... 290
    Militarism in education; S......394; see also C...................... 524
    Military policy of the United States; S 757
    National park service; S........... 569
    Peace, early, prospects for; S........ 423
    Presidential possibilities; S.......... 310
    Refugees in Scandinavia, fate of; S.. 542
    Roosevelt, F. D.; S................ 477
    Roosevelt on national defense; S..683, 710
    Scandinavia, nazi attack on; S....... 514
    Turkey and the war; S............. 358
    United States war entry expected by nazis; S 450
    Valedictory; S 782
    War in the air; S.................. 20
  Leaves The Nation on issue of pacifism; S 782
  Villard's Nation. L. S. Gannett; S.... 155
Vinson bill. See United States—Navy
Viton, Albert
  Great Britain; doomed? S............ 774

W

WPA. See Works progress administration
Wages. See Labor
Wages and hours act. See Labor
Wagner, Robert F.
  Bill for mediation board; EP.......... 295
  Bills for extension of old-age insurance; EP 295
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1939.... 6
Wagner act. See National labor relations board
Wagner-Lea bill. See Investment trusts
Wagnerian socialism; E.................. 270
Wales, Nym
  Chinese industrial cooperatives; S..509; see also C.......................... 523
Wall street. See Stocks
Walsh-Healey act upheld; EP............. 582
Wang Ching-wei. See Chinese-Japanese war
War; air power against sea power; EP..... 525
  Economic warfare; E................. 3
  In the air. O. G. Villard; S......... 20
  Peace lovers versus war lovers. E. E. Mist; C......663; see also 599; see also C 765
  Youth, war, and freedom. R. G. Swing; S 749

- War, European (see also names of countries and regions)
  - Advance on Paris; EP.......... 721
  - Aim in the struggle. J. P. Lash; C... 787
  - Aims, nazi and fascist; E.......... 324
  - Aims, real. M. Piatt; C......347; see also E 149; 174
  - Air power against sea power; EP...... 525
  - Altmark, steamship, rescue of British captives; EP 265
  - American colonies, if nazis win; EP.... 769
  - Asama Maru incident; EP.......... 237
  - Blitzkreig, postponement. Low; Ct..... 363
  - Blockade, British, and the neutrals; EP 1
  - Blockade, extension to the Pacific; EP.. 462
  - Bombing of cities; EP.......... 693
  - Civilization at stake; E.......... 612
  - Democracy versus nazism; E......149; see also 174; C.......... 347
  - Extensions, probable; EP.......... 293
  - "Fifth columns." F. Kirchwey; S..... 529
  - German and Italian aims; E.......... 324
  - German victory, possible, and America. F. Kirchwey; S.......... 695
  - German-Russian pact. See Germany
  - Hitler plan to smash England. O. G. Villard; S 366
  - Hitler triumph in Europe; escape and appeasement. F. Kirchwey; S...... 773
  - Hitlerism, destruction of, as war aim. R. G. Swing; S.......... 177
  - Hitler's "peace offers." Low; Ct...... 179
  - Holiday. Low; ct.......... 596
  - Illusions, end to. R. Niebuhr; S...... 778
  - Invasion of England. E. Banse; S..... 616
  - Mediation, possible? F. Kirchwey; S......87; see also 101, C.......... 290
  - Military and diplomatic moves; E..... 32
  - Nation, The, stand on the war; resignation of Oswald Garrison Villard; S.. 782
  - Near east situation; EP.......... 237
  - Neutral rights, violation by Great Britain; EP 31
  - Neutrals, need for union; EP.......... 85
  - Neutrals, tension among; EP.......... 57
  - Peace, early, prospects for. O. G. Villard; S 423
  - Peace, looking toward. M. S. Stewart; S 594
  - Peace, nazi offer. Low; Ct.......... 506
  - Peace drive by nazis following defeat of Finland; E......379; see also 385; C 459
  - Peace move by Roosevelt; EP.......... 1
  - Politics and peace. F. Kirchwey; S.... 242
  - Post-war economic co-operation, plans for; EP 266
  - Present war and that of 1914-1918. R. Dell; S 441
  - Radio propaganda. H. B. Kranz; S... 123
  - Radio propaganda. Low; Ct.......... 125
  - Refugees, aid needed; EP.......... 239
  - Russo-German pact. See Germany
  - Same now as in 1914. S. L. J.; C.... 376
  - Supposing Hitler wins. F. Kirchwey; S 640
  - Totalitarianism versus democracy. M. Marshall; S 311
  - Welles, S., return of; and nazi and fascist attempts to impress him; E... 324
  - Winter in war-time Europe; EP....... 265
  - See also Refugees
- Warren, Robert Penn
  - Crime; P 655
- Washington letters 36 (see also EP, 30); 63, 119, 271, 355, 440, 615, 644, 699, 747
- Washington Star; story of British "invasion" of Holland; E 528
- Washington state; anti-labor conspiracy. H. Lundy; S......383; see also C...... 496
- Wasson, C. T.
  - Polls and politics; C......263; see also. 64
- Wealthy, working for. M. R.; C.......... 459
- Weber, Brom
  - Seeks prose by Hart Crane; C.......... 404
- Wechsler, James
  - Christian front and M. Dies; S........ 89
  - Polling America; S......64; see also C 263
- Wechsler, James, leaves The Nation; joins staff of PM; EP.......... 611
- Weiss, Katherine
  - Picketing; New York city police on; C.. 692
- Welles, Sumner, return, and nazi and fascist attempts to impress him; E.......... 324
- Werth, Alexander
  - France and the war; S.......... 275
- Wheeler, Burton K.; presidential possibility. R. Bendiner; S.......... 532
- Whitbread, Jane
  - "Stamping" out hunger; S.......... 507
- White, Leigh; review of C. de la Mora's "In place of splendor." M. Adams; C... 56
- White, Walter
  - Four Negroes, case of; C......404; see also E 269
- White, William Allen; address at The Nation's dinner to Mrs. Roosevelt...... 623
  - Head of committee to aid allies; EP.... 666
- "White book," German. See Germany
- White-collar salaries; E.......... 642
- White house conference on children in a democracy; E 118
- "White paper, American," by Alsop and Kintner. F. Kirchwey; S.......... 558
- Wiesner, Arthur P.
  - Milwaukee election; C.......... 523
- Williams, Oscar
  - I remember the block party; P.......... 202
- Williams, William Carlos
  - Vision of labor, a; P.......... 200
- Willkie, Wendell L.; candidacy. McA. Coleman; S......469; see also.......... 461
  - Defends holding companies; EP........ 349
- Wilson, Walter
  - Twilight of the chain gang; S......44; correction 111
- Winkler, Max
  - German refugees in France; C.......... 290
- Winter in war-time Europe; EP.......... 265
- Winter miscellany—four poems; selected by J. Berryman 200
- Wireless. See Radio
- Wohl, Harry D.
  - Strike against Hearst's Chicago newspapers; aid needed; C.......... 432
- Wolfe, Bertram D.
  - Oil and the good neighbor; S.......... 537
  - Reply to L. Corey's articles on Marxism; S 329
- Wood, T. E.
  - Election in Canada; S.......... 391
- Works progress administration
  - Appropriation, attempt to cut; EP...... 498
  - Appropriation; president's request on spending; EP 527
  - Ban on relief to aliens, communists and members of bund; EP.......... 666
  - Cuts, and effect on relief in New York city; EP 323
  - Minneapolis; cuts or jail. D. Macdonald; S......120; see also EP.... 238
- Writers. See Authors

Y

- Yarros, Victor S.
  - Ideal newspaper, the; C.......... 56
- Young Tom Edison. F. Hoellering; MP... 521
- Youth, war, and freedom. R. G. Swing; S.. 749
- Youth congress. See American youth congress
- Yugoslavia, danger from Italy; E.......... 556

Z

- Zanuck, Darryl F., preview of "The grapes of wrath." M. Mok; S......127; see also C.......... 291
- Zeidler, Carl Frederick; election as mayor of Milwaukee; C 523

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B	Book review
AN	Brief annotation
R	Reviewer

A

- A. T. & T.: The story of industrial conquest. N. R. Danelian; B.......... 102
  - See also Amer. Tel. & Tel.
- About people, W. Steig; B.......... 48
- Abrams, Charles
  - Revolution in land; B.......... 103
- Abramson, Victor, L. S. Lyon, and M. W. Watkins
  - Government and economic life. Development and current issues of American public policy. Volume I; B.......... 314
- Accent on power: The life and times of Machiavelli. V. Marcu. Translated by R. Winston; B.......... 79
- Acculturation in seven American Indian tribes. Edited by R. Linton; AN.... 430
- Across the dark river. P. Mendelssohn; AN 80
- Adams, Grace
  - Workers on relief; B.......... 428
- Adams, Mildred
  - Letter on L. White's review of C. de la Mora's "In place of splendor"....... 56
- Adams, Mildred; R..........711, 736
- Adler, Mortimer J.
  - How to read a book: The art of getting a liberal education; B.......... 575
- Agent of death: The memoirs of an executioner. R. G. Elliott with A. R. Beatty; B 456
- Aiken, Conrad
  - Conversation; AN 401
- Aikman, Duncan, and B. Bolles
  - America's chance of peace; B.......... 340
- Air raid: A verse play for radio. A. MacLeish; B 132
- Alexander, Roy
  - Cruise of the raider Wolf, the; AN.... 52
- Allen, Ethan, biography. S. H. Holbrook; AN 763
- Allen, Frederick Lewis
  - Since yesterday; B.......... 255
- Alsop, Joseph, and R. Kintner
  - American white paper; B.......... 558
- Alvarez del Vayo, J.
  - Freedom's battle; B.......... 711
- America was promises. A. MacLeish; B.... 132
- American entente, the. R. B. Mowat; B... 340
- American exodus, an: A record of human erosion. D. Lange and P. S. Taylor; B......77; correction, C.......... 291
- American faith. E. S. Bates; B.......... 484
- American in Paris, a: Profile of an interlude between two wars. J. Flanner; B 659
- American novel, the, 1789-1939; B......... 212
- American stakes, the. J. Chamberlain; B.. 395
- American Tel. & Tel.: The story of a great monopoly. H. Coon; B.......... 102
  - See also A. T. & T.
- American white paper. J. Alsop and R. Kintner; B 558
- America's chance of peace. D. Aikman and B. Bolles; B.......... 340
- America's house of lords. H. L. Ickes; B.. 131
- Ameringer, Oscar
  - Autobiography; If you don't weaken; B 784
- Annals of the New York stage. Volume XI. G. C. D. Odell; B.......... 53
- Another time. Poems by W. H. Auden; B 452
- Anthony Philip Heinrich. W. T. Upton; AN 52
- Aretino, scourge of princes. T. C. Chubb; AN 286
- Armstrong, Hamilton Fish, and A. W. Dulles
  - Can America stay out of war? B...... 340
- Art and life of William Shakespeare, the. H. Spencer; AN.......... 287
- Art Young: His life and times. A. Young; B 214
- As long as the grass shall grow. O. La Farge; AN 786
- Ask the dust. J. Fante; AN.......... 80
- Auden, W. H.
  - Another time. Poems; B.......... 452
- Auden, W. H.; R.......... 48
- Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, the. With sayings of Poor Richard, hoaxes, bagatelles, essays, and letters. Selected and arranged by C. Van Doren; AN 762
- Autumn journal. L. MacNeice; B......... 602
- Aviation business, the: From Kitty Hawk to Wall street. E. Freudenthal; B..... 629

B

- Barbarians within and without. L. Woolf; B 23
- Barnouw, Adriaan J.
  - Dutch, the: A portrait of the people of Holland; AN 401
- Barzun, Jacques; R..........23, 315, 482, 761
- Bates, Ernest Sutherland
  - American faith; B.......... 484
- Beard, Charles A.
  - Foreign policy for America, a; B...... 656
- Beatty, Albert R., with R. G. Elliott
  - Agent of death: The memoirs of an executioner; B 456
- Bendiner, Robert; R.......... 396
- Bennett, Richard M., with G. Hicks
  - First to awaken, the; B.......... 689
- Bernanos, Georges
  - Star of Satan, the; B.......... 783
- Bernard's brethren. C. M. Shaw; B....... 315
- Bethel Merriday. S. Lewis; AN.......... 401
- Bidwell, Percy W., and H. J. Tobin
  - Mobilizing civilian America; B........ 735
- Bingham, Alfred M.
  - United States of Europe, the; B...... 686
- Birchall, Frederick
  - Storm breaks, the; B.......... 368
- Birth of the American tradition in art, the. O. Hagen; B.......... 342
- Bishop, John Peale; R..........132, 452, 602
- Blankfort, Michael
  - Brave and the blind, the; B.......... 633
- Block, Harry; R.......... 284
- Bloody Mohawk, the. T. W. Clarke; AN... 605
- Bogan, Louise; R.......... 631
- Bolles, Blair, and D. Aikman
  - America's chance of peace; B.......... 340
- Booker, Edna Lee
  - News is my job; B.......... 456
- Books that changed our minds. Edited by M. Cowley and B. Smith; B.......... 285
- Booth family, book on. S. Kimmel; AN.... 634
- Borgese, G. A.; R.......... 543
- Boyle, Kay
  - Crazy hunter, the; B.......... 396
- Brandi, Karl
  - Emperor Charles V, the: The growth and destiny of a man and of a world-empire. C. V. Wedgwood, translator; AN 287

Index

Brave and the blind, the. M. Blankfort; B.. 633
Briffault, Robert
  Fandango; AN 577
British case, the. Lord Lloyd; B.......... 566
British empire, the. Its structure, its history, its unity, its strength. S. Leacock; B 758
Brittain, Vera
  Testament of friendship: The story of Winifred Holtby; B................ 260
Brooks, Robert R. R.; R.................. 783
Brown, Riley
  Men, wind, and sea; AN.............. 135
Bryan, Julien
  Siege; B 515
Buell, Raymond Leslie
  Isolated America; B................. 656
Burk, John N.
  Clara Schumann: A romantic biography; AN 430
Business cycles. J. A. Schumpeter; B...... 133

C

Cabot, Hugh
  Patient's dilemma, the; B............ 368
Caldwell, Erskine
  Trouble in July; B.................. 283
Calvin Coolidge. C. M. Fuess; B......342; see also C.......................... 496
Can America stay neutral? A. W. Dulles and H. F. Armstrong; B............ 340
Canada: America's problem. J. MacCormac; B 760
Caroline of England. P. Quennell; B...... 370
Carr, Edward Hallett
  Twenty years' crisis, the: 1919-1939. An introduction to the study of international relations; B................ 285
Case for federal union, the. W. B. Curry; AN 287
Catholic crisis, the. G. Seldes; B......... 49
Censor marches on, the. M. Ernest and A. Lindey; B 131
Chad Hanna. W. D. Edmonds; B........ 488
Chamberlain, John
  American stakes, the; B.............. 395
Chamberlain, John; R..................... 214
Charles V, emperor: The growth and destiny of a man and of a world-empire. K. Brandi. Translated by C. V. Wedgwood; AN 287
Chart for rough waters: Our role in a new world. W. Frank; B.............. 600
Chase, Stuart; R......................... 686
Chatham, Earl of, biography. J. C. Long; B 517
Chesterton, G. K.
  End of the armistice, the. AN....... 661
China, two books on; B.................. 105
China at war. F. Utley; B................ 105
Chip off my shoulder. T. L. Stokes; AN... 401
Christen, Toni; R........................ 257
Christopher Columbus. S. de Madariaga; B 548
Chubb, Thomas Caldecot
  Aretino, scourge of princes; AN....... 286
Church and state. L. Sturzo; B.......... 543
Citizens. M. Levin; B................... 515
Clara Schumann: A romantic biography. J. N. Burk; AN........................ 430
Clark, Kenneth
  Leonardo da Vinci: An account of his development as an artist; B.......... 518
Clarke, T. Wood
  Bloody Mohawk, the; AN............. 605
Cockpit of the revolution: The war for independence in New Jersey. L. Lundin; AN 661
Colbourne, Maurice
  Real Bernard Shaw, the; B............ 761
Collected poems of A. E. Housman, the; B.. 684
Columbus, Christopher, biography. S. de Madariaga; B 548
Common sense neutrality. Edited by P. C. French; B 340
Connecticut River, the, and other poems. R. Denney; B 103
Conversation, C. Aiken; AN.............. 401
Convert to freedom. E. W. Dobert. Translated by H. and R. Norden; AN..... 634
Coolidge, Calvin, biography. C. M. Fuess; B......342; see also C............. 496
Coon, Horace
  American Tel. & Tel.: The story of a great monopoly; B 102
Cooper, Duff
  Second world war, the: First phase; B.. 340
Corey, Lewis; R......................... 601
Crazy hunter, the. K. Boyle; B........... 396
Cruise of the raider Wolf, the. R. Alexander; AN 52
Curry, W. B.
  Case for federal union, the; AN....... 287
Czar of all the Russias. E. Lyons; B..... 451

D

Daiches, David
  Novel and the modern world, the; B.... 77
Danelian, N. R.
  A. T. & T.: The story of industrial conquest; B 102
Danger of being a gentlemen, the: And other essays. H. J. Laski; B............. 214 Dangerous thoughts. L. Hogben; B....... 482
Daniels, Jonathan
  Southerner discovers New England, a; B 629
Daniels, Jonathan; R..................... 78
Daniels, Josephus
  Tar heel editor; B.................. 737
Darby, Hugh H.; R...................344, 368
Davis, Elmer
  Not to mention the war; B........... 570
Deadly parallel, the. C. H. Grattan; B.... 340
Defoe's review. Introduction and bibliographical notes by A. W. Secord; B........ 714 de Kruif, Paul
  Health is wealth; B................. 758
Dell, Robert; R..................484, 566, 659
De Madariaga, Salvador
  Christopher Columbus; B............ 548
Democracy's Norris. A Lief; B........... 50
Denney, Reuel
  Connecticut river, the, and other poems; B 103
De Quincey: A portrait. J. C. Metcalf; AN 521
Design, three books on; B................ 489
Design this day. W. D. Teague; B........ 489
De Silver, Albert, biography. W. Nelles. Edited by L. Gannett; B............ 426
Dewey, John. An intellectual portrait. S. Hook; B 22
Dobert, Eitel Wolf
  Convert to freedom. H. and R. Norden, translators; AN 634
Does distribution cost too much? B........ 308
Don't you cry for me. J. Weld; B........ 520
Doob, Leonard W.
  Plans of men, the; AN............... 605
Dulles, Allen W., and H. F. Armstrong
  Can America stay neutral? B......... 340
Dunn, Waldo Hilary, and N. W. Stephenson
  George Washington; B............... 486
Dupee, F. W.; R.......................22, 427
Dutch, the: A portrait of the people of Holland. A. J. Barnouw; AN.......... 401

E

Eastman, Max
  Stalin's Russia and the crisis in socialism; B 711
Eaton, Clement
  Freedom of thought in the old south; AN 430
Ebenstein, William
  Fascist Italy; B.................... 134
Edmonds, Walter D.
  Chad Hanna; B...................... 488
Edwards, Jonathan, biography. O. E. Winslow; AN 577
Egotism in German philosophy. G. Santayna; B 340
Eliot, T. S.
  Idea of a Christian society, the; AN... 370
Elliott, Robert G., with A. R. Beatty
  Agent of death: The memoirs of an executioner; B 456
Emperor Charles V, the: The growth and destiny of a man and of a world-empire. K. Brandi. Translated by C. V. Wedgwood; AN.............. 287
Encyclopaedia of the theater. G. J. Nathan; B 53
End of the armistice, the. G. K. Chesterton; AN 661
England's money lords. S. Haxey; AN..... 106
Ernst, Morris, and A. Lindey
  Censor marches on, the; B............ 131
Essays in musical analysis. Tovey; B..... 635
Ethan Allen. S. H. Holbrook; AN........ 761

F

Failure of a mission. Sir N. Henderson; B 515
Fandango. R. Briffault; AN.............. 577
Fairchild, Henry Pratt
  People: The quantity and quality of population; AN 605
Fante, John
  Ask the dust; AN.................... 80
Fascist economic policy: An analysis of Italy's economic experiment. W. G. Welk; B 134
Fascist Italy. W. Ebenstein; B........... 134
Faulkner, William
  Hamlet, the; B...................... 481
Feibleman, James
  Positive democracy; AN.............. 577
Feuchtwanger, Lion
  Paris gazette; B.................... 546
Finland. J. H. Jackson; AN.............. 315
First to awaken, the. G. Hicks with R. M. Bennett; B 689
Flanner, Janet
  American in Paris, a: Profile of an interlude between two wars; B........... 659
Flexner, Helen Thomas
  Quaker childhood, a. 1871-1888; AN... 763
Foreign policy for America, a. C. A. Beard; B 656
Foster, William Z.
  Pages from a worker's life; AN....... 315
Frank, Waldo
  Chart for rough waters: Our role in a new world; B...................... 600
Franklin, Benjamin, autobiography, et cetera. Selected and arranged by C. Van Doren; AN 761
Frazier, E. Franklin
  Negro family in the United States, the; B 105
Freedom of thought in the old south. C. Clement; AN 430
Freedom's battle. J. Alvarez del Vayo; B.. 711
Freeman, Douglas Southall
  South to posterity, the: An introduction to the writing of Confederate history; B 78
French yellow book, the; B............... 484
Freudenthal, Elsbeth
  Aviation business, the: From Kitty Hawk to Wall street; B.................. 629
Fuess, Claude M.
  Calvin Coolidge; B......342; see also C 496
Fuller, Buckminster
  Nine chains to the moon; B.......... 489
Fuller, Margaret, biography. M. Wade; B. 688

G

Gang rule in New York. C. Thompson and A. Raymond; B...................... 546
Garratt, Geoffrey T.
  What has happened to Europe; B...... 487
Geddes, Norman Bel
  Magic motorways; B................. 489
Geismar, Maxwell; R.............490, 548, 688
Gellhorn, Martha
  Stricken field, a; AN................ 521
George Washington. N. W. Stephenson and W. H. Dunn; B...................... 486
German army, the. H. Rosinski; B........ 687
Germany, two books on; B................ 452
Gilmore, William; R...574; see also C.... 663
Giono, Jean
  Joy of man's desiring; B............. 783
Gitlow, Benjamin
  I confess: The truth about American communism; B 396
Glaspell, Susan
  Morning is near us, the; B........... 286
Gogarty, Oliver St. John
  Going native; AN.................... 401
Going native. O. St. J. Gogarty; AN...... 401
Golden avalanche, the. F. D. Graham and C. R. Whittlesey; B................ 128
Gorman, Herbert
  James Joyce; B..................... 339
Government and economic life. Development and current issues of American public policy. Volume I. L. S. Lyon, M. W. Watkins, and V. Abramson; B 314
Graham, Frank D., and C. R. Whittlesey
  Golden avalanche, the; B............ 128
Graham, John, junior
  Housing in Scandinavia: Urban and rural; AN 634
Grattan, C. Hartley
  Deadly parallel, the; B.............. 340
Graves, John Temple; R.................. 737
Great Britain, two books on; B........... 758
Great Britain. Empire in transition. A. Viton; B 758
Gross, Bertram M.; R.................... 103
Guatemala, past and present. C. L. Jones; AN 577
Guérard, Albert
  Preface to world literature; B......... 631
Gumpert, Martin
  Heil hunger! Health under Hitler; B.. 452

H

Hagen, Oskar
  Birth of the American tradition in art, the; B 342
Haggin, B. H.; R........................ 635
Hamlet, the. W. Faulkner; B............ 481
Hamsun, Knut
  Look back on happiness. P. Wiking, translator; AN 634
Hanson, Haldore
  "Humane endeavor": The story of the China war; B...................... 105
Happy days: 1880-1892. H. L. Mencken; B 312
Happy land, the. E. Knight; B........... 426
Hardy of Wessex. His life and literary career. C. J. Weber; B............ 548
Harris, Abram L.; R..................... 711
Harris, Leslie J.
  Vitamins in theory and practice; B.... 344
Harrow, Benjamin; R..................... 454
Haskell, Douglas; B..................... 489
Hauser, Ernest O.
  Shanghai: City for sale; AN......... 401
Havighurst, Walter
  Winds of spring, the; AN............ 575
Havlik, Hubert F.; R.................... 102
Haxey, Simon
  England's money lords; AN........... 106
Health in handcuffs. J. A. Kingsbury; B.. 368

Health is wealth. P. de Kruif; B.......... 758
Heil hunger! Health under Hitler. M. Gumpert; B 452
Heinrich, Anthony Philip, biography. W. T. Upton; AN 52
Henderson, Sir Nevile
  Failure of a mission; B................ 515
Hendrick, Burton J.
  Statesmen of the lost cause: Jefferson Davis and his cabinet; B............ 51
Henriques, Robert
  No arms, no armour; B............... 48
Herskovitz, Melville J.; R................. 104
Hicks, Granville, with R. M. Bennett
  First to awaken, the; B............... 689
Hillman, Sidney, biography. G. Soule; AN 135
History of science, technology, and philosophy in the eighteenth century. A. Wolf; AN 401
Hitler's Germany. K. Loewenstein; B..... 340
Hobart, Alice Tisdale
  Their own country; AN............... 521
Hoellering, Franz; R...................313, 452
Hogben, Lancelot
  Dangerous thoughts; B................ 482
Holbrook, Stewart H.
  Ethan Allen; AN...................... 763
Holding, Eileen; R........................ 260
Holtby, Winifred, biography, by V. Brittain; B 260 Hook, Sidney
  John Dewey. An intellectual portrait; B 22
Housing in Scandinavia: Urban and rural. J. Graham, junior; AN.............. 634
Housman, A. E.
  Collected poems, the; B................ 684
How green was my valley. R. Llewellyn; B 221
How to pay for the war. J. M. Keynes; B......571; see also C.............. 691
How to read a book: The art of getting a liberal education. M. J. Adler; B.. 575
"Humane endeavor": The story of the China war. H. Hanson; B.......... 105
Hutchison, Keith; R......128, 308, 571 (see also C 691)

I

I confess: The truth about American communism. B. Gitlow; B.............. 396
I married adventure. O. Johnson; B...... 736
Ickes, Harold L.
  America's house of lords; B........... 131
Idea of a Christian society, the. T. S. Eliot; AN 370
If you don't weaken: The autobiography of O. Ameringer; B.................. 784
In place of splendor. C. de la Mora; letter by M. Adams on review by L. White 56
In Stalin's secret service. W. G. Krivitsky; B 24
In the American grain. W. C. Williams; B 255
Ingres. W. Pach; B........................ 21
Irish theatre, the. Edited by L. Robinson; B 454
Isolated America. R. L. Buell; B........ 656
Italy, three books on; B.................. 134

J

J. Pierpont Morgan: An intimate portrait. H. L. Satterlee; AN............... 105
Jackson, J. Hampden
  Finland; AN 315
Jackson, Percival E.
  Look at the law; B.................... 398
James Joyce. H. Gorman; B............. 339
Jennings, W. Ivor
  Parliament; B 632
Joel, George; R.......................... 456
John Dewey. An intellectual portrait. S. Hook; B 22
Johnson, Osa
  I married adventure; B............... 736
Jonathan Edwards: 1703-1758. O. E. Winslow; AN 577
Jones, Chester Lloyd
  Guatemala, past and present; AN........ 577
Joy of man's desiring. J. Giono; B....... 783
Joyce, James. H. Gorman; B............ 319

K

Keep America out of war. N. Thomas and B. D. Wolfe; B................... 340
Keynes, John Maynard
  How to pay for the war; B......571; see also C.......................... 691
Kimmel, Stanley
  Mad Booths of Maryland, the; AN.... 634
Kingsbury, John A.
  Health in handcuffs; B............... 368
Kintner, Robert, and J. Alsop
  American white paper; S.............. 558
Kirchwey, Freda; R....................... 558
Knight, Eric
  Happy land, the; B.................... 426
Kohn, Hans; R..................256, 515, 758
Kraus, René
  Private and public life of Socrates, the. B. Mussey, translator; AN.......... 430
Krivitsky, W. G.
  In Stalin's secret service; B.......... 24
Kronenberger, Louis; R.......217, 370, 481, 574
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R...............53, 736
Kuttner, Alfred B.; R..................... 428

L

La Farge, Oscar
  As long as the grass shall grow; AN.. 786
Lamont, Corliss
  You might like socialism; AN........ 634
Lange, Dorothea, and P. S. Taylor
  American exodus, an: A record of human erosion; B....77; correction, C...... 291
Language of logic, the. J. MacKaye; AN.. 371
Laski, Harold J.
  Danger of being a gentleman, the; and other essays; B...................... 214
Last flower, the. J. Thurber; B........... 48
Lauterbach, Albert; R.................... 660
Leacock, Stephen
  British empire, the. Its structure, its history, its unity, its strength; B.... 758
Leeds, Stanton B.
  These rule France; AN................ 430
Leonardo da Vinci: An account of his development as an artist. K. Clark; B.. 518
Lerner, Max; R.......................... 398
Levin, Meyer
  Citizens; B 515
Levy, Hyman
  Modern science; B.....................454
Lewis, Sinclair
  Bethel Merriday; AN................. 401
Liberal in war time, a: The education of Albert De Silver. W. Nelles. Edited by L. Gannett; B.................. 426
Lief, Alfred
  Democracy's Norris; B................ 50
Life and writings of Abraham Lincoln, the. Edited by P. Van D. Stern; B....... 574
Life on the circuit with Lincoln. H. C. Whitney. Edited by P. M. Angle; AN 401
Lights go down, the. E. Mann; B....574; see also C.......................... 663
Lincoln, Abraham, life and writings of. Edited by P. Van D. Stern; B...... 574
Lindey, Alexander, and M. Ernst
  Censor marches on, the; B............ 131
Llewellyn, Richard
  How green was my valley; B.......... 221
Lloyd, Lord
  British case, the; B.................. 566
Loewenstein, Karl
  Hitler's Germany; B.................. 340
Loewenstein, Karl; R....................51, 632
Lohrke, Eugene and Arline
  Long watch in England, the; AN....... 786
Long, J. C.
  Mr. Pitt and America's birthright; B... 517
Long watch in England, the E. and A. Lohrke; AN 786
Look at the law. P. E. Jackson; B....... 398
Look back on happiness. K. Hamsun. Translated by P. Wiking; AN............ 634
Lore, Ludwig; R.......................... 24
Lundin, Leonard
  Cockpit of the revolution; The war for independence in New Jersey; AN.... 661
Lyon, Leverett S., M. W. Watkins, and V. Abramson
  Government and economic life. Development and current issues of American public policy. Volume I; B.......... 314
Lyons, Eugene
  Czar of all the Russias; B............. 451

M

MacCormac, John
  Canada: America's problem; B........ 760
Machiavelli, Niccolo, biography. V. Marcu. Translated by R. Winston; B........ 79
MacKaye, James
  Language of logic, the; AN............ 371
MacLeish, Archibald
  Air raid: A verse play for radio; B... 132
  America was promises; B............. 132
MacNeice, Louis
  Autumn journal; B.................. 602
Mad Booths of Maryland, the S. Kimmel; AN 634
Madariaga, Salvador de
  Christopher Columbus; B............. 548
Magic motorways. N. B. Geddes; B....... 489
Man coming toward you, the. O. Williams; B 572
Mann, Erika
  Lights go down, the; B...........574; see also C.......................... 663
Mann, Erika and Klaus
  Other Germany, the; B................ 257
Mansfield, Katherine, scrapbook. Edited by J. M. Murray; B.................. 217
Marcu, Valeriu
  Accent on power: The life and times of Machiavelli. R. Winston, translator; B 79
Margaret Fuller: Whetstone of genius. M. Wade; B 688
Mariana. S. Salminen. Translated by B. Mussey; AN 634
Marshall, James
  Swords and symbols; The technique of sovereignty; B 51
Marshall, Margaret; R......77, (correction, C ....291), 133, 255, 283, 311, 367, 515, 570, 629
Marxism: An autopsy. H. M. Parkes; B.. 601
Matsui, Haru
  Restless wave: My life in two worlds; B 604
McCausland, Elizabeth; R................ 604
Men, wind, and sea. R. Brown; AN...... 135
Mencken, H. L.
  Happy days: 1880-1892; B............ 312
Mendelssohn, Peter
  Across the dark river; AN............ 80
Menninger, Karl; R....................547, 758
Merriam, Charles E.
  Prologue to politics; B................ 216
Metcalf, John Calvin
  De Quincey: A portrait; AN.......... 521
Meyers, William H.
  Naval sketches of the war in California; B 105
Miller, Henry S.
  Price control in fascist Italy; B....... 134
Mobilizing civilian America. H. J. Tobin and P. W. Bidwell; B.............. 735
Modern science. H. Levy; B............. 454
Mora, Constancia de la
  In place of splendor; letter by M. Adams on L. White's review.............. 56
Morgan, J. Pierpont, biography. H. L. Satterlee; AN 105
Morning is near us, the. S. Glaspell; B... 286
Mowat, R. B.
  American entente, the; B............. 340
Mr. Pitt and America's birthright. J. C. Long; B 517

N

Nathan, George Jean
  Encyclopedia of the theater; B......... 53
National labor policy and how it works, the. J. Rosenfarb; B.................. 783
Native son, R. Wright; B................ 367
Naval sketches of the war in California. W. H. Meyers; B.................. 104
Negro family in the United States, the. S. F. Frazier; B.................... 104
Nelles, Walter
  Liberal in war time, a: The education of Albert De Silver. Edited by L. Gannett; B 426
New world order, the. H. G. Welles; AN.. 371
News is my job. E. L. Booker; B........ 456
Nicolson, Harold
  Why Britain is at war; AN........... 286
Niebuhr, Reinhold; R........216, 484, 600, 656
Nine chains to the moon. B. Fuller; B.... 489
No arms, no armour. R. Henriques; B.... 48
Norris, George W., biography. A. Lief; B.. 50
Not to mention the war. E. Davis; B...... 570
Novel and the modern world, the. D. Daiches; B 77

O

O'Brien, Justin; R....................... 783
Odell, George C. D.
  Annals of the New York stage. Volume XI; B.............................. 53
Oh, promised land. J. Street; AN......... 577
Orrick, James; R............51, 285, 548, 575
Oscar Wilde and the yellow nineties. F. Winwar; B 490
Other Germany, the. E. and K. Mann; B 257
Oxford book of English verse, the. 1250-1918. Second edition, Chosen and edited by Sir A. Quiller-Couch; B... 219

P

Pach, Walter
  Ingres; B 21
Pages from a worker's life. W. Z. Foster; AN 315
Paris gazette. L. Feuchtwanger; B........ 546
Parkes, Henry Bamford
  Marxism: An autopsy; B............. 601
Parliament. W. I. Jennings; B........... 632
Parsons, Wilfred, S. J.
  Which way, democracy? B............ 49
Patient's dilemma, the. H. Cabot; B...... 368
Peace in our times. J. P. Warburg; AN... 430
Peck, Graham
  Through China's wall; B............. 259
People: The quantity and quality of population. H. P. Fairchild; AN.......... 605
Persian painting; AN..................... 763
Pielkova, Ruth; R........................ 104
Pitt, William, biography. J. C. Long; B... 517
Plans of men, the. L. W. Doob; AN...... 605

Polish profile. Princess Paul Sapieha; B... 736
Polite essays. E. Pound; AN............ 401
Porter, Rose Albert
  Stranger, the; B.................... 398
Positive democracy. J. Feibleman; AN.... 577
Pound, Ezra
  Polite essays; AN.................... 401
Preface to world literature. A Guérard; B 631
Price control in fascist Italy. H. S. Miller; B 134
Private and public life of Socrates, the. R. Kraus. Translated by B. Mussey; AN 430
Prologue to politics. C. E. Merriam; B.... 216
Prologue to war. E. Wiskemann; B....... 283

Q

Quaker childhood, a. 1871-1888. H. T. Flexner; AN 763
Quennell, Peter
  Caroline of England; B............... 370
Quest for peace since the world war, the. W. E. Rappard; B.................... 758

R

Rahv, Philip; R.......................77, 396
Rappard, William E.
  Quest for peace since the world war, the; B 758
Rauschning, Herman
  Voice of destruction, the; B........... 313
Rawlings, Marjorie Kinnan
  When the whippoorwill——; B......... 715
Raymond, Allen, and C. Thompson
  Gang rule in New York; B............ 546
Real Bernard Shaw, the. M. Colbourne; B 761
Reconquest of Mexico, the. N. and S. Weyl; B 284
Restless wave: My life in two worlds. H. Matsui; B 604
Revolution in land. C. Abrams; B........ 103
Roberts, Donald A.; R.................. 714
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
  Selected letters; B.................. 427
Rodman, Selden; R 103
Rogers, Lindsay; R...................285, 735
Romains, Jules
  Verdun. G. Hopkins, translator; B.... 22
Rosenfarb, Joseph
  National labor policy and how it works, the; B 783
Rosenfeld, Paul; R...................... 399
Rosinski, Herbert
  German army, the; B................. 687
Rourke, Constance; R..................214, 342

S

Sachar, Abram Leon
  Sufferance is the badge; the Jew in the contemporary world; B 573
Saerchinger, Cesar
  Way out of war, the; B............... 340
Salminen, Sally
  Mariana. B. Mussey, translator; AN... 623
Salomon, Louis B.; R......... 48, 80, 221, 286, 344, 398, 426, 520, 545, 633, 689
Salvemini, Gaetano; R.................... 134
Santayana, George
  Egotism in German philosophy; B...... 340
Sapieha, Princess Paul
  Polish profile; B...................... 736
Satterlee, Herbert L.
  J. Pierpont Morgan: An intimate portrait; AN 105
Schumann, Clara, biography. J. N. Burk; AN 430
Schumpeter, Joseph A.
  Business cycles; B.................... 133
Scrapbook of Katherine Mansfield, the. Edited by J. M. Murry; B.......... 217
Second world war, the: First phase. D. Cooper; B 340
Seldes, George
  Catholic crisis, the; B................. 49
Selected letters of Edwin Arlington Robinson; B 427
Shakespeare, William, art and life of. H. Spencer; AN 287
Shanghai: City for sale. E. O. Hauser; AN 401
Shaw, C. M.
  Bernard's brethren; B 315
Shaw, George Bernard, biography. M. Colbourne; B 761
Shaw, George Bernard, book on. C. M. Shaw; B 315
Shotwell, James T.
  What Germany forgot; B............. 425
Shrine of the silver dollar. J. L. Spivak; B 658
Sidney Hillman. G. Soule; AN............ 135
Siege, J. Bryan; B....................... 515
Since yesterday. F. L. Allen; B........... 255
Slade, Caroline
  Triumph of Willie Pond, the; B....... 545
Socrates, biography. R. Kraus. Translated by B. Massey; AN................... 430
Soule, George
  Sidney Hillman; AN.................. 135
South to posterity, the: An introduction to the writing of Confederate history. D. S. Freeman; B.................. 78
Southerner discovers New England, a. J. Daniels; B 629
Spencer, Hazelton
  Art and life of William Shakespeare, the; AN 287
Spivak, John L.
  Shrine of the silver dollar; B......... 658
Stalin, Joseph, two books on; B.......... 451
Stalin's kampf. Edited by M. R. Werner; B 451
Stalin's Russia and the crisis in socialism. M. Eastman; B 711
Star of Satan, the. G. Bernanos; B....... 783
Statesmen of the lost cause: Jefferson Davis and his cabinet. B. J. Hendrick; B 51
Steig, William
  About people; B...................... 48
Stekel, Wilhelm
  Technique of analytical psychotherapy. E. and C. Paul, translators; B....... 547
Stephenson, Nathanial Wright, and W. H. Dunn
  George Washington; B................ 486
Stewart, Maxwell S.; R......259, 314, 456, 760
Stokes, Thomas L.
  Chip off my shoulder; AN............. 401
Stone, I. F.; R 49, 340, 395
Storm breaks, the. F. Birchall; B......... 368
Stranger, the. R. A. Porter; B............ 398
Street, James
  Oh, promised land; AN............... 577
Stricken field, a. M. Gellhorn; AN........ 521
Stuart, Jesse
  Trees of heaven; AN................ 761
Study of history, a. A. J. Toynbee; B..... 256
Sturmthal, Adolf; R...................... 79
Sturzo, Luigi
  Church and state; B.................. 543
Sufferance is the badge; the Jew in the contemporary world. A. L. Sachar; B.. 573
Sweezy, Paul M.; R...................... 133
Swords and symbols: The technique of sovereignty. J. Marshall; B............... 51

T

Tar heel editor. J. Daniels; B............ 737
Taylor, Paul S., and D. Lange
  American exodus, an: A record of human erosion; B.....77; correction, C..... 291
Teague, Walter Dorwin
  Design this day; B.................... 489
Technique of analytical psychotherapy. W. Stekel. Translated by E. and C. Paul; B 547
Testament of friendship: The story of Winifred Holtby; B..................... 260
Theater, three books on; B................ 53
Theater handbook and digest of plays. Edited by Bernard Sobel; B................ 53
Their own country. A. T. Hobart; AN.... 521
These rule France. S. B. Leeds; AN....... 430
This land is ours. L. Zara; AN........... 577
Thomas, Dylan
  World I breathe, the; B............... 399
Thomas, Norman, and B. D. Wolfe
  Keep America out of war; B......... 340
Thompson, Craig, and A. Raymond
  Gang rule in New York; B............ 546
Thompson, Lovell; R....342; see also C.... 496
Through China's wall. G. Peck; B......... 259
Thurber, James
  Last flower, the; B................... 48
Tixier's travels on the Osage prairies. Edited by J. F. McDermott. Translated by A. J. Salvan; AN.................. 763
To the end of the world. H. S. White; AN 80
Tobin, Harold J., and P. W. Bidwell
  Mobilizing civilian America; B......... 735
Tovey
  Essays in musical analysis; B......... 635
Toynbee, Arnold J.
  Study of history, a; B................ 256
Trees of heaven. J. Stuart; AN.......... 763
Triumph of Willie Pond, the. C. Slade; B 545
Trouble in July. E. Caldwell; B.......... 283
Twenty years' crisis, the: 1919-1939. An introduction to the study of international relations. E. H. Carr; B..... 285
Two systems: Socialist economy and capitalist economy. E. Varga; B............. 660
Two thousand and ten days of Hitler. P. Ziemer; B 452

U

United States of Europe, the. A. M. Bingham; B 686
Upton, William Treat
  Anthony Philip Heinrich; AN......... 52
Utley, Freda
  China at war; B..................... 105

V

Vambery, Robert; R...................... 454
Vambery, Rustem; R.....283, 368, 425, 487, 517
Van Doren, Carl; R...................... 212
Van Doren, Mark
  Windless cabins; B.................. 344
Varga, Eugene
  Two systems: Socialist economy and capitalist economy; B.............. 660
Vayo, J. Alvarez del
  Freedom's battle; R.................. 711
Verdun. J. Romains. Translated by G. Hopkins; B 22
Villard, Oswald Garrison
  Within Germany; B.................. 311
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R...426, 629, 687, 784
Vitamins in theory and practice. L. J. Harris; B 344
Vitamins, the—a symposium. The American medical association; B................ 344
Viton, Albert
  Great Britain. Empire in transition; B 758
Vivas, Eliseo; R......................... 22
Voice of destruction, the. H. Rauschning; B 313

W

Wade, Mason
  Margaret Fuller: Whetstone of genius; B 688
War, eleven books on; B................ 340
War in the twentieth century. Edited by W. Waller; B 340
Warburg, James P.
  Peace in our time; AN............... 430
Washington, George, biography. N. W. Stephenson and W. H. Dunn; B..... 486
Watkins, Myron W., L. S. Lyon, and V. Abramson
  Government and economic life. Development and current issues of American public policy. Volume I; B......... 314
Way out of war, the. C. Saerchinger; B... 340
Weber, Carl J.
  Hardy of Wessex; His life and literary career; B 548
Wechsler, James; R 658
Weld, John
  Don't you cry for me! B.............. 520
Welk, William G.
  Fascist economic policy: An analysis of Italy's economic experiment; B...... 134
Wells, H. G.
  New world order, the; AN............ 371
Weyl, Nathaniel and Sylvia
  Reconquest of Mexico, the; B.......... 284
What Germany forgot. J. T. Shotwell; B... 425
What has happened to Europe. G. T. Garratt; B 487
When the whippoorwill——. M. K. Rawlings; B 715
Which way, democracy? W. Parsons, S. J.; B 49
White, Helen C.
  To the end of the world; AN 80
White, Leigh; review of C. de la Mora's "In place of splendor." M. Adams; C 56
Whitney, Henry Clay
  Life on the circuit with Lincoln. Edited by P. M. Angle; AN............... 401
Whittlesey, Charles R., and F. D. Graham
  Golden avalanche, the; H............. 128
Why Britain is at war. H. Nicolson; AN.. 286
Wilde, Oscar, biography. F. Winwar; B... 490
Williams, Oscar
  Man coming toward you, the; B........ 572
Williams, William Carlos
  In the American grain; B............. 255
Windless cabins. M. Van Doren; B....... 344
Winds of spring, the. W. Havighurst; AN 577
Winslow, Ola Elizabeth
  Jonathan Edwards: 1703-1758; AN..... 577
Winwar, Frances
  Oscar Wilde and the yellow nineties; B 490
Wiskemann, Elizabeth
  Prologue to war; B.................. 283
Within Germany. O. G. Villard; B........ 311
Wolf, A.
  History of science, technology, and philosophy in the eighteenth century; AN 401
Wolfe, Bertram D., and N. Thomas
  Keep America out of war; B.......... 340
Woodward, W. E.; R..................... 486
Woolf, Leonard
  Barbarians within and without; B...... 23
Workers on relief. G. Adams; B.......... 428
World I breathe, the. N. Thomas; B...... 399
Wright, Richard
  Native son; B....................... 367

Y

Yarmolinsky, Avrahm; R.................. 573
You might like socialism. C. Lamont; AN 634
Young, Art
  Art Young: His life and times; B...... 214
Young, Donald Minot; R.................. 546

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen;
  R 21, 219, 312, 339, 518, 572, 684
Zara, Louis
  This land is ours; AN................ 577
Ziemer, Patsy
  Two thousand and ten days of Hitler; AN 452

THE Nation

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 6, 1940 NUMBER 1

The Shape of Things

FINLAND'S SUCCESS IN WITHSTANDING THE onslaughts of the Red Army has its most eloquent testimony in the reticence of recent official Soviet communiqués. For over a week Moscow's daily statements have declared "nothing important" to be happening on the fighting fronts, although successes have been claimed for Russian bombers. Had there been victories to record, they would certainly have been hailed with gusto. Hence the negative nature of Moscow's news tends to confirm the main tenor of Finnish reports, if not their details. It remains to be seen whether the fresh troops which the Soviet command is said to be sending into action and the appointment of General Gregory Stern, hero of the Manchurian campaigns, will bring about any dramatic change of fortune. Aerial bombardments, while they may cause death and destruction, are not by themselves likely to prove decisive and are hardly calculated to increase the enthusiasm of the Finnish workers for their "liberators." Meanwhile the damaged prestige of the Red Army is having repercussions elsewhere. In a defiant speech King Carol asserted that both Bessarabia and Bukovina would be defended to the last man. Persistent reports of Soviet activity in the direction of India deserve to be treated with extreme skepticism. Invasion of India would necessitate a campaign through some of the most difficult country in the world and prove a test of organization and transport even more severe than that provided by the Finnish war. The origin of most of these reports is Rome, and they may be regarded as Italian propaganda for an anti-Bolshevik peace between Germany and the Allies.

*

MANY PEOPLE ATTRIBUTE THE PRESIDENT'S latest peace move to considerations of internal politics and in particular to a desire to catch the Catholic vote. We are loath to accept this interpretation, which by implication would convict him of levity. It is not the view taken in London and Paris, where the President's action has had an unfavorable reception. A few days ago somebody asked the President the pertinent question whether the Pope had been approached in his religious or political capacity. It is really impossible to distinguish between the two. At the time of the Concordat between the Papacy and the Italian government that acute French Catholic, Maurice Pernot, said in the Journal des Débats, of which he was for many years the Rome correspondent, that the Papacy had sacrificed the international interests of the church to its national interests. Events have justified him. The policy of the Vatican is now an Italian nationalist and Fascist policy. The Pope blessed and encouraged the Italian aggressions against Abyssinia and Republican Spain and deserted the Basque Catholics. Since Mr. Roosevelt's initiative we have had the semi-official declaration that the Pope and Mussolini have agreed to work for peace and combat communism. It was followed by the Pope's visit to the King of Italy, in the course of which His Holiness prayed for divine protection for "the illustrious chief of the Italian government" and declared that the wisdom of its rulers was making Italy great, strong, and respected before the world. Mr. Roosevelt's initiative seems likely to bolster Mussolini's waning prestige in Italy and to encourage the small minorities in England and France who are demanding peace with Germany in order to attack Russia. Is this what Mr. Roosevelt desired?

*

IN ITS NEGOTIATIONS WITH GERMANY'S neutral neighbors for war-time trade agreements, Britain's main objective is to prevent their acting as entrepôts through which the Reich could obtain imports from overseas. The blockade provides it with a powerful argument, for unless the country concerned agrees not to pass on supplies to Germany it is likely to find shipments for its own needs held up indefinitely. The war-time trade treaty just signed by Britain and Sweden is understood to contain a pledge by the latter to use imported goods only for domestic consumption, and in the case of certain strategic raw materials to limit its purchases to amounts imported over a fixed pre-war period. We have also ground for believing that Sweden has undertaken not to expand shipments of its own iron ore to Germany. The negotiations were probably speeded up by Russia's attack on Finland. Sweden, although nominally neutral, is rendering much unofficial aid to the Finns, and its own position as next in line must make it look for outside support. Its difficulty is how to cooperate with the Allies in backing the Finns without giving Germany an excuse to attack it.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

FURTHER INDICATION OF JAPAN'S GROWING difficulties was provided last week by the petition presented by a majority of the members of the Diet calling for the Cabinet's resignation. The fact that the action was spontaneous and unofficial, and therefore not binding on the Cabinet, does not in any sense detract from its importance as a sign of deep-seated discontent with the results of the China war. While this discontent has been nourished chiefly by heavy war losses, high prices, and steadily falling living standards, it has undoubtedly been intensified by the frustration of Japanese foreign policy. As January 26 approaches, it becomes clear that there will be no new Japanese-American trade treaty to replace the old one on the date of expiration. This gives the United States veto power over Japan's imperialistic ambitions on the Asiatic mainland. A hint that Japan recognizes the impossibility of pushing its campaign to a successful conclusion appeared last week in press comments on the outlook for the trade treaty. The popular newspaper Yomiuri predicted that as a result of American pressure the puppet government of Wang Ching-wei might never materialize. If this is true, it represents a major setback for Japan. For unless Japan can establish a centralized regime with semi-responsible Chinese leadership, it must depend solely on force of arms to hold the occupied territories.

* * *

ELECTION-YEAR SESSIONS OF CONGRESS DO not as a rule make history. Too much controversy is bad: it puts Congressmen on the spot, takes their minds off the necessary fence-mending at home, makes for party disharmony when the lines should be drawn against the common enemy, and presents the legislators with a log jam of debatable bills at a time when they want to push off to the conventions. Matters are even more delicate when, as in the present instance, Congress is packed with Men Who Would Be President. Nevertheless, there are some questions that can't be evaded. By the time this issue of The Nation reaches the newsstands, the President will have delivered his budget message, and if present indications are reliable he will have put the economy bloc in something of a hole. Its members face several unpleasant alternatives. They can slash appropriations, including those for farm aid and work relief, but no Congressman likes to deprive his constituency of federal hand-outs in an election year. They can vote for increased taxes, but that would make them even less popular. Or they can sanction more government borrowing, perhaps even voting to raise the legal $45,000,000,000 limitation on the government debt, which now stands at some $41,000,000,000. But in that case what becomes of their crusade for a balanced budget? The second course would normally be the soundest, but, given the temper of the Seventy-sixth Congress, it is socially the most dangerous, since thoughts on increased revenues have been running toward some form of real or disguised federal sales tax.

ASIDE FROM BUDGETARY MATTERS THERE are few issues likely to be pushed to a showdown. The reciprocal-trade system will have to fight for its life against a Democratic-Republican coalition of protective-tariff champions, and linked with its fate are the Presidential aspirations of Cordell Hull. A spate of resolutions for breaking off diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union are in the offing, and an equal number for stopping raw-material shipments to Japan. Serious pressure is expected for more drastic "alien-and-sedition" legislation; the Dies committee will make an all too hopeful fight for a renewal of its franchise, although its own division of opinion should help to discredit it; and the Smith committee will attempt to make out a case for its pitiful "exposure" of the National Labor Relations Board. All manner of proposals to discourage this country's entry into the war may be expected, and perhaps further attempts to restrict the President's discretionary powers in carrying out the provisions of the new neutrality law; most of these will be offered with an eye on the coming election campaign and will hardly blow the lid off the Capitol.

* * *

THE QUESTION OF THE CONCENTRATION OF financial control of industry is once again to the fore both in Washington and Wall Street. Evidence presented before the TNEC suggests that, however effective the Banking Act of 1933 may have been in the protection of depositors, the time-honored system of "tied-house" security financing has been scarcely touched. In the financial district acute controversy has been raised by Halsey, Stuart's demand that capital issues for publicly regulated corporations be made with competitive bidding. In the case of the Consumers' Power issue, to be made by a syndicate headed by Morgan, Stanley and Company and Bonbright and Company, the SEC after prolonged deliberations has decided it may go forward in part. The commission has still to determine, however, whether the relationship between the bankers and the power corporation, a subsidiary of Commonwealth and Southern, was such as to permit "arm's-length bargaining." Its present ruling affects a different principle, that of capital structure, and on this point its decision was to allow the bond issue to the amount needed for refunding but to forbid the raising of new money in this form on the ground that the corporation's debt already represented too large a proportion of its total capital. Meanwhile, the argument over "arm's-length bargaining" versus "cheek-to-cheek negotiations" has erupted into the railroad field as a result of Halsey, Stuart's protest against the allotment of a Louisville and Nashville $60,000,000 refunding issue to Morgan, Stanley and Company. This step has not halted the offering, but it brings before the ICC the whole question of open competition for issues of railroad securities.

FRANK MURPHY'S ANNOUNCEMENT THAT the Department of Justice is planning to investigate the promoters of anti-Semitism reads like welcome, if belated, news. But the announcement seems to contain one serious "escape clause." According to press accounts Mr. Murphy, when asked whether the probe would turn its spotlight on Father Coughlin, disclaimed knowledge of any evidence that the unholy father was anti-Semitic, and pointed out further that his inquiry was directed at "organizations." We hope that this is not a complete summary of Mr. Murphy's views. An investigation which failed to touch Father Coughlin's network would be as meaningless as a probe of anti-Catholicism which overlooked the Ku Klux Klan. No doubt it will be a good deal easier—and politically less precarious—to prosecute the Bundsmen and other plainly foreign agencies. But these groups are incomparably less influential than their native counterparts, of whom Father Coughlin is the spiritual father. Nowhere is anti-Semitism preached more flagrantly than in his Royal Oak pulpit and in the pages of Social Justice, and by no one is it practiced more savagely than by the Christian Front, the Social Justice clubs, and other Coughlin groups. While Coughlin has shrewdly denied any official link with these groups, its existence is made clear every week in Social Justice. If Mr. Murphy is planning a serious tour through the anti-Semitic hot spots, his first stop should be Royal Oak, Michigan.

*

WE ARE SURE THAT WEST COAST SHIPPING interests share William Green's disappointment in the Landis decision on Bridges, but for the labor movement as a whole it represents a resounding victory. It is clear from the published summary of Dean Landis's conclusions that his stomach was turned by the plain and fancy lying which made up a large part of the testimony against Bridges, and by the revelation that an official of the United States Immigration Service dangled the possibility of a pardon before a prisoner if he would give evidence against Bridges. This official, Raphael P. Bonham, immigration inspector at Seattle, and others like him on the Coast ought to be given a departmental trial and, if found guilty of such conduct, dismissed from the service. We hope that Landis's finding that on the evidence Bridges is neither a Communist nor affiliated with the Communist Party will put a damper on the perennial campaign against the labor leader. Whether Bridges would be deportable if he were a Communist was left undecided. We should protest against his deportation in any case. The real objection to him is his militancy as a labor leader.

*

WHEN THE AMERICAN STUDENT UNION'S annual convention last week rejected a resolution condemning the Russian invasion of Finland, it presented a precious New Year's gift to Martin Dies. The resolution itself was moderate in tone and simultaneously warned against the dangers of an anti-Soviet crusade. The fact that it was so overwhelmingly defeated in even this form may appear to the Daily Worker as a sweeping vindication of Russian policy and something to write Pravda about, but the victory is bound to prove costly. Until this convention, membership in the Student Union was widely regarded as a valuable part of an undergraduate's education. We suspect that this view more accurately reflected the Union's real character than did its rejection of the resolution. But as James Wechsler pointed out in last week's Nation, the unique and unflagging energy of the Communists in rallying their followers to action is bound to give a distorted picture of their numerical strength. The defeat of a proposal for a membership referendum on the issue may indicate that they are aware of the discrepancy between their influence and their numbers.

Britain's War Economy

WHETHER or not the war is finally decided on the economic front, economic weapons are at present playing a paramount role. The Allies' blockade appears increasingly effective and is now being reinforced by a series of agreements with neutrals which will gradually stop many leaks. At the same time the prospects of Russian economic aid to Germany, never rated very high by experts, have been further diminished by the unexpected drain on Soviet resources brought about by Finland's tough resistance.

But while the campaign against German trade offers cause for satisfaction, the Allies, and Britain in particular, have no reason for complacency about the organization of the home front. In four months of war Britain has proliferated controls, commissions, and committees to deal with every branch of commerce and industry; it has not succeeded in working out any kind of unified economic plan for the most efficient utilization of its immense resources. The British press is full of complaints of overlapping authorities, maldistribution of available raw materials, obstacles placed in the way of exports which are essential for the maintenance of foreign-exchange supplies, and so on. Grumbling, of course, plays an important part in the democratic process, and the amount now going on in Britain is, in a way, reassuring. Nevertheless, its volume and still more its quality suggest that greater drive and imagination are needed in high places and less trust in the spirit of "muddling through."

The most vital question, on which policy seems still in a state of flux, is that of financing the war. Early in October Sir John Simon, Chancellor of the Exchequer, introduced his war budget and announced that the government intended to avoid inflation and pay the bill by means of taxation and loans representing real savings instead of created credit. At the same time both direct and indirect taxes were heavily increased. But expenditure is mounting still more rapidly. It is already at the annual rate of £2,400,000,000, or nearly half the pre-war national income, and has not yet reached a maximum. Meanwhile, despite efforts to control prices, the cost of living has been rising, and the Economist index of wholesale prices showed an increase of 23 per cent between the beginning of the war and November 28. As a result workers have been demanding higher wages, and the better-organized groups have obtained at least partial satisfaction. At the same time there is growing pressure on the government to increase payments to old-age pensioners, soldiers' dependents, and other recipients of public funds—the first victims of the high cost of living.

Such demands are fully justified, but an all-round increase in incomes occurring simultaneously with a diminished supply of consumers' goods means inflation. The problem which the British government must face sooner or later can best be expressed mathematically. Supposing maximum national production is x billion pounds and war requirements are y billion, then x minus y billion remains to be divided up among all receivers of incomes. It is axiomatic, or ought to be, that every family should receive at least enough for subsistence, but how is the balance, if any, to be split in accordance with that blessed principle—equality of sacrifice? Even if you take 90 per cent of an income of $100,000—and Britain has not yet approached so drastic a level of taxation—the sacrifice involved is not the same as that presented by a 10 per cent deduction from the pay of a $15-a-week wage-earner.

The fact remains, however, that it is improbable that sufficient reduction in current consumption can be obtained without encroaching on the standard of living of at least the better-paid workers—a step bound to raise political as well as economic difficulties. This is not to say that the workers would under all circumstances refuse to tighten their belts. But they are likely to insist that, before they are asked to do so, unused resources and labor should be productively employed, that all necessities should be rationed so as to allow for a fair distribution of available supplies, and that the purchasing power of the rich and the comfortable should be brought into closer relationship with working-class incomes by either further taxation or compulsory loans, or by both. But the British government could only take such steps as these if it were prepared to enforce far more basic alterations in the economic and class structure than it has hitherto been willing to attempt. Business, as much as possible, as usual, is still its motto.

J. M. Keynes has attempted to solve its dilemma for it by suggesting a scheme by which a graduated levy would be made on all incomes, above a low minimum, deductible at the source. The amount paid by each "contributor" would be credited to his account in the government savings bank, after the deduction of direct taxes due, and would earn 2½ per cent interest. But the accounts would be frozen, except possibly in the event of unemployment or serious illness, until after the war, when, as Mr. Keynes points out, their release would be a useful offset to the probable post-war deflation. This plan would certainly prove fairer to the workers than either inflation or the kind of wage control long since adopted in Germany and now in France. But it has aroused great opposition in both labor and business circles. No alternative has yet been produced, however, and it is doubtful how much longer Britain can continue to drift on stormy seas with its financial machinery only partially functioning. Before long it must assuredly face the problem of making its turbines deliver their maximum power even if this involves revolutionary changes in their mechanism.

Happy New Year!

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

LISTENING to the radio this past week-end was a depressing introduction to the New Year. Almost every turn of the dial produced a note of cheer which rang false and induced melancholy in the hearer. Peace was detected over the horizon, but no speaker remarked that the horizon is an ever-receding and therefore nonexistent boundary. Prosperity in our own country was hailed, though with some appropriate warnings of the later effects of even the most profitable war. And the blessings of liberty and democracy were added up to an astonishing total, without, I thought, any sufficient recognition that they face great hazards from within or that the war in Europe and Asia may create a world in which they will be a hopeless handicap.

Peace, if it came soon, would be a calamity, because a peace based on the status quo ante Munich would be no peace at all but only an armistice on the front to be used by Hitler for the consolidation of past conquests and preparation of others to come. When a man like John Haynes Holmes can say that "the close of this dreadful decade is glorified by cooperation between America and Rome to save mankind before it is too late," one fears that Ethiopia and the Spanish republic fell in vain. The President, in setting up a committee of religious leaders and sending a personal representative to the Vatican, may have intended only to encourage long-range thinking on peace while, incidentally, fostering political good feeling in anticipation of the coming campaign. But it is a dangerous maneuver just the same, and unforeseen ill-effects may spring from it. A decent settlement will come only after the downfall of Hitler and then only if men who understand the economic and political needs of Europe are in power in the leading countries. These ends cannot be furthered by hopeful New Year nonsense about an early peace.

Optimistic prophecies about the prospects of the home team seem equally questionable. Our liberties are going to be under fire from several directions. Only an understanding of the anatomy of fascism and a sharp sense of domestic realities can successfully counter the attempt of such allied groups as the Dies committee, Coughlin and his satellite hoodlums, and reactionary business interests to carry out a large-scale anti-radical, anti-alien program. Ordinary Americans, unaccustomed to the more concealed sorts of fascist propaganda, may swallow a dangerous dose of Diesism without knowing what's in it.

If the Dies committee is continued, it will have a serious effect on the coming campaign—if not on the future of civil rights in the United States. It will be used to blast the New Deal and the integrity of liberals in the government service, from the President down. In fact, in his coming report to Congress Mr. Dies is expected to wipe out all distinctions between "Communist" and "liberal" and thus to brand the New Deal with a red label. The decision of Dean Landis in the Bridges case shows how difficult it is for a conscientious investigator to establish a man's political status. But Landis's scrupulous regard for evidence may, I fear, serve as a spur to repressive action rather than an example of juridical integrity. In any case, the Dies virus has spread. Liberals and radicals will have to fight boldly to preserve their rights to speak and act as they think. They should recognize the Dies committee for what it is—the Congressional arm of a country-wide reactionary drive—and not be taken in by irrelevant talk about ferreting out sedition. Mr. Dies isn't after sedition; he is after you and me and the President. If every Nation reader would tell his Congressman that he wants no more of Dies and his committee, it would add up to a formidable protest. But time is short.

Then the questions of unemployment and relief. These are too large to discuss in the limits of a page, but they must be reckoned into any New Year calculations of American prosperity. After almost eight years of New Deal effort and in spite of a considerable increase in business activity, unemployment still stands at almost 9,000,000. Measures adopted by the Administration have been useful, but they are not good enough. The prospect of a retreat from the New Deal under a Republican Administration is, humanly speaking, appalling. Meanwhile the coming election will probably serve to freeze relief during the balance of the year at the lowest possible level consistent with gathering in the vote, and to stop fundamental reforms altogether.

As for our current prosperity, whatever that means when millions of workers are hungry and idle, it was apparently born to die at an early age. Mr. Hutchison analyzes its prospects on another page of this issue, and in their New Year's messages Messrs. Lewis and Green agreed at least in reminding the country that if measures of reform and relief are allowed to lapse during a wartime boom, monstrous suffering will certainly follow. But their warnings are likely to fall on deaf ears—the ears of politicians interested in no deluges scheduled after the fall of 1940.

If I seem to repudiate all proffered arguments of hope, it does not follow that I despair. On the contrary I see many good omens in the January sky. Only they happen to be different from those noted by the year-end radio orators. I see, for instance, definite signs that the Allies will refuse offers of new Munichs in 1940; that the American people will fight for their liberties if and when they realize that the Coughlins and Dieses are out to kill instead of defend them; that they are not yet politically ready to swing to reaction as an alternative to inadequate reform. These are modest reasons for hope, but they may be enough to prevent the New Year from sealing the triumph of reaction abroad and at home.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 1

EDITORIALS:

BRITAIN'S WAR ECONOMY 3
HAPPY NEW YEAR! by Freda Kirchwey 4
THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL FOR 1939 6
SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY. II. FOREIGN POLICY: GENEVA TO HELSINKI by Louis Fischer 7
AMERICA'S STAKE IN BRITAIN'S WAR by Frederick L. Schuman 11
DEATH OF A NEWSPAPER by George W. McGill 13
WRITERS IN THE WILDERNESS. II. JOHN DOS PASSOS by Margaret Marshall 15
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 18
IN THE WIND 19
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 20

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE LESSON OF THE MASTER by Morton Dauwen Zabel 21
ROMAINS AT WAR by F. W. Dupee 22
INTRODUCTION TO DEWEY by Eliseo Vivas 22
THE GREAT DILEMMA by Jacques Barzun 23
GENERAL KRIVITSKY by Ludwig Lore 24
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 25
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 26

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

The Nation's Honor Roll for 1939

FOR the twelfth successive year The Nation presents its list of individuals and organizations deserving honorable mention for their activities during the past twelve months.

ELEANOR ROOSEVELT, for refusing to be intimidated by the Dies committee and its champions, for her helpful interest in the problems of young men and women, and for her quiet, intelligent, and dogged defense of democratic principles throughout the year.

CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, for the part he has played since he became Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court in extending the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment to freedom of expression, as exemplified in the Hague case and the handbill-ordinance decisions.

THE FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE, for its unostentatious, non-political, and enormously effective work of bringing physical relief to the innocent victims of war and aggression, especially in Spain and Poland; and the FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR WAR CHILDREN, for its heroic work in providing refuges for the orphaned children of Loyalist Spain.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING and ELMER DAVIS, news commentators for the Mutual and Columbia broadcasting systems, respectively, for the most illuminating running analyses of Europe's tangled affairs.

MAURY MAVERICK, mayor of San Antonio, for making an important political comeback, for upholding civil rights, and for successfully withstanding an unscrupulous attempt to wreck his official career.

CLAUDE BOWERS, now ambassador to Chile, for the loyalty to democratic principles which characterized his career as ambassador to the Spanish Republic.

CULBERT OLSON, governor of California, for freeing Tom Mooney and for the vigorous part he played in obtaining the liberation of Warren K. Billings.

SENATOR ROBERT WAGNER and REPRESENTATIVE EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, for their generous and persistent efforts to gain American shelter for the refugee children of Europe.

ARTHUR EGGLESTON, columnist on the San Francisco Chronicle, for his intelligent and progressive treatment of labor issues, and especially for his vigorous fight against California's proposed anti-picketing law.

THE LA FOLLETTE CIVIL LIBERTIES COMMITTEE and SENATOR ELBERT THOMAS, specifically for their revelations concerning the National Association of Manufacturers and in general for their continuing attack on corporate tyranny in the United States.

FRAZIER SPAULDING and MORRIS ERNST, for their services as counsel for the C. I. O. in the Hague case, and GRENVILLE CLARK for the splendid brief amicus curiae he submitted as chairman of the Civil Liberties Committee of the American Bar Association.

W. CALVIN CHESNUT, judge of the Federal District Court of Baltimore, for his decision requiring the payment of the same wages to Negro teachers as to white; and THURGOOD MARSHALL, WILLIAM H. HASTIE, LEON A. RANSOM, and W. A. C. HUGHES, Jr., counsel to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, who argued the case.

CAROLINE PRATT, founder of the City and Country School, whose devotion to the principles of progressive education won their acceptance in the reorganization of a number of public schools in New York State.

JOHN STEINBECK, for dramatizing in "The Grapes of Wrath," and CAREY McWILLIAMS, for documenting in "Factories in the Field," the desperate plight of the migratory farm worker in California and the political and economic forces arrayed against him.

CARL SANDBURG, for his massive and definitive study of Lincoln and his times, which has now been completed with the publication of "Abraham Lincoln: The War Years."

WILLIAM SAROYAN, for writing "The Time of Your Life," the delightful stage fantasy into which he managed to put all that amused people in his earlier works, and very little that exasperated them.

EDWARD A. DOISY, of St. Louis University, and LOUIS F. FIESER, of Harvard University, for the artificial production of Vitamin K, which causes the blood to clot. The two scientists worked independently.

P. J. HANZLIK, A. J. LEHMAN, and A. P. RICHARDSON, of Stanford University, for their discovery of a bismuth preparation for the treatment of syphilis which can be taken by mouth, thus facilitating cure of the disease and, ultimately, reducing the cost.

Soviet Russia Today

II. FOREIGN POLICY: GENEVA TO HELSINKI

BY LOUIS FISCHER

I HAVE been able to discover no proof—there are plenty of sensational statements—regarding German-Soviet pact negotiations before May, 1939. In December, 1938, talks about commercial credits took place between Moscow and Berlin, but Germany insisted that they had no political significance, and they actually made no progress until months later when the diplomatic rapprochement was under way.

The first hint that led to the Russo-German pact was thrown out by Stalin. Molotov, the Soviet Prime Minister, is authority for that. On August 31, 1939, Molotov reminded the Communist congress in Moscow that on March 10, 1939, "Comrade Stalin posed the question of good-neighbor relations without enmity between Germany and the Soviet Union. It can be seen now that the declarations of Comrade Stalin were, in general, correctly understood by Germany, and that Germany drew political consequences from them." Unsuspected by outsiders and without any announcement, Germany had acted on Stalin's suggestion.

Toward the end of April, 1939, as I then learned from good Soviet sources, Litvinov told the German ambassador in Moscow there was no use even trying to reach a commercial understanding while the press and spokesmen in one country regularly attacked the other.

On May 5, 1939, Maxim Litvinov was dismissed.

In the middle of May Ribbentrop, the German Foreign Minister, said to several highly placed visitors that the Third International no longer played an important role in Soviet foreign policy and that closer relations with Moscow had now become both possible and desirable. On May 28 Sir Nevile Henderson, the British ambassador in Berlin, had a long interview with Marshal Göring, and his report of the meeting is printed in the British Blue Book on the origins of the war. Henderson wrote: "Göring said since France and ourselves [England] could not, and Russia out of self-interest would not, give them [the Poles] any effective military assistance, they would be taught a terrible lesson."

This reflected successful preliminary conversations, but the Germans hesitated; they still hoped to conclude a military alliance with Japan. The Russians pressed the Germans and showed greater eagerness than Hitler to reach an understanding. In June Berlin gave the Kremlin assurances that it had no aggressive intentions against Russia. By July the pourparlers became more serious and intense. Between August 8 and August 14 the negotiators discussed territorial adjustments and texts.

On August 16 Sir Nevile Henderson reported to Lord Halifax on an interview he had had that day with Baron von Weizsäcker, the German Assistant Minister of Foreign Affairs. "I was impressed," Henderson declared, "by one thing, namely, Baron von Weizsäcker's detachment and calm. He seemed very confident, and professed to believe that Russian assistance to the Poles would not only be entirely negligible, but that the U. S. S. R. would even in the end join in sharing the Polish spoils. Nor did my insistence on the inevitability of British intervention seem to move him."

Apparently an agreement already existed between Russia and the Reich on August 16, and it is significant that it was on August 15 that the Kremlin, for the first time, asked the British and French delegates in Moscow for permission to march into Poland and Rumania. The Soviet spokesmen declared that they wished to "make contacts with the Reichswehr"—an enigmatic formula—by advancing into eastern Galicia and into the Vilna corridor as far as Suwalki. The British and French experts advised Moscow to approach Poland and Rumania directly, but promised nevertheless to consult the Poles. After a two-hour interruption of the conference the Soviet representatives returned to announce their refusal to make a direct démarche, and added that if an immediate satisfactory reply from the English and French were not forthcoming they would consider that collaboration with the Allies had been rendered impossible.

It is obvious why Moscow had not applied before August 15 for Polish consent to admit the Red Army. No Polish government could have lasted an hour after granting such consent. Poland could not admit Russian troops because it was afraid they would stay. Whether they came as invaders or saviors changed nothing. Warsaw had adopted the same attitude toward German troops, and in March, 1939, when Hitler in an interview at Berchtesgaden with the Polish Foreign Minister, Beck, proposed a joint attack on Russia, Beck refused; the Germans would have had to go through Poland to Russia, and the Polish government feared permanent occupation. The entrance of the Red Army would have split Poland socially. It was politically impossible. Moscow knew this, and had always known it, and did not broach the subject until August 15, when the understanding with Germany was complete. Russia got from Germany what the Allies could not give.

The secret Moscow-Berlin agreement of August, 1939, allowed Russia to establish itself in Estonia, Latvia, and Bessarabia, and in Poland as far west as the Vistula. Part of Warsaw would become soviet. No mention was then made of Finland. Lithuania fell within the German sphere. In subsequent military conferences, however, the Russians surrendered part of their Polish zone in exchange for domination over Lithuania. It was only much later that Russia and Germany agreed about Finland.

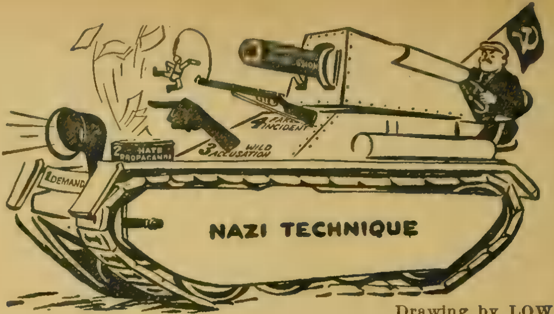
That there was a pre-war agreement regarding the partition of Poland is clear from Ribbentrop's words at Danzig on October 24, 1939. "When the German army advanced victoriously into Poland," he said, "the English propaganda declared that the Russian army would certainly not participate in the measures against Poland. Instead, the Russian troops, after a very few days, moved forward on the entire front in Poland and occupied Polish territory up to the line of demarcation which we had previously agreed upon with the Russians."

WAS IT SELF-DEFENSE?

Russia is taking advantage of the war in the west to make conquests and to wage its own little wars. But do the new territory in Poland and the naval bases and garrisons in the Baltic states make Russia stronger?

Between 1920 and 1939 Russia enjoyed peace. During that period Germany, England, and France were not involved in war; yet they did not move their armed forces against the Soviet Union, although at certain times in those nineteen years Russia was extremely weak and exposed. In 1919 Germany volunteered to march into Russia to crush the Soviet regime. Marshal Foch demurred—he did not wish Germany to recuperate in Russia. After this present war the Allies, if they win, are likely to adopt the same view for the same reason; if Germany wins, it can only be at the end of a most exhausting struggle in which all the belligerents will have been seriously debilitated. During and after a European war, therefore, Russia would have been in no greater real danger of a Western invasion than at any other time since 1920. This war proves that the contradictions among the capitalist powers have been greater than those between the capitalist world and Soviet Russia.

Moreover, the independence of the Baltic states served as a protection for Russia. They were buffers against attack. If the West decides to make war on Russia, Russia will be more accessible now that it holds the Baltic positions. Czarist Russia had all the Baltic states and more, yet fell an easy prey to German military strength. The Soviet regime has never before put its trust in mere territory or naval bases. Russia's recent territorial acquisitions may prove to be a boomerang. For if Germany ever comes back, the vengeance will be fierce. Russia's acts have multiplied the number of its enemies many fold and reduced the number of its foreign friends to the lowest possible minimum. The bulk of the working classes of Scandinavia and the Baltic countries and of England, France, and all the Americas has been antagonized. This does not augur well for Russia. A peaceful and stable Soviet Union was not attacked. An expanding Russia might be. Hitler's successes in Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Memel have got Germany into a devastating war. I think Stalin's policy toward Germany is bad for Russia, bad for the Soviet government, and bad for the revolution. Russia's new foreign policy is storing up fuel for a future war against Russia. It is poor power politics.



Drawing by LOW

How much hatred for Soviet Russia was neutralized by the popular-front and collective-security policies, by Litvinov's speeches, and by Russia's help to Spain and China can be measured by the vehemence and venom of the reaction against Moscow today. Those who believe that the Soviet war with Finland could provide the capitalist world with an excuse or opportunity for an attack on Russia must agree that Stalin should therefore have kept the peace, for such a joint assault would mean defeat for Russia. Stalin, the circumspect, boasted that he would not pull anybody else's chestnuts from the fire. But you can burn your fingers on your own chestnuts.

The Second World War simply presented Russia with an opportunity to grab. It could not resist the temptation. If the Soviet government had said, "A plague on both your houses; the Allies and the Germans are imperialists and we will have nothing to do with either," its moral position would have been unassailable and all its interests safeguarded. It is the profit taken by a state resting on a non-profit system of society which is objectionable. Once upon a time the Bolsheviks criticized foreign governments for adopting such imperialist measures. There is no difference in principle between British tenure of Gibraltar and Russian occupation of the Estonian islands in the Gulf of Finland or the existence of a Soviet military airdrome one mile from the Lithuanian city of Vilna or a Red garrison in that city. To accept the theory that the Baltic states might have been used as springboards for an attack on Russia and therefore had to be swallowed by Russia would mean to imperil the life of every small nation, for Germany or England could similarly contend that Holland and Belgium represent such a danger. To argue that Finland was a menace because Leningrad was within range of its artillery is to make a case against the existence of every weak country. Thus German cities are within range of Hungarian air fields: Germany should annex Hungary. This principle could only lead to world anarchy and endless wars. On the same basis, and since at some undetermined date the United States might be attacked from Canada or even from Europe, we ought to annex everything within the flying radius of bombing planes of the future.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Ca

To apologize for Russia's attack on Finland by saying that Finland is semi-fascist makes it more difficult to explain Moscow's alleged desire to fight for Poland, which was certainly more reactionary than Finland. If you wage war on semi-fascists why not on fascists? Russia has set up a puppet Soviet regime in Finland and is trying to crush the established national government. Isn't that exactly what Hitler and Mussolini did in Spain?

We are told that collectivized agriculture is better for the peasant in the new Russian section of Poland than the domination of the Polish landlords. I am prepared to agree, although I read with skepticism the dithyrambic greetings sent from the new Soviet provinces to "Father Comrade Stalin" and the ecstatic reports in the Soviet press about the reception given by the Poles and Ukrainians to the Russians. This, however, is the typical excuse of the capitalist imperialists—the fellah is better off because England dominates Egypt. That Mussolini would improve conditions in Abyssinia did not make us defend his war of conquest. Mexico and Central America might benefit by incorporation in the United States.

"CEMENTED IN BLOOD"

How profound is the change in Soviet policy? Is it mere opportunism stimulated by the unique chance to aggrandize, or does it reflect, and deepen, a new Soviet attitude toward world problems and toward political isms in general? This can be judged by Moscow's language. Pravda recently charged that the Polish Foreign Minister, Colonel Beck, had "made provocative speeches before the war between Poland and Germany and—as a result of this—provoked a war with Germany." Poor Nazis! But for Beck's words it would never have occurred to them to attack Poland.

On March 10 Stalin said: "We are in favor of supporting peoples who are fighting for the independence of their countries." There is one word of rebuttal: Finland.

On May 31 Molotov said: "How do we define our tasks in the present international situation? We consider that they are in line with the interests of non-aggressor countries. They consist in checking the further development of aggression." Five months later, on October 31, Molotov said: "Such concepts as 'aggression' and 'aggressor' have acquired a new concrete connotation." "Today," he suggested, "Germany is in the position of a state that is striving for peace while England and France . . . are opposed to the conclusion of peace." "You see," he added, "the roles are changing." They are indeed. Russia is in a different role. Russia has become an aggressor and sees the world from a new perspective.

And then Finland, the big bully, prepared to attack little defenseless Russia. That is just what Germany said about Poland. In the Nazi press the German invasion of Poland was always called a "counter-attack." The war on Finland is a brutal, unwarranted assault on a small nation which I cannot distinguish from the fascist invasions of Ethiopia, Spain, China, Czechoslovakia, and Poland.

The past and present are the parents of the future. If we draw a line between the past and the present and prolong it, it may give some indication of the general trend. Molotov recently revealed that in the negotiations with Turkey in the autumn Moscow proposed to conclude a mutual-assistance pact with Turkey. A mutual-assistance pact means that if one party is attacked the other comes to its aid. But, declares Molotov, the Soviet government stipulated "that such a pact could not induce it to actions which might draw it into an armed conflict with Germany." Germany is the only exception. Moscow allows nothing to cloud its friendship with the Third Reich.

Molotov had some harsh words for the United States on the same occasion. "The decision of the American government," he stated, "to lift the embargo on arms to belligerent countries raises certain misgivings." Why? "It can scarcely be doubted," he ventured, "that the effect of the decision will be to aggravate and protract" the war. Now American arms will go only to the Allies, not to Germany. If that protracts the war, it means that Russia had expected Germany to win in a short war.

Molotov stated on August 31: "It would be difficult to underestimate the international importance of the Soviet-German treaty. It is a date of historic importance. It marked a turning-point in the history of Europe and not only of Europe." The treaty could have been so important only if it enabled Germany to take Poland without a war or if Germany won the war. Moscow must have foreseen and welcomed both these eventualities.

Stalin was present at the signing of the Russo-German pact. It was the first time that he had attended the signing of a diplomatic document. Since he never does anything without an eye to its political effect, this was a demonstration. It told the world to attach special significance to the treaty. The photographs of the ceremony also tell a story. Stalin looks as if he had performed a trick and was pleased. Molotov too seems to be cynically delighted, and Ribbentrop beams. Stalin's face is more telling than a dozen secret clauses.

The Russo-German pact does not merely record Russia's intention not to fight on the side of the Allies and the resolve of both signatories to refrain from attacking each other. It goes much farther. The Soviet government, by the text of the treaty, undertakes not to help any victim of German aggression or any country which is helping a victim of German aggression. Stalin has adopted the policy of "non-intervention," which, as he saw in Spain, favors the aggressor. But that is not all. Germany and Russia are to remain "in continuous touch with each other for consultation and in order to inform each other regarding questions which concern their mutual interest." This has often served as the veiled formula for an alliance. Moreover, "neither of the two contracting parties will participate in any grouping of powers which is directly or indirectly directed against the other party of this agreement." That immediately and obviously killed the Franco-Soviet agreement. Strictly interpreted, Russia cannot be a member of any future League of Nations while the pact is valid, which is for ten years at least. "The pact comes into force immediately on its signing." This is not the usual procedure. Nations generally wait until the instrument is ratified. Ratification, the document prescribed, was to take place "within the shortest possible time." Both governments were apparently in a hurry. Germany was poised for an attack on Poland. It started seven days later. Not only the text of the agreement, but the time chosen and the circumstances surrounding it warrant fully the suspicion that this is more than an ordinary non-aggression pact. As Molotov put it on August 31, "the enemies of the pact are the enemies of the Soviet Union and of Germany." The pact then is the keystone of Soviet foreign policy.

Of course, Germany and Russia may quarrel. All states that are friends may quarrel. There is nothing immutable in international relations. Japan and Russia fought a war in 1904. They were allies in 1914. Germany and Italy were allies in 1914. They fought a war in 1915. But for the present, at least, Moscow and Berlin seek to avoid measures which displease the other. They likewise engage in mutual defense. Thus the Bolsheviks do not merely justify their own acts in Poland; they also throw a favorable light on what Germany is doing there. Izvestia on October 9, 1939, for instance, stated that "the government of the Soviet Union and the government of Germany undertook the task of establishing peace and order on the territory of the former Poland and to give to peoples inhabiting that territory a peaceful existence which would correspond to their national characteristics." Is this not a good deal to expect from Hitler in view of his record on national minorities? It is novel and instructive to find Izvestia uniting Soviet and Nazi conduct in Poland under a single formula. Moscow's own words suggest the existence of a Soviet-Nazi entente. Stalin himself has revealed his view on this subject. When Ribbentrop congratulated him on his sixtieth birthday, Stalin replied: "The friendship of the peoples of Germany and the Soviet Union, cemented in blood, has every reason to be lasting and firm." (Incidentally, whose blood?)

Molotov informed the Supreme Soviet Council on August 31 that "when the German government expressed its desire to improve political relations, the Soviet government had no reason to refuse. That is how the question arose of concluding the non-aggression pact. This stands every former Soviet principle on its head. Soviet policy had always been hostile to bilateral pacts of non-aggression without escape clauses, because they gave liberty of action to the aggressor. If Hitler, having decided to invade one country, signed non-aggression pacts like the Ribbentrop-Molotov document with all other countries, then nobody could assist the victim of aggression. Moscow had therefore repeated for years that bilateral treaties led to war. Stalin's alternative had been collective security, a united front against aggressors. Hitler, on the other hand, pleaded in several Reichstag sessions (May, 1935, for instance) the desirability of bilateral agreements. Stalin has taken the Hitler road.

"WORLD REVOLUTION" MAY BE REACTIONARY

If any further proof of a sharp alteration in Soviet foreign policy were sought it could be found in the new strategy of foreign Communist parties. In May, 1935, France and Russia concluded a treaty of alliance. Accordingly Pierre Laval, the reactionary Premier of France, came to Moscow, and on May 15 he and Stalin, Molotov, and Litvinov issued a joint communiqué which read in part: "M. Stalin understands and fully approves the national-defense policy of France in keeping her armed forces at the level required for security." This was an intimation to the French Communists to drop their opposition to French military budgets (they had previously voted against the building of the Maginot Line). It would not have been logical for the French Communists to endeavor to keep France weak when France was an ally of Soviet Russia. The French Communists adopted a new line. Thereafter and until the signing of the Russo-German pact the Communists in democratic countries tried to cooperate with bourgeois parties. They did not advocate world revolution. They preached an alliance with democracy. They served many liberal causes with devotion and good effect. What has happened now? The French Communists, who began to support French military preparations when Stalin signed a pact with Laval, began to oppose them when Stalin signed a pact with Hitler. The British and other Communist parties followed suit. On September 3 Harry Pollitt, secretary of the British Communist Party, published a penny pamphlet entitled "How to Win the War," in which he wrote that although the war was of course an imperialist war, nevertheless, "to stand aside from this conflict, to contribute only revolutionary-sounding phrases while the fascist beasts ride roughshod over Europe, would be a betrayal of everything our forebears have fought to achieve in the course of long years of struggle against capitalism." Then new instructions reached party leaders abroad contradicting everything they had said in the popular-front period and even what they said after August 23. The Communists thereupon condemned the anti-Nazi war and are now urging a cessation of hostilities.

Plainly the Communists' pacifist and world-revolutionary slogans can only be designed to undermine morale in England and France; in England their propaganda is unrestricted by official interference and in France they carry on despite it, whereas the Gestapo had reduced the effectiveness of German Communist anti-Hitler agitation to an insignificant minimum. Moreover, I am not at all sure that Communists in Germany will not conduct patriotic German propaganda, for is not Germany fighting Great Britain, which has suddenly become Russia's public enemy No. 1 (this honor was once held by France, later by Germany and Japan), and are not Germany and the Socialist fatherland warm friends? German Communists are returning from Russia to Germany under a promise of immunity. The Communist Party of the United States has discontinued its economic boycott of Germany. It is still boycotting Japan, however. There is as yet no agreement between Moscow and Japan on China, and the united front between the Chinese Communists and Chiang Kai-shek remains. But if the new world-revolutionary strategy should require the Chinese Communists to desert Chiang Kai-shek and intrench themselves in provinces contiguous to Siberia—where Moscow could establish a protectorate over them—Chiang Kai-shek would be weakened, and the occupation of a large zone in China by Japanese imperialism would be facilitated.

Thus it becomes clear that the world revolution, which sounds so radical, has reactionary implications. That is dialectical, too. There is nothing in common between the world revolution and Russia's recent conquistadorial acts, which have alienated the working classes of Western countries and left others confused and dismayed. The cause of world labor is not identical with that of Russian territory. The methods of conquest employed by Moscow and the lies about "Finnish aggression" are counter-revolutionary in their effect. Stalin's photograph with Ribbentrop is the finest counter-revolutionary propaganda. If Stalin had been thinking of the world revolution or of the work of foreign Communist parties, he would not have posed for his picture with a leading fascist. He did not have to do it.

[The concluding article of Mr. Fischer's series, dealing with internal developments in the Soviet Union which have paved the way for the drastic change in foreign policy, will appear next week.]

America's Stake in Britain's War

BY FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

THE seven blind men of the Hindu legend who sought to describe the elephant by feeling its parts could come to no agreement as to the nature of the beast. The problem which they faced was less difficult than that which the citizens of the United States, giddy-minded and sober-minded alike, are meeting in their efforts to comprehend the issues of "other people's wars" and the interest of America therein.

The chief obstacle to clarity of vision lies in the unpredictability of human events in a world given over to international anarchy. The first curse of anarchy, as Thomas Hobbes observed some centuries ago, is that every man is the enemy of every man and that life is solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short. The world's tragedy gives testimony. The second curse of anarchy is that none knows what dangers the morrow will bring, and life becomes a perilous experiment based upon doubtful assumptions about an unknowable future. America's dilemma bears witness. Could the outcome of the present war be foretold, it would probably not have to be fought. Overt tests of power are necessary only when the balance of forces is in doubt. And anyone who could predict the verdict of Mars could with the greatest of ease prescribe an American foreign policy.

The quarrel at home over American interests in the world of 1940 is not a quarrel over conflicting loves and hates or over irreconcilable demands, but only over divergent expectations. All Americans want "peace" and "prosperity." All want "democracy," "freedom," and "justice," both in American society and in the society of nations. Whether the goods thus named can ever again be had depends upon the design of world politics which is being blindly woven by the embattled hosts abroad. The means of having them, if they can still be had, is obscured by the haze of dubious combat which spreads from Shansi to Lapland and from the Westwall to all the seaways of the globe. Amid a chaos of guesses and slogans, all without meaning save in terms of coming consequences of current acts, the despairing seeker after certainty may well echo Alice's wistful question—"whether you can make words mean so many different things." Humpty Dumpty's contemptuous retort is still the best reply: "The question is which is to be Master—that's all."

Every war is a struggle for mastery, whether it be called a quest for empire or a crusade for righteousness. Every world war is a struggle for mastery of the world. America has been inextricably a part of the Western world since Europeans wrested it from the Indians. America has therefore been willy-nilly involved in every world war of the last three hundred years. The solution of the problem of power posed by each conflict was long in doubt, as it is now. But the alternatives presented are not wholly novel. In the tumult and shouting of the moment many forget that the broad pattern of Weltpolitik, writ large across North Atlantic civilization, has exhibited astonishingly little change since Elizabeth's seamen defeated the Armada and Europe's first great clash of ideologies drove the first refugees to these shores.

That pattern is one of successive efforts on the part of the most powerful Continental power to emulate ancient Rome in unifying Europe and the world by the sword. Each such effort has ultimately been thwarted by a coalition of rivals and victims who have stubbornly preferred independence to the blessings of enforced unity. The decisive component in each such coalition has always been the insular "nation of shopkeepers." An England lacking large land forces and Continental bases has never been able to partition or annex Continental powers. But an England possessing preponderant sea power has been able to acquire the lion's share of Africa, Asia, and Oceania, and to buy off or defeat each Continental aspirant to hegemony, from Hapsburgs and Bourbons to Bonapartes and Hohenzollerns.

These practices of Albion are attributable neither to vice nor to virtue but to geography and business. Britain's rulers have viewed every would-be Continental conqueror as a threat to British security and a menace to the far-flung markets without which England would die. They have welcomed every ally willing to serve their interests on British terms. And they have seldom hesitated to "sell out" allies no longer useful. The net result of British victories in former world wars has been to preserve a state system of rival sovereignties with the strongest always held in check by coalitions of the weak.

From the beginning of America's independent existence this result has been taken for granted by Americans, most of all when they have been least conscious of it. Having failed to conquer Canada in 1812, the United States ceased playing the power game against Britain. Having realized that Canada was vulnerable, Britain reciprocated. The unique features of Anglo-American relations since the Treaty of Ghent have no parallels in the relations between any other two powers. They derive less from a common tongue and common cultural values than from geography and business. Each nation has always been the best customer of the other. Each nation has looked to the other for support in the power game. The new British Empire was made in America. The Monroe Doctrine and the Open Door were made in England. American isolationism and Anglophobia have flourished only when British naval supremacy and British ability to keep Europe safely divided into rival camps were not in question. America has used Britain as a defense against Continental conquerors potentially dangerous to the United States. Britain has used America to redress the European balance whenever it has been in danger of fundamental disturbance. In 1917 America came to Britain's defense when British defeat was threatened. Under similar circumstances America will again come to Britain's defense if past definitions of national interests persist.

The central issue of American foreign policy is nothing less than the issue of whether America can safely expose itself to the risks resulting from possible British defeat at the hands of a new corporal turned Caesar. If the danger does not arise, no choice will need to be made beyond that already made in the revision of the neutrality legislation. But should Britain face disaster at the hands of Hitler and/or Stalin in consequence of the tragic blunders of Tory appeasers during the past eight years, America must either take up arms against Britain's enemies or confront a changed world in which for the first time the principal obstacle to the military unification of Europe will be gone and the bulwark between America and the Continental powers will be demolished. All other decisions in American diplomacy hinge upon this decision, since all problems of world power revolve around England's destiny.

In support of the view that Britain's fate need not concern Americans to the point of intervention, certain assumptions about the future can readily be made. A triumphant Reich may turn against Russia. A Europe torn by German-Russian conflict will not threaten America. Or a victorious Germany, aided by Russia, Italy, Spain, and Japan, may become wholly occupied for years or decades with the partition and exploitation of the British, French, Dutch, Belgian, and Portuguese colonial empires in Africa and Asia, leaving America in safe and splendid isolation. Or a coalition of aggressors, having mastered three continents, may become satiated and leave America in peace because of the risks and costs of challenging the great power of the West. A unified Europe, albeit united by the sword, might become a stable and prosperous Europe offering economic opportunities rather than political threats to America. In any of these contingencies the defeat and dissolution of the British Empire would present few dangers to the United States.

On the other hand, a different set of consequences, equally possible and far less reassuring, may well flow from the long-predicted fall of Britain. Naval hegemony in all the seaways outside the Western Hemisphere will pass to the victors. The world's new masters will presumably continue to stand for autarchy in international trade and for anarchy in international politics. A German-Japanese alliance or a German-Russian-Japanese alliance could readily complete the conquest of China and drive America from the western Pacific. A world dominated by the totalitarian economies may be a world in which most American foreign trade will vanish. Whether the military security of the United States could be seriously threatened under any of these circumstances appears doubtful. Symbols, however, are also weapons of conquest. The prestige value of the triumphant totalitarian ideologies, coupled with widespread deprivations and insecurities throughout the Western Hemisphere, might well destroy the democratic way of life—first in Latin America and later within the United States itself. A militarized totalitarian America could readily survive as a great power in a totalitarian world. In all probability a democratic America could not.

These alternative prospects impose certain imperatives upon all participants in the great debate on what American policy should be. Isolationists would do well to talk less of the sins of Anglo-French imperialism, which are well known, and to think more of the probable impact upon American security and American democracy of a victory of German, Japanese, and Russian imperialisms over Anglo-French imperialism. Interventionists might profitably devote less attention to the crimes of Berlin, Moscow, Rome, and Tokyo, which are also well known, and give more thought to the future shape of Anglo-American relations as the foundation of a new commonwealth of states. What risks of tomorrow are Americans prepared to run for the sake of avoiding involvement in today's war? What new price for security are Americans prepared to pay if the security hitherto afforded by the British fleet is gone? What obligations are Americans prepared to assume for the sake of preserving the security they have hitherto enjoyed? What, if anything, do they propose to do to stop Hitler and Stalin in Europe and the Japanese war machine in Asia? If they are indisposed to do anything effective, what form do they propose to give to acquiescence in a possible totalitarian victory and to their future relations with the victors? And if such a victory is prevented, what responsibilities, if any, are Americans prepared to assume to reconstruct a liberal world economy devoted to welfare and not to power and a liberal world polity resting on cooperation and consent and not on violence?

Until these questions are discussed much more frankly than is now the case, until provisional answers are found which can command general support and serve as guides to Washington, American foreign policy must remain a muddle, dangerous alike for America and for the rest of the world. Answers found soon will shorten the sufferings of millions, for the decisions to be made in many capitals will depend upon calculations as to American decisions. Answers found late may be found too late.

Death of a Newspaper

BY GEORGE W. McGILL

Chattanooga, December 23

TEN days before Christmas the Chattanooga News was forced to suspend publication after more than fifty-one years as an afternoon daily. The action was the result of an agreement between a combination of majority bondholders and preferred stockholders of the Chattanooga News Company and Roy McDonald, publisher of the Chattanooga Free Press, the paper's bitterly anti-New Deal competitor. The deal called for the sale of "certain assets" of the News to the Free Press on condition that the News cease publication immediately. This squeeze-out was vigorously opposed by both the management of the News and its 150 employees. All proposals made by George Fort Milton, president and general manager of the News, and a committee of employees were ignored. Protests by organized labor leaders representing both the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. went unheeded.

The opportunity to crush the News was presented by a technical default in payment of bond obligations which made possible an order by holders of a majority of the bonds for foreclosure against the paper's physical assets, although it was admitted that except for its $325,000 bonded-debt burden the News was in better financial condition than the Free Press. George Fort Milton's stepmother, Mrs. Abby Crawford Milton, and her three children controlled the majority of the bonds and preferred stock of the Chattanooga News Company. George Fort Milton, Sr., had been president and editor of the News from 1908 until his death in 1924, and his will designated his son to succeed him and to control the policies of the paper. In order to insure this, he bequeathed to Milton, Jr., sufficient stock, both outright and as trustee, to give him control. In 1928 Milton and Walter C. Johnson, then general manager and vice-president of the News, contracted with Mrs. Milton to buy, at $295 a share, the stock owned by Mrs. Milton and her minor children and also the stock held by Milton as trustee.

Milton's figures show that from 1928 to 1936 Mrs. Milton and her children received more than $400,000 in cash and securities.

In 1936 Milton and Johnson, to remove the personal obligations against them incurred in the deal with Mrs. Milton, agreed to a plan for increasing the bonded indebtedness of the company from $120,000 to $325,000 and for enlarging the preferred-stock issues from $100,000 to $150,000. Most of the new bond and stock issue was given to Mrs. Milton to wipe out the rest of the notes which Milton and Johnson had signed individually. It was through Mrs. Milton's control of the majority of the securities and the combination of her interests with those of minority stockholders that control was wrested from Milton and the fate of the News decided.

The underlying cause of the paper's extinction had little to do with its finances; it lay rather in the editorial policies which had made the Chattanooga News one of the most liberal dailies in the South. Its crusade for public power in Chattanooga, the last major fight waged by the News, was what probably spelled its doom. It had previously championed the fight for woman suffrage, and had long pressed for reform in city, county, and state government. It had exposed rackets and vigorously condemned lynching. It had demanded that the underprivileged be given a fair opportunity and the rights of labor be recognized. President Roosevelt and the New Deal received the support of the News, and, what was perhaps most important, the Tennessee Valley Authority program was publicized fully and favorably.

Chattanooga's fight for public power was started in 1934 and reached its climax in March, 1935, when the voters decided by nearly three to one that the city should issue bonds to build or acquire its own power-distribution system. The News was the only Chattanooga paper that supported public power, and every member of its editorial staff took part in the fight. The referendum did not end the struggle, and the News carried the battle on until the sale of the Commonwealth and Southern properties to the TVA ended the controversy last summer.

The public-power battle turned many local business interests against the News and induced them to encourage and give aid to the Free Press, which started as a shopping guide for Roy McDonald's chain of grocery stores, later became a weekly sheet, then a semi-weekly, and finally a daily in September, 1936. Testimony introduced before the Congressional Committee to Investigate the TVA showed that the Tennessee Electric Power Company withdrew all its advertising from the News and advertised heavily with the Free Press at higher rates than were paid by others.

For two years before the death of the News on December 19, various injurious rumors had been circulated concerning the paper. But it was not until December 1 of this year that employees were advised officially of the critical situation. When Milton told them the facts as he knew them, they acted immediately and vigorously. A News Employees' Committee was formed, composed of representatives from the various departments. Through the committee the workers took it upon themselves to raise the $15,000 needed to make up the bond default and to contribute 20 per cent of their salaries to buy stock in the News and thus make available weekly deposits with the trustee sufficient to take care of the indebtedness as it matured. The management agreed that this contribution should continue as long as the Employees' Committee considered it necessary. Since the paper's volume of business had increased steadily over a period of fourteen months and for the past few months it had actually been in the black, it was expected that these sacrifices would not have to be made over a long period.

The $15,000 was raised quickly. Friends of the News and friends of the employees responded with cash, checks, and notes ranging in amount from $25 to $1,500. Many of the workers sold their cars, mortgaged their homes and furniture, or borrowed on their life insurance to contribute to the fund.

The climax of the employees' efforts came on the night of December 2 when seventy-five of them called on the persons who seemed responsible for the situation to ask them to give the News a chance to continue operations under the employees' plan or at least to grant a stay of execution. Wearing the rough clothes in which they had done their day's work and with ink smudges on their hands and faces, they drove in sleet and rain over the serpentine highway which leads up historic Lookout Mountain to the home of Mrs. Abby Milton's daughter. Some of them, men who had been with the News for more than twenty-five years and had worked for the elder Milton, made personal appeals to his widow. She insisted, however, that she was powerless to act and that she was not responsible for the situation which had arisen.

The employees went next to the home of Sam J. McAllester, Mrs. Milton's attorney. McAllester has been active in Republican politics and is secretary of the Home Stores, Inc., the grocery chain of which Roy McDonald, publisher of the Free Press, is president. He received the News representatives courteously and praised their spirit of cooperation and efforts to save the paper, but told them nothing could be done inasmuch as the sale agreement had already been signed and only a few formalities remained to be done to consummate the transaction. He said persons with money were willing to back the Free Press if only one afternoon newspaper were left in the field, but they were unwilling to invest in the News.

It was a gloomy procession which wound its way back down the mountain through the fog. But the men were not ready to surrender. They asked the trustee to take the $15,000 they had raised and to give them assurance that the News would continue to operate. The conditions were not acceptable, however, and the money was returned to the donors. The fight was lost.

"But the spirit of the News," wrote Alfred D. Mynders, the paper's veteran editorial writer, "is not going to die, and certainly no one in the News family is today in the mood to salute any Caesars." The people of Chattanooga, he added, "will keep that spirit alive and some day they may even demand a paper like the News to voice their hopes and aspirations."

Public indignation was expressed over the freezing-out of the paper, and even some of the minority bondholders were displeased. Already there are reports that after the first of the year the public demand will be satisfied and that the News—under another name—will rise phoenix-like from the ashes.

Writers in the Wilderness

II. JOHN DOS PASSOS

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THE career of John Dos Passos might well be the subject of one of the biographies which form a segment of "U. S. A." He was born in the middle of America in 1896 just as finance capitalism was beginning to hit its stride across the land of opportunity. His grandfather had been a Portuguese immigrant to the New World, a shoemaker in Philadelphia. His father was a drummer boy in the Civil War, which gave the country to the northern industrialists and increased the reservoir of "free" labor by several million blacks. By the time he was born his father was a corporation lawyer in a land of corporations whose quiet golden voice outweighed the silver tongue of Bryan at least sixteen to one. His mother stemmed from the stock of Maryland and the Old Dominion, where Jefferson, the slaveholder, had paradoxically espoused the ideal of equalitarian democracy. From one of those fusions of racial and cultural strains in which the melting-pot has been so rich came an American with the name of John Roderigo Dos Passos.

He was born in Chicago, but he began traveling at an early age. He lived in the Northern Neck of Virginia, in Washington, D. C., in England, where he also went to school. His later education was at the Choate School and Harvard, where he graduated in 1916. He wrote for the Dial, aesthetic advance guard of the period, and wanted to study architecture. He sailed for Spain for that purpose in 1916, but turned up in Paris in 1917 studying instead the architecture of history, which was being basically altered at the time in the World War. He has been working at it ever since.

He drove an ambulance during the war, and his first book came out of that experience, not "Three Soldiers" but "One Man's Initiation," published in England in 1920. It was the militant, questioning book of a very young man learning to write.

"Three Soldiers" was published in America in 1921. It showed a great advance in writing and in thinking. Coningsby Dawson in the New York Times denounced it as a story told "brutally with calculated sordidness and a blind whirlwind of rage which respects neither the reticences of art nor the restraints of decency." Today it seems mild enough; then it was called by the Independent the "Main Street" of the war, which serves to remind us of the outraged protest that greeted Lewis's exposé of Gopher Prairie.

After the war Dos Passos extended his travels. Spain, the Near East, Mexico. His next book, "Rosinante to the Road Again," was the first of three such books that have punctuated more than two decades. He took the world for his province at an early age and has covered more of it than most people. Endowed with an extraordinary sensory apparatus, he has set down the sights, sounds, smells of a dozen countries with such vividness and immediacy that the words themselves seem like colors, noises, odors; but these books also contain the itinerary, with milestones, of the emotional and intellectual research of a man of conscience, deliberately extending and deepening his awareness, determined to confront all the complexities and contradictions of contemporary human experience. They show his progression from the eloquent and sometimes rhetorical description of far countries to an ever-deepening concern with the social and human landscape at home and abroad, and they reflect the author's experience, as observer or participant, of the wars of his generation—from the struggle to save the lives of Sacco and Vanzetti to the civil war in Spain. Excerpts from the three books were published in 1938 under the title "Journeys Between Wars." From each of his journeys he has returned to confront America, as novelist, with a tough faith in the vague but undeniable promise of American life and a determined disillusion with its specific broken promises; they have combined to generate the energy and will to produce a 1,400-page trilogy of the American scene, as well as other books, plays, pamphlets, and many articles.

After his last journey—to Spain, France, and England—Dos Passos said farewell to Europe, as far as its power politics are concerned. Europe includes Stalin's Russia, where Dos Passos has been popular as a "proletarian" novelist. The October Revolution had filled him, as it had many others, with a driving hope; its perversion into a totalitarian dictatorship turned that hope to disillusion. But he thinks that America may be able to discover indigenous methods of attaining a just social order. In the Partisan Review for Summer, 1939, he voiced the opinion he had expressed two years earlier in Common Sense on his return to America:

> I think there is enough real democracy in the very mixed American tradition to enable us, with courage and luck, to weather the social transformations that are now going on without losing our liberties or the humane outlook that is the medium in which civilizations grow. The reaction to home-bred ways of thinking is a healthy defense against the total bankruptcy of Europe.

Dos Passos's main journey between two major wars and innumerable smaller ones has been an unprecedented literary exploration of the American scene. His findings are contained in "Manhattan Transfer" (1925); the trilogy "U. S. A.," made up of "The 42nd Parallel" (1930), "Nineteen Nineteen" (1932), and "The Big Money" (1936); and "Adventures of a Young Man" (1939), which also incorporates his farewell to Europe.

Two books—a volume of indifferent verse, "The Pushcart at the Curb," and an inferior novel, "Streets of Night"—were published in 1922 and 1923, respectively, but "Manhattan Transfer," which is in a sense a prologue to "U. S. A." in both subject matter and style, marked the beginning of what he calls "straight writing." In an introduction to the Modern Library Edition of "Three Soldiers" in 1932 he defined his method and his objective:

> I think there is such a thing as straight writing. A cabinetmaker enjoys cutting a dovetail because he's a cabinetmaker; every type of work has its own vigor inherent in it. The mind of a generation is its speech. A writer makes aspects of that speech enduring by putting them in print. He whittles at the words and phrases of today and makes of them forms to set the mind of tomorrow's generation. That's history. A writer who writes straight is the architect of history.
>
> What I'm trying to get out is the difference in kind between the work of James Joyce, say, and that of any current dispenser of daydreams. . . . Joyce is working with speech straight and so dominating the machine of production, while the daydream artist is merely feeding the machine. . . .

His preoccupation with speech comes out again in the brief preface to the Modern Library edition of "U. S. A." (1939), which ends, "But mostly U. S. A. is the speech of the people." He has done a conscientious job of putting the speech of this generation in print. His tool chest contains a huge vocabulary and a multiplicity of characters collected from every stratum of American life. His novels, like his travel books, contain much color and sound. On the very first page of "Manhattan Transfer" is an incidental but typical example of his onomatopoetic gift with words: ". . . men and women press through the manuresmelling wooden tunnel to the ferry-house, crushed and jostling like apples fed down a chute into a press." The italicized phrase makes the very sound of apples in a press. In his "whittling" at words and phrases he has made new joinings and given old phrases a fresh look, sometimes so fresh that the reader does not recognize them at first. When I first came on "chiponthe-shoulder" I wanted to pronounce the th hard as in "Iolanthe." The phrase-word happens in this case to be a good brief description of a policeman, though it would be clearer with hyphens. Often his "cabinet work" is superficial and puzzling rather than organic and revealing.

"U. S. A.," as everybody knows, is divided into four segments. The Camera Eye is autobiographical; Newsreel gives the external setting; the brief biographies of important Americans provide the moral and historical perspective. All three make up the background against which the numerous fictional characters move. They are drawn from every walk of life; they are connected only by chance. The principle of unity in the book is the impact upon the characters, including the great Americans and the author, of a social system whose main values are money and respectability.

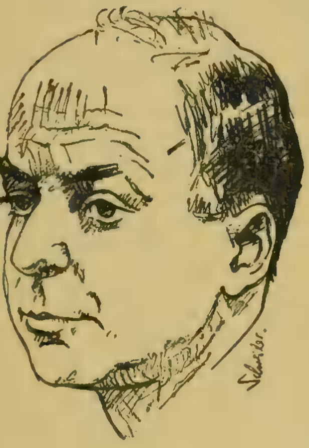
"U. S. A." reflects both the unflinching disillusion and the persistent renewal I have already mentioned as the driving forces in Dos Passos's attitude. Roughly speaking, these two attitudes are projected, respectively, in his fictional characters, who are typically "little people" overtaken and defeated by one or another manifestation of the "system," and in his "great Americans." John Chamberlain, in an interesting brochure on Dos Passos published last spring, asks whether, by the juxtaposition of the will-less common man and the dedicated great, the author is not "trying to tell us, without becoming didactic and destroying himself as a novelist, that the 'little man' is damned because something (call it 'Fate,' call it the 'system,' call it what you will) comes between him and opportunity to use the product of the brains of the great." This is probably Dos Passos's intention, and I would not quarrel with the thesis. But certain unplanned effects make his demonstration less convincing than it should be.

Three of his characters, one real and big, two fictional and little, will serve to illustrate—Debs in "U. S. A." and Jimmy Herf and Ellen Thatcher in "Manhattan Transfer." All are thwarted by the "system." But of the two fictional characters Ellen is for me alive, Jimmy is not; and in her own way, despite Dos Passos's thesis, Ellen shares with Debs and others of the "great Americans" the resilience and will that the Jimmy Herfs and the Charley Andersons lack.

The answer seems to me twofold. First, the demonstration of the thesis, as far as Jimmy Herf or Charley Anderson is concerned, does tend to be didactic, and sentimental as well. The difference between Ellen and Jimmy in Dos Passos's characterization of them is, to put it rather crudely, that Ellen in spite of everything says yes to life; Jimmy has no said for him. And Ellen is the more convincing, because even "little people," under capitalism or any other system, are not quite so miserable as Dos Passos forces them to be, if only because ignorance and the self-preserving impulse to rationalization keep from them the ultimate and self-destroying knowledge, which Dos Passos possesses, that they are once and for all defeated. In particular his men tend to be creatures of his own intellectual disillusion to whom he allows none of his own persistent hope. As a result their small tragedies lack the tragic sense, and as characters they fail to come to life. His women, on the other hand, often do come to life; in these cases they transcend the pattern; but by this very fact they show his real power of characterization once it works free of an imposed design.

Too often, and this is the second part of the answer, Dos Passos reports rather than creates character. Innumerable details of speech, circumstance, setting are put down, sometimes to the point of monotony and sometimes, since the details are often similar, to the point where the characters run together in the reader's mind. Dos Passos tends toward the generalized rather than the significant detail. For the most part he has been unable to create in his fictional characters the illusion of life which is already there to be reported in his real characters. But occasionally the report gets up and walks, and most often it is an Ellen, a Margo Dowling, or an Eleanor Stoddard. It would be foolish to assume that Dos Passos considers American women superior in the sense of life, if only because it is so strong in his characterizations of great Americans. The key seems to lie rather in his attitude toward such characters as Jimmy Herf. His pity for them is clear and conscious. As John Chamberlain says, his pity is sometimes wasted. But what devitalizes them is not pity but a condescension, no doubt unconscious, on the part of the author which is communicated to the reader. Toward Ellen and even toward Margo Dowling, on the other hand, he maintains and communicates that attitude of wonder never quite dispelled which makes one fundamental difference between invented and created character.

"U. S. A." demonstrates Dos Passos's extraordinary capacity for observation; his "scholarship" in this respect is amazing; the sheer bulk and variety of his reading as reflected in both the biographies and the fictional sections have been tremendous. The work as a whole is one of the most impressive performances in contemporary writing. Yet one cannot say, "Here is the essence of American life." One can say rather that here in parallel columns is a pretty complete report of the human and social elements of American life from which the essence might be distilled. Eventually, however, the reading of parallel columns becomes monotonous. In the end one tends, in self-defense, to read the fictional column out of order.



John Dos Passos

What is more serious, one grows to feel that the multiple device is a substitute for integration on the part of the author; the autobiographical Camera Eye does not fulfil what might have been its catalytic function.

His latest book, "The Adventures of a Young Man," is refreshingly free of devices. In comparison with "U. S. A." it is a minor work; and among other things it reveals to what extent the life of "U. S. A." depends upon the biographies of great Americans which form its most enduring segment. But if "The Adventures" fails, at least it is a move in the direction of integration of both style and content, which seems to me to be Dos Passos's primary problem as a novelist. Its theme, moreover, indicates an advance from reporting to analysis; in this book Dos Passos comes closer to functioning as the "architect of history" he aspires to be rather than a carpenter of style preoccupied with the inadequate theory that "mostly U. S. A. is the speech of the people."

"The Adventures of a Young Man" appeared at a time when it was still fashionable to defend the Soviet Union as a socialist state. With exceptions it was pounced upon as merely a fictionized account of the Stalinist-Trotskyist feud by both sides to the dispute, partly because both its critics and its defenders wished to use it as a stick with which to beat their enemies, partly, I think, because the Stalinists have hammered so hard on the patent lie that every left critic of Stalinism is a Trotskyite that the lie has been accepted even by intelligent people, and partly because of the weaknesses of the book itself. At any rate its real theme got little attention. This theme, broadly speaking, is the main problem of our day—the problem of achieving the "better world" of socialism without setting up a "bureaucratic machine for anti-human power," run by an "iron combination of men . . . who have only one idea binding them together, to hold on to what they've got" (I quote from Dos Passos in other contexts) and abetted by a fanaticism as cruel as that of the Inquisition. This is no sectarian issue.

The theme is developed through the account of the "adventures" of Glenn Spotswood, an American who is led by his social convictions into the Communist Party and out again into independent radicalism. He is labeled a Trotskyite by his former comrades, and when he finds his way to Spain to fight for the republic he is imprisoned and then sent to certain death. He is not merely a rival sectarian, but an independent radical who rejects Moscow and what it stands for.

The book does not do artistic justice to its theme. In the section dealing with the miners' struggle Glenn Spotswood takes on the proportions of a full-bodied character. Thereafter the tension of the writing slackens, the character of Glenn shrinks to the proportions of the subject of a case history, and the theme tends to become imprisoned in the case history, which is brought too quickly to its fatal close. In a less bitter external setting the book might at least have received the credit it deserves for its convincing analysis of the process by which honest fanatics manipulated by unscrupulous "iron men" arrive at the state of mind in which the death of a nonconformist becomes not only necessary but right. At a time when this state of mind has taken possession not only of the most patently reactionary sectors of human thought but of groups in a position to influence revolutionary thought, such an analysis can hardly be cried down as sectarian or cynical or as evidence of "a growing disaffection with the whole radical movement," that is, reactionary.

In the preface to "Three Soldiers" quoted above Dos Passos went on to say:

> These years of confusion, when everything has to be relabeled and catchwords lose their meaning from week to week, may be the reader's poison, but they are the writer's meat. Today, though the future may not seem so gaily colored or full of clanging hopes as it was thirteen years ago . . . we can at least meet events with our minds cleared of some of the romantic garbage that kept us from doing clear work then. Those of us who have lived through have seen these years strip the bunting off the great illusions of our time; we must deal with the raw structure of history now, we must deal with it quick, before it stamps us out.

Dos Passos's exposure of fanaticism and power politics on the left is only one more of his conscientious attempts to "meet events with our minds cleared . . . of romantic garbage." The "garbage" includes the brand of thinking on the left which, armed with the slogan that the end justifies the means, has in the last decade effectually gutted the socialist idea of both its morals and its morale.

As a political thinker Dos Passos can be charged with having reached the intellectual impasse of many intelligent Americans who have not found the answer to the question how to achieve a socialist economy without sacrificing the "capitalist" Bill of Rights. As novelist he is not required to give the answer. What one does hope for are more characters, "big" or "little," as convincing and significant as the real ones he has given us, including his own.

[The third article of this series will appear soon.]

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The Uncertain Forties

WE HAVE said a glad goodby to the thin thirties, and it would be pleasant to predict with assurance that the forties will be fat, at least by contrast. Unhappily, there is very little solid basis for such optimism or, indeed, for any long-range forecast at all. The only certainty in the present situation is uncertainty. Abroad, a war "the end of which no man can foresee"; at home, an unresolved struggle to overcome the contradictions of capitalism within a capitalist framework. Under these circumstances it is well to eschew any attempt to look far into the new decade and to confine one's gaze to the immediate future.

But before considering the prospects of 1940 it is worth while to take a backward glance at 1939. The past twelve months have been a period of definite but rather halting progress. At the beginning of the year the recovery which set in about the middle of 1938 seemed already to have lost its impetus, and in the early spring there was an actual recession, accentuated by the prolonged stoppage in the coal fields. But in June industry started to move forward once again, despite the mounting fears of war, and when the conflict actually began it proved an unexpectedly vigorous tonic for American business.

The first weeks of September saw a speculative bonfire in commodity markets, which soon burned itself out, and a huge increase in orders for industrial goods. The spurt in buying was directly traceable to the belief that a tremendous demand for goods from the warring countries would rapidly develop. This was soon shown to be an illusion; nevertheless, industrial activity continued to increase almost to the end of the year.

The expansion of business during the past four months appears, therefore, to have been a quickening of a domestic movement already under way when the war started rather than an incipient war boom. The effect on industrial production is shown by the rise of the Federal Reserve Board's index, which was 92 in May and 103 in August, to 124 in November. The December figure is expected to show a further slight improvement. This means that industrial goods are now being produced at a rate rather higher than the average for 1929. But even if this rate is sustained over the next twelve months, we shall be far from the prosperity of that fabulous year, for today production has to support a population at least eight million greater. Moreover, industry is only one sector of the economic front. It does not include building and construction, which are most important factors in the creation of wealth and employment, and recovery in this field has been much less impressive, with the October index of contracts awarded only 77 compared with a 1929 average of 117.

It is clear, then, that if 1939 has put us once again on the road to recovery, we have still a long way to go before we can claim to have refound prosperity. Nor do official forecasters appear confident that the pace of the past few months can be sustained. A recent survey by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics declared that, while the average level of 1940 business would be higher than the 1939 average, it seemed certain that the rate of gain shown in the second half of last year would not be maintained. This authority, however, does not expect any serious recession unless the inventory position gets out of hand. On this subject there is a good deal of difference of opinion. Some authorities believe that an appreciable part of the recent additional output of goods has not passed into actual consumption; others assert that stocks have increased only in proportion to the advance in consumer sales. One favorable factor is that there has been no general increase in prices comparable to the movement which checked consumption, encouraged speculative accumulation of goods, and resulted in the inventory crisis of 1937.

The danger of production outstripping domestic consumption and real investment is certainly one to be guarded against, as Secretary of Commerce Hopkins pointed out in his year-end statement. The political auguries suggest that the net contribution of the government to purchasing power is going to decline in the current year, and as a result a larger share of the burden of new investment will fall on private enterprise. Whether the latter is prepared to accept the load is another matter. The volume of new capital financing, though showing a small increase in recent weeks, is still at a very low ebb. Wall Street men tend to blame the SEC and other government agencies for this fact, but before the investment bankers can launch an issue, some industrialist must conceive a plan for which money will be needed.

At present the birth rate of capital-using plans is rising very slowly, although the new records achieved week after week in electric-power production offer hope of utility expansion. According to the Wall Street Journal, preliminary construction budgets for this industry allow for an expenditure of upward of half a million dollars during the year, with a possibility that a figure of $600,000,000 may be attained. This would compare with a 1939 estimated total of $480,000,000. If the railroads maintain their present traffics, further steps toward overcoming maintenance arrears are possible. In the housing and general construction field, however, it does not at present seem likely that increased activity by private enterprise will do more than offset the expected fall in federal contracts.

For those who believe in the barometric infallibility of the Stock Exchange, the most depressing feature of the current situation is the extreme apathy of that institution. Since its brief spasm of excitement in September nothing has been able to move it. News of increasing production, sharply rising profits, handsome dividends have left it completely indifferent; even the recent speculative revival in the commodity markets has proved uninfectious. In Wall Street rapid changes in market atmosphere are always possible, and the New Year may see a sudden swing from stormy to set fair. But present behavior of the Exchange certainly suggests a complete lack of faith in the ability of business to maintain its present level of production and profits. This attitude may itself serve to restrain enterprise in general, for Wall Street not only reflects the state of confidence objectively but is also one of the subjective factors in its determination.

In the Wind

IN A DISPATCH from an anonymous Boston correspondent Father Coughlin's Social Justice reports that "citizen groups trained in the use of arms to cooperate with police in putting down subversive uprisings" are quietly emerging throughout New England. The dispatch asserts that "rifle clubs are being organized under the supervision of local police officials to assist in quelling any revolutionary disturbance." "Efficient units," it continues, already exist in Belmont and Arlington, with more to come.

ALL A. R. P. POSTS in the Paddington district of London recently received a telegraphed message from the Home Office. Posted throughout the area exactly as it had been received, the message read: "Please note that the provision of females for wardens will cease as from tonight under Home Office instructions." Some hours later "females" was crossed out and "free meals" substituted.

COPY-DESK MYSTERY: Last week American newspapers featured reports that the Red Army had dropped leaflets over Finland threatening to destroy Helsinki on Christmas Day. Most papers ignored a subsequent private note from the Associated Press which read: "The Finnish censor has requested that the material in the second lead Finnish about the dropping of pamphlets threatening destruction in Finland if Finland does not surrender be eliminated. We suggest that you eliminate this in order that the work of the Associated Press correspondents in Finland not be handicapped.—The A. P."

"DO NOT PATRONIZE the electrical pinball machine on these premises," reads a sign carried by a C. I. O. picket outside a sandwich shop in Manhattan. The device is serviced by A. F. of L. unionists.

A GENEVA CORRESPONDENT of the London Times recently reported "a remarkable display of spontaneous pro-Allied feeling." While he was sitting in a Geneva cafe, he wrote, the rumor spread that Germany had bombarded Holland. "Almost immediately the band began to play the British national anthem and . . . in a few seconds all present were on their feet in solemn silence." The correspondent—and the Times—forgot that the Swiss national anthem has the same tune as the British.

A WELL-KNOWN PUBLISHER recently received a letter from an English author which concluded: "The war isn't lost—it's just been mislaid." . . . Non-Sequitur Department: "Those who have followed the testimony elicited by the Temporary National Economic Committee can hardly escape the conclusion that the NLRB in practical operation is a menace."—Commercial and Financial Chronicle. . . . Over its story of the scuttling of the Graf Spee the St. Louis Globe-Democrat ran the headline: "Captain Blows Up and Sinks Graf Spee."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The War in the Air

Paris, December 2

WHAT of the war in the air? Will that decide the fate of nations? Is it true that the old shibboleth of soldiers, that the infantry in the end always decides, has been done away with? I have just been talking with a diplomat who tells me that the French and English have so completely demonstrated their superiority in the air that in the spring they will completely "do in" the Germans. He was kind enough to give the lion's share of the credit to us Americans, saying that our Curtiss plane was so far ahead of the German Messerschmidt that the French pilots could "get on the tail" of the Germans and shoot them down at leisure.

He then proceeded to give me a rosy picture of what is to come by telling me that after the German airplanes are finished the German cities will receive precisely the same dose of death from the sky that the Germans gave to the Poles; so that once and for all the Germans will learn what war means instead of sitting safe while their soldiers ravage other lands. When I mildly suggested that the Germans claimed they would have 30,000 airplanes in the spring and that it would be miraculous if the Allies could polish them off so easily, he scoffed at those figures and declared that the French and British general staffs knew exactly the type and number of German airplanes and that he was certain they could not possibly put more than 7,500 in the field, many of which would be antiquated.

He did not stop there with his good news, this informant of mine, but went on to say that after the Germans are disposed of, the Allies will be so superior in the air to the rest of the European military powers that they will proceed to straighten out Europe merely by the threat of using their planes. Thus they will send word to Stalin that they will thank him to get out of Poland, give up his concessions from the Baltic states, move out of Finland, and recall his fake people's government from that country. No need of any plan for collective security! The French and English air forces will make the peace of Europe and keep it. I wanted to ask him if Mussolini would also be asked to give up Ethiopia, and Franco to leave Spain for a permanent home in Rome, but just then the lunch hour came and I was bowed out.

Now this was a serious talk with a responsible official in a position to know a lot, and I have set it down without exaggeration exactly as it took place. I cite it because it clearly illustrates the way the air forces have come to be regarded, especially in France, as all-important. I did not tell my friend that the highest figure given me in Germany by one who has been close to Hitler was actually 60,000 planes and not 30,000. That seemed so preposterous that I was afraid to quote it or to telegraph it to the United States, and so I cut it in half. But I have not forgotten what a former German aviator told some of us last spring out of his familiarity with the German aviation industry, in which he was long employed. He was anti-Hitler, but he declared that after war came the German aircraft industry would be turning out between 10,000 and 12,000 planes a month; five or six German airplane companies, he said, were then employing more than 50,000 men each. I could also have told my confident Paris friend that when I was in Berlin in October the German military men were just as confident that the German aviators had put it all over the Allied fliers and had already won the mastery of the air. I was told there that in May German airplanes would attack England with a ferocity and in numbers undreamed of, and that it would be all over in two months and a half with every English coast city in ruins. In reply I told the Germans that the English were absolutely certain no large enemy force could possibly sweep over England and believed their aviators were showing complete superiority to the Germans. I could have added that the British plane industry has been increased seven fold in a year—an expansion that is regarded as little less than miraculous.

The truth is, I fear, that we shall not know where the superiority lies until air fighting begins on a large scale. Perhaps that will be next month, perhaps later. Much will depend upon the speed with which the German first-line pilots are shot down, for there is a well-founded belief that the second- and third-string men are by no means equal to the first. Neutral military observers are not frightened by the threat of 30,000 airplanes, or of 60,000. They point out that since the Germans allow fifteen men on the ground to every flier, that program calls for 450,000 mechanics and laborers. (This is not, however, an impossible force for Göring to put together.) They also doubt whether it will be possible for the Germans to send more than 300 planes in each "wave" launched against England, and they are not impressed by the German skill in formation flying. But they agree that if the war goes on, next spring will see amazing developments which will perhaps completely alter the gentle art of war as it is now practiced.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Lesson of the Master

INGRES. By Walter Pach. Harper and Brothers. $6.

THE topography of modern painting is dominated by two mountains. At the far end rises the Parnassus of Ingres, the throne of Homer, its summit crested by the Parthenon and thronged by the genius of nations in rich and complex symmetry. At the nearer end soars the Mont St. Victoire of Cézanne, its massive angle dominating and defining a landscape wholly divested of human and symbolic associations, its ruggedly sculptured bulk hewn to its final contours. Between these peaks the valleys and lesser promontories fall and rise, their height or flatness determined by the two pinnacles that set the scale. Almost every painter of the past hundred years has worked in the consciousness of their looming presence. By one the tradition of antiquity and Renaissance is fixed and surveyed. By the other the scope of modern invention and the perspectives of future exploration are calculated. Their remoteness and almost polar antithesis are, however, deceptive. They rise from the same foundations and clasp their century in boundaries equal in strength and purpose. Their summits salute one another.

The nearer has naturally been best explored. The critical literature on Cézanne is substantial in all languages. In English it has set a standard of intelligence and corrective restraint caught from the severe integrity of its subject. Ingres has been correspondingly neglected. Except for early appreciations by men as foresighted as Amaury-Duval and Silvestre or the devout researches of Lapauze, Delaborde, and Boyer d'Agen, he has had few serious interpreters. He has never found, as Delacroix found in Baudelaire, a great one. He has had to wait, in fact, until 1939 for a book in English. One had hoped that Roger Fry would enlarge his searching remarks into a volume, but this never came about. Now Mr. Pach provides a survey that should make further ignorance of Ingres's career or his meaning to modern art as inexcusable as the hostility maintained until comparatively recent years by various modern partisans. That hostility has curiously survived—for reasons abandoned even officially a century ago in France—a mastery of resources, a regeneration of methods within a framework of the most forbidding tradition, and an irresistible charm of style and content that remain a unique achievement in two hundred years of painting. Today Ingres rises anew as the genius who not only clarified the formal inheritance of antiquity but extracted from the confusing wealth of the Renaissance its central elements of design, its thematic motives, and its principles of line and mass. He was, moreover, the last great defender of the social and public offices of art against the bourgeois and mechanistic aggressions that were driving it once more to the refuges of subjectivism, bohemianism, and rebellion. He was not alone the pure, the exhaustive, the dedicated, or the prodigal genius we identify in Delacroix, Degas, Cézanne, and Picasso. He was the magistrate, arbiter, and public hero of craft and aesthetic morality, probably the last redeemer of those offices from the trivialities of academic and popular authority. The grandest of his canvases are themselves an academy and a senate. The least of his drawings combine a matchless and delicate perception with the most rigorous intransigence of law—and they do it by as little as the stroke of a pencil.

These are great claims, but no one who has stayed with Ingres for any term of years finds them vulnerable to critical comparison or the hostility his own pride of rank stimulated among the schools of his day. They offer every possible test to our appreciative and historical faculties. Mr. Pach has made the most of them. His book shows both the advantages and the risks of its pioneer position among English readers. It gives a full account of Ingres's career. It makes use of an enviable opportunity to present in first English translation all of Ingres's important ideas on art from letters, notebooks, and mandates delivered to his pupils, allies, official consultants, and enemies. It concludes with a critical appraisal in which Ingres is measured in his four characters—as revolutionist, classicist, realist, and European, categories by which Mr. Pach aims to define not only his style and method but his place in European civilization and his influence on modern art. Of these three sections the second is admirably edited and indispensable; the first, hearty, enthusiastic, and charming; the third, by turns excited and aggressive, too heavily propagandist in tone, too undefined in its lines of attack and defense, healthily alive to the aesthetic causes and battles of Ingres's lifetime, unhealthily vague in terminology and argument, and, finally, for all the infectious enthusiasm by which it refers those issues to the present—thus giving the book its educational motive—too evasive in fixing the line of Ingres's descent and heritage among his followers. This line and influence are continuously invoked as a means of isolating Ingres's distinction, but they too much remain matters of speeding names and loose analogy, lost in the onrush of Mr. Pach's defensive tactics. He wishes, like every art writer who hopes to have some value outside academic or political quarters, to be an educator; he has axes to grind and causes to urge; he has written "Ananias" and "Queer Thing, Painting" as well as his distinguished translation of Delacroix's "Journals." The heat and journalistic aim of these purposes, so useful in ventilating studios and museums, show their defects when set against a mind and style like Ingres's, for whose serious appreciation are wanted not only the lucidity and cutting eyesight of Fry but something better than a propagandist's bluff approximations of the bearing of Ingres and classic tradition on the painters who, from Géricault to Cézanne and Picasso, stepped forward from the classic moment of 1824.

Lacking this precision, Mr. Pach's book hardly evokes, as it should, the effect and meaning of Ingres's work—the complex and often repellent grandeur of his allegorical tableaux and subject pieces (in which Fry rightly discerned his greatest synthetic and formal powers to lie), the miraculous delicacy and penetration which make his drawings among the most beautiful things ever put on paper, the infinitely subtle harmonization of abstract design with sensuous authority in the nudes and studies, and that superb sense of milieu by which Ingres, modernizing the Renaissance example, imposed his faces and figures on arbitrary landscape or among the heavily Balzacian interiors of empire and republic, all controlled by his exquisitely selective sense of detail—of garments, scarves, fichus, combs, consoles, ornaments, textures, fringed and studded fauteuils. Such devices define his range, his enrichment of studio and salon by evoking state and society, his mastery of a vast freight of pictorial properties by the most passionate research into line, form, and design. Of that whole achievement—apparently remote from present-day experimental or social considerations and yet so supreme a lesson to them—Ingres's teachings and maxims are a constant illumination, and Mr. Pach has laid open an invaluable apparatus. To anyone who goes from his book to the canvases, the documents, and the research stores of Paris and Montauban, he supplies a guide. If he has not pursued his motives into the necessary exact account of Ingres's devices, discoveries, and lineage, he makes that pursuit inescapable to anyone who takes from his book the twin examples of Ingres's consummate workmanship and the moral rigor of his aesthetic.

Neither of these, however, should subordinate the fact that Ingres is a painter to enjoy in the richest possible sense. The present plates and the increasing number of his works that have come to America—now that collectors' prejudice against his austerity has relaxed after a long-standing preference for the swirling agitations and breathing colors of Delacroix, the romantics, and the modernists—offer the aesthetic intelligence one of its greatest stimulants and rewards. The beauty of his example becomes more emphatic and irresistible as the dissolving tendencies of experiment overstep the bounds of responsibility. His touch on the hand and intellect of his greatest heirs is felt anew. The focus he provides in the history of painting is clarified. The miraculous line, the ultimate harmony, emerges from the sumptuous elegance and freighted tradition of his canvases. A remark by George Moore returns to mind: "Only Ingres and antiquity knew how to simplify." MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Romains at War

VERDUN. By Jules Romains. (Volume VIII of "Men of Good Will.") Translated from the French by Gerard Hopkins. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IT HAS seemed for some time that Jules Romains was running a race with history. While Europe moved toward a second 1914, the author of "Men of Good Will" pushed his long novel toward its climax in the first 1914. And Romains won. In "Death of a World," which appeared here last year, that climax had already been reached. Defunct now were nearly all those benevolent "conspiracies," ranging from socialism to freemasonry, through which Romain's characters had expressed their longing for unity and peace. And the men of good-will were mostly sunk in the spiritual apathy which is supposed to precede a conversion to new intellectual values.

"Verdun," the present volume, revolves around the famous battle and shows us France in the second winter of the war. The book deals in very great detail with matters of military strategy and action in the field, shuttling continually from G. H. Q., with its discreet rivalries and portentous discussions of policy, to the stinking trench of the common soldier. These, together with the glimpses of war-time Paris, represent the external side of war, and Romains handles them with his usual virtuosity. But he is more effective in exploring the soldier's sensibility: his fears, his disgusts, his angers, the cunning "dreams of safety" devised in his anxious brain, his impulse to look for scapegoats among the female flag-wavers, the slackers and literary phrase-makers in the "back areas."

The soldier is usually an ex-worker or, like the intellectual Jerphanion, an ex-Socialist; and what he does in the trenches is to transfer to the civilians—an amorphous and historically meaningless group—the hostility he formerly felt for the class of employers. On this point Romains is quite explicit, committed though he is to a philosophy that regards all conflict as ultimately illusory; he exhibits war as a kind of gigantic pressure machine that weakens and deforms the traditional social antagonisms. And Jerphanion wonders if demagogues won't "deduce from what's happening certain philosophic and cynically Machiavellian truths for use in the post-war period."

Jerphanion is in fact the main observer and commentator in "Verdun." This joyous empiric and eager amateur of experience is now somewhat embittered. Yet, for all that, his "tone" remains amiable and expansive—so much so, indeed, that he seems a bit shadowy planted in the trenches and proclaiming his disillusionment. And, with qualifications, the same may be said of Romains himself as a war novelist. Brilliant as a sort of running exposition and commentary of war, "Verdun" is rather deficient in dramatic power; in this respect it is certainly not among the best volumes of "Men of Good Will." Romains has a great capacity for enjoyment, an immense gusto for exploring the processes of modern life. Quite at home among the concrete, daylight presences of the upper world, he is best at retailing superior anecdotes of intrigue and unraveling the ingenuities of sophisticated behavior. And such volumes as "Recours à l'abîme" and "Mission à Rome" render the whole series far more important than most Americans seem to realize. Lacking any sort of profound moral passion or tragic feeling Romains can descend into the underworld of war and describe its appearance and its inhabitants, but he cannot quite convince us of its reality. F. W. DUPEE

Introduction to Dewey

JOHN DEWEY. AN INTELLECTUAL PORTRAIT. By Sidney Hook. The John Day Company. $2.

IT IS necessary at least to allude to the wide range of Dewey's interests and to the difficulty of his thought to suggest the reason why there has long been a need for an introductory exposition of his philosophy. Sidney Hook meets this need in a book which in almost every respect is an ideal introduction. It is sympathetic and lucid; and the result, as he intended, is a very lively picture of "the sweep and vitality of Dewey's vision."

Dewey's conception of philosophy, as Hook suggests, occupies a mid-way position between that of the grand tradition and that of the positivists. According to the former, the philosopher gazes from an a priori knoll on the structure of eternity, while the latter demotes him to something like a janitorship in Science Hall. For Dewey, as Hook points out, human values and beliefs constitute the chief subject matter of philosophy; its task is criticism; and its aim is essentially practical, for it seeks finally to meliorate the adventure of living. But both task and aim may be interpreted superficially or philosophically; and the difference between philosopher and reformer or preacher is abysmal. The latter is in a hurry to get things done, and lacks insight into the relevance of abstruse, technical considerations, with which he is impatient. The result is that he changes the sketch but uses the old tools, the old methods of construction, and materials salvaged from the old building, while the philosopher grasps in full the reason for the need to condemn the structure. This leads him into abstruse problems of epistemology, of logic, and of axiology. One of the merits of Hook's exposition is that he keeps us always clearly informed about the relevance of the technical subjects he discusses to the conflicts and anxieties of the social scene. Thus the early chapters of the book—on Truth, Ideas, Logic, and Mind—deal with matters usually thought none too relevant to life as lived by unphilosophic man. And yet in Hook's treatment they are quick with the dramatic emotions of the practical issues to which they are pertinent. And thus, also, Dewey's reliance on intelligence is revealed not as the naive optimism of a professor but as a realistic faith which grows out of a scientific conception of man as a creature of and in nature, endowed with natural capacities which may be used to enhance living.

Hook will no doubt be criticized for reading Dewey from a positivist standpoint. Not that Hook reads positivism into Dewey, but rather that he emphasizes it to a degree which will seem an exaggeration to those who read Dewey with an interest in speculative philosophy. Traditionalists will point out that Dewey would have included among the philosopher's tasks the metaphysical, along with those which Hook mentions in the second chapter: criticism of belief, of values, and investigation of methods of inquiry. They will observe that in another chapter Hook attributes to Dewey a virtual denial of the validity of the metaphysical task, when one of his most important books, "Experience and Nature," is thought of by Dewey as a venture in metaphysics. And they will urge that Dewey's conception of method and his attack on all forms of philosophical as well as practical absolutism cannot be dismembered from his view of the universe as constituted by events, a view of which Hook gives no adequate account. In short, they will argue that Hook gives an account of Dewey with the recent "Logic" uppermost in his mind, as might have been expected from a man who has been flirting with the positivists. But for the objection to retain a semblance of fairness it must be raised solely as an issue of degree or emphasis, not of exclusive alternatives. And Hook could answer that accent on a philosopher's method is all to the good, since his doctrines are remembered because they give us, not a fake substitute for physics and astronomy under the rubric of ontology, but a method which enables us to reject or improve on his insights and thus to push on.

A fuller treatment of Dewey's intellectual origins will be missed—of his debt to Peirce, to James, and to the idealists, as well as an account of his relations to his contemporaries, to Mead, Santayana, Russell, Whitehead, and the others. Such a study would have helped to place Dewey much more fully in the matrix of his day and culture than Hook does. But this is a minor objection, and it is partly obviated by the way in which the exposition of doctrine is carried on at every step by means of contrast with current opposing views. It should not therefore be taken as a serious stricture on a brilliantly executed performance for which there was a very genuine need.

ELISEO VIVAS

The Great Dilemma

BARBARIANS WITHIN AND WITHOUT. By Leonard Woolf. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

UNDER the three headings of The World We Live In, Anatomy of Civilization, and The Choice Before Us, Leonard Woolf gives us in very brief compass the historical and immediate reasons for his belief that freedom is not only superior to tyranny but also stronger and harder to achieve. His easy and lucid manner of exposition happily blends illustration with inference, so that we are led in the course of 180 pages from his initial point that the nineteenth century had a civilized conscience to his conclusion that since "Western civilization" means the "full development of a society of free men," what we are now witnessing is a series of conflicts, national and international, between civilized man and barbarian.

The poignancy of the drama, according to Mr. Woolf, comes from the fact that Russia, with its understanding of what economic civilization should mean, forgets what intellectual and political civilization requires; while the democracies, with their continued faith in political and civil liberties, fail to see that their institutions have to be modernized in order to insure a genuinely free society. That is why the barbarian is both within and without.

With this underlying thesis it would be difficult to quarrel, as it is with Mr. Woolf's insistence that the way to get at working principles in the contemporary chaos is "through a process of historical analysis." It is his use of the analytic process itself, his way of condensing and using history, that raises recurring doubts in the reader and a sense of perpetual self-contradiction. Making allowance for the difficulty of putting complex slices of European history into simple sentences, it still remains necessary to mention a few of the insecure props on which the author rests his case. The superior conscience of the nineteenth century and its rapid decline into modern cynicism are, I believe, an illusion of perspective. The few "outrages" of the last century that Mr. Woolf discusses by no means exhaust the tale of that century's depravity, and the indignation that followed these few selected instances could be matched by corresponding feeling in our own times. New ways of imparting and playing up news would go far to explain the surface difference.

Again, Mr. Woolf's passion for the Greeks tends to soften in his eyes the crudities of their political life. The Greeks loved freedom—as we do—largely because they were without it. The tyrannis and the demagogues are facts of Greek history, and it is not enough to cite Pericles's Fourth of July Address as if the ideal were the fact. Mr. Woolf himself occasionally recognizes it, and it is at such times that he contradicts himself.

As a final sample of his confusions, one can point to his contention that in modern Europe the barbarian system is an easy one to establish and keep going, whereas a free society is very difficult even to plan in theory. The mistake here is to believe that the ready appeal of barbarian methods—force, hatred, and obscurantism—makes the system which is based on them particularly stable and smooth-running. The reverse is true, since emotional tensions and ever-increasing displays of force tax the strength and ingenuity of both leaders and led, at the same time as the desire for freedom and the inquiring spirit regain an entrance into the minds of men. Fortunately for the reader who might be made skeptical by such details as these, Mr. Woolf ends his readable little sermon on the note of Trust Freedom and It Shall Not Fail You.

JACQUES BARZUN

General Krivitsky

IN STALIN'S SECRET SERVICE. By W. G. Krivitsky. Harper and Brothers. $3.

NO MATTER where you stand on the question of Soviet politics, you are going to read W. G. Krivitsky's "In Stalin's Secret Service." Its value is not decreased by the fact that a large part of the book was published in the Saturday Evening Post during the last twelve months, for Mr. Krivitsky has added so many interesting details to the original version that it is well worth rereading.

It is not customary to devote too much space to the private life of the author in a critical analysis of his work. In this case, however, the reader's attitude toward the book will depend so largely on his willingness to accept the author's version of what has been happening behind the scenes in the Soviet Union that a knowledge of his past and the role he played in Soviet activities is imperative. The value of the book rests almost entirely on the reader's estimate of Mr. Krivitsky's personal integrity.

That being the case, it was to be expected that the Communist press should choose, as the easiest way to discredit this gruesome revelation of twenty years of Soviet diplomacy, to attack Krivitsky's credibility. They called him an impostor, a liar and adventurer, an Austrian gambler, a Viennese cafe habitué. Since Mr. Krivitsky's work demanded secrecy and anonymity, he was known to few outside the Soviet secret service, and disavowing him seemed the best defense. Significantly not one of his Soviet detractors seems to have been able to uncover a single discreditable action in his "infamous" past.

On the other hand, Mr. Krivitsky is vouched for by two men of unassailable position in world politics—Léon Blum, leader of the French Socialist Party and former Premier of France, and William C. Bullitt, American ambassador in Paris—who have known Mr. Krivitsky for years and were instrumental in securing his admission to the United States. Both men are so well established in the opinion of the world for the almost religious rigidity of their ethical and moral standards that any man who has their indorsement deserves at least a respectful hearing.

Nevertheless, there has been, even among impartial reviewers of his book, a feeling of distrust and uncertainty. They find it incongruous that a man who could work for almost two decades in the Soviet secret service, with all that this means in terms of murder, crime, and cruelty, should turn against the whole system when it demanded the framing and perhaps assassination of one of his friends. To understand this, one must know Krivitsky's past and have some conception besides of the lengths to which a religious faith in a revolutionary movement can persuade its adherents to go.

The author was at the impressionable age of eighteen when the Russian Revolution started Russia on a new epoch in November, 1917. "The Bolshevik Revolution," I quote Krivitsky's own words, "came to me as an absolute solution of all problems of poverty, inequality, and injustice. I joined the Bolshevik Party with my whole soul. I seized the Marxist and Leninist faith as a weapon with which to assault the wrongs against which I instinctively rebelled." How many of us, even outside Russia, went through the same experience! Suddenly we found ourselves walking in the sun, in a world that had taken on a new meaning. There were hesitations, qualms, even doubts, but we dismissed them. "When a nation's life's at hazard, we've no time to think of men!" Crimes ceased to be crimes when they helped a new world into being. Perhaps one must have lived through all this—the fervor, the high expectations, the qualms, the doubts, and the final disillusionment when doubt was no longer possible—to understand a man like General Krivitsky.

Knowing Mr. Krivitsky's past I am convinced that there are many episodes in his experience that he has not told. He worked in the G. P. U. during Stalin's regime, but he cannot help knowing that the methods Stalin used did not differ greatly from those employed by the Soviet secret service under Lenin and Trotsky. The character of the victims changed, but the methods were the same. The methods of terror never vary. The secret institutions of every dictatorship are always brutal, arbitrary, dishonest, and merciless. Mayor Gaynor once spoke of the necessity of "outward decency." Dictatorships, proletarian or otherwise, have no need for this thin veneer of outward decency which saves democratic government from disintegration.

It is difficult to say which of the eight chapters is most interesting. Stalin Appeases Hitler and The End of the Communist International lay bare the workings of the ruthless political machine that has plunged the world into war. Why Did They Confess?—the tragic story of the Moscow trials—gives what seems to me the first convincing explanation of that mystery, even though it leaves much to be explained.

"In Stalin's Secret Service" will not be judged by the usual standards. A book that deals with so controversial a subject will produce reactions too violent to permit dispassionate judgment. But there are many thousands still who are capable of approaching even this book with an open mind, men and women who are making an honest effort to understand the situation in present-day Russia and the motives that led to its astounding betrayal of a nobler past.

LUDWIG LORE

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal

FILMS

THE former German producer, Max Glass, is responsible for the French picture, "Entente Cordiale," which is running simultaneously in two New York theaters, but which I assume does not aspire to compete with "Gone with the Wind." It celebrates with enthusiasm and with an eye to propaganda, no doubt, the beginning of the English-French alliance—the conclusion of the Entente Cordiale of 1904. Nevertheless, it cannot be shown in England because its main character, Edward VII, died only twenty-nine years ago and England does not yet allow his portrayal. Otherwise the picture should give no offense even in Britain. The war censorship could easily eliminate the crack at the present Prime Minister, of whom the elder Chamberlain says, "A good business man, perhaps, or a lawyer; but he will never make a politician." The German people get a few good words, while their leader is duly characterized—in the picture he is the irresponsible Wilhelm II but the remarks about him fit Adolf Hitler like a glove. They are made by Edward in an irresistibly charming way, like all the other remarks in this picture. Only a moviegoer who expects to see a realistic treatment of one of the most decisive developments in our young and historically overcrowded century could be offended or disappointed by it. The more cynical escapist who takes his entertainment where and under whatever pretexts he can will enjoy this newest importation from Paris.

Based on André Maurois's "Edward VII and His Time," the film has no plot in the conventional sense of the word. It has, rather, a theme—Edward's diplomatic maneuvering toward a lasting English-French friendship. The love interest is happily reduced to unessential by-play. Starting with Queen Victoria's worries about Egypt and the Fashoda incident, we follow the gradual development of the entente through its diplomatic stages. We see Lord Salisbury, Balfour, Joseph Chamberlain, Delcassé, Clemenceau, Cambon, von Bülow, and Isvolsky, if not exactly at work, at least involved in intrigue. Only Edward seems to be really at work. He knows from the beginning exactly what he wants and how to achieve it by almost playful methods. In comparison with him Delcassé looks like a tailor and the Tiger Clemenceau like a little shoemaker, not to speak of the timid French President. I suspect that they really looked like that, but Edward has been idealized; and in addition all the situations and lines are given to him. This makes for an effective movie character unburdened by the complexity of reality.

Victor Francen, seen last in "That They May Live" as the ex-soldier who becomes insane in his unsuccessful fight for peace, gives a brilliant performance as Edward VII. He creates such a witty, human, and superior personality that one enjoys him, however great the discrepancy between his characterization and the original may be. At the opera in Paris, where he conquers his icy hosts, and in the interview with the German ambassador he is a sheer delight. But if he leaves the rest of an excellent cast far behind, it is also because they have only bits while he never leaves the screen. Special credit is to be given to the young actress Janine

CONFERENCE

THE NEXT
PEACE TREATY
A Conference
FRI., JAN. 5, 8:30
SAT., JAN. 6, 2:30

Philip Guedalla, Emil Lengyel, Ernest McPallerson, Jean-Yves Le Branchu, Hans Simons, Louis Waldman, Algernon Lee, Clarence Streit, Leslie Buell.
at the
Rand School 7 E. 15 St. AL4-3094

BOOKS

NOW you may order
BOOKS
from the NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

The Readers Service Division
The Nation - 55 Fifth Avenue - New York

"... in the realm of politics fairy-tales become lies."

THOMAS MANN

offers his most important statement to date on the tenuous relationship between politics and art. In Defense of Wagner, a brilliant and extended analysis of this relationship, was inspired by Peter Viereck's series of articles, Hitler and Richard Wagner, currently appearing in

Common Sense

W. H. AUDEN discusses the same problem from a different angle in Poet and Politician, an essay in the same issue.

MAX EASTMAN begins a notable discussion of the underlying failure of Marxism (Stalinist and Trotskyist varieties) in Socialism Revalued.

A Magazine of Optimism . . .

is what COMMON SENSE since its inception has aspired to be. Though COMMON SENSE predicted That Coming Nazi-Soviet Pact six months before it was signed, and is not blind to disaster, it has no use for post-facto recriminations. Carleton Beals Toward a Hemisphere Economy and Alfred Bingham's The United States of Europe are the kind of article that gives COMMON SENSE its distinction.

COMMON SENSE, 315 Fourth Avenue, New York

Enclosed find $1. Please send me a 7-month introductory subscription to Common Sense, to begin with the issue including the Thomas Mann article.

Name...

Address...G

Darcey, who plays a short love scene exquisitely. Marcel L'Herbier directed the lavishly produced picture with his focus on little ironical details; it was the best he could do with a superficial script incapable of bearing dramatic weight.

Those who like Charlie McCarthy should not see his picture "Charlie McCarthy, Detective." It is one of the stupidest films ever produced. Charlie from time to time goes through his radio routine, while the cheap gangster plot unravels itself around him. To see him so thoroughly misused is irritating. The illusion his voice creates over the radio is destroyed by the demonstration of its mechanics and by the bad acting of Mr. Bergen.

"Remember" (MGM) is a feeble play with a pretty good third act. Lovely Greer Garson, the former Mrs. Chips, and Lew Ayers play Robert Taylor off the screen in every scene, but for box-office reasons he still gets the girl.

"The Honeymoon's Over" (Twentieth Century-Fox) is a moralistic Class B picture you needn't see at all, though Stuart Erwin is an amiable and gifted actor. He really deserves a good picture.

FRANZ HOELLERING

RECORDS

COLUMBIA has issued a new set of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony K.425 made by Beecham with the London Philharmonic (M-387, $5.50). If you already have the Busch set of three or four years ago you have a clear recording of an excellent performance. But if you have no set the new one gives the work greater power and impact—achieved partly through Beecham's characteristically dynamic phrasing, partly through his characteristically slower tempos, and partly through the present-day richness and spaciousness in the recording. I find the pace of the first movement Allegro spiritoso and again of the Minuet a little over-deliberate; and the pause before the concluding measure of the Minuet is the sort of lily-gilding Beecham should leave to Walter Damrosch.

Victor has issued two H. M. V. subscription sets. One (M-595, $14) offers four more string quartets of Haydn: Opus 1 No. 1, Opus 20 No. 1, Opus 55 No. 3, Opus 76 No. 4. In these one hears the inexhaustible fecundity and variety of invention, and such things as the sustained loveliness of the slow movement of Opus 20 No. 1, the darting humor of its finale and of the Minuet of Opus 55 No. 3, the breadth and splendor of the first movement of Opus 76 No. 4. The Pro Arte performances are good, but without the brilliance, the fire which these works should have, and which one can imagine the Budapest or Primrose Quartet giving them.

The other (M-611, $12) offers Bach's Suites Nos. 2 and 3 for solo 'cello, played by Pablo Casals. Listening to these works, one is aware of Bach's success with the difficult problem he set himself—"to make his melody flow freely . . . to see that its direction suggests the harmony which is not heard"—but also of the fact that solving this problem was not equivalent to writing great or interesting music. The life the works have on these records is the life created by the coloring, the movement, the tensions of Casals's phrasing; and I am thinking not only of the bold, powerful distention of the phrases of the vigorous movements, but of the subtle inflection of the Sarabande of No. 2. This is something you would almost not believe you had heard in a performance, after it was over; but you can put the needle back at the beginning and find that it did happen; and there it is on the record for all time, as other such achievements are on canvas or in print.

Completely uninteresting to me are several other major Columbia releases: the fluency of Arnold Bax's Viola Sonata, Nonett and "Mater Ora Filium," excellently recorded by Primrose, the Griller quartet, the B. B. C. Chorus and others (M-386, $14); the arid, grimacing Kleine Kammermusik of Hindemith, Opus 24 No. 2, well done by the Los Angeles Wind Quintet (X-149, $2.50); the arid String Quartet No. 1 of Walter Piston, also well done by the Dorian Quartet (M-388, $5). More rewarding are two single records—one (69752-D, $1.50) with a work of Buxtehude sung under the title of "Send hid den Engel" by the Copenhagen Men and Boys' Choir with strings and organ; the other (69751-D, $1.50) with the "Elegy" of the English composer Herbert Howells, played by the Jacques String Orchestra. Not great works, but enjoyable. After the enchanting style in which Franz Rupp played a Chopin waltz at his recent recital, Kilenyi's zigzagging in the complete Columbia set of the waltzes (M-390, $7.50) sounds like something contrived without real feeling for the genre and without first-rate musical taste. As for the volume of recently discovered music by Johann Strauss (M-389, $5), it is enjoyable even in the straightforward performances without much feeling for the genre recorded by Howard Barlow with the Columbia Broadcasting Company.

Columbia's surfaces, I regret to report, continue to be troublesome.

Among recent jazz records are two made by small groups of excellent musicians who play together with superb vitality and ensemble feeling: the Muggsy Spanier "Dipper Mouth Blues" and "Sister Kate" (Bluebird 10506) and Jelly Roll Morton "West End Blues" (Bluebird 10442). Quite good also, with a little more sophistication, a little less vitality, are the Bud Freeman "Satanic Blues" (Decca 2781) and "As Long as I Live" (Decca 2849). The Benny Goodman Sextet is in effect a small band, of which Goodman himself—in "Rose Room" (Columbia 35254)—plays as though he were bored, Hampton continues to mess things up with the sound of his vibraphone, and Charlie Christian on guitar and Arthur Bernstein on bass are the only ones who play with distinction. Coleman Hawkins contributes two fine opening phrases to the otherwise uninteresting Lionel Hampton "One Sweet Letter from You" (Victor 26393), and exhibits the extraordinary rhythmic intricacy of his style, if not his highest musical imagination, in his "She's Funny That Way" (Bluebird 10477). Count Basie's distinctive piano style can be heard at length with a background by his extraordinary rhythm section in "Fare Thee Honey Fare Thee Well" and "Oh! Red" (Decca 2780). The Kirby Orchestra's "Royal Garden Blues" (Vocalion 5187) is over-arranged—and "Blue Skies" on the reverse side atrociously so—but the playing continues to be exciting.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Catholic Journalism

Dear Sirs: In your issue of December 16 you give display to an article making strong assertions concerning the National Catholic Welfare Conference News Service. As the director of that service may I comment briefly?

The article first recites a number of often-told facts about the Catholic press—its size, its variety, its obvious independence of thought ("a Catholic of any political point of view can today find at least one Catholic paper to suit his taste"), its sponsorship, and how it is serviced. It then makes a number of extravagant charges without giving substantiating evidence. With respect to the N. C. W. C. News Service, it makes a sweeping assertion of "dishonesty," but omits any attempt at proof. It lists nine points in the "stand" of the Catholic press on the Spanish war, summarily calls them "demonstrably false," then neglects to demonstrate the "falsity" of a single one.

One can scarcely disprove evidence that is not given. This piece was written by one Mr. Southworth. Surely it must be agreed that the name in itself is without authority. Thus the honestly questioning reader must look to positive statements in the writing itself to discover just how much credence may be placed in the author's mere ipse dixit statements. It is here I hope I may be able to assist readers of The Nation.

The Catholic Worker is described as a publication of "small circulation." Actually, its circulation is between 105,000 and 125,000 monthly.

The Catholic Press Association is given as "founded in 1890," whereas actually it was organized in 1911.

The publication Social Justice is first called a "Catholic journal," then is shown to be not included in a listing of Catholic publications; it is said to have lost "approval" early this year, and immediately afterward is quoted as an authority on the Catholic press. Actually, the attorney for Social Justice has certified that it "is not and never has been a Catholic publication," and certainly the present Archbishop of Detroit has neither given nor withdrawn approval since he went to Detroit in August, 1937. Social Justice is thus by no means "the most widely circulated Catholic journal of our times," as asserted.

Catholic papers belonging to companies "controlled by wealthy laymen" are such a rarity that Mr. Southworth did not undertake to name even one.

The N. C. W. C. News Service does not "service twenty-four foreign countries," although it does have as subscribers some Catholic publications in that many lands.

The N. C. W. C. News Service did report Father Coughlin, but so did every other news service in the country.

As for the N. C. W. C. News Service's coverage of the civil war in Spain, since the close of that conflict persons of high authority and integrity—chiefly non-Catholics—have come forward to vindicate the factual statements made by the service. Among others, Señor Araquistáin, former Spanish Republican ambassador to France; William Philip Simms, distinguished foreign editor of Scripps-Howard; and Hugh Gibson, noted as diplomat and writer, are not by any means trivial or ex parte witnesses.

It was only recently that Mr. Gibson made a radio address after a 5,000-mile motor trip through Spain, in the course of which he interviewed hundreds of persons in every walk of life, including former Loyalist politicians and soldiers. He testifies in positive terms to the truth of many of the facts reported by this news service. Of particular significance is this statement by Mr. Gibson: "Much of what I have to tell you is so radically different from what you have been fed for the past few years that I shall confine myself as far as possible to statements of fact which can be verified by anybody who really wants to know the truth and who does not accept propaganda as fact."

It is, of course, obvious from the article itself that it is merely an anti-Catholic attack. Judging the writer's unsupported statements by an examination of such of his assertions as can be checked, I suggest that we have here only evidence of a will to make reckless charges, a rare irresponsibility, and sloppiness of both mind and workmanship.

FRANK A. HALL

Washington, D. C., December 23

Dear Sirs: I have read Mr. Hall's letter with more attention and respect than its unbridled language would seem to deserve, and, frankly, I am more than ever convinced that the record of the Catholic press on Spain and recent international politics is utterly indefensible. On one point Mr. Hall has me: I was wrong in referring to the Catholic Worker's circulation as small. However, on the founding of the Catholic Press Association, let me cite my authority, Father Thomas F. Meehan, who wrote in America (June 24, 1939) that it was founded in 1890 and incorporated in 1911.

Father Coughlin is a priest in good standing; his Social Justice carried on its editorial page until January 9, 1939, the permission of his superior to publish. I am not one of those who believe that the powerful Roman Catholic church is unable to curb the radio priest of Royal Oak, for I have noticed how effectively it curbed bishops and even a cardinal in Spain who were out of sympathy with Franco and how it condoned the execution by Franco of Basque priests through the Primate of Spain, who spoke of "the aberration of certain priests which brought them in front of a firing squad." It would be a comparatively simple matter for the church to dissociate itself from the priest Coughlin for his political "aberrations."

Mr. Hall's service handles news of special interest to Catholics and clearly cannot be judged by the same criteria as "every other news service in the country."

For a Catholic paper belonging to a company "controlled by wealthy laymen" I refer Mr. Hall to New York's archdiocesan organ, the Catholic News, among others.

I listed nine demonstrable untruths which formed the basis of the Catholic propaganda for Franco in this country. If I failed to develop them, it was for obvious reasons of space, and also because their falsity has been often proved. Would not Mr. Hall do better to offer some defense of the Catholic press record? Does the N. C. W. C. News Service still maintain that the Popular Front government won power by fraud and violence? Its own correspondent, the Reverend Manuel Grana, did not say so in his dispatches written before the war, before the "line" was adopted. The Vatican attested that government's legality when it accepted an ambassador, as did Franco and other generals when they reaffirmed their loyalty in April, 1936.

Mr. Hall's news service sends out items glorifying José Antonio Primo de Rivera, founder of the fascist Phalanx. Is it possible that he has not read José Antonio's speeches? Is it possible that he does not yet know that the Phalanx, presented to democratic American Catholics as twentieth-century crusaders, was in reality the political party most openly dedicated to terrorism as a political weapon in all Western Europe? Would Mr. Hall defend that cardinal point of Catholic propaganda that the disorders of the spring of 1936 justified Franco's rising? Let him read "Onésimo Redondo" (Valladolid, 1937), in which Phalanx leaders proudly reveal that it was the "crusaders" who provoked the violence. Does Mr. Hall believe that the murder of Calvo Sotelo provoked the rebellion? Let him read in detail the conspiracy as revealed by José María Iribarren in his life of Mola, by Bertrán Güell in "Preparación y desarrollo del alazmiento nacional," and by numerous other pro-Franco writers published under Franco's censorship. Does Mr. Hall still believe that German and Italian intervention followed Soviet Russia's, even after the confessions of Hitler and Mussolini to the contrary?

It is true that William Philip Simms and Hugh Gibson, as well as Martin Dies, Merwin Hart, and H. L. Mencken, have fallen for and retailed many "facts" on Spain of the kind sponsored by the N. C. W. C. I am surprised to find a Catholic holding to the view that error is transmuted into truth if its sponsorship is sufficiently distinguished. Mr. Simms wrote an editorial for the Scripps-Howard newspapers on March 9, 1939, called Army Within an Army, in which the simplest known historical facts were mishandled with a recklessness that is more reprehensible than mere ignorance. Hugh Gibson's remarks on Spain were adequately disposed of by Jay Allen in the Protestant Digest of November, 1939, an article as yet unanswered, I believe. Before the N. C. W. C. News Service embraces Luís Araquistáin as its vindicator, I suggest that it read that stout defender of a Marxist revolutionary ideal with greater care. The devil quoting Scripture is on no shakier ground than the N. C. W. C. quoting the founder of Claridad.

If it is "anti-Catholic" for me to cite the facts of the war in Spain, facts chiefly drawn from Franco sources, then some very distinguished members of Mr. Hall's church are also "anti-Catholic." In this category would fall the columnist in the New World, archdiocesan organ of Chicago (December 22, 1939), who refers to my article in words which I can only interpret as commending its accuracy.

H. RUTLEDGE SOUTHWORTH

New York, December 28

An Anti-Fascist in Canada

Dear Sirs: The issue of The Nation of October 28 contained an article by S. J. Kennedy headed Let Canada Be a Warning, in which the writer discussed the new war measure in Canada known as The Defense of Canada Regulations Decree, Section 39(a). Under this measure, which became law on September 18, four Italian anti-fascists and one Cuban were arrested on October 4, their premises raided, and a truckload of literature taken away by the "Red Squad" and the Mounted Police.

Since then two trials have taken place—one dealing with the charge of "having printed and distributed literature intended or likely to cause disaffection to His Majesty," the other with two broken, rusty revolvers found in the room of Arthur Bortolotti, the most outstanding personality of the Italian group. Both trials brought out clearly the Red Squad's efforts to convict the men. In both all the defendants were entirely exonerated.

But Arthur Bortolotti now finds himself under the jurisdiction of the immigration authorities, though he has lived in Canada for twenty years without being molested. Arthur Bortolotti is an ardent anti-fascist, completely dedicated to the effort to prevent fascism from taking root in Canada. He uncovered a fascist school in Windsor where Canadian children were being taught the blessings of Mussolini and thereby incurred the hatred of the Fascists. When the war decrees went into effect, the black elements saw their chance. It is reasonably certain that they were back of the arrest. Having failed to send Bortolotti to the penitentiary, they are determined to bring about his deportation to Italy.

Mr. Kennedy stressed the fact that "the outcome of the case will be watched anxiously by people who have scarcely heard of anarchism, who have only a nodding—and, at the moment, curtly nodding—acquaintance with communism, but who fear that their own small liberties will be affected." The author was entirely too optimistic. In point of fact, the people of this city seem not to care about their liberties sufficiently to "watch anxiously" the outcome of the arrests. As to the press, with the exception of a few lines reporting the trials, the papers in this city have maintained a conspiracy of silence. The liberal evening paper, so termed, in this city has refused to acquaint its readers with the full implication of the decrees or the fate awaiting Arthur Bortolotti. A protest in The Nation and other publications may instil some courage in a few liberal-minded people in Canada to raise their voices in behalf of Arthur Bortolotti and to give his defense moral and financial support. Contributions may be sent to Miss Clara Fredericks, 45 West Seventeenth Street, New York City.

E. G.

Toronto, Canada, December 23

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER, for many years The Nation's Moscow correspondent, is the author of a two-volume work entitled "The Soviet in World Affairs."

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, Woodrow Wilson professor of government at Williams College, is the author of "American Policy Toward Russia Since 1917" and "Europe on the Eve."

GEORGE W. McGILL was associated with the Chattanooga News for ten years, as state news editor, political writer, and Washington correspondent.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL has made a special study of the art of Ingres.

F. W. DUPEE is on the editorial staff of the Partisan Review.

ELISEO VIVAS, assistant professor of philosophy at the University of Wisconsin, was awarded a Guggenheim fellowship for 1939.

JACQUES BARZUN, assistant professor of history at Columbia University, is the author of "Of Human Freedom," a study of democratic culture.

LUDWIG LORE conducts a column on European affairs in the New York Post, headed "Behind the Cables."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 150 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 13, 1940 · NUMBER 2

The Shape of Things

WE CANNOT SHARE THE WALL STREET Journal's satisfaction with Mr. Roosevelt's new budget. It cuts aid to farmers, the unemployed, and youth by more than a billion dollars, and it increases our already enormous arms expenditures to more than $1,800,000,000. By the President's own estimate, his new relief appropriations will reduce the number on the WPA rolls to 500,000 less than were employed even under the Woodrum bill. A faltering war boom has done little to reduce the standing army of unemployed or to dent the ranks of youth who cannot find a job. Increased arms expenditures will of course provide some new employment, but they represent the most expensive form of "work relief," for every dollar that will feed the hungry by this route must first feed the steel trust, the shipbuilding trust, the chemical trust, and the munitions makers. Mr. Roosevelt asks for a half-billion dollars in new taxes and hopes they will not be of a kind to cut into consumption, but the sales tax is sure to raise its head again at this session. It is good to see that Mr. Roosevelt asks that capacity to pay be the basis of new taxation. The President's budget, if adopted, will give us a deficit $1,760,000,000 below that of the present fiscal year, but the deficit will still be more than $2,000,000,000. The size of that deficit is the fiscal reflection of the chronic unemployment from which we seem to be suffering, and for which the New Deal—for all its reforms—has yet to find a remedy.

* * *

IN 1932 MR. ROOSEVELT CALLED HOOVER "spendthrift" because he had piled up a deficit of $5,000,000,000; now the President wants it understood that only $19,000,000,000 of our public debt of $42,000,000,000 is due to his own accumulated deficit. Much is made of the comparison—and of Mr. Roosevelt's inconsistency—by the New York Times and other critics of the Administration. But the fact is that every country in the world has been forced to abandon deflationary policies and to spend in an effort to combat depression. Britain, the homeland of classical economics and the chief pillar of financial conservatism, was the first great power to do so, and this fact is itself of historic significance. The contrast between the measures Mr. Roosevelt advocated in 1932 and those he has since applied testifies to the "quarterback" flexibility of mind on which he has always prided himself. In a larger context the contrast reflects the world trend to state domination of economic life; and the hope of reversing it, with a new war under way, is fantastic. The real need is to recognize the trend, the breakdown of private capitalism that brought it about, and the new policies for which it calls. We still cling to "bootstrap economics," but we cannot go on spending forever. The next step must be for the government to take over certain sectors of private enterprise so that its expenditures may be poured into productive channels rather than into the bottomless pit of subsidizing consumption.

* * *

FRANK MURPHY IS A GREAT IMPROVEMENT over Pierce Butler, and there will be general satisfaction with his nomination to the Supreme Court. As a young attorney, as a local judge in Detroit, and later as Governor of Michigan, Murphy demonstrated sympathy with labor and courage in expressing it. His recent address in this city before the civil-liberties conference held under the auspices of the American Civil Liberties Union was not particularly impressive, and his references to A. Mitchell Palmer were rather disturbing. On the debit side, too, are Murphy's praise of J. Edgar Hoover and his assurance that the FBI can never become an OGPU. Nevertheless, we believe that on the court, removed from political pressures, Murphy's liberalism will wear well. It is always hard to judge a Supreme Court nominee in advance; sometimes conservatives grow more liberal on the bench; sometimes genuine progressives, up against new issues, sag badly as they grow older. This was the case with Taney. We wish the new Justice well. Jackson's elevation to the Attorney Generalship and Francis Biddle's appointment as Solicitor General will meet with approval. Biddle's willingness to resign from the old Labor Board rather than kotow to Hearst in the Jennings case did him honor, and his new appointment is the President's amends for that disgraceful episode. We are only sorry to see Biddle leave the United States Circuit Court; his position there was, we think, more important if less politically strategic than that of Solicitor General.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 8, 1897.

THE READING OF THE WAGNER ACT BY A unanimous Supreme Court in the Longshoremen's, Falk, and Consumers' Power cases is admirably literal. The law says that only "final orders" of the board are reviewable by the courts. The provision was the fruit of bitter experience under the old Labor Board, when employers could tangle proceedings interminably by running into court for a restraining order at every step. In other days the Supreme Court was accustomed to swathe such plain statutory mandates in obfuscation—and do as it pleased. But Justice Stone in the first and last of these three cases exercises that "self-restraint" he so bitterly recommended to his colleagues in the first AAA case, and declares that it is up to "Congress and not the courts" to change the law. What judicial interference in earlier stages of the Labor Board's work can do is made clear by Justice Black in the Falk decision. There a circuit court amended a Labor Board order for an election so as to add a company union to the ballot and relieve the employer from the necessity of posting notices announcing that the company had been ordered to discontinue its support of that union. This is the type of judicial "amendment" that has reduced to impotence so many of our administrative agencies—notably in the field of utility regulation. Employers and rival unions have their day in court when a final order is issued. That is ample.

*

WE HOPE THAT LIBERALS IN WASHINGTON and elsewhere will get the point of the subdued report issued by the Dies committee. As Kenneth Crawford points out on another page, the liberals on the committee were permitted to rewrite the original report because the reactionary majority wants to keep the show going at all costs. They are confident that they can resume control if and when a new appropriation is granted. There has not been the slightest change of heart or objective; Mr. Dies has shrewdly retreated to lay the groundwork for a new offensive. That offensive will, as before, be directed against the New Deal. There is only one way to avert that development: New Dealers must expose the fraud involved in the report and fight to end the life of a committee which has already done an incalculable amount of damage.

*

THE SMITH HIT-AND-RUN INVESTIGATION OF the National Labor Relations Board, about to resume its hearings as we went to press, will this time dish up some "revelations" about the board's employment of young college graduates. Judged by its past conduct, the Smith committee could learn a great deal even from young college graduates about the fair and proper way to run a Congressional inquiry. So far it has served only as a sounding-board for grudges and a source of unfair and one-sided news stories which have been used as the basis for a drive to turn the Wagner Act into a means of oppressing rather than helping labor. Inspired stories that Democratic leadership in Congress will seek to appease business by revising the law into a replica of railroad labor legislation do not impress us. The mechanism for adjusting disputes over wages and hours in the highly organized railroad industry is no model for businesses in which the right of organization has yet to be won. The chief objection to the Wagner Act is still an elementary one—it encourages workers to organize. That objection can only be eliminated by eliminating the act, and elimination smells no sweeter when termed amendment. The board's latest report is encouraging. During the last fiscal year the number of strikes called to obtain the right to organize decreased by two-thirds.

*

TWO WEEKS AGO ONE JAMES C. PETRILLO, who is not only head of the Chicago Federation of Musicians but a strong-arm politician, was reported to have forced deletion of the name of John L. Lewis from three shows in that city. John L.'s name has been put back, and two columnists have now "revealed" that it was all a trick devised by George White to get publicity for his "Scandals." Maybe so, but the whole story sounds more like a genuine essay in censorship by Petrillo than a risky publicity sketch by White. Meanwhile on the national stage the Federation of Musicians is putting on a show of its own. Two years ago the federation forced through a demand that radio broadcasters spend some $1,500,000 for the labor of musicians, whether they need them or not. This year the ante has been raised to $3,000,000. Since the broadcasters are balking, the union has asked its locals throughout the country to refrain from signing contracts with broadcasters, but has given them permission to let their members work without written agreements, the object being to make constant the threat of a strike that would tie up the broadcasting industry. This seems to us a highly irregular procedure. The interests of musicians should be defended, but not by methods which discredit collective bargaining and in the end hurt rather than help the rank and file of labor.

*

WITH A MINIMUM OF RHETORIC, LEHMAN of New York continues to press forward with a progressive program that should be a model to other governors. In his quiet and methodical way this ex-banker has achieved far more than was accomplished by either Smith or Roosevelt in liberal legislation. Outstanding in his proposals are his suggestions for the abolition of the "blue-ribbon jury," an undemocratic device if there ever was one, and for the outlawing of wire-tapping. He asks an amendment to make state development and ownership of water-power resources a reality, particularly in regard to the St. Lawrence River. He calls attention to the extraordinary loophole in utility regulation that makes it unnecessary for the companies to reveal their depreciation accounts. He wants to make it easier to get rid of corrupt judges and corrupt municipal officials. He asks an amendment to force reapportionment. He promises to speed up public housing. He proposes to forbid discrimination against the Negro by labor unions and all businesses affected with a public interest. How much the Governor can do depends upon the Republicans, who control the Assembly. We indorse the Governor's defense of his Labor Relations Board but deplore his inability to see that in the milk field the farm cooperatives he praises are undemocratic company unions, that milk regulation under state as under federal law is still cut to suit the needs of the two big milk combines, and that the state-wide milk-advertising campaign is the device of milk-trust lobbyists to shut the mouths of the newspapers.

* * *

PROSPECTS FOR AN IMMEDIATE EMBARGO ON the export of war supplies to Japan upon the expiration of the trade treaty on January 26 are not considered very favorable in Washington. Certain business interests have apparently exerted sufficient pressure to prevent the stoppage of their lucrative war trade. A much better chance is seen for the adoption of discriminatory measures against growing imports from Japan. Such a movement would have the strong support of American textile interests, which have been alarmed at the sudden jump in imports of Japanese textiles. The President already has the power to take action against Japanese imports as soon as the trade treaty has expired. He can apply the 10 per cent countervailing duty on Japanese imports suspended by President Grant in 1872. If this fails to bring Japan to terms he can increase the duty on the ground that Japan subsidizes its exports to the United States—similar action has already been taken against German imports. Under the 1934 Tariff Act he has the power to ban Japanese imports altogether if Japan continues to discriminate against American trade in the occupied areas of China. Individuals and groups interested in checking Japanese aggression and preserving China's independence should throw themselves unreservedly behind this movement while continuing their drive for an export embargo. For a reduction in Japanese imports would be just as effective in stopping Japan under present conditions as a ban on exports. Japan's gold and foreign-exchange reserves are completely exhausted. Without sales of silk, textiles, and other products to this country it cannot hope to obtain the foreign exchange necessary for the continued purchase of war materials.

GREAT BRITAIN HAS PAID LITTLE HEED TO the series of protests delivered by our State Department in recent weeks against the infringement of American neutral rights on the high seas. Although some interference with American shipping may be regarded as inevitable in this war, the particular infringements singled out for protest are of a type that it is difficult for a neutral to tolerate, no matter how sympathetic it may be with Allied war aims. The seizure of American mails destined for neutral countries violates the eleventh Hague convention without appearing to serve any legitimate British war purpose. Similarly, the action of the British navy in taking the American merchant ship Mormacson into the European war zone in violation of the Neutrality Act was a needless flouting of American sentiment. Only slightly less objectionable was the detention of the American liner Manhattan, bound for a neutral port. The impossibility of enforcing neutral rights against a sea power like Great Britain in a major conflict was demonstrated in the last war. But the State Department is in an unassailable position in demanding full compensation for all losses incurred as a result of Great Britain's illegal actions.

* * *

THE PRESIDENT'S NEW YEAR DIPLOMATIC appointments range all the way from excellent to ridiculous. Whole-hearted approval can be given to the choice of George Messersmith as ambassador to Cuba. During recent years American policy toward Cuba has been marked by consistent blundering, and it is difficult to think of anyone whom we could better trust to rectify these mistakes than Mr. Messersmith. At the other extreme is the selection of James H. R. Cromwell, Doris Duke's amateur economist, as minister to Canada. Mr. Cromwell's sole qualification for the post seems to be personal friendship with the President and Mayor "I-Am-the-Law" Hague of Jersey City. Scarcely more encouraging is the report that former Governor George H. Earle of Pennsylvania will be named minister to Ireland, replacing John Cudahy, who has been moved to Belgium. While Mr. Earle's record as minister to Austria was generally considered satisfactory, his subsequent acts in Pennsylvania scarcely confirmed his liberal reputation. Little criticism will be made of the promotion of Breckinridge Long, former ambassador to Italy, to the post vacated by Mr. Messersmith in the State Department. But the filling of Mr. Messersmith's shoes should challenge the abilities even of a diplomat with as much experience as Mr. Long.

* * *

CORRECTION: Through an unfortunate error in transcription the name of Spaulding Frazer appeared as Frazier Spaulding in The Nation's Honor Roll, which was printed in our issue of last week.

Seeking a Flank

COMPLETE inactivity continues on the western front, and there has been little news recently of the war at sea. Either because of weather conditions or because of more effective counter-measures, the German effort to smash the British blockade seems to have been relaxed. It is hardly conceivable, however, that this passivity can continue for many weeks.

So far as land warfare is concerned, the difficulties of a break-through by either side appear more formidable than ever. Through these winter months, while front-line activity has been limited to skirmishes, the work of strengthening and deepening both the Maginot and Siegfried lines has apparently continued feverishly. Hence the possibility of a military decision has been still further reduced unless one side or the other succeeds in opening up a flank. It is recognition of this fact that has caused the recent heightened tension in neutral countries and led to renewed activity on the diplomatic front.

The most sensational development has been the negotiations between the Hungarian Foreign Minister Count Csaky and Count Ciano of Italy. After a long conference during the week-end Count Csaky returned suddenly to Budapest instead of remaining in Italy for a vacation as originally planned. The reasons for this move are still unknown, but a "high authority" in the Hungarian capital has been quoted as saying that Italy and Hungary had agreed on a defensive military alliance which would assure Hungary of support against invasion by Germany and Russia. If this report proves correct, it will put an entirely new complexion on the situation in Southeastern Europe. For it would mean that Italy had recognized that neither Germany nor Russia could take any offensive action in the Balkans without at least the tacit consent of the other, and that in order to oppose effectively any advance by the Soviets into the region it would have to be prepared to break with its former axis partner.

This news coincides with a recrudescence of Balkan rumors and suggests that some of them may be well founded. These include reports that Germany is extremely dissatisfied with the amount of economic support received from Rumania and is considering bringing military pressure to bear. Another story current is that Berlin is worried by plans of the Allies and Turkey for constructing an eastern front and would like to establish a good defensive position in the Balkans. Even if these reports are entirely false, they reflect the growing fear in Southeastern Europe that deadlock elsewhere may bring the tides of war sweeping over its borders. Certainly Rumania's mistrust of Russia's intentions has not been allayed, although its dread of the Red Army seems to have been diminished by Finland's resistance. Consequently, while not long ago it was said that in the event of a Russian attack Bessarabia would be abandoned, more troops have now been moved into that region and King Carol has announced it will be defended to the last.

Another factor in the situation is the appalling disaster caused by earthquakes and floods in northern Anatolia. To what extent this has temporarily weakened Turkey in a military sense is not clear. Obviously the disorganization of economic life and transport must have an adverse bearing on its defensive preparations, and the cost of reconstruction will be a heavy burden on the country's limited resources. Hence if Russia or Germany or both were contemplating an attack on Turkey's ally, Rumania, the present time might seem propitious.

If the tortuous relations of Moscow and Berlin are a threat to the Balkans, they are even more dangerous to the Scandinavian countries. Should the Russian attack on Finland succeed—and despite the Finns' remarkable resistance they must be overwhelmed by numbers unless outside aid arrives—Norway and Sweden would seem destined to be the next victims. In fact, there is a widespread belief in Scandinavia that Germany and Russia have already agreed on a plan to carve them up. Yet if they openly move to Finland's assistance they fear that Germany might seize the opportunity to attack. Britain and France are sending planes and munitions to Finland but cannot give more substantial aid, even if otherwise prepared to do so, while Norway and Sweden remain officially neutral, for the Finns' only contact with the West is through those countries.

The dilemma of the Scandinavian states has been sharpened by recent harsh warnings issued in Berlin. According to the German press, the Allies are attempting to drag the Northern countries into the war, and dire consequences are threatened if they fail to remain strictly neutral. Actually, while there is no reason to suppose that the Allies are putting pressure on the Scandinavian countries except in an economic sense, it may well be that the advantages and disadvantages of a northern front are being weighed. It would mean a clear breach with Russia, which so far Paris and London have striven to avoid. Apart from that, the outstanding problem is whether the Allies could spare sufficient men, and transport them speedily enough, to prevent Germany from getting a real grip on the Scandinavian peninsula. For if Germany were able to seize the southern Swedish and Norwegian coasts, the Allies would be immensely handicapped in enforcing the blockade. On the other hand, a firmly established position in the peninsula would give the Allies a chance to break into the Baltic and attack Germany's vulnerable northern coast. Unless, however, their hand is forced, Sweden and Norway will probably try to cling to their neutrality a while longer. They have no illusions about their fate should Germany win the war, but they have understandable misgivings about how much immediate protection they are likely to receive from the Allies.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burling Cal.

Tariffs and Trade Pacts

IN ASKING for an extension of the Trade Agreements Act beyond next June 12, the President has set the stage for what may become the bitterest struggle in the present session of Congress. While the suspension of negotiations with Argentina and Uruguay may tend to draw the teeth of farm opposition to the act, it will hardly change many votes. During recent weeks the Republicans, led by Senators Vandenberg, Borah, and McNary, have been sniping continuously at the Hull trade program. The opposition has grown to such proportions that some Administration supporters are known to have urged the President to accept a compromise under which future trade agreements would be submitted to the Senate for ratification. Although he did not deny that the determination of general tariff policy is a function of Congress, Mr. Roosevelt pointed out that it is desirable in the interest of flexibility to have the trade agreements kept in administrative hands. Had he wished, he could have drawn upon a long and not wholly honorable history of Congressional action in the field of tariffs to show that progress in the elimination of trade barriers seldom comes as a result of Congressional consideration. Whatever an individual Congressman's tariff views may be, he rarely feels free to vote for a reduction of the duty on a product in which his state is vitally interested. And there is no issue on which Congress can waste more time with less satisfactory results than the consideration of specific rates. Giving the Senate power to review the trade agreements might not completely wreck the reciprocal-trade program, but it would open the door to action by pressure groups which could only obstruct the Administration's efforts to break the log jam of international commerce.

Senator Vandenberg, who opposes the traditional Republican tariff policy exemplified by the Hawley-Smoot Act, has suggested what he terms an "elastic" tariff instead of the Hull program. He would base the tariff upon "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad." Despite Mr. Vandenberg's disavowal, it is difficult to distinguish between his "elastic" tariff and the so-called "scientific" Hawley-Smoot tariff, which stands as one of the major causes of the Great Depression. The theory that our tariff policy can be safely based on differences in the cost of production has plagued Republicans for decades. Carried to its logical conclusion, it would stop all trade in competitive articles. For if a foreign producer cannot turn out goods more cheaply than his American competitor, or has to pay a duty equating his costs with those of American competitors, he obviously cannot afford to ship his article for sale in the United States. And if foreigners are unable to sell here, they have no way of obtaining foreign exchange to buy American goods. Moreover, experience has shown the "cost-of-production" formula to be wholly unworkable in practice. The determination of the relative costs of production of even one article, produced in scores of factories here and in several foreign countries, would tax the full capacities of the Tariff Commission for many months. And even then the result would be far from the "scientific" ideal held up by Senator Vandenberg.

There have been inaccuracies and exaggerations on the other side of the fence also. Mr. Hull and others in the Administration have spoken of the trade agreements as "peace insurance" and have attached a significance to them as economic stimulants which they do not deserve. While it can scarcely be denied that the reciprocal pacts have contributed to more friendly relations between the United States and the countries with which we have signed them, they have done little, if anything, to remove the basic tensions threatening to make for war. Such exaggerations are minor as compared with the opposition's claims that the trade pacts have injured both agriculture and industry, but they have weakened rather than aided the Administration's case. An honest inquiry such as has been proposed by Secretary Hull might not show the pacts to have been as important as is sometimes asserted, but it should make an impregnable case for the extension of the act in its present form. If the pacts have not yielded the results expected, the blame does not rest so much on the act as on the continuous pressure from vested interests—illustrated by the opposition to the proposed Argentine pact—which makes impossible any real reform in our protectionist tariff policy. For despite the valiant efforts of Mr. Hull, the United States still has one of the highest tariffs in the world—a tariff wholly inconsistent with our interests as a creditor country.

The Fall of Hore-Belisha

HORE-BELISHA'S dismissal as Secretary of State for War has resulted in a greater explosion of British public opinion than Mr. Chamberlain may have foreseen. It is not yet clear why he was forced out. Explanations in the British press are varied and in some cases conflicting, while the only official statement available stresses the absence of any division on policy between the Premier and the ex-Minister.

For this reason we must suspend judgment on the merits of the case, lacking as we do the omiscience of Major George Fielding Eliot, who announced in Sunday's New York Herald Tribune that differences on questions of strategy between Mr. Hore-Belisha and General Sir Edmund Ironside, Chief of the Imperial General Staff, had become so acute that one or the other had to go. In Major Eliot's opinion, "the Prime Minister's decision does him immeasurable credit" and "is not the least of the accomplishments for which future historians will acclaim Neville Chamberlain."

According to the same commentator, Mr. Hore-Belisha's mistaken policy is the result of his close association with Captain Liddell Hart, the well-known military writer and author of "The Defence of Britain." But this association has long been public knowledge, and while the Minister's energetic democratization of the army may be partly due to Captain Hart's influence, he must have differed with his unofficial adviser on the question of the dispatch of a British army to France, opposition to which was the main thesis of "The Defence of Britain." For this fundamental question was settled months ago, and clearly in a way approved by Mr. Hore-Belisha, since otherwise a War Office crisis would have arisen then.

Whatever the cause of Mr. Hore-Belisha's dismissal, its manner was extremely curious. Information has reached us, from a source that makes it impossible to doubt its accuracy, that a few people in London knew two weeks ago that Chamberlain had decided to drop his War Minister. But the latter remained apparently in ignorance until last Thursday, when he was asked to take a definitely inferior position which would have left him outside the War Cabinet.

The storm of indignation in the British press is a tribute to the energy and imagination with which Mr. Hore-Belisha has carried out his job. These qualifications are conspicuously lacking among the majority of the Cabinet, and courage of the kind which he showed in clearing out the Old Guard of generals and attacking the officer-caste system is also rare. Consequently his popularity has grown despite his exhibitionism. The fury aroused by his sacrifice is fanned by the widespread belief that his real "crime" was being an outsider. His successor, Oliver Stanley, son of the Earl of Derby, is very much an "insider." Apart from that, he is an amiable, responsible, well-meaning Tory whose record in half a dozen high offices is one of ineffective mediocrity.

In the ordinary course a minister leaving office has the right to make a personal statement in the House of Commons. Parliament will not meet again until next week unless the Labor Party's demand for an immediate meeting is granted. In any case, public opinion will compel Chamberlain to defend the step he has taken, and it is unlikely to be satisfied with an explanation to a secret session of Parliament. There is a possibility that the crisis will lead to a general airing of the methods by which the war is being carried on, and in some quarters it has been suggested that the outcome may be a complete change in government. Such a change could hardly fail to be for the better since, quite apart from the widespread distrust Mr. Chamberlain inspires, his tendency to surround himself with tired and incompetent old men has proved a serious handicap to Britain's war effort.

The President's Message

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

WHEN I read the President's message I thought, this is a sensational statement of the country's stake in the European war; it will arouse a terrific storm of protest among isolationists. It did nothing of the sort. Soothed perhaps by the President's calm tone and measured language, most of his bitterest Congressional opponents reacted mildly. Several Senators and Congressmen attacked the references to the trade-pact policy, but most of the political comment was favorable and most of it ignored the obvious implication of the message's dominant theme. Newspaper references were also mild and generally beside the main point, although the Wall Street Journal and Raymond Clapper in the Scripps papers both expressed disagreement with the President's statements on foreign policy.

Since I agree with Mr. Roosevelt's position I was pleased with the friendly reception it received. But I was puzzled as well. Because he said as plainly as possible that if the totalitarian powers should win the war the world would be "a shabby and dangerous place" for our children to live in—"even though we are a very great and very powerful nation." He said that "with modern weapons and modern conditions" civilized life could not survive a prolonged period of continued warfare like the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. He said that "certain freedoms" were essential everywhere if we ourselves are to feel safe. He did not argue from these facts that the United States should send an army to Europe to help defeat the nations that are trying to "dominate the world by concentrated force alone." On the contrary, he specifically said that "the overwhelming majority of our fellow-citizens do not abandon in the slightest their hope and expectation that the United States will not become involved in military participation in these wars." He said that, and I believe he meant it. None the less his words were carefully chosen. Participation other than military is not ruled out; by implication it is approved. What the President did was to express, more clearly than he or any other responsible official has yet done, the momentous opinion that the United States cannot afford to see Britain and France defeated. I agree with this position, and I believe it should be put forward. Only by accepting it without hysteria can we go on to consider its implications.

Pacifists and isolationists will argue that to take sides even mentally—and, still more, materially—is to run the danger of becoming involved militarily as well. Certainly it would be dishonest to pretend that no risks are attached to an open expression of partiality, of whatever sort. A shipment of supplies to Finland carries with it a measure of emotional commitment that might be avoided by a cool refusal to help. A loan to Britain, if it were permitted, would combine mercenary and emotional entanglements. Only isolation, far more complete than the neutrality law provides, would prevent acts which bind our interests to those of the Western nations. And even legal isolation cannot freeze human feeling.

Risk of war is not to be dodged. But it can be argued, and I believe it to be true, that American involvement is less likely if continued large-scale material help is sent to the Allied countries. The best chance for preserving American neutrality lies in a quick victory for the Western powers. A long war or a war in which Britain and France face probable defeat will wear down the "hope and expectation" of peace to which Americans still so firmly cling. A long war will increase the danger of a merging of Russian and German forces against the West. A long war will increase the demand for a vindictive peace. Only the early collapse of Hitler's power offers promise of the kind of settlement the world needs.

The President made it plain that he intended to have a hand in securing such a settlement after a totalitarian defeat. He offered as an example of international unity the relationships of the American republics and the success of the Trade Agreements Act in removing restrictive barriers, and he made a strong plea for an extension of the act. He recalled the "blind economic selfishness in most countries, including our own," which after the World War "resulted in a destructive mine field of trade restrictions which blocked the channels of commerce among nations" and contributed to the economic breakdown that led toward the present wars. And he looked ahead to the time when peace would become possible and the United States could "use its influence to open up the trade channels of the world in order that no nation need feel compelled in later days to seek by force of arms what it can well gain by peaceful conference." "For this purpose," he said, "we need the Trade Agreements Act even more than when it was passed. . . . Such an influence will be greatly weakened if this government becomes a dog in the manger of trade selfishness."

I quote this because it shows the direction of the President's thinking. He clearly intends to help bring about peace; if his acts had not already proved this, he indicates such an intention in another part of his message. He believes that an important element in that peace will be a widespread adoption of the principles that govern our trade agreements. This is good enough for a beginning even though it falls far short of the economic collaboration that will be needed after the war. But it is sufficient to prove that the President hopes for a future organization of international relationships in which the United States will play a leading and continuing part. This, too, is an important piece of news.

It is interesting, though perhaps not significant, that the British Ambassador, speaking at Chicago the day after the President delivered his message, made many of the same points. His address was also designed to emphasize the meaning of the European war for America. He too recognized and accepted the determination of this country to stay out. He too talked about trade barriers and stressed the need of a peace that would prevent the economic collapses and conflicts that led to the present struggle. The two addresses were like the British and American faces of a single coin. But while I agreed with most of what Lord Lothian said, I wish he hadn't said it. When the President talks of America's stake in the war, he is fulfilling his duty to his fellow-citizens. When the British Ambassador says the same thing, it is discounted as propaganda, however true it is. Lord Lothian pointed to our "excellent" Ambassador Kennedy, who "is continually explaining to the British people what Americans think." It was a poor example to choose. Both nations would be better off if their ambassadors maintained a decorous diplomatic silence, especially in war time.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 29
EDITORIALS:
SEEKING A FLANK 32
TARIFFS AND TRADE PACTS 33
THE FALL OF HORE-BELISHA 33
THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE by Freda Kirchwey 34
THE REAL DIES REPORT by Kenneth G. Crawford 36
SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY. III. DEATH OF A REVOLUTION by Louis Fischer 37
IS SCANDINAVIA NEXT?
THE ANTI-NORDIC GERMANS by Joachim Joesten 41
SWEDEN PREPARES by Maurice Feldman 42
TWILIGHT OF THE CHAIN GANG by Walter Wilson 44
IN THE WIND 46
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 47
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
THE ICON AND THE PORTRAIT by W. H. Auden 48
ARMY WITHOUT BANNERS by Louis B. Salomon 48
TWO CRISES IN ONE by I. F. Stone 49
NORRIS OF NEBRASKA by McAlister Coleman 50
MEN OF THE CONFEDERACY by James Orrick 51
THE VISCERA OF THE POWER PROCESS by Karl Loewenstein 51
SHORTER NOTICES 52
DRAMA by Joseph Wood Krutch 53
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 54

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

The Real Dies Report

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, January 8

HAVING run through one dragon, Martin Dies is charging another. As a result of his first gallant fight, he admits, communism in the United States lies prostrate, if not dead. The Russian invasion of Finland might have helped a little, but Dies takes most of the credit for the accomplishment. Since the Dies committee already has achieved its purpose, the virtual destruction of un-Americanism, why should it go on? This problem has been solved by the discovery of another, tougher, uglier dragon, parent of the first. It is atheism or paganism, and the campaign against it is to be a holy war led by Martin Dies.

The ideology of the crusade goes like this: The world is engaged in a fight between Marxist materialism on one side and Christian idealism on the other. The Russian invasion of Finland and the German invasion of Poland are products of Marxism, a term synonymous with atheism. That leaves the Italian invasion of Ethiopia unaccounted for, but it apparently was the exception proving the rule. In the United States the Marxian atheists, disguised as "so-called liberals," are engaged in the materialistic enterprise of supplying the unemployed with food and, in the process, transforming our system of government into a bureaucratic state capitalism.

Dies introduced the new line in the first article of his series in Liberty. He developed it in his radio sermon last Saturday night. But it was most fully and clearly set forth in the first draft of his report to Congress. This report, unfortunately, was rewritten by liberal members of the Dies committee and consequently never made public. I say unfortunately because the original document shows that Dies himself and, presumably, a majority of his committee are still determined to destroy the New Deal. The reasonable report that was finally made public was written by a minority of the committee and has created the wholly false impression that Dies and his majority have changed stripe. If their authority and their appropriation are renewed, their efforts to smear Roosevelt liberalism, this time in the name of Christianity itself, will also be renewed.

Consider this paragraph from the conclusions of the suppressed report submitted to the committee by Dies with the recommendation that it be adopted:

> These Marxists who are not attached to the Communist Party or the German-American Bund are characterized, especially in these times, by their constant assaults upon the American economic system, which to them is a pile of "folklore" [as in Thurman Arnold's "Folklore of Capitalism," apparently]. Some of them have received appointments to high government positions, from which vantage points they carry on an incessant attack upon our economic system. Most of them may properly be called milk-and-water Marxists. Nevertheless, by their contempt for the American economic system and their unflagging efforts to discredit it, they serve the ends of those Marxists who feed on the stronger meat of violent revolution. Marxists of all hues and of all degrees of consciousness are seeking to sabotage by slow stages the political and economic system of America in favor of bureaucratic state capitalism.

Jerry Voorhis

And this, according to the rejected report, is how the sabotaging is done:

> First, attacks upon one phase or another of our economic system [reform]. Second, the advocacy of the principle that the government has the duty to support the people [relief]. Third, subtle proposals to regiment agriculture [AAA], labor [NLRB], and industry [SEC and various other government agencies] under some system of planned economy. Fourth, the final abolition of private property in favor of public ownership of basic industries [TVA], and, finally, complete dictatorship [Roosevelt the Kerensky who precedes the dictator].

The report goes on to bolster the Kerensky approach with the flat statement that "we are now witnessing the first stages of this [Marxist-atheist-pagan] campaign."

Thus it becomes apparent that Dies himself and, presumably, the four conservatives who constitute the majority of the committee are still bent on a campaign of New Deal destruction. They permitted the minority members—Jerry Voorhis of California, Joe Casey of Massachusetts, and John Dempsey of New Mexico—to rewrite the report because they wanted something all members of the committee would sign. Dies was anxious to avoid the uncertainties about renewal of his authority that a minority report might entail. Even the House, tolerant as it has been with the antics of the committee, was disgusted with the report of J. B. Matthews, "research director," that consumer organizations are Communist dominated—except Consumers' Research, the one in which he was long interested. Dies authorized publication of this report without consulting minority members of the committee. He also raised Matthews's pay without bothering to mention it. Matthews was probably the real author not only of the original Dies report but of the chairman's other recent literary productions.

The elaboration of Dies's anti-New Deal prejudices into a new testament of Christianity suggests the Matthews hall mark. Other features of the original report were similarly suggestive. For example, there was the announcement that "Communists have from the beginning of this labor organization [the C. I. O.] wielded the dominant influence in its polices and control." And there was the "shameful and alarming" finding that "563 employees of the federal government could belong to so obviously a Communist-controlled organization" as the League for Peace and Democracy. At one of the committee's meetings Matthews was forced to confess that he could not name a single Communist in the government service, although the original report said some of the shameful 563 were "self-admitted members of the Communist Party." The minority members of the committee eliminated this along with other fanciful "statements of fact."

As everyone now knows, the published report of the committee denounced communism and fascism in uncompromising terms. It was, in fact, considerably harder on the Communists than the original. But it affirmatively rejected the falsehood that liberalism and communism differ only in degree. It defended civil liberties and by implication accused the Dies committee of disrespect for them. It estimated that no more than 1,000,000 of 132,000,000 Americans have embraced subversive doctrines despite widespread suffering during ten depression years. "We owe them," it concluded, "a solution of the economic and social problem of unnecessary poverty in the midst of possible plenty."

The published report, like the unpublished original, recommended further investigation of "un-American activities," but it defined these, as the original did not, as operations in the interest of foreign governments. Such a recommendation seemed so reasonable that it was promptly underwritten by the liberal as well as the conservative press. The New York Times expressed the happy thought that the Dies investigation at last had educated Dies. But Dies was in Texas whetting his trusty dragon-lance when the report was written. It is plain that his new dragon is much the same as his old dragon and that it still bears a striking resemblance to the Roosevelt New Deal.

Soviet Russia Today

III. DEATH OF A REVOLUTION

BY LOUIS FISCHER

THE drastic modification in Russia's attitude toward the outside world did not suddenly spring full-blown from the brain of Stalin. It is not the casual whim of one individual. Nor is it merely the product of a new world situation. It has its roots deep in Soviet domestic conditions. The Russo-German pact begins a new era. But it is also a stage in a striking development of the Soviet revolution which started several years ago.

The year 1936 represents a divide in the history of the Bolshevik Revolution. The roots of the rapprochement with the Nazis go back to that year. I trace the new pact with Germany to a divorce between the Soviet leadership and the Soviet people; it became noticeable in 1936.

Up to about 1933 the Soviet regime was laying the industrial foundation of a new Russia, for which the population paid in the form of reduced consumption and harder work. Some did so grumblingly, many patiently. In 1934 and 1935 and in the first half of 1936 life became a bit easier. More goods could be bought in shops. But then the rising curve of consumption began to flatten out. The supply of consumers' commodities in the Soviet Union is today woefully inadequate, and while food is generally plentiful, butter and milk and even articles like cabbage, a staple of Russian diet, are often unobtainable. In this field little progress has been made in the last three years. The deficiency is in part due to military preparations. But it is more adequately explained by the purges and several inherent Soviet economic weaknesses.

Even when he has the money the Soviet citizen faces a knotty problem when he tries to purchase most articles of clothing, especially pants—and there is no socialism without pants—or writing paper, or kitchen utensils, or kerosene for cooking, or a thousand and one items of common daily use. The proof of scarcity is found in the Soviet press: speculators are regularly arrested and sentenced. Speculators flourish only in scarcity. Moreover, factory directors and managers of industries are discharged, purged, or imprisoned for failing to produce efficiently and sufficiently. This usually makes matters worse: less experienced men take the vacated posts. On December 2, 1939, the New York Times carried a report from Moscow about "the famine in consumers' goods" and the "complaints by the Moscow public." The inability to buy necessities is a grave disappointment to the Soviet population, which had hoped that some day, after twenty or more fatiguing years of Soviet economy, life would grow comfortable and easy.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE TRIALS

Simultaneously, another great yearning of the Soviet nation was shattered—the yearning for liberty. The Stalin constitution of 1936 was sincerely intended as a charter of freedom. The enemies of the Bolshevik regime—the kulaks, capitalists, old-style conservative intellectuals—had been eradicated. The loyal folk that remained could be granted more civil rights. That was the conception of the constitution, and its promulgation produced joy throughout the land. The subsequent dejection has been no less intense. For almost immediately restrictions on individuals were drawn tighter, restraint increased, arrests multiplied. The terror that had been directed chiefly against anti-Soviet elements who hated the regime was now aimed at Communists who had made the regime. In 1936, for the first time, occurred wholesale arrests and executions of Communists for political reasons. The trials and purges that followed caused the disappearance of hundreds of thousands of men and women, some shot, some incarcerated, some exiled to frozen and desert wastes. Trials were held not only in Moscow under the limelight. Every city and small town had its trials. The purge extended to every nook of the vast continent which is Russia. Foreign Communists, especially Polish and German refugees, were caught in the huge dragnet.

The basic problem raised by the constitution was the future of the G. P. U. Civil rights, habeas corpus, and all democratic liberties are illusory while a secret police operates with special powers to arrest without proper judicial warrant and to exile and execute without public trial. The Kremlin realized this, and as a preliminary to the issuance of the constitution took measures to curtail the prerogatives of the G. P. U. These measures and their success demonstrated that the G. P. U. was not an independent, omnipotent state within a state but subject to the higher authority of Stalin and his associates.

Then there followed a reversal and setback. In August, 1936, Kamenev and Zinoviev, Lenin's friends, with Stalin members of the triumvirate which ruled after Lenin died, were tried and later executed. The trial of Piatakov, Radek, and several others followed in January, 1937; and in June, 1937, Tukhachevsky and a large group of top-rank Red Army commanders were shot. Many of them were anti-Stalin—though he was the one subject they strangely avoided in their confessions and public statements at the Moscow trials—and some probably had conspired against him. When Soviet Russia was ready for democracy, it got a more draconic dictatorship, because, for one thing, investigations revealed that the country was not as unanimous about the genius and achievements of Stalin as the press seemed to indicate.

The terror of the G. P. U. was now unleashed against all former oppositionists who had or had not recanted, and against numerous others who had never been connected with any opposition. Big figures toppled into prison and oblivion. To have made revolutionary history or to have carried out the Five-Year Plan was no security.

A deadly fear was injected into those who remained. The purges were regrettable not merely from the human point of view and because industry lagged while good industrialists languished in jail; they demoralized the population. The country, for instance, had been taught that Yagoda, the chairman of the G. P. U., was "the flaming sword of the revolution." He was one of the guiding lights of the Soviet government. He had staged the trials of Kamenev and Zinoviev, and of Piatakov, Radek, and the others. But then he himself sat in the dock as an "enemy of the people," and he was executed as an agent of foreign governments. Could he have staged the trials to harm the revolution? Doubts harassed many citizens.

Yagoda was succeeded by Yezhov, and Yezhov in turn became "the flaming sword of the revolution." His picture was displayed in countless offices, factories, and homes. Then he too disappeared in disgrace. Whom could one trust? Whom could one follow?

In 1936 the Soviet government created the rank of marshal and elevated five men to that rank: Voroshilov, Tukhachevsky, Yegorov, Blücher, and Budenny. Children and adults treasured a widely circulated photograph of these heroes of the country. Before long Tukhachevsky was executed for having allegedly wanted a pact with the Nazis, and the children had to cut his face out of the photograph. Then Yegorov had to be excised. And finally Blücher. Today two remain.

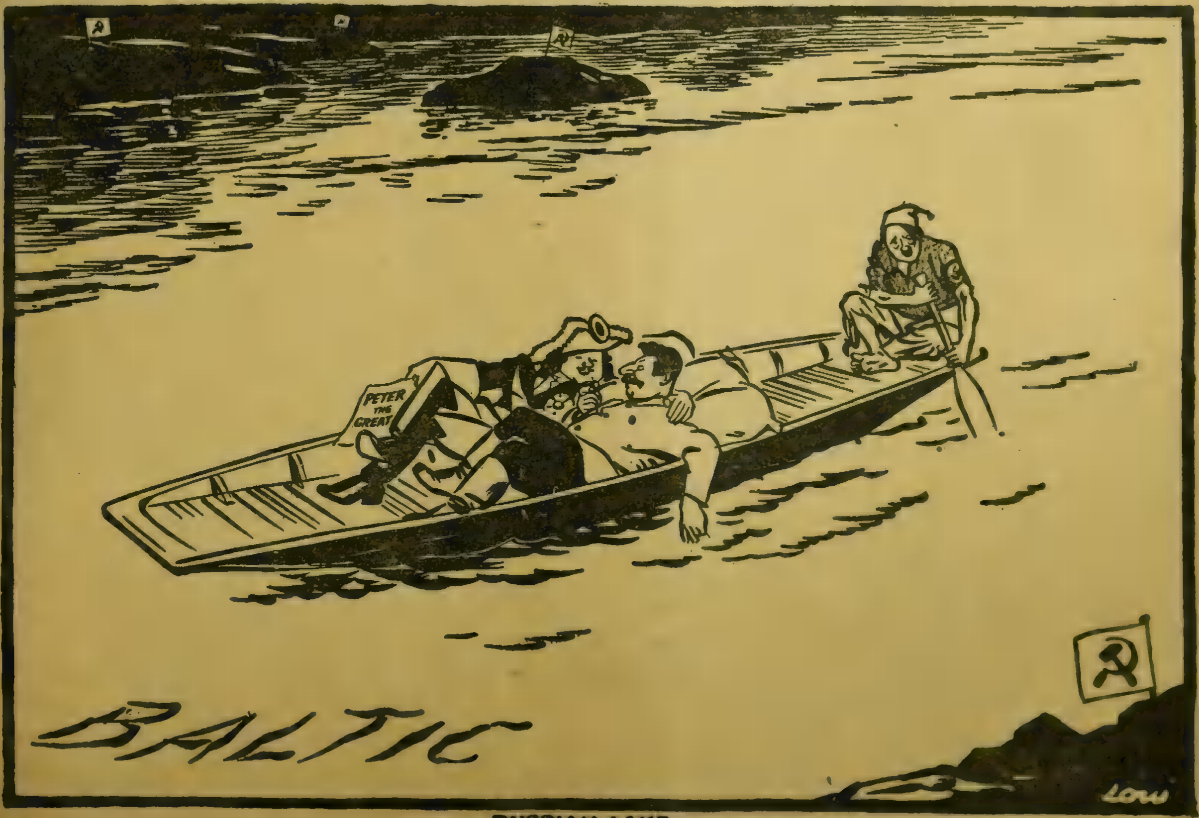
Thousands of writers, journalists, Communist officials, party speakers, Bolshevik provincial leaders, and leaders of the youth movement were arrested because, according to the published version, they had been uncovered as anti-Soviet. Then how could the ordinary citizen know whether the man whose article he was reading today, whose speech he was listening to, whose advice he was following, might not be annihilated tomorrow as a foe of the Soviet state? The purges produced a crisis of faith. Since everybody was a potential spy and traitor, everybody distrusted everybody else. This was ruinous to economic activity. Persons in industry knew that promotion brought greater responsibility and greater danger. Some preferred therefore to remain in small jobs. I know of the case of an engineer who chose to be a taxi driver to escape the constant strain of important work in which he might make a mistake that would be interpreted as due to evil political intent. Everybody hesitated to talk on serious subjects or to associate with any but a few intimates. There was a premium on frivolity and personal disloyalty. Communists started saying "they" instead of "we" in referring to the regime.

The mass took refuge in indifference and passivity. The Communist Party ceased to count and became a rubber stamp. This made it easy for the leadership to do as it pleased. The people did not have to be considered. It did not have to be prepared for future measures. Steps taken by the government did not have to be explained to it. The Russo-German pact was divulged to an unsuspecting and I am sure horrified Soviet public without preparation or justification.

The Russo-German pact was not the first instance of crude disregard of Bolshevik tradition and Soviet culture. In 1936, having established himself as undisputed dictator, Stalin began making political mistakes. He had accused others of being "dizzy with success." Now he seemed to suffer from the same giddiness. I will limit myself to two mistaken innovations which illustrate the ideological gulf that has developed between top layer and people. In May, 1936, the Soviet government published the draft of an anti-abortion law. Previously abortions had been legal and numerous, and the Bolsheviks, with their usual pendulumism, now swung to the other extreme and wished to proscribe them altogether. But they said to the country: Here is the draft, shoot at it. Do you like it or not? Tell us frankly; this is a democracy. This provoked a nation-wide discussion. Resolutions were adopted in factories condemning the act. The resolutions were published in the press. Women and men wrote letters to the newspapers explaining that under the difficult Soviet housing and living conditions the new provision would work impossible hardships. Overwhelmingly the sentiment, as shown by public statements, was against the draft. Then, after the open debate had raged over the whole country for a month, the government republished the draft as the law, making one or two very minor changes. Independently of the merits or demerits of this piece of legislation, and they are not now germane to my argument, the behavior of the government testified to its contempt and disrespect of the will and wish of the population. It was a slap in the face for the public. It was a political blunder. Citizens shrank back into their unpolitical corners, humiliated and disconsolate.

RUSSIFICATION

Again in 1936 the leadership intensified propaganda, first launched cautiously in 1935, to inculcate patriotism and Russian nationalism. Half the residents of the Soviet Union are not Russians at all, but Ukrainians, Georgians, Turks, Armenians, Mongols, Uzbeks, Tartars, Mordvinians, Chuvashes, and so forth, on down a list of about two hundred nationalities. The bulk of the population had never had any patriotism for czarist Russia and had never been taught any Russian nationalism or even Soviet nationalism by the revolution. The intelligent



RUSSIAN LAKE

Soviet man or woman who believes in socialism is a patriot of the doctrine and attributes the achievements of the Soviet regime to it rather than to the fact that Russians are applying it on Russian soil. He or she will usually tell you that it is a pity socialism was first tried in Russia, for its chances of success would have been greater in Germany or England or America, which are more civilized and more advanced industrially. The teaching of Lenin was internationalism, and it was accepted by millions of Soviet citizens. I should say that Loyalist Spain, for instance, meant more to Soviet citizens than most events of the last few years inside or outside Russia. Nevertheless, and in defiance of this spirit, Soviet leaders attempted to inoculate the people with Russian nationalism. Prerevolutionary Russian history was rewritten to make it palatable to a new generation, and the works of Pokrovsky, friend of Lenin and famous Communist historian of czarism, were discarded. Peter the Great, reviled for his cruelty by all who read, was refurbished for modern consumption. A whole galaxy of czarist notables appeared from the dustbin of the past, into which a proper assessment of their reactionary deeds had consigned them. Figures like Alexander Nevsky were brought forward out of the mist of the czarist Middle Ages and popularized in the films. Art, literature, and politics received a deepening Russian tinge. "Shors," the latest talkie produced by Dovzhenko, celebrated Soviet Ukrainian director, makes a typical Ukrainian exclaim on his deathbed, "Farewell, Russia and the Ukraine." It is altogether unnatural and un-Soviet for him to say "Farewell, Russia," but it is in tune with the latest Russian patriotism.

Startling official manifestations of Russification appeared for the first time in Soviet history. Soviet policy toward national minorities had always been above criticism by reason of its political wisdom and effectiveness. Racial conflicts were eliminated or reduced to infinitesimal dimensions. As part of this general trend, anti-Semitism became a waning, disappearing phenomenon frowned on and punished by the authorities. The struggle in society, Bolshevism taught, was between classes, not between religions or races.

One of the most attractive features of Soviet endeavor to liberate backward minorities was the introduction of the Latin alphabet among Eastern ethnic groups whose complicated cursive Arabic and other scripts retarded their cultural progress, created a small intellectual aristocracy, and made for a high percentage of illiteracy. Latinization gave a tremendous fillip to popular education, brought Asiatic races closer to Western culture, and documented a decided rupture with the czarist policy of oppressing and Russifying non-Russian populations.

But in 1937 an officially inspired movement away from Latinization set in, and today most of the forty-odd nationalities which adopted the Latin alphabet have decided to drop it or are about to do so and—this is truly amazing—to substitute the Russian Cyrillic alphabet. Pravda of October 14, 1939, reported "a meeting of the intelligentsia of the city of Tashkent," in Central Asia, which "unanimously adopted a resolution asking the party and government of Uzbekistan to hasten the transfer to an alphabet based on Russian script." The purpose of this change is "to bring still nearer the cultural wealth of the great Russian people to the peoples of Uzbekistan and considerably to facilitate the study of the great Russian language." The intelligentsia of Tashkent can rest assured that when they demand what Moscow wants to give they will certainly get it. But it is a sharp departure from Soviet practice and principles. And what is this business of the "great Russian nation" and the "great Russian language"? Why are they greater than the Ukrainian or Mongol or Turkish? Such terminology was unknown in the Bolshevik past.

This cultural reaction illumines Molotov's reference on May 31, 1939, to Czechoslovakia as the "large Slav nation." It was the first time a Soviet leader had used "Slav" in such a connection. The political climate in Moscow has grown different. Russianism and Slavism can breathe in it again. Russian expansion and Russian aggression flourish in that atmosphere.

Cultural retrogression, economic stagnation, and political blunders are all interlaced in the pattern of a dictatorship that has become personal. Stalin has sought to eliminate his opponents and every independent source of authority and popularity within the country. He is all-powerful. Yet in his might he is a failure, for socialism is a will-o'-the-wisp. Stalin cannot solve the problems of his country: he seizes other countries. In the same predicament Hitler and Mussolini behaved the same way. A dictator thinks he must have triumphs, and when they elude him at home he seeks them abroad.

FROM MADRID TO OBLIVION

From far and near I watched this evolution of the Soviet revolution with mounting concern. I aired my doubts to Russian, Spanish, and other friends. I never wrote or uttered a word of justification of the Soviet trials and purges. From 1936 on I ceased writing about Soviet internal affairs. While Moscow helped Spain and while the Soviet government was an active factor for world peace, I did not wish to attack the Soviet Union. I had hoped that in Spain Europe might be saved from the present war. It could have been if all the elements now backing Finland had helped struggling democratic Spain against foreign aggression. I had hoped that in Spain Russia would be saved from further reaction. During 1937 and 1938 I often said to Dr. Juan Negrín, the Loyalist Prime Minister, that the Spanish republic had a service to perform to Russia which was greater perhaps than the services Russia was performing for Spain. The Bolshevik ebb might have been reversed in Spain. Instead, Soviet Russia was probably lost there.

Fascism is the universal enemy of peace and decency. The Soviet government opposed fascism. I refrained from throwing stones at the Soviet government. British and French sins of appeasement which led to this war won Moscow many friends who never approved of the Kremlin dictatorship. Was I, an old friend, to become a public enemy? Spain and China were dear to millions outside their frontiers. These millions had a kindlier feeling for the Soviet Union. I imposed silence on myself. Then Stalin signed his pact with Hitler on August 23, 1939. When it came I recognized it immediately as the ugly fruit of the preceding years of unbolshevik acts within Russia and of the chasm between the will of the leaders and the spirit of the people. I did not have to wait for the invasion of Finland.

Because Spain was so important to the progressive, democratic world I believe it necessary to record that, with one exception, all the leading Soviet officials sent to Spain to help the Loyalists were executed or arrested after their return to Russia. Their names are:

General Goriev, the savior of Madrid—executed.

General Grishin, the first Soviet military chief of staff, who arrived in Madrid in October, 1936, a man of sixty, able, revered by the Spaniards—arrested. He was followed by General Grigorovich, who left Spain in the first half of 1938 to assume a high army post in the Soviet Far East. As Grigory M. Stern, his real name, he is now reported to be in command of a sector of the Finnish-Soviet front. He is the one exception.

General Maximov, Stern's successor in Spain, who helped direct the victorious Ebro offensive in the summer of 1938—arrested.

Marcel Rosenberg, first Soviet ambassador to Loyalist Spain—arrested.

Gaikis, his successor—arrested.

Stashevsky, the Soviet trade representative, an old Polish revolutionist, who not only arranged the Spanish purchases of Russian arms but was Negrín's friendly adviser on many economic problems—arrested.

Antonov Avseyenko, Soviet consul general in Catalonia, who led the assault on the Winter Palace in Petrograd in 1917—arrested.

Michail Koltsov, Pravda correspondent in Spain throughout the war, who had reported personally to Stalin and Voroshilov on Spanish conditions and on the behavior of Russians in Spain—arrested.

General Uritzky, of the Moscow War Office, in charge of arms shipments to the Loyalists—arrested.

No outsider knows what happened to most of these men after their imprisonment.

This purge of men to whom republican Spain owes a debt for big services was no more serious and costly, however, than the destruction of other rich Soviet military and civilian talent on a much larger scale. Thousands of fine young Soviet men are now paying for it in the Finnish war. But individuals do not count where only one individual counts.

[This is the concluding article of Mr. Fischer's series.]

Is Scandinavia Next?

The Anti-Nordic Germans

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

Oslo, December 26

A NAUSEATING comedy is ended—not a day too soon. With the publication of the cynical account of "Germany's Relations with the Northern Countries During the Past Twenty Years," released through the D. N. B., the official German news agency, on December 7, Nazi Germany threw off the Nordic mask it had worn far too long. The release was probably the most mendacious, ungrateful, and distorted statement that has yet come out of Dr. Goebbels's propaganda machine.

After the World War, when Germany was down and out, says Goebbels, it "waited in vain for some show of sympathy or effective moral support" from the Northern countries. What of the thousands of Wienerkinder, a term comprising both German and Austrian war orphans, who were rescued by generous Scandinavian foster-parents? What of the unending stream of Liebesgaben that poured into the Reich from the Northern countries both during and after the war? What of the hundreds of millions of kroner which those countries invested in the renascent economy of post-war Germany? To say nothing of the historical fact that it was thanks to essential supplies—both home products and transit goods—from Scandinavia that the German armies broke down only in 1918, instead of two years earlier; or of the equally historical fact that certain Northern countries, up to the summer of 1935, played an important role in the secret rearmament of the Reich.

Who was the unselfish, untiring porte-parole for ostracized Germany at Geneva, long before it was itself readmitted to the concert of civilized nations? Who, if not the Danish Foreign Minister, Dr. Munch, vetoed League sanctions against the Reich after each of Hitler's lawless coups? And did not the Swedish Academy year after year give German scientists much-needed cash and encouragement by granting a larger proportion of Nobel prizes to them than to the scientists of any other country?

The truth is that the Northern countries, out of a certain feeling of racial affinity and a great admiration for the true spirit of Germany, have stuck to it through thick and thin. None of them has ever been anti-German in any way. But they have, as one man, instinctively and uncompromisingly rejected the Nazi mentality, which is wholly incompatible with their own way of life and thought.

Now at last it has become unmistakably clear—as the best Germans have always known—that the spirit of Hitlerism, with its flaunted inhumanity and barbarism, with its degrading Kadaver-Gehorsam and Führer-Prinzip, is the exact antithesis of the truly Nordic element in the German national character. It was in keeping that the Nazis should finally turn against the true bearers of the Nordic spirit and tradition. As long as there exists a peaceful, democratic, prosperous Scandinavia, it will be by force of contrast a continual reproach to the Nazis. They may not relish the thought of Soviet air and naval bases dotting the "German lake" and they probably consider the Russian military operations rather bungled, but for all that they must feel a psychological relief at the prospect of the Northern eyesore at last meeting its fate.

The Swedes, except for a tiny minority of Nazi admirers, never dreamed of joining an anti-Soviet crusade, but neither did it ever occur to them that they might one day have the Red Army rolling up against their doorsteps, with Hitler, the Savior, and Göring, that great friend of Sweden, piously washing their hands. I wonder whether one could, the world over, find anyone more discountenanced these days than Sven Hedin, or the brothers General and Admiral de Champs, or Göring's brother-in-law, Count Erik von Rosen, or others of the disillusioned, disgusted advocates of the Reichsvereinigung Schweden-Deutschland.

I have read, in the course of years, a good many books and pamphlets by leading Swedish military writers discussing the strategic position of their country from every conceivable angle: in a war between Germany and Russia, between Britain and Russia, between Britain and Germany, between an Anglo-German combination and Russia. These, I repeat, were the "conceivable" cases. None brought the Swedish strategists to despair, for each of them was bound to create a certain balance of power in the Baltic, as far as Sweden was concerned.

And now the inconceivable has happened. With Stalin's troops endeavoring to drive through Finland to Sweden's frontiers, the entire German press trains its big guns on Sweden. There was no mistaking the sense of the Nazi campaign which led to the resignation of Foreign Minister Sandler of Sweden. It closely followed the pattern of the earlier assaults on Benes, Beck, and—by the Soviet press—Cajander. Whether it will abate now that the object of its wrath has disappeared, remains to be seen. But I doubt it. For it was not only Sandler's policy that irked the Nazis; it was Sweden's vigorously maintained neutrality.

Sweden committed the crime of rejecting a proffered commercial agreement with the Nazis that would have meant the discontinuation of all trade with the Allies and might have brought on war with them. It also had the insolence to protest when Nazi mine layers, a few weeks ago, proceeded to mine its territorial waters. It even went so far as to inquire in Berlin why and how long the Germans proposed to detain in their ports some 65,000 tons of Swedish shipping destined to neutral countries. Think of it! Gott strafe Schweden!

So Sweden now stands officially branded "unneutral." And with it Norway, which dared to release the City of Flint and carries on a lively trade with Britain. Denmark, thus far, is still in Hitler's good graces, but for how long? It made a hit when, alone of the four Northern countries, it signed last May a non-aggression pact with Germany. Finland's, Sweden's, and Norway's polite refusal to do so is now the Nazis' trump card against them.

No one can say whether the threats and abuse in the Nazi press will be followed by action. Shall we really see Hitler's Germany and Stalin's Russia jointly make a meal of Scandinavia, the erstwhile "quiet corner" of the world? If so, will Britain and France, will the United States, stand by? These questions, this anxiety, haunt everyone up here. But perhaps I should not voice them, for Scandinavia is neutral.

Sweden Prepares

BY MAURICE FELDMAN

SWEDEN'S foreign policy has always been one of diplomatic impartiality toward Russia and Germany. The whole Northern group of nations—Finland, Norway, Denmark, and Sweden—has been devoted to the principles of the League of Nations. As late as four weeks after the outbreak of the war in Europe a Swedish newspaper close to the government carried an enthusiastic hymn to Geneva. The disappointment over the League's failure was great in the Scandinavian countries, which had honestly and fervently believed in a world-wide union of free peoples. Since the war started, Sweden's foreign policy has been directed to establishing closer contacts with the so-called Oslo states, a group which includes Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, Holland, Belgium, and Luxembourg. The aim of Richard Sandler, until recently Swedish Foreign Minister, was to keep the Northern bloc out of the war under all circumstances and to maintain normal commercial relations with foreign countries. Sweden's exports of pulp, cellulose, iron ore, and machines are of vital importance to the national economy. Among the purchasers of its exports England comes first, Germany second, and the United States third. The chief export to the United States is cellulose, to England pulp, and to Germany iron ore. Swedish iron ore, considered the best in the world, is vitally important to Germany, especially in war time. Of the fifteen million tons produced yearly by the Grängesberg works at Kiruna in northern Sweden, not less than eight million tons goes to Germany. On the other hand, Swedish banks and financiers are bound up more closely with England and the United States than with Germany. The richest man in Sweden, Karl Axel Wenner-Gren, for instance, has his largest interests in England and the United States, and the connection of most Swedish banks, particularly of the Enskilda Bank, with the London City is very close. Commercial and financial relations with the Soviet Union are negligible.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The annexation of Finland by Soviet Russia would bring Sweden into the Russian sphere of influence. Simultaneously with the attacks on J. E. Erkko, the former Finnish Foreign Minister, the Russian radio broadcast threats against the Swedes. Russia's Dr. Goebbels, Andrey Zhdanov, said in a radio address on November 12: "Herr Sandler, the lackey of English-French imperialism, is encouraging the use of the so-called neutral states as tools against the interests of the Soviet Union. This social fascist gentleman [Sandler is a Social Democrat and has translated the works of Karl Marx into Swedish] is forcing Russia to go to war. We do not fear him or his bragging Finnish colleagues. They can learn something from Beck and Moscicki." Even more ominous were the negotiations between Molotov and the Swedish minister to Moscow, O. W. Winther, in which Russian threats were clearly implied. Ultimately, Russia will hardly be satisfied with control of Swedish foreign policy. It will demand important strategic territories, particularly the island of Gotland, Sweden's most important air base.

Since Sweden, like Finland, has no intention of meekly submitting to the Russians' demands, preparations for the defense of the country have been accelerated. Complete plans have been drawn up for the evacuation of Stockholm, which has a population of 560,000. Enough foodstuffs, raw materials, and gasoline have been stored to last two years. Sweden's chances of holding out are better than were Poland's or than Finland's seemed to be. I have talked to high Swedish officers and officials, and they are not at all pessimistic about the defense possibilities of their country. The Swedish air force is small; it probably consists of not more than 250 to 300 planes. And there is a scarcity of tanks. But in the Bofors works Sweden has one of the finest and most modern armament plants in the world. This concern, which employs 6,000 workers and is controlled by Wenner-Gren, makes first-class cannon and the famous 40-millimeter anti-aircraft guns, which are not surpassed by the product of any other gun factory in the world.

The Swedish army, when fully mobilized, has at the most 800,000 to 900,000 men, but it is well trained and equipped and would prove no mean foe for an invading army. Moreover, the Swedish defenders would have the advantage of the natural situation of the country. With a population of only 6,500,000, Sweden has almost as large an area as Germany. There are only eleven persons to a square kilometer. The industries are not concentrated in one area but stretch from Kiruna in Lapland, the seat of the iron-ore industry, to the rubber works of Trelleborg, the southernmost city in Sweden. Attacks from the air would have only widely scattered objects to shoot at. Enemy operations in the Baltic Sea would be greatly hampered by mine fields which the Swedes and Finns have laid since the war broke out. On land the great mountains in the north and the immense forests that cover the country would favor the defenders. An invading army would have great difficulty in maintaining its mobility and striking power.

The Swedes are fully aware that they and the other Scandinavian nations are bound up with Finland for better or worse. At a recent mass-meeting in Stockholm one of Sweden's leading military strategists, Lieutenant Colonel Magnus Dryssen, declared that an investigation by the Swedish Royal Defense Commission had shown that if the Finnish army were strengthened, it could block the Russian invasion for months. "Finland's, Sweden's, and Norway's independence," he said, "can only be safeguarded effectively if these three nations unite and defend themselves collectively. If Finland falls, and thereby also the Aaland Islands, the chances of a successful defense of the other Scandinavian countries will not be very great. The geographical situation of Sweden is such that the country cannot withstand a Russia which controls the Baltic, Finland, and the Aaland Islands." One of the leading anti-fascists and left-wing Socialists in Sweden, Dr. Alf Ahlberg, told the same audience that "he who does not fight for Finland has no right to call himself a Swede."

One of the most active workers for Finland is Dr. Georg Branting, the son of Hjalmar Branting, who founded the Swedish Social Democratic Party. Dr. Branting, an "extreme left-wing" Socialist and editor of the periodical Sovjetnytt (Soviet News), has completely broken with the Communists and is now heading the Swedish-Finnish Aid Committee. (During the Spanish civil war he was chairman of the International Aid Committee for Loyalist Spain.) With the formation of the new Swedish coalition government representing all parties, internal political differences are rapidly disappearing. On all sides there is genuine regret that Per Albin Hansson, the Prime Minister, found it necessary to replace Foreign Minister Sandler, who has always been extremely popular with the Swedish people and whose foreign policy had their full confidence. Sandler's successor, Christian de Günther, formerly minister to Norway, is a career diplomat without political affiliations. His appointment was presumably made to appease the Russians and Germans.

The Swedish people and their government know that the fate of their country will be decided in Finland. The recently concluded commercial treaty with England contains a clause which guarantees British help in case Sweden is attacked by Germany, but makes no mention of military assistance in the event of a Russian invasion. It is clear, then, why thousands of Swedish and Norwegian volunteers are flocking to Finland and enrolling in the Finnish army, and why Sweden and Norway are extending liberal help, officially and unofficially, to Finland. A "Nordic Corps" of 10,000 men is already on Finnish soil and a second corps of another 10,000 men is being organized. The new year finds a war at Sweden's door, and the shadow of Moscow falls on the land.

Twilight of the Chain Gang

BY WALTER WILSON

FOR half a century the South's penal system has been considered particularly cruel and degrading. Many writers have exposed the shocking conditions in the prisons and the brutalities of the chain gangs, and painted horrifying pictures of convicts tortured in steel cages, flogged to death, or making desperate efforts to escape, pursued by bloodhounds and men with shotguns. Recently, however, we have been told that extensive reforms have been introduced, and the South has challenged its critics to revise their judgments. The Jacksonville Times-Union, for example, not long ago invited "those penmen who have berated this section of the country to ply their trade with equal assiduity in heralding the improvement of conditions in convict camps."

I have myself frequently protested against conditions in Southern prisons, and when I heard it asserted that a major transformation had been effected, I decided to investigate. I went to the chain-gang country, made a personal survey, and discovered that since 1933, and chiefly since 1936, the South has made definite progress toward a more humane and intelligent penal system. To appreciate the reforms accomplished, one must recall the conditions that had persisted almost without change since the close of the Civil War. The men who at that time established the penal system for the Southern states were less interested in setting up machinery for the administration of justice and the protection of society from crime than in obtaining a reservoir of quasi-slaves and a weapon for terrorizing freedmen and poor whites. Under the system they devised the services of convicts were leased to private employers. Planters and business men went to the prisons and after signing a so-called contract drove the convicts away in chains as if they were work animals. They then worked them, starved them, flogged them, or even killed them as they saw fit. This lease system was not finally eradicated from its last stronghold in the mines of Alabama until 1927.

After abolition of the private lease the local governments took over the machinery of justice, but proved only slightly more humane. The sufferings endured by prisoners under county authorities were strikingly exposed a few years ago by the book and the movie "I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang."

More recently Southern prison officials have been proving receptive to the modern idea that terror neither deters men from crime nor maintains prison discipline. The degrading punishments of the road gang are on their way out. Chains and shackles are being eliminated. In North Carolina, for example, only 2 per cent of the prisoners wear shackles. Georgia has announced that all "maximum-security" men will be kept inside the walls of the new central penitentiary at Reidsville, and that men in the camps outside will not be required to wear stripes, chains, or shackles. Tennessee and Kentucky have recently joined the states which have made flogging illegal. A few other states, while retaining statutes legalizing the lash, have taken practical steps to end its use. The present penal administration in Alabama has announced that under no circumstances will wardens be allowed to whip prisoners. The new head of the Texas Prison Board, Dr. Sidney M. Lister, has suspended the "bat" (lash) in his state for two years. Dr. Lister says he is confident that he can demonstrate by the improved morale of the prisoners that corporal punishment is unnecessary.

In accordance with the practice in progressive prisons elsewhere, the South is adopting solitary confinement on restricted diet as the chief means of maintaining discipline. Tennessee and North Carolina rely almost entirely on this method. Georgia adopted it in March, 1937, and at the same time abolished the stocks. Among the noticeable effects of the change are improved discipline and fewer attempted escapes.

Today in many Southern prisons a majority of the inmates are better housed, fed, and hospitalized than they were in their poverty-stricken homes. By the end of this year North Carolina, with the aid of federal funds, will have completed its task of putting all its prisoners in modern camps. Alabama, except in a half-dozen camps, has an excellent system of prison housing. Georgia has some modern camps, and this classic chain-gang state has completed the most important single housing development in the whole section in its new $2,000,000 prison plant at Reidsville. Most of the camps are permanent, fire-proof structures designed to accommodate from 75 to 100 prisoners. They are usually surrounded by a high wire fence inclosing generous outdoor space. In the corner of the yard is a small hospital unit equipped with first-aid and other medical supplies. All camps have hot and cold water, and most of them modern plumbing. Several that I visited last summer even had air-conditioned dining-rooms.

Up to a few years ago such factors as the prisoner's age, previous record, home environment, employment experience, education, type of crime for which he was convicted, and prospects of rehabilitation were not considered important. Today in several Southern states the prison authorities are trying to build up files of information about each prisoner, to provide suitable employment for him, and to establish separate camps for the various classes—misdemeanants, felons, first offenders, recidivists, young offenders, women. Classification work has been going on in North Carolina, the first state to undertake it, since 1935. The Work Projects Administration has been cooperating with the state of Georgia in setting up a model classification department in the new Reidsville Prison, which is to be the receiving prison for the whole state. Alabama has just added two new wings to Kilby Prison to house the classification department. This state has already established a camp for misdemeanants near Montgomery, and the new Draper Prison at Speigner is exclusively for young men and first offenders.

Another feature of the new prison technique is the emphasis upon education, recreation, and vocational training for convicts. Most of the central prisons and practically all of the camps built within the past six years have rest rooms and recreation yards, and many provide competitive sports. Last summer I witnessed a rousing good baseball game between the central prison and the camp for young offenders, under twenty-one, outside Raleigh, North Carolina. Baseball teams, bands, and show troupes from Texas prisons hold a jamboree and rodeo at Huntsville each fall. This affair is open to visitors, and the considerable gate receipts are a major source of income for the general recreation fund.

If complaints against the old whipping bosses are no longer heard, wardens are occasionally accused of "coddling convicts" by providing not only exercise and recreation but schooling. In several states illiterate prisoners are required to attend classes—hardly a fourth of Southern convicts can read even road signs, and very few have reached the sixth grade. Two or three states have gone farther. Texas, for instance, while making classes compulsory for illiterates only, offers inducement to others by giving them five "good-time" days a month for attending. A class in shop mechanics is open to Texas prisoners, and a course in English has been established for those who wish to learn the printing trade.

In the South, as in other parts of the country, a good start has been made toward abolishing the few old industries chosen for their profit and toward installing a variety of new ones which fit a man to earn a living. Among these industries are cotton-textile manufacturing, cotton-seed-oil extracting, printing, automobile-plate manufacturing, machine shops, electrical work, tanneries, tailoring, and shoe-repairing. They employ prisoners who work inside from choice or experience or because they require maximum-security confinement. Road work and agriculture are the chief occupations outside the prison walls. Some attention is being given to teaching modern methods of farming. Many prisoners, in consequence, will come out better equipped to wrest a livelihood from the soil than most of their neighbors. In Alabama the farming program is being planned, says Bruce Airey of the State Classification Division, "with the idea of giving much of the scientific agricultural training provided in the state agricultural schools." In one Alabama prison the inmates are experimenting with silk-worm culture.

Another new development in the South is the effort being made to rehabilitate criminals through probation and parole. Francis Hiller, field secretary of the National Probation Association, told me that public interest in the improvement of probation and parole during the past three or four years has been more marked in the South than in any other part of the country. North Carolina's parole system is listed among the nation's ten best by the United States Attorney's office. Amendments to Alabama's constitution overwhelmingly voted last July permit the establishment of a parole and probation set-up which can be entirely divorced from politics.

Without a trained, well-paid personnel attempts at prison reform must fail in the long run. Despite many difficulties, not the least of which is the poverty of the South, progress is being made in this respect. Governor Rivers of Georgia proposes to establish six weeks' training courses for the present wardens and guards along the lines of the New York program, and experts have already been obtained from the federal penitentiary in Atlanta to train the personnel at the big Reidsville Prison For all future appointments the Governor recommends the merit system.

For the first time since the Civil War Southern prison officials are visiting and studying prisons in other parts of the country. Also for the first time since the Civil War "outsiders" are being sought as allies. The United States Prison Industries Reorganization Administration (P. I. R. A.) was asked by nine Southern governors to send experts to survey conditions in their prisons and to offer recommendations for improving them. The invitations were accepted, and the P. I. R. A. has received credit for many of the subsequent reforms.

Much more, of course, will have to be done before Southern prisons measure up to the best penal institutions in such states as Wisconsin, New York, Massachusetts, and New Jersey. Flogging, while resorted to infrequently, is still legal in a few states. Often the prisoner is released after serving his time as hopeless as Jean Valjean, with barely enough clothing to cover his nakedness and with no prospects of employment. The "county-rights" political system prevents uniform standards in penal methods. (Both North Carolina and Alabama have recently placed all convicts under centralized control, and a few Georgia counties have relinquished their prisoners to the state.) Too few educational opportunities are offered; prisoners are worked too hard and much too long; and in certain prisons the personnel is still made up of brutal, ignorant bullies. Probation and parole work needs expansion; classification work should be extended.

Enlightened Southerners do not attempt to hide these conditions. Rather they are showing a willingness to probe deeply into the social and economic injustices which underly the prison problem. They recognize the connection between the poverty of the South and the fact that its prison population is from five to eight times greater in proportion to the general population than is the case in other sections of the country.Southern groups have published the fact that Alabama in 1937 had 201 prison commitments per 100,000 as against New York's 24. Progressive thinkers are insisting that the question of prison reform cannot be isolated. Tarleton Collier, Atlanta newspaper columnist and expert on Georgia prisons, said recently, "We may remake Georgia by remaking our penal system." Connected with it, he declared, are "youth problems, political problems, problems of court procedure, of equal opportunities and equal justice."

In the Wind

FOR A GOOD many months American radio networks have been trying to arrange regular broadcasts from Moscow comparable to those now heard from Paris, London, and Berlin. After long and futile effort one of the major networks recently telephoned Ambassador Oumansky for help. "Officially," retorted Oumansky, "write me a letter. Confidentially, it won't do any good."

LIFE RECENTLY devoted a three-page spread to Florence Linden, who has been lecturing for several years on the etiquette of cigarette smoking under the auspices of the Philip Morris Company. The Life spread, which should have been a Philip Morris publicity man's dream, showed Miss Linden carefully opening a package of Lucky Strikes.

LEADING AMERICAN newspapers—among others the New York Times and Herald Tribune, the Philadelphia Inquirer, and the Washington Post—have been carrying large unsigned ads extolling French gloves, French champagne, French fashions—and "France, Land of Liberty." None of the ads give any hint of their sponsorship. It has been learned that they originated in Paris, in the offices of the Havas Agency, official French news and advertising agency, and were placed in this country through Joshua B. Powers and Company, Paris space representatives of the Times. The outlay was $30,000.

THE BROOKLYN Church and Mission Federation recently adopted a stinging resolution denouncing the Christian Front. The resolution was posted in church lobbies throughout the city. A few Sundays ago, while church services were in progress, the resolutions were quietly removed from all the bulletin boards, neatly folded, and placed on a table in the lobby.

DIPLOMATIC NOTE: Commenting on rumors of a possible Nazi invasion of Holland or Belgium, Major General Oba, military expert for the Japanese Mainichi, wrote cryptically: "In view of Adolf Hitler's assurances that the neutrality of Belgium and Holland will be respected, it is premature to judge at this moment whether or not Germany really means to advance her troops to those two countries near the English Channel."

THE REPORT of the American Civil Liberties Union on the Dies committee has been held up and the first draft is being overhauled because some of the Union's executive-board members think it's too gentle. . . . A group of professors at the Catholic University Law School in Washington is preparing a "brief" charging Father Coughlin with violations of canon law. . . . John Brophy, C. I. O. leader most often accused of Stalinist leanings, has become bitterly anti-Communist since the signing of the Moscow-Berlin pact.

A JAPANESE DIPLOMAT was asked recently whether he thought his nation would ultimately enter the war on Germany's side. "I doubt it," he replied slowly, "the custom of hara-kiri seems to be definitely dying out in my country."

A QUIET BOOST for French Communists appears in "Facts in Review," a Nazi propaganda leaflet periodically issued by the Germany Library of Information. The item runs: "Humanité, leading Communist newspaper in France, has been suppressed but it manages to appear, nevertheless, in mimeographed editions. When a Communist textile syndicate in Lyons was dissolved, Humanité was not published because police confiscated its mimeograph. The next day, however, the paper appeared again with the heading: 'Humanité Officially Confiscated.' "

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Burlingame, Cal.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

AGAIN the President has demanded of Congress increased appropriations for army and navy. He asks $271,999,523 more in this fiscal year "for the proper observance, safeguarding, and enforcing of the neutrality of the United States and the strengthening of national defense." The total for the two defense services in the budget for 1940-41 is the enormous sum of $1,800,000,000. I presume that we may take the Kansas City Star's comment, that "the national-defense statement was reasonable," as representing the average opinion of it. Yet it was not reasonable, for all army and navy appropriations are unreasonable as long as they are not based upon a thorough study of the problems of national defense and a clear understanding of the possible enemies of the United States by whom it could conceivably be attacked. I know that there is less need of great defense expenditures today than there has been for many years. It is gratifying to note the number of Congressmen who are demanding an accounting of these items.

I have not just come from the belligerent European nations without knowing that they are far less able to attack the United States today than they were when war came in September, and that the last thing they are thinking about is attempting it. Even if Hitler should win this war, Europe would be prostrate for years, and a victorious Hitler would be surrounded by enemies who would welcome his getting embroiled in a war with the United States. I asked a British major general in London just before I left whether he had ever heard of a European military or naval officer who thought that an attack upon the United States in any form was feasible. "Preposterous," he said, "absolutely preposterous and impossible. No one dreams of such a thing." This officer has been stationed in the United States and knows our military conditions and our chief military leaders.

Since I have been for years demanding that calm logic and not hysteria should control our military policy, I was delighted lately to receive additional support for the proposal I advanced in my little book "Our Military Chaos" that there should be an immediate inquiry by an unbiased group, preferably civilian and non-Congressional, into just what dangers, if any, confront us. Thus, General Hugh Johnson, while saying that he cannot support many of my conclusions, strongly urges my principal recommendation, "which is that we need an impartial, non-partisan, extra-governmental commission to look into this question." He cites General Marshall, Chief of Staff, as having just said that in spite of the billions we have lavished on the War Department our defense is not 25 per cent effective. General Marshall charges this to the historians of the United States, who, he says, have always represented us as being victorious in our wars and have failed to record our defeats. But General Johnson points out that there are other culprits. He says: "I would shudder to see a careful compilation of comparative unit costs—per soldier or per ton of shipping—as between our own and the armies and navies of all other nations. It would shock the country." He concludes: "A commission of inquiry is imperative. If it finds that this column and Mr. Villard's book are wrong, it will be a splendid vindication which I, for one, would welcome. If it finds that we are only partly right, the country ought to know it."

Writing in the New York Herald Tribune, Major George Fielding Eliot, who approaches the problem from a different point of view than mine, said on January 4: "It is plain that we cannot continue as in the past making plans for defense without some definite idea of what we are going to defend; the army and navy cannot decide what they need until they know what they are going to have to do with it. The point is well taken that the major decision of this sort which now confronts us is whether we are going to prepare for the defense of the Western Hemisphere, or whether we are going to plan for military adventures overseas." But Major Eliot desires a permanent Committee of National Defense with Congressional representation to study particular problems, to straighten out our "tangled defense scheme," and to command "a greater degree of public confidence when heavy expenditures are called for." I still feel that the first inquiry should come from an absolutely independent commission without Congressional or military or naval members, since these are bound to be biased if only by reason of their training.

It is quite characteristic of President Roosevelt that his new budget shows an increase only for national defense. He does not succeed in justifying it; he could not if he would justify the increases in the army and navy and coast guard which he ordered at the outbreak of the war, an action which struck foreign observers—I was in England at the time—as absurd and inexplicable. He cannot justify the 300-mile safety zone around the Americas, which is utterly impracticable and ridiculous. Does he expect British and German warships which may begin an action 302 miles from us to stop fighting when they cross the 300-mile line?

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Icon and the Portrait

THE LAST FLOWER. By James Thurber. Harper and Brothers. $2.

ABOUT PEOPLE. By William Steig. Random House. $2.50.

THERE has always been a competition in the visual arts between iconography and portraiture, the symbolic and the unique, the God and the mortal. In the great periods of Italian and German art, that is, up to the middle of the sixteenth century, these two elements coexisted in a fruitful tension and equilibrium. Not only was it possible, for instance, to use realistic portraits of models for icons in religious pictures, but also the relation of man to the rest of nature, of the spiritual to the temporal was never in doubt; witness the elaborate and significant, almost surrealist landscapes in such painting.

For a whole complex of reasons, psychological, political, and economic, this equilibrium was destroyed. The main current of painting confined itself more and more to portraiture, whether of people or still life, and iconography was relegated to the cartoon, which, the genius of Goya and Daumier notwithstanding, wore a slightly disreputable air, as if it had to apologize for not being noble or serious.

In recent years, however, iconography has begun to recover its prestige; the interest in child art, Negro sculpture, and doodling, the popularity of Disney and Thurber are evidences of this. Yet a synthesis of icon and portrait is still far off. The former remains non-representational, the latter accidental. It would be as impertinent as it is unnecessary for me to praise Mr. Thurber's work; everyone knows and loves it. All I can do is to point out what I believe to be certain deficiencies common both to him as an artist and to us all as people.

The spiritual father of the tradition to which both Mr. Thurber and Mr. Steig belong is Edward Lear, that remarkable artist who supplemented what he thought of as his serious work, his realistic pre-Raphaelite landscapes, with scribbled diagrams of his inner life. To Lear as to Thurber after him, the icon is the average non-political man of an industrialized society—who is surprisingly the same in Park Avenue and the Bowery—the person who in large enough numbers makes up what the damned refer to as the Masses. The popularity of their work with all classes indicates that such an icon is a valid one for our present stage of culture.

Is it not, then, a little disconcerting to find how little of life has today any iconographic significance, that is, seems both universal and capable of inspiring reverence and love? Not only landscape but the human figure itself has to be reduced to the barest outline—even sexual differences almost disappear. All detail, all portraiture belong to the world of the enemy, those unpleasant and powerful forces which Lear called "They" and Thurber calls the Liberators, the world whose art is the realistic bosh of society portraits and statues representing the workers of tomorrow. The realm of modern freedom is indeed limited.

"The Last Flower" is a parable about social life. Their amenities destroyed by war, deserted even by their dogs, down to their last flower, a young man and woman rediscover sex; society is rebuilt; back come the dogs and the politicians and war; and the cycle begins all over again. This is at once both too pessimistic and not pessimistic enough. It suggests (1) that all politicians are equally evil, and (2) that all lovers are without error. But the public and the private life are not so distinct. If all politicians do evil, yet no lover is innocent, and there are better and worse politicians just as there are better and worse lovers. Mr. Thurber's heresy is particularly dangerous because it flatters our conceit; every reader will call the lovers Me and My Girl, while he will equally naturally call the Liberators Mr. R or Mr. H.

This is where Mr. Steig comes in. When Mr. Thurber has debunked the Liberators, Mr. Steig carries on by debunking the lovers. If "About People" makes others as uncomfortable as it makes me, I'm afraid Mr. Steig will not become widely popular; for he is unequivocally pessimistic: the only virtue he grants the human species is a capacity to perceive and laugh at its folly. Though this is, I believe, too negative to be an adequate response to life—a sense of humor is rarely without an element of fear—it is an indispensable preliminary. We shall never earn the right to lift our heads till we have learned to hang them.

Nor is it, I hope, merely fanciful, to connect this politico-ethical problem of our thinking and conduct with the artistic problem of how to combine the icon and the portrait. Just as we have still to discover the proper relations of the private and public life, so the inward-looking artist has to unlearn his puritanical distrust of matter, and the outward-looking his crude faith in the kingdoms of this world. Logos and Eros have yet to be reconciled in a new Agape.

W. H. AUDEN

Army Without Banners

NO ARMS, NO ARMOUR. By Robert Henriques. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

THE British army in peace time, without benefit of Fuzzy-wuzzy charges or even Boches dumping grenades into trenches—that is the unusual background for the All-Nations Prize Novel Competition winner, written by a thirty-four-year-old major of artillery. Instead of exploiting the easy glamour of martial pageantry, Major Henriques studies his army, particularly the under-officer class—lieutenants to majors—merely as a human organization which, through its detachment from ordinary human relationships, accentuates the strength or weakness of each of its members: which either strips them of all individuality, stamping them in the sub-human mold of Soldier, or forces them to grow a philosophical shell of skepticism or blind faith or cheerio-carry-on flippancy. Anything to integrate the relentless mechanism of army life with a thinking man's sense of personal existence; anything to forge an armor against life. There is Sammy, the major, who fortifies himself with a glowing faith in human potentialities that endears him to his subordinates but effectively bars him from further advancement; he is killed in a brief skirmish in Africa—the only fighting that occurs in the book. There is "Daddy" Watson, an embittered cynic with a penchant for proselyting and whiskey, whose armor is his conviction that nothing good is to be expected. But chiefly there is Tubby Windrush, a polo-playing young lieutenant with money and a good family name, public school and all that, a typical Richard Aldington hero at his first appearance but redeemed by a mind that soon begins stirring and groping after some sort of truth. Under the tutelage of Sammy and Daddy, under the stress of physical pain after a steeplechase smash-up, and finally under the supreme test of solitude, he forges his own spiritual armor.

Major Henriques is not an especially polished writer, and some of his asides could well be dispensed with, but he has unquestionably lived his material, and his people have a three-dimensional solidity which thoroughly vitalizes the story. There is philosophizing, it is true, but there are also quarrels, loves, courts martial, automobile accidents, and treks through the desert. And strangely enough, even an army, as an army, has a certain personality, which perhaps expresses itself more in peace time than in war. I should like to see someone equally well qualified make a similar novel out of the American military. LOUIS B. SALOMON

Two Crises in One

THE CATHOLIC CRISIS. By George Seldes. Julian Messner. $3.

WHICH WAY, DEMOCRACY? By Wilfred Parsons, S. J. The Macmillan Company. $2.

GEORGE SELDES would have been at home with S. S. McClure or the elder Pulitzer. He is handicapped in a period when the popular magazines are slick, the newspapers leashed and house-broken. "The Catholic Crisis," like most of Seldes's books, is a one-man journalistic campaign which has had to be conducted in the uncongenial sedateness of book covers. He could hardly have picked a more explosive subject. Cardinal Manning once said that the future of the church lies in America, but more and more people are beginning to doubt that the future of America lies in the church. Hilaire Belloc predicted "the necessary conflict between the civil state and the Catholic church" in this country, and Seldes reviews the factors that are laying the basis for a conflict, though it is still far from inescapable. The attempt to muzzle the press in favor of Franco during the Spanish civil war, the part played by the hierarchy in the fight against the Child-Labor Amendment, the increasing power over the movies wielded by aesthetically illiterate and politically reactionary Catholics, the strong support given by Catholics to Hague as "an American Duplessis," and the poison broadcast by Coughlin are bringing an American anti-clericalism into being. True, one will find little if any reference to these matters in a cowed press, but recent elections have shown that the newspapers are not necessarily an index of what people are thinking.

Seldes is not a Catholic-baiter. He has written no one-sided attack. He is generous in his presentation of what Catholics, cleric and lay, are doing on the left as well as the right. His earlier "The Vatican—Yesterday, Today, Tomorrow" showed that he could handle a Catholic subject temperately and fairly; it became a Catholic Book-of-the-Month selection. This one deserves to be, if only to give progressive Catholics a picture of what liberals of their faith are doing. It was a Catholic, John Longo, who went to jail in the fight against Hague. It was a Jesuit priest, Father Charles of the Jesuit faculty of theology at Louvain, who traced the notorious Protocols back to their illegitimate origin. The Gallup poll showed that despite the heat turned on by church propagandists, one-third of American Catholics were for neither side in the Spanish struggle, and that of the remainder actually 42 per cent were for the Loyalists.

If "The Catholic Crisis" leaves one puzzled and dismayed, the fault is not the author's. Under the broad roof of an institution based on dogma infallibly expounded there seem to exist the most bewildering inconsistency and diversity of opinion. In Rome, where the shadow of the fasces falls on the cross, the Pope attacks racism. But in America the chief disseminator of anti-Semitism is a Catholic priest. The late Pius XI regarded events in the Reich "mit brennender Sorge," but the Bund cheers and the Völkischer Beobachter applauds the Nazi apologetics of Coughlin. Like most large organizations the church seems better at hindsight than foresight. Father Parsons in "Which Way, Democracy?" can see clearly now that "in France the Royalist politicians kept Catholics for two generations from the ralliement to the republic to which Leo XIII had called them, on the ground that the republic was a persecuting state." He declines to see that the separation of church and state decreed by the French republic differed little from that attempted by the Spanish, or that Franco and his foreign allies used the church in Spain as the Royalists did in France. He can write, "In Spain the alliance of the clergy with the landowning nobles and the conservative politicians was largely the cause of the growth of a large church-hating proletariat." Yet he still sees the Franco revolt as "a struggle of liberation in Spain from a red tyranny" and the non-intervention committee as "a delightful piece of double-dealing."

"Which Way, Democracy?" is the best answer to critics of "The Catholic Crisis." The former editor-in-chief of the weekly America is an outstanding Jesuit publicist. He writes with distinction. He is not a Catholic Liberty Leaguer. He quotes with approval the late Cardinal Mundelein's condemnation of employers who use the cry of communism as a cloak for social injustice. He has the same innate fondness for communism that the late Billy Sunday had for his old sparring partner, the devil. "It has," he says, "everything the true religion has, except God." He puts an arm around the freethinker Jefferson and claims a Jesuit origin for the ideas in the Declaration of Independence. But no Catholic can read "Which Way, Democracy?" without feeling that democracy's probable course is to perdition, that this country was never intended to be democratic, that racial inequality is not incompatible with democracy, that fascism has many virtues, that the best form of government is probably the corporate state, and that this exists in its most ideal form in Portugal—"such a state can preserve liberty in all its essentials as well as a democracy of the old model. In fact, in the presence of an enlightened public opinion, it might preserve it much better." If democracy really originated with Jesuit thinkers, it seems odd that Father Parsons, himself of the society, is so ready to abandon it.

Characteristically equivocal is his attitude toward the Jews; he is against racism, but hints darkly of horrible things in the Talmud. The Catholic attitude, he feels, is to treat the Jew justly but deprive him "of power to harm." Revealing is his discovery that "it is significant that it was not until Christendom had broken up and seemed to be on the verge of dissolution about the time of the French Revolution that the Jews achieved final emancipation in Europe." Herr Rosenberg says the same thing, though not in gentle innuendo. Father Parsons, like so many Catholic thinkers, agrees with the fascists in a hatred for 1789. But can one be against 1789 and for 1776?

I. F. STONE

Norris of Nebraska

DEMOCRACY'S NORRIS. By Alfred Lief. Stackpole Sons. $3.50.

SENATOR NORRIS of Nebraska recently made some caustic remarks about the peculiar financing of an electric company, a subsidiary of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, the sprawling holding company over which Wendell Willkie so wordily presides. Instantly there was a great to-do. Arthur Krock in his Washington column in the New York Times muttered ominously of a "conspiracy." The New York Herald Tribune cried aloud. "Old Iron Pants" Hugh Johnson moved into action by suggesting at a New York dinner of bond peddlers that Wendell Willkie might be a good man for the Republican nomination for the Presidency, a suggestion, by the way, to which Mr. Krock refers wistfully every now and then. Mr. Willkie upon being interviewed allowed Wendell was willin'.

All of which must have caused the senior Senator from Nebraska to chuckle dryly. On July 11 next George William Norris will be seventy-eight years old. In 1913 he spoke in the Senate, to which he had been elected for the first time, in favor of a bill authorizing San Francisco to build a reservoir in the Hetch-Hetchy Valley from which water and power might be taken for the use of the people. The discovery that Norris is a conspirator is thus a bit belated. All through his Senatorial career he has indulged in an Open Conspiracy, to use a Wellsian term. It is the conspiracy of the people of the United States to get back their government and natural resources. Norris was tackling the light and power nabobs when Sam Insull was a petty clerk and Merlin Aylesworth was taking his first lessons in the magic art of making the public pay.

Not until he is well into the seventh chapter, in which he describes Norris's pioneer grapplings with the power gang, does the author of this 548-page biography of Norris really begin to march. Up to the time that Norris enters the Senate, Mr. Lief's is a slow-paced journey filled with the rustling of yellowed newspaper clips. The evidences of the author's laborious researches into the rise of Norris are weighted down with a lifeless style. Indeed, he makes young Norris something of a self-centered careerist and thus fails to prepare us for that display of stiff-necked independence which Norris was to put on in his leadership of the House insurgents against the tyranny of Speaker Cannon. This is too bad because the insurgent movement was no sudden flare-up over committee appointments and House rules. It was the articulation of the hatred of an indigenously radical West for the raw tactics of the finance capitalists back of Cannon. The fight can be and should have been traced back to the grass roots of Populism, the agrarian revolt, and the rise of the Socialists. Ironically enough, Norris's first major victory was over Ashton C. Shallenberger, who had been sent to Congress by left-wing Democrats, Populists, and Silver Republicans. When Norris took Shallenberger's place in 1902, he was forty-one years old, a judge known for the severity of his sentences, who had been a successful lawyer for the Burlington and Missouri Railroad and was then an active member of Beaver City Lodge, F. A. and A. M., Miriam Chapter of the Royal Arch Masons, Commander of the Knights Templar and of the Scottish Rite and Seostris Temple. An unlikely leader indeed for the embattled farmers, small shopkeepers, and industrial workers in their fight against Wall Street's political brokers.

Forces which Mr. Lief somehow ignores put George Norris into the struggle on the people's side, and the lack of an adequate description of those forces leaves a great gap in this biography. Instead of devoting pages to details of Norris's early Congressional campaigns, the author might have given us at least a hint as to the passions that stirred the men of the prairies in the first decade of this century.

No lack of background material or faults of style, however, can detract from the story of Norris's struggle against the power trust. It is by all odds the most exciting saga of the under-dog that our generation knows. It is all there in Mr. Lief's book for those who are today wavering in their faith in the democratic processes to ponder well. You come away from this book with a renewed respect for the sheer persistence of the stocky man from the sticks, standing up in an almost empty Senate chamber year after year doing battle with the united front of greed, hypocrisy, and double-dealing; and at the end winning the glorious victory that is symbolized by the concrete dams and falling waters in the Tennessee Valley. During the black days preceding our entrance into the war, which he so gallantly opposed, Norris remarked, "The people of the United States are not thinking about water power now. We are thinking about militarism." And Mr. Lief adds that the people "could be robbed of their rights without knowing it for a long, long time."

Today with the hoarse shouting of the strategists of World War II ringing in our collective ears, we are lucky to have George Norris around to remind us that the robbers of our rights—civil, economic, and political—are fixing for another killing right here at home, while we are worrying about Bessarabia, Iran, and points east.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

Coming soon in The Nation
What Next on the Left?
Two articles reexamining Marxism and pointing the way to a democratic collectivism
BY LEWIS COREY

Men of the Confederacy

STATESMEN OF THE LOST CAUSE: JEFFERSON DAVIS AND HIS CABINET. By Burton J. Hendrick. Little, Brown and Company. $3.75.

IN THIS clear and conscientious re-creation of the leading political figures of the Confederacy Mr. Hendrick, author of "The Lees of Virginia" and other works, subjects the legend of the gallant fight against overwhelming odds to a calm, if not strictly impartial, analysis. In admiration of the valor and military genius of the leaders in the field, as in obeisance before the Tidewater aristocracy, this Connecticut Yankee yields to no Southerner. But where other historians have sought the explanation of defeat in economic causes, Mr. Hendrick finds it in the political.

> Had the Confederacy, at the beginning, husbanded its great material asset—cotton—and thus built a solid financial and economic structure; had it rigidly enforced conscription, overridden opposition by suspending habeas corpus and martial law in such places as the circumstances made necessary; had it regulated its abundant food supplies and intelligently applied them to the support of the army and the civilian population, the war might have reached a different end. It did all these things deprecatingly and piecemeal. The enemy that faced it on every front was more than the armed forces of the Federal Union; it was that doctrine of state rights that led to secession and then, when adapted to the Confederacy itself, destroyed its vitality and made useless the splendid exertions of its ably led military forces.

The burning of Atlanta, for example, he shows to have been largely due to the defiance of the Confederate government by the governor of Georgia, who first enrolled every possible able-bodied man in the militia and then refused to place it at the disposal of the Secretary of War, to whom he dispatched, while Sherman was ravaging his state, long constitutional arguments probably composed for him by the Vice-President of the Confederacy himself.

Mr. Hendrick's thesis is important and clarifying, and his presentation of it enlighteningly concrete. The facts which he fuses into one coherent historical narrative are not new to Southerners, though it may take a Northern historian to present them in their full significance. Anyone with a Confederate upbringing can tell Mr. Hendrick that any sympathy felt for Jefferson Davis on the part of Southerners of the old school was due to his treatment at the hands of the North after the war and not to approval of the conduct of the Confederate government. Mr. Hendrick's facts are not new; neither are they the whole story. He greatly underestimates the seriousness of the South's inferiority in industrial development in the first really "totalitarian" war to take place under modern conditions. He does not touch upon the inefficiency of slave labor in times of dislocation of normal routine. And then there are what we should now call the "imponderables." His explanation of the comparative ineptitude of the political leaders by the fact that "the new-rich Southwest contributed the political leaders, the old traditional South the military captains" is too simple. As Mr. Hendrick himself brings out, several of the former were very able men and not of Southern origin at all. (When he remarks that four of the five Confederate generals who won world fame were Virginians, it is tempting to point out that the fifth he mentions, Longstreet, is generally credited in the South with losing the Battle of Gettysburg.)

This is both a fascinating and a needed book; its author shows himself a more than able historian and biographer. Had he not three times won a Pulitzer Prize, it would not be necessary to call attention to defects of style and even of grammar: "President Buchanan sufficiently regarded his diplomatic talents as to offer him the Ministership to Spain"; "His successor, Robert M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, brought to the office a man who had served alongside Davis in the United States Senate." These are fairly typical instances. "A veracious [for "veritable"] 'cavalier' " is an unusually bad slip.

JAMES ORRICK

The Viscera of the Power Process

SWORDS AND SYMBOLS: THE TECHNIQUE OF SOVEREIGNTY. By James Marshall. Oxford University Press. $2.

IN THE field of legal and political science also, in recent years, the shift from the institutional to the functional and psychological approach has become so much a fashion that one begins to wonder why former periods have been so blind as not to see the awful truth revealed to us by modern social psychologists. A Freudian hue affects methods and material. This school no longer takes anything for granted, even at the risk of becoming at times trivial and crashing lustily into wide-open doors. Mr. Marshall's interesting treatise, stemming to all appearances from the intellectual climate of Thurman Arnold's brilliant efforts to lay bare the subconscious of our political and social existence, tries to dismantle sovereignty, the colossus with the feet of clay as he and others seem to believe.

It is another of the endless variations on an old theme. What is political power; how is it operated; what is the power process? But this last attack on sovereignty fails to get closer to the core of the matter than its predecessors because the author, an accomplished lawyer, fails to distinguish between sovereignty as a legal and as a politico-social concept.

The main theme is that sovereignty, "the aggregate of powers possessed by the rulers of a society," is not absolute as the lawyers contend, but limited at least by latent custom and passive resistance emanating from the habits of the people, which prove to be unsurmountable obstacles to arbitrariness in absolute power. There is nothing new in this statement, well taken care of already by Aristotle, Hobbes, and Austin, although the great absolutists or monists of political power could not foresee the new power techniques of compulsory acquiescence through propaganda and coercion in modern totalitarian states. But the lawyer looks at sovereignty from a different angle. In every well-ordered community which deserves the name of a state there must be an ultimate power of decision if anarchy is to be avoided. The author, startled as many before him by this inherent contradiction in concept and practice of sovereignty, identifies sovereignty as an abstract norm of jurisdiction and as the power situation or power relationship. Had he taken sovereignty as a condensed formula, or as a symbol familiar both to lawyers and mathematicians, he would have been led to the conclusion that it is merely a working hypothesis for centering the ultimate power of decision in a definite person, organ, group, or class. Some of the best minds of the last generation have tried in vain to dethrone sovereignty. No one has succeeded in refuting Austin, who by depersonalizing sovereignty established it permanently. Society is not the objective for the sovereign power, but the latter is the inescapable result of organized society.

With these reservations the book, replete with erudite quotations and beautifully written, provides a remarkably clear and penetrating inventory of the forces determining political action and a keen analysis of the viscera of the power-generating process. Political power has four weapons—the "sword" or physical force; "gold and bread," or economic pressure; "symbols and words"; and finally education. Law seems to be, for the author, merely a sort of camouflaged violence or violence in abeyance, though it is now generally admitted in legal philosophy that voluntary submission to the established rules of the community is as potent a factor in maintaining social order as the potential threat of sanctions. Among the symbols of political power, controlled by the powers that be or seized by the opposition in quest of political power, are liberty, popular sovereignty, the social compact—incidentally another concept whose revival may be duly expected if and when dictatorships fall—and the "ideal of unity," which is as much an aim as a tool of the "sovereign." A good deal of "debunking" goes on in these chapters analyzing the "symbols," though without the spark of the Arnoldian wit.

The final chapters, on Ethics and Ideals and on Democracy and Equality versus Bureaucracy and War, are decidedly very much thinner and less well substantiated. When the author sums up that "limitation of power is only achieved through a diffusion of physical force and economic power," one fails to see how the first of these premises can be attained without destroying, with political power, the state itself. The state, or to be more precise, the government, must have the undisputed monopoly of physical coercion. The dangers of absolute power, which the author justly considers an evil in itself, are to be countered by the familiar democratic processes of continuous control. It is at this juncture that many of the "exploded myths," such as liberty, social compact, popular sovereignty, et alia, come into the picture again. They are not institutionalized slogans but reflections of absolute values which are the sole effective limitations of absolute power.

This leads to a crucial point of disagreement with the book. Its ice-cold analysis of our social existence has the same effect as a theatrical performance seen from behind the stage. The visitor is more conscious of the shabbiness of the decorations and the grease on the face of the actors than of the words spoken and the plot acted. This clever book exudes disillusionment. Here is no belief in a system of absolute and intangible values; the ethical components of our intellectual existence, for which, after all, social institutions should serve, appear merely as abused instruments of the soulless mechanism of political strife. Liberty, if we follow the author, is at best a utilitarian concept, and moral certainties are only parts of the "dominant" ideology or of that of the opposition. Introspection in the social sciences begins to reach the stage of outright agnosticism. One should be aware that a philosophy of the state is above all a philosophy of values discovered by and applied to living individuals. There can be little doubt that in a democratic environment like ours the only solution is that sovereignty must be mollified by the categorical imperative.

KARL LOEWENSTEIN

Shorter Notices

THE CRUISE OF THE RAIDER WOLF. By Roy Alexander. Yale University Press. $2.75.

There is a grim topicality about this story of the exploits of the most daring German commerce raider of the last war. The Wolf was a large freighter equipped with carefully concealed guns and torpedo tubes and carrying a big load of mines. Slipping through the North Sea blockade one foggy November she made her way into the Indian Ocean and for nearly a year cruised Eastern waters sowing mines at strategic points. She could touch at no point without giving away her secrets, and so was solely dependent for food and fuel on the ships she could capture, loot, and sink. Their crews and passengers were transferred to the Wolf's hold, which gradually became horribly overcrowded. Among the prisoners was the author of this book, who was radio operator on a British steamer seized off the New Zealand coast. Writing in a straightforward fashion with no literary flourishes, he has contrived to do justice both to the sufferings of himself and his fellow-prisoners and to the really amazing feats of their captors. For the commander of the Wolf, Captain Nerger, he has a boundless admiration and time after time pays tribute to the seamanship, resourcefulness, and determination which eventually brought the ship safely back to Kiel after logging 65,000 miles in thirteen months.

ANTHONY PHILIP HEINRICH. By William Treat Upton. Columbia University Press. $4.50.

Sonneck led the way to the rediscovery of Heinrich, and Professor Upton has completed the task of revivifying that strange American composer—he always considered himself American—who was rather accidentally uprooted from his native Bohemia and came here in the early eighteen hundreds to settle for a while in Philadelphia and in Lexington, where he began his ebullient career. This was to end in his being dubbed the American Beethoven but without other more substantial rewards. Professor Upton might perhaps have given us an explicit analysis of certain of the major compositions since he has studied the scores, but his general portrait of Heinrich as a composer and as a man is admirable, and he has succeeded well in the difficult art of including long excerpts from contemporary journals without the effect of merely slapping down the raw materials of research. As glimpses of contemporary musical criticism these excerpts are invaluable, lighting up the taste, the knowledge, the hesitations, the courage of early adventurers in a difficult field. Sonneck left behind him a wealth of suggestions for further study. The literature of American musicology will be rich indeed if they are developed as thoroughly and as sensitively as is this biography of Heinrich.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

DRAMA

THE holiday lull gives me opportunity to comment upon three new books about the theater, and by any standards—including both weightiness and weight—Professor Odell's eleventh volume (1879-82) comes first. As the series proceeds, fewer and fewer years can be included in each volume, but the undaunted author refuses to relax his standard of completeness, and we may still rest assured that no public entertainment provided anywhere in the metropolitan area will go unrecorded. One result is to give us the impression—false no doubt—that our frivolous fathers lived in a continuous round of gaiety, diverting themselves with contortionists or midgets or lectures on "What Our Girls Ought to Know" on the evenings when they were not attending performances of "Hamlet" by Lawrence Barrett or admiring the sensational new beauty, Lillian Russell, in one of the productions of "Patience."

Professor Odell's work has been called—correctly I think—the most extensive contribution to the history of the theater ever made by any one man, and nearly everything which can be said in praise of it has been said on previous occasions. The present volume contains 649 pages of text, plus an apparently impeccable index of more than 100 pages and approximately 350 illustrations. Certainly no one alive in 1882 was in possession of as much information about the contemporary stage as is here available to anyone who can use an index. But most remarkable of all is a fact which the reader is every now and then startled to realize—namely, that an amazing number of the hundreds of persons referred to are not, to the author, merely names. They are individuals whose talents and histories he either remembers or, as was of course always the case in the earlier volumes, has reconstructed from the record.

In a recent review Walter Prichard Eaton remarked that a scholar who could perform such a prodigious labor would certainly not object to another little task, and suggested a series of maps showing the location of the various places of amusement referred to. I am emboldened to make a considerably less modest request—namely, that Professor Odell should also give us in a separate volume his personal recollections of the stage. The "Annals" are themselves by no means wholly impersonal, but the scheme excludes any considerable amount of reminiscence, and he could recreate as probably no one else could the atmosphere of a theater which is separated from us by more than mere time. The rise of our own "new drama" meant the death of an old theater. Probably no one today goes to a theatrical performance expecting or getting just the kind of pleasure which playgoers expected and got in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. It is evident that Professor Odell remembers all this with extraordinary vividness and particularity. A great many people would like to have him share his memories.

George Jean Nathan resembles Professor Odell in one—and probably only one—respect: he too has an encyclopedic knowledge of the theater and probably remembers in detail more plays and players of the last thirty-five or forty years than anyone else now writing. For that reason there is a subtle justification for the title of his latest volume, even though that volume is not what one would at first expect, the book being as a matter of fact a collection of short pieces on a great variety of subjects arranged alphabetically by title. At this late date there is no point in describing either Mr. Nathan's attitude or his style, both of which are as well known as those of any writer on our theater are ever likely to be. He lays about him with all his accustomed vigor, but the secret of his individuality is simply that, for all his cynicism, he has an abiding respect for the theater and that, for all his "sophistication," his deepest liking is for the most substantial things which the theater has to offer. Many years ago when for the first time I reviewed one of his books I called Mr. Nathan "little better than a highbrow," and that description will have to stand. No one is less often taken in, but no one is less likely to respond to the genuine with conventional flippancy. There is a great deal of good reading in the present volume, and it is hard to single out for comment individual pieces from such a varied assortment; but since Mr. Nathan's encyclopedic memory makes him a dangerous man to face with a generalization I suggest the article Morgan as a fine specimen of confutation by example and Everyman His Own Critic as an equally fine example of what the author can do in the way of collecting dramatic clichés.

"Annals of the New York Stage." By George C. D. Odell. Vol. XI. Columbia University Press. $8.75.

"Encyclopædia of the Theater." By George Jean Nathan. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

"The Theater Handbook and Digest of Plays." Edited by Bernard Sobel. Crown Publishers. $3.

Don't Miss An Issue!

To keep THE NATION coming regularly

just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $........................

☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

Special Introductory Offer

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name . . . .

Street . . . .

City . . . .

State 1-13-40

Extra postage per year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c.

Mr. Sobel's "Handbook" is exactly what its full title suggests and should prove extremely useful despite the fact that it is not clear just what principles of inclusion and exclusion were adopted in compiling a 900-page encyclopedia of the theater of all time. There are brief synopses of nearly a thousand plays, brief biographies of hundreds of actors, playwrights, critics, and managers, as well as definitions of technical terms and many bits of curious lore. Probably, however, there is nothing that one can be quite sure of finding. I note for example, that Frank Harris and Sam Harris are here, but that Jed Harris is not; that Mrs. Malaprop is included, but Mrs. Grundy and the gay Lothario left out; that Thomas Rymer is given five lines while William Hazlitt is omitted entirely. Nevertheless, there is a great deal of information, including an excellent bibliography contributed by George Freedley, and the book has real usefulness.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

THIS column has its own little In the Wind department in which, with some compunctions, I record Vladimir Horowitz's statement to an interviewer that in recent years "the later Beethoven sonatas have drawn me very much, though I would seldom try to play them in public, since the musical thought, partly on account of Beethoven's bad piano writing, remains inaccessible to the majority of listeners." My compunctions are caused by the fact that while the statement is in all ways ridiculous the man who made it is not: describing the development of his taste he confessed it had taken him a long time to get from Grieg, who had captivated him at the start, to Beethoven, and added: "But one must develop in one's own way, without apologies and certainly without the attempt at taking an artificial position, and claiming to admire what one does not." This honesty increases one's respect for Horowitz as a man, but it does not lessen one's concern over his effect as a concert pianist. All over the country, that is, are people whose only contact with music for the piano is made at recitals which are given almost entirely by pianists like Horowitz, functioning on a high level of virtuosity and a considerably lower level of musical understanding and taste; and for these people the greatest works of Beethoven, Schubert, Mozart, Haydn, and Bach might as well not have been written. And this is not to consider what idea they would get of the last sonatas of Beethoven from performances by someone with Horowitz's idea of them.

With no compunctions I report the way some of the German conductors you never heard of, who are now in this country, listen to a Toscanini broadcast, beating time and exclaiming now "So he does it?" and now "This tempo he takes here?" and once in a great while "That was good"—the verdict in the end being that Toscanini can do justice to Rossini and Verdi but not to German music, and above all not to Beethoven (for an eminent German musicologist who heard the broadcasts of the Seventh and Ninth only the Trio of the Scherzo of the Ninth was rightly understood by Toscanini). Inevitably these men appeal to an American to explain attitudes of the American public which they can account for only by dark conspiracies of American critics: the inflation into a twentieth-century Beethoven of a composer, Sibelius, in whose symphonies they cannot hear one phrase worthy of being called a theme; and the lack of appreciation of the genius of Bruckner. Evidently the Teutonic mind that is impressed by mere aspiration to profundity when this is expressed in sufficiently bulky and ponderous terms is a mind incapable of perceiving the modest pleasures—of thematic material and formal construction—which Sibelius does offer; and it is a mind that will hear injustice to Beethoven in Toscanini's performances.

Being myself bored by Bruckner's attempts at profundity, and the more bored the more bulky and ponderous the terms, I have had no enjoyment from the fourteen sides of Victor's set of his Ninth Symphony, recorded by the excellent Munich Philharmonic under Hausegger (M-627, $14). Nor have I had more enjoyment from Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5, which is more fluent and slick but in its own way as pretentious and as empty and arid in its pretentiousness—and what that way is I will have to postpone to another time. The work is gorgeously recorded by Stokowski with the Philadelphia Orchestra (M-619, $12).

After these I have had all the more pleasure from the first of the two volumes of Chopin's Mazurkas recorded by Artur Rubinstein. The genre is one in which Chopin and Rubinstein are at their best; and in this set (M-626, $10) nearly all the examples are fine, and some—such as Opus 6 No. 2, Opus 17 No. 4, Opus 41 No. 2—are among the finest. There has been pleasure also from Mozart's Violin Concerto K. 218 in a performance by Kreisler with the London Philharmonic under Sargent (M-623, $6.50), in which Kreisler's tone is silken, his technique and intonation clean, his phrasing simple and in good taste; but there are more vitality and sparkle and style in the performance, excellently recorded four years ago, of Szigeti and the same orchestra under Beecham. In the same way Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (M-625, $7) is excellent, but I like even better what Beecham makes of the work; and in this instance the Boston performance is less successfully recorded: one hears reverberation at times which may be what at other times coarsens the sound of an orchestra that is outstanding for the refinement of its sonorities. That has been true of other Boston recordings. On the other hand, the sound of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski is beautifully reproduced, as usual, in the single record (15800, $2) of the Magic Fire music from "Die Walküre." Other January releases next time.

There is still a December set to report on—the beautiful Concerto Grosso in G minor of Corelli, excellently recorded by Bruno Walter with the London Symphony (M-600, $3.50). As for the December releases of Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" and Haydn's Symphony No. 104, and the special releases of Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger," Lehmann's set of Wolf songs, Landowska's set of Handel suites—they are of the highest importance, and those readers who are interested in what I think of them may be more successful in persuading Victor to send them to me than I have been. To hear that many records in a shop is something not easily managed by the shop or myself.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Socialism in the U. S. S. R.

Dear Sirs: The appearance of such an article as Alan Mather's Militarism versus Socialism in the U. S. S. R. in The Nation (December 16) must set thousands of Nation readers wondering —wondering about many other things now appearing in The Nation, on subjects other than those covered by the article. Reference to the back files of the magazine will convince any reader that it is a type of article that would not have been printed four months ago, though the facts on which Mr. Mather bases his conclusions are supposedly three or four years old. I do not mean to imply that no rabid attacks on the Soviet Union appeared in The Nation before the signing of the Soviet-German non-aggression pact. Such attacks, however, were always of an ideological character and usually dealt with imponderables not capable of prima facie proof or disproof. In articles dealing with such factual matters as Mr. Mather's article purports to deal with, the editors of The Nation, in the past, have seen to it that the author observed the amenities of scientific research and have permitted no unsupported statement and no unverified figures to appear in its columns.

Mr. Mather's thesis is that since 1934 factors which the internationalists [Trotskyists?] had predicted have prevented the development of Russian economy into socialism. The factors to which he refers are inherent in the militarization of the Soviet Union, which has led to a supposed stasis of Soviet production. Even the old "nationalization-of-women" gag is revived—Mr. Mather cites the increased Russian birth rate of the last few years as a military measure which is preventing socialism by withdrawing women from industry. To support this thesis Mr. Mather declares that "the output of coal, pig iron, steel ingots, and rolled steel flattened out to an almost dead level in 1936, 1937, and 1938." Furthermore, he insinuates that Soviet statistics are deliberately falsified. "Industrial production," he says, "measured in tons, gallons, and other physical quantities, not in rubles as Soviet officials are so shrewdly measuring it these days, has been leveling off in the last three years," the inference being that an inflated ruble explains whatever current production increases may be claimed.

Nowhere does Mr. Mather cite the comparative production figures for the three-year period he mentions, 1935 to 1938. Here are the figures, not in rubles, but in very physical tons. In 1935 coal production was 109,000,000; in 1938, 133,000,000. In 1935 pig iron was 12,500,000; in 1938, 15,000,000. In 1935 steel was 12,600,000; in 1938 it was 18,000,000. In 1935 oil was 26,900,000; in 1938 it was 32,000,000. Certainly this does not read like a flat level.

Moreover, if Mr. Mather had ever looked at a Soviet statistical chart in which production is given in rubles he could not have failed to notice that in parentheses appears always the following statement—"in rubles, prices of 1926-27"; in other words, in the prices contemporaneous with the initiation of the Five-Year Plan. If a ton of steel was priced at ten rubles in 1927, it remained at ten rubles in 1938 statistics, thereby insuring that financial figures were strictly correlated with figures of weight and volume.

Either Mr. Mather accepts Soviet statistics as veracious, including their calculation of values of production in fixed prices of 1926-27, or he does not. If he does not he has no criterion of production to go by, and there is no use discussing the increase or decrease of Soviet production or basing any theories on it. But if he is looking for figures on the success or failure of socialism in the Soviet Union he might look up page 412 of the bound volume of the reports of the eighteenth congress of the C. P. S. U. "The Socialist system of production," says one of the reports, "has come to exercise undivided rule in the economy of the U. S. S. R. In 1937 it comprised 99.8 per cent of the gross production of industry and 98.6 per cent of the gross output of agriculture." From these percentages it would seem that the curve of socialism can hardly go very much higher in the Soviet Union.

ALTER BRODY

New York, January 2

Dear Sirs: In regard to Alter Brody's letter, that which is written on page 412 of The Book means that about 99 per cent of production in the Soviet Union came from farms and factories which had been labeled "socialist." But socialism, an economy superior to capitalism, is founded upon distributed material wealth—not upon speeches in congresses. The curve of socialism has only started to rise in the Soviet Union. Its progress awaits events in other countries.

Just as in my article I made a distinction between Stakhanov's work and the Communist Party's "Stakhanovism," or speed-up, so I accept Soviet statistics and reject the "clarifications" of them by Communist Party and Soviet officials. Sometimes the officials quote values in fixed prices of 1926-27, sometimes they don't. It was to protect readers against the times that they don't that I advised the use of weight and volume measurement. To reject falsification of statistics does not mean to reject statistics. I don't say that the officials are congenital liars. I say they can't afford to tell the truth.

Sure, production of coal, iron, and steel were so much in 1935 and so much more in 1938. So what? Of the net increase in steel production between the end of 1935 and the end of 1938, seven-tenths was made in 1936, two-tenths in 1937, and one-tenth in 1938. That's what I meant by leveling off. Coal and pig-iron production have the same unhappy profile. In the article I was concerned with a flattening production rate and a rising birth rate. Forget the absolutes, compare the rates!

I see by Alter Brody's letter that I said that socialism in the U. S. S. R. has failed because women there are nationalized and have too many babies. Or is that an exaggeration of an exaggeration? Finally, if I had meant Trotskyists I would have said Trotskyists. I said internationalists and I quoted Lenin. Was Lenin a Trotskyist? I'm no expert on sects. But maybe Lenin was a centrist, Bukharinite wrecker disguising rightist or fifth-column policies with left Trotskyist phrase-mongering.

ALAN MATHER

New York, January 9

Rivera's Fantasies

Dear Sirs: In Mexico, Diego Rivera's unchallenged place as public clown no. 1 has long overshadowed his fame abroad as his country's foremost painter. Consequently, his grotesque list of the G. P. U.'s Mexican agents, recently published in the American press, has been discounted here, by a public well inoculated against his noisy vagaries, as nothing but a characteristic bid for free headlines. This impression is fortified by Rivera's remarkable discovery of a sinister representative of the Cheka in the person of Harry Skipsey, a prominent and eminently conservative English banker who has been in business here for some thirty years.

However, as there may still be in the United States some persons gullible enough to be impressed by Rivera's irresponsible fantasies, and as he did me the honor of including me in his list, I should like the opportunity to advise them against uncritical acceptance of "denunciations" whose sole purpose is publicity for their inventor. The incident is without importance save as an illustration of the latest and most depressing phase in the degeneration of Diego Rivera. HARRY BLOCK

Mexico City, December 11

First a Spaniard and a Liberal

Dear Sirs: May I take issue with Leigh White's inadequate review of Constancia de la Mora's "In Place of Splendor" which appeared in your issue of December 23.

Mr. White criticizes the book on three counts—because the first part is more interesting than the last, because it is not a "candid account of a Spanish government worker in the war," because, or so he claims, its last half follows the Communist Party line.

On the first and second counts the fault lies surely with Mr. White. To complain because the vivid autobiography of an intelligent and high-spirited rebel against the old, hard crust of Spain is not a critical account of the conduct of the war is to misunderstand the fundamentals of a reviewer's task. In claiming that Miss de la Mora follows the Communist line when she relates what came under her personal observation and what she heard, is Mr. White quite sure that he is not following the line of another and a competing party? This book breathes on every page the spirit of "some of which I was, all of which I saw."

As any number of us who knew Spain long before 1936 have tried to explain, the line which the Communist Party adopted there was in many respects similar to that which intelligent Spanish liberals had been advocating for years. Constancia de la Mora was first of all a Spaniard and a liberal. Whatever her later party affiliations may have been they never weakened the force of those primary allegiances.

And by the same token she was quite capable of making her own estimate of government officials. Other people who by no stretch of anyone's imagination could be called disciples of Moscow have found Caballero inadequate, considered Prieto an inflated politician whose bilious temperament affected his judgment. Nor must one be following any party line in order to find Negrín intelligent, effective, and deserving of loyal support.

It is regrettable that avowed friends of liberalism like Mr. White should continue to obscure the main struggle between liberal and reactionary Spain by raising clouds of factional dust. What he seems in some strange way estopped from understanding is that Miss de la Mora's book, in picturing with such warmth and spirit the life of a girl growing up in the ruling circles of Spain, is making comprehensible that main struggle to hundreds of Americans who have never understood it, and is winning such friends for the defeated Spanish Republic as might have changed the whole American attitude toward the conflict had it been published in 1936.

MILDRED ADAMS

New York, January 1

The Ideal Newspaper

Dear Sirs: Professor Lerner's proposals for remedying the abuses of the press (see The Nation for November 4 and 11) are hardly practicable. Yet something should be done. May a retired newspaperman with nearly fifty years' varied experience in journalism behind him venture a suggestion?

It is surely not out of the question to establish an independent, non-partisan, intelligent, and comprehensive daily paper in, say, Washington, and make it truly national. Would not such a paper soon command a large circulation? Would not liberals, wage-workers, thoughtful persons generally welcome and support a daily that was fair to all groups, that suppressed no news fit to print, that opened its columns to all points of view?

The editorials, the book reviews, the dramatic and music criticism, the special essays, and other such features could be syndicated. The paper would need, perhaps, half a dozen correspondents in Europe and Asia. But it would also need local pages—a Chicago page, a Boston page, a Denver page, a San Francisco page. A well-edited daily of ten or twelve pages would meet all reasonable requirements. There is too much padding, too much repetition in our "big" dailies.

At five cents a copy such a daily should before long pay expenses. But for a time it would need subsidies and gifts. I believe there are many men and women who, disgusted and discontented with the plutocratic and yellow papers, would cheerfully endow a progressive, enlightened, and decent newspaper. A small group of trained and competent newspapermen, plus a few generous financial backers at the start, should take the initiative and appeal for wide cooperation. The response to such an appeal would surprise them.

VICTOR S. YARROS

Winter Park, Fla., December, 29

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER, for many years The Nation's Moscow correspondent, is at work on a book on Russia which will be published shortly.

JOACHIM JOESTEN, a German journalist, has lived in the Scandinavian countries for some years. He is the author of "Rats in the Larder," a study of Nazi influence in Denmark.

MAURICE FELDMAN, formerly editor of Der Tag of Vienna, was on the staff of the Stockholm Tidningen for more than a year.

WALTER WILSON is preparing a study of the convict lease system. To obtain material he has visited many prisons and prison camps in the South and interviewed ex-convicts, laborites, and important Southerners interested in improving penal conditions.

W. H. AUDEN is the well-known English poet and critic. He is at present in this country.

LOUIS B. SALOMON is a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College.

McALISTER COLEMAN is a journalist with long experience in left-wing politics and the utilities field.

JAMES ORRICK was for many years on the staff of the Oxford Press.

KARL LOEWENSTEIN is professor of political science at Amherst College.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 20, 1940 NUMBER 3

The Shape of Things

TENSION HAS RISEN AMONG THE WESTERN European neutrals in the past few days. Over the week-end Holland and Belgium received news which led them immediately to recall all troops on leave and to reinstate the frontier precautions adopted in November, when, there is good reason to believe, a German plan to invade the Low Countries was abandoned at the last moment. This time the alarm seems particularly acute in Belgium, where the evacuation of civilians from border districts has begun. The exact nature of the information which has prompted these steps is unknown, although there are unconfirmed reports of new German concentrations in the northern Rhineland. In any case, they seem to be taken seriously by the Allies. One theory held in Paris, however, is that German movements apparently threatening to Belgium and Holland are intended to cover an extension of the war to a new theater. The Balkans have been mentioned in this connection, but the increasingly strained relations between Russia and the Scandinavian states suggest the possibility of a joint Nazi-Soviet move in the North. Moscow has sharply rejected as "unsatisfactory" the replies of Norway and Sweden to its notes protesting against the assistance these countries are rendering to Finland. There is evidence, it declares, that their governments "do not offer resistance to the influence of those powers which strive to involve Sweden and Norway in war against the Soviet Union." Taken in conjunction with the bitter German press attacks on Scandinavia, this warning carries a sinister connotation for the Northern neutrals.

*

THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT AFTER A LONG period of acute taciturnity has published an extended communiqué mainly devoted to assailing "the slanderous fabrications" of the foreign press. Regarding the activities of the Red Army in Finland, it asserts that operations during the past three weeks have been limited to ordinary clashes of reconnoitering detachments. It denies that the Finns have anywhere crossed the Russian frontier and scornfully denounces reports of the crushing defeat of the Forty-fourth Division at Suomussalmi. There is no doubt that the American press has been guilty of more than a little exaggeration in its presentation of Finnish news. Editorial blue pencils might well have been exercised more freely on many cables, particularly on those relaying reports from cities outside Finland. Nevertheless, it seems certain that our daily press has accurately reported the main events of the war. In particular the news of the destruction of the Forty-fourth Division has been confirmed by experienced and responsible American correspondents actually on the spot. For the fact that the war has been reported almost exclusively from the Finnish angle, the Russian government is itself largely to blame. Its official statements have been singularly uninformative; it has developed a censorship system apparently designed to prevent foreign correspondents from sending fresh news; and it has kept foreign newsmen not only away from the front but apparently even from Leningrad. Soviet apologists in this country are making a great to-do about the way the bombing of Finnish cities is being handled in the press. Here again there has no doubt been exaggeration. The actual number of casualties has been relatively small, and there is no clear evidence of deliberate bombing of civilians. But what sort of excuse is this for the real crime, for the damning fact that Finland is being invaded at all?

*

ITALY CONTINUES TO STRIVE WITH THE hydra-headed Balkan problem, seeking to build up a bloc under its influence which will compensate for its present military and diplomatic weakness. There are, however, so many conflicting interests to harmonize that the job would tax the genius of a Talleyrand, and Count Ciano hardly comes up to that standard. Last week we mentioned editorially a report from Budapest of an Italian guaranty to Hungary of military support against either Russian or German aggression. This story has not been confirmed, and according to a cable by Pertinax in the New York Times it clearly exaggerated the scope of the present negotiations between Italy and Hungary. The same authority states that Mussolini has obtained an assurance from Germany that it does not intend to disturb the status quo in Southeastern Europe, but this promise might easily be broken if Stalin decided on a move against Rumania. For Hitler would be in no position to oppose such a move openly and would either have to give his Moscow friend carte blanche or join his adventure on profit-sharing terms. Meanwhile Italy's primary effort is to find a basis for cooperative action between Hungary and Rumania. Both these states fear their Russian neighbor, but Transylvania seems too great a barrier between them to be breached by common funk. Italy's plan is to persuade Rumania to agree to a territorial adjustment after the war which would return to Hungary those parts of Transylvania in which the Hungarian proportion of the population is greatest. But neither King Carol nor the Hungarians dare lessen their intransigence on border questions in view of the menace of their own Nazis.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

LITTLE CHANGE IN JAPANESE FOREIGN OR domestic policy may be expected from the new government under Admiral Mitsumasa Yonai. In solving the Cabinet crisis caused by the resignation of General Abe, the Japanese elder statesmen fell back on what has by now become an almost monotonous formula. Like Abe, Hayashi, Okada, and several other recent Premiers, Admiral Yonai is a non-party man, and a moderate who is respected chiefly for his service record. He has served as navy minister in three recent Cabinets but has no direct connections with the military extremists. Abe's downfall was due chiefly to discontent over economic hardships resulting from three and a half years of war. Criticism centered particularly on the recent sharp increase in the official price of rice, made after the farmers had disposed of their crops. In view of the continuing military pressure for an intensification of the China campaign, it is difficult to see how Yonai can succeed where Abe has failed in the domestic sphere. Abroad he may be expected to be somewhat more vigorous in pressing for agreements with the United States and Great Britain. But with the military holding the reins in China, it is doubtful whether he can go beyond his predecessor in offering effective concessions. According to all indications, the China policy will be unchanged. Plans still call for the establishment of a unified puppet government under Wang Ching-wei at the first suitable opportunity. But there is no evidence that the basic conflicts between the various Japanese military factions in China which have impeded its establishment have yet been settled.

*

OPPONENTS OF THE HULL TRADE PROGRAM would do well to study carefully the Argentine communiqué setting forth the reasons for the breakdown of negotiations for a reciprocal trade pact between Argentina and the United States. Argentina, it appears, was prepared to offer favorable quota arrangements and tariff concessions which would result in a decline of 7,000,000 pesos in governmental revenues in return for equivalent concessions from the United States. Such concessions, the Argentine government declares, were never offered. This statement completely refutes the assertion, frequently made by opponents of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, that the State Department has exhibited a flagrant disregard for the interests of American producers. Actually the shoe seems to be on the other foot. Solicitude for American farm producers has wrecked a pact which would have been of great importance to American exporters, as well as of utmost political significance. That the State Department's zeal in this case was not exceptional may be seen in the fact that our exports to the countries with which we have trade agreements have increased nearly twice as much as our imports from the same countries. Instead of correcting the serious maladjustment in our balance of payments, the trade agreements seem to be accentuating the export surplus. Responsibility for this anomalous situation rests primarily on the political groups which are constantly sniping at the Hull program.

*

A FLEET BIG ENOUGH TO PROTECT HAWAII, the Panama Canal, and Atlantic coastwise shipping against the combined forces of Germany, Italy, Japan, and Soviet Russia was set forth by Admiral Stark, Chief of Naval Operations, as the objective of the Vinson bill now in hearings. Even with the 25 per cent increase envisioned in the bill, the fleet would still be inadequate for the protection of the Philippines and Latin America, the Admiral asserted. Thus we have for the first time a clear-cut statement of the navy's defense policy. It is a far cry from the parity principle which has hitherto governed naval construction. For a paltry $1,300,000,000, or slightly more than the amount asked for unemployment relief, the North American continent is to be made safe from the four powers with which we have the least friendly relations. It might seem to be a bargain if Mr. Vinson would only tell us what the other powers are likely to be doing while this huge navy is being constructed. The Japanese have already implied that they expect to match us ton for ton. Soviet Russia cannot very well afford to let Japan gain such an advantage; so it may attempt to match Japan's program. The result may be that at the end of the building period our inferiority to the combined forces of the four powers will be greater than at present. It may be taken as axiomatic that no country wants to divert a huge share of its resources to the building of unproductive battleships. The United States with its unparalleled natural defenses should be the last country to take responsibility for plunging the world into a naval race of such gigantic proportions.

*

AFTER TOTTERING FOR YEARS IN A STATE OF constructive insolvency, the Associated Gas and Electric Company has crashed into the bankruptcy court. It applied for a receiver after the SEC forbade its chief subsidiary, the Associated Gas and Electric Corporation, to pay unearned interest and dividends on its 5 per cent note or its capital stock. Both these securities are held by the parent company, which in turn became unable to meet interest due on its publicly held debentures. Unpopular as the SEC is in financial quarters, its action in this case has not raised a murmur, for the very good reason that the A. G. and E. represents so flagrant an example of the holding-company racket that it is almost impossible to defend. It is not merely a holding company but a holder of holding companies—a set-up which vastly increased the amount of "water" in the system. Its final attempts to stave off bankruptcy are illuminating. Last year it applied for a loan to the RFC, which agreed to consider the proposition if certain strict conditions were observed, including its approval of management changes and salaries. While negotiations were in progress, Roger J. Whiteford, who had been general counsel for the FHA, was suddenly made president of A. G. and E. with the handsome salary of $10,000 a month. This appointment of an important Administration official failed to bring results. Jesse Jones of the RFC had not been consulted, and the change in management apparently did not impress him. The loan was refused, and when the SEC issued its ruling on dividend payments Mr. Hopson's hydro-financial empire filed its petition.

*

THE WITHDRAWAL OF THIRTEEN OTHER nominees, eight specifically in his favor, was a striking recognition of Kenneth Crawford's fitness to succeed Heywood Broun as president of the American Newspaper Guild. More than four years of yeoman work as chairman of the Washington Guild's negotiating committee and a record of courageous journalism for the New York Post and The Nation would have been enough to commend Crawford to the Guild's membership, but there were other factors that underscored his eligibility. Geographically and by conviction he occupies a strategic middle ground. In almost all national organizations there is a tendency to look upon leadership from New York with a jaundiced eye. Whether justified or not, this fear of being dominated by "the New York crowd" is present in the Guild, and, to a small extent, so is the labor-political factionalism that clings to every trade union in times like these. What looks like a blend of these two factors is contained in the statement issued jointly by three of Crawford's fellow-nominees upon his indorsement by the New York Guild: "We are glad that the New York leadership has finally been brought to realize the desirability of broadening of control in the American Newspaper Guild. We join in the support of Crawford, whose candidacy originated in the opposition to that narrow domination." But harmony candidate though he may be, Crawford is anything but a fence-sitter. He has ideas about how the Guild should be run, "some of which," he announces, "conflict with current practice." One of these, it appears, involves the Guild's extreme addiction to political resolutions. "It is not the Guild's business," Crawford said in his first statement as president-elect, "to reform the world or the world's newspapers." That is taking a bull by the horns; it is also good trade unionism.

*

WHEN YOU WALK INTO YOUR FAVORITE woods and find the brooks cleared, the trees trimmed, the brush in piles, and a new trail around the old pond, you can be pretty sure there's a CCC camp nearby. The Civilian Conservation Corps is perhaps the only project of the New Deal which everybody approves; even Republicans favor relief for trees. Robert Fechner, director of the CCC until his death on December 31, has left an eloquent record of his six years' work in his annual report for 1938, now issued posthumously. In six years the CCC has given jobs and valuable training to 2,600,000 men, most of them young men who might otherwise have been haunting the street corners of the nation. They have planted 1,855,000,000 trees, built 106,800 miles of trucks trails, and spent 9,375,000,000 man days fighting fires and preventing them. What this work in the open air under expert supervision—formerly military, but now civilian—has done for 2,600,000 men cannot be measured. "Work projects already suggested by federal and state departments would keep . . . 1,500 camps busy for from thirty to fifty years," says Mr. Fechner's last report. But for economy's sake the number is to be cut to 1,227, in face of the fact that according to one estimate four million young people are without jobs.

The Coughlin Terror

IN ARRESTING seventeen members of the "Christian Front," the FBI has drawn the curtain on a violent and ugly political underworld. Because only a handful of men have thus far been seized, there is a tendency in some quarters to minimize the disclosures, and to scoff at the notion of seventeen men preparing for der Tag. But this was no crackpot conspiracy of violence conceived by political lunatics. It contains all those recognizable elements of anti-democratic and anti-Semitic terror which were the preludes of European fascism. It is the most dramatic expression of a movement that is national—perhaps international—in scope and organization. The ringleaders arrested this week are political thugs who took the words of their leader seriously. Their leader is Charles E. Coughlin.

The precise number of persons intimately involved in the conspiracy is still unknown. Undoubtedly some members of the Christian Front were not let in on the details of the terrorist schedule which had been drawn up. But the art of terrorism has never required mass armies to achieve its prime objective. That objective is the inoculation of a populace with a sense of dread and panic in the face of an invisible enemy; it is accomplished by periodic, seemingly unrelated explosions, by sudden brutal forays against individuals. When hysteria is widespread, the chance for more serious business is at hand.

This exposure cannot be seen in its proper perspective without recognizing the role of Coughlin himself. Confronted with the revelations, Coughlin carefully disclaimed any link with the Front and blamed the plot on "Nazis or Communists." The words of his denial are disingenuous; the denial itself is a lie. Coughlin has not only advocated the idea of a Christian Front in general; he has been closely linked with this one in particular. On July 14, 1939, speaking by direct wire to a Philadelphia mass-meeting, he told his audience that "John Cassidy is our leader in the Christian Front." Cassidy himself delivered the principal address at the meeting, Social Justice reported on July 24. And it is Cassidy whom the FBI has now singled out as one of the two chief figures in the terrorist conspiracy. On July 31, 1939, Social Justice carried a lengthy report of the Front's progress under the headline: "Militant Units of Christian Front Being Formed in Middle West; Hosts Battle Communism in New York." The article reported enthusiastically: "Under the leadership of John F. Cassidy of Brooklyn there are now five central units operating in the metropolitan district." On several occasions Cassidy has shared speakers' platforms with Edward Lodge Curran. Curran is one of Coughlin's closest allies; he has frequently spoken on the priest's radio hour.

In view of Coughlin's palpable link with the Front, was he innocent of its preparations for violence? Would he shun such violent techniques? There is no conclusive evidence on this point. What we do know is that Social Justice recently reported approvingly the formation in New England of "rifle clubs" designed to "assist in quelling any revolutionary disturbance." We also know that less than two months ago Social Justice published "Father Coughlin's advice to the Christian Front"; it read: "Meet force with force only as a last resort." Behind the camouflage of the "defense mechanism," Coughlin has constantly hinted to his followers of impending violence and cited the Franco insurrection as a classic political model. Only a fortnight ago, in a national broadcast, he candidly announced his faith in the dictatorship idea.

What has been exposed thus far is only a fragment of the story. There is a visible effort in some newspapers to free Coughlin from embarrassment at the exposure. But without Coughlin himself the picture cannot be completed; and unless the FBI is prepared to unravel all the threads of Coughlinite intrigue, it may only have prepared a boomerang. It has accused the Christian Fronters of conspiring to overthrow the government; that accusation can hardly meet the "clear and present danger" test without far more sweeping revelations than have thus far been made.

Even the limited material already issued is a damning indictment of Coughlinism. It is also a startling commentary on the work of the Dies committee, which for two years has been looking under beds and behind fronts for "un-American activities." In the 5,000-page record published by that committee there are only parenthetical references to the Christian Front. And when Martin Dies addressed a New York "Americanism" meeting held in his honor last November, Christain Fronters crowded the balconies to cheer him. They had been admitted free.

When the Treaty Ends

ALL but a week of the six-month period of grace provided in the Japanese-American trade treaty has elapsed, and the United States has yet to formulate a policy to be adopted upon the expiration of the treaty. The most direct and logical action which could be taken would be to impose an embargo on the export of all war materials to Japan while that country persists in its illegal campaign of aggression in China. Such action was urged last week by Henry L. Stimson, former Secretary of State, in a brilliant statement printed in full in the New York Times. The war in Europe, cutting Japan off from its preferred source of supplies in Germany, has greatly increased the potential effectiveness of such a step. Japan now obtains some 75 per cent of its imported war supplies from the United States, and as the European conflict develops, its dependence on the United States will increase.

An embargo on exports is not, however, the only means of depriving Japan of essential war materials. Without ceasing our efforts for such a measure, it is well to recognize, as was pointed out in last week's Nation, the practicability of discriminatory action against imports from Japan. Punitive measures of this type would have the advantage of following the orthodox lines of American commercial policy. They would require no additional machinery beyond that already provided in the customs service and in the main no additional legislation. By depriving Japan of foreign exchange, they would limit its ability to obtain needed war supplies.

The Tariff Acts of 1930 and 1934 provide the Administration with power to take rather drastic defensive action against Japan's hostile and discriminatory trade practices. Section 303 of the 1930 act gives the President the right to impose a countervailing duty against any country which subsidizes its exports to the United States. This section was invoked last year in imposing a 25 per cent additional duty on a long list of German goods.

Section 338 of the same act authorizes the President to proclaim additional duties, up to at least 50 per cent, on the products of any country which discriminates against the commerce of the United States, and to impose a special tax on goods carried in the ships of such a country. In case the discrimination continues, the President is empowered to ban all goods from the offending country.

While there is little doubt that many Japanese exports to this country are subsidized, and therefore liable to increased duties, the evidence of discrimination against American trade is even less disputable. In line with its general totalitarian trade policies Japan has deliberately discriminated against American exports and favored those of Manchoukuo, Germany, Italy, and the puppet Chinese regimes. The most serious form taken by this discriminatory policy has been the preferential treatment given cotton from North China to the disadvantage of American cotton. The result has been a complete wrecking of the traditional basis of Japanese-American trade, namely, the exchange of Japanese raw silk for American cotton. In the case of other goods, there is evidence that Japanese buyers have been instructed to place their orders in the Axis countries regardless of their individual preferences. Trade statistics issued just prior to the European war show a rise in Japanese purchases from both Italy and Germany at the expense of the United States. In the occupied sections of China, Japan has followed a systematic program designed to exclude the United States and other Western nations from the Chinese market.

In considering penalties it must not be forgotten that some 70 per cent of our imports from Japan consist of a non-dutiable item—silk. Percentage tariff increases, no matter how heavy, would be largely ineffective unless some duty were levied on silk. For this there are ample grounds. Section 338 of the 1930 act authorizes the President to levy new duties on the goods of countries which discriminate against American exports. We have referred to the flagrant discrimination practiced against American cotton. In addition, Japan has sought to take advantage of America's almost complete dependence on Japanese silk by boosting prices and levying increased freight rates on this one product—nearly all of which goes to the United States—with a view to making American consumers pay an increased share of Japan's war expenses. As a retaliatory measure, a duty of, say, 50 per cent ad valorem on silk would be wholly justified.

The Nation has steadfastly opposed high tariffs which are adopted solely on the pretext of protecting the American market. But low-tariff advocates have always recognized the necessity for penalties to protect American exports from discrimination by countries which profit by our own non-discriminatory policies. And in this instance the United States has, in addition, a moral obligation to dissociate itself in every way from active economic assistance to the Japanese war machine.

Jews in Hitler's Poland

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

SOMETIMES I hear decent peole who don't like war wondering whether a Nazi victory would after all be so tragic. They try to think of it as a more or less logical alternative to the "anarchy" and disorganization of the Europe of the past twenty-five years. Hitler is an aggressor, that's true; but so was Napoleon. Was Europe better for the twenty years of struggle to resist the Napoleonic "Continental system"? Hitler, too, is trying to create a system, a stable, unified Europe under his own domination. The day of France and Britain is done; they had their chance and they muffed it. Now let Hitler—and perhaps Stalin—try to create the "new Europe" that must supersede a run-down system supported by two run-down empires. This is the argument, though it is seldom so flatly stated.

People who feel that a Nazi peace and a Nazi-dominated Europe are preferable to their horrible alternative should stop to consider the state of the territories already in process of organization by Hitler. Austria, the Bohemian-Moravian Protectorate, German Poland, Memel—a great area contiguous to the old Reich—are being coordinated as fast as administrators and secret police and troops can do the work. Whole populations are being shifted as if they were armies in order to wipe out the cultural as well as the political boundaries that divided the conquered states from each other and from Germany. And the Jewish problem is being "solved." In a laboratory of occupied or incorporated territory the Nazis are constructing a working model of the "new Europe."

Mr. Villard wrote an article from The Hague, which appeared in our issue of December 30, describing the situation of the Jews deported to Poland from various parts of the Reich. It was based on the results of his own inquiries in Germany and is the best report so far published. I shall do no more than add items appearing in the newspapers before and after Mr. Villard wrote.

The scheme for shifting populations in the conquered territories to make space for Germans and to get rid of Jews was announced officially from Berlin. It was reported in October that a reservation between Lublin and the Soviet border would be set aside for Jews evacuated from Posen and West Prussia. Later, Nazi authorities announced that other areas in the same general region would be turned into Jewish reservations and that Jews would be sent in from all over the Reich. Early in November an item from Bruenn, Czechoslovakia, told of 300 unemployed Jews from that town being deported into Poland, there to be supported by contributions from the remaining Jews in Bruenn. Deportations, said the same dispatch, were to be made from the whole protectorate; only old people and some women and children would be left behind.

Later in the month it was reported, also from Berlin, that Warsaw's ghetto had been cut off from the rest of the city by barricades patrolled by armed guards. No Jews were allowed to pass through them without being thoroughly searched. A dispatch from Kattowitz in German Poland said that some 5,000 "women, children, and infirm men" must leave that town and Teschen for the Lublin reservation by December 15. Another item added the fact that Jewish men between the ages of fourteen and seventy and women under fifty-five who had been shipped to the reservation had been put to forced labor. An Associated Press dispatch from Lodz stated briefly that a curfew for Jews had been established and that any Jew leaving home between the hours of five p. m. and eight a. m. might be punished by death. The death penalty could also be applied to Jews who failed to wear the broad yellow arm band prescribed by law.

Figures and dates do not always coincide in these fragmentary dispatches. A story from Berlin dated November 26 reported that the Jews of Teschen had been given two extra weeks to evacuate the city, but must all be out by December 9. When they left they would be almost the last of 150,000 Jews to be transported from the former Czech provinces to Poland; the deportations from Austria were also virtually completed; from Moravská-Ostrava the whole Jewish population of 10,000 had left for the Polish reservation on the River San. The Gestapo was supervising the forced migration.

All the facts so far cited are from German dispatches, presumably censored and including only what the Nazis want known. Since the beginning of December reports direct from Germany have all but stopped. To discover the reason, it is necessary to turn to dispatches from other centers. These tell stories of unimaginable horror in the reservation and in the ghettos of Polish towns. Jewish deportees are starving, freezing, homeless, jobless, and without money; thousands are ill of typhus and other diseases. The reservation has become a place of death and a center of infection. The hospitals are overflowing. A recent dispatch from Paris reports that "Dr. Frank, who visited the reservation a few days ago, is reported to be dissatisfied. . . . He told his aides . . . that the idea of the reservation is difficult to work out and too costly, as foreign Jews are unwilling to pour relief money into a reservation." So 60,000 Jews from various parts of the Reich who were to have been sent into the reserved area are now "concentrated near Cracow" and ghettos are being established in various Polish towns.

This is only a fragment of the story, as the fate of the Jews is only a fragment of the fate of the subject peoples of the Reich. The Poles themselves have in thousands been arrested, or executed, or moved to other parts of Germany, or simply turned out of their homes to make room for Germans or the transplanted Balts. A mania of migration possesses Hitler. Into the new "living-space" Germans must spread to accomplish the Teutonic occupation of the whole land. The original inhabitants are being dispersed, to serve as workers under the master race and to shed the bonds that bind them to their native soil and customs and kin. And the Jews are merely to be segregated, without means—for their wealth is confiscated—and without rights, segregated to live or to die as their richer brothers in other lands may determine. Hitler washes his hands of them.

But the rest of the world, slowly awakening to the savage internal warfare that is destroying the lives of millions along with the basic human decencies, cannot wash its hands of either Hitler or his victims. The state of Poland, the new mass torture of the Jews form too clear a blueprint of what Hitler intends for Europe. It is a challenge to the humanity of all of us. It is also a challenge to our understanding and determination. If we don't like the picture of Hitler's "Continental system," what do we want? And how do we intend to get it?

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 57

EDITORIALS:

ACT TWO: THE COUGHLIN TERROR 59
WHEN THE TREATY ENDS 60
JEWS IN HITLER'S POLAND by Freda Kirchwey 61
A HULL-JACKSON TICKET by Kenneth G. Crawford 63
POLLING AMERICA by James Wechsler 64
THE POUND AND FRANC UNITE by Fritz Sternberg 68
IDEALISTS AS CYNICS by Reinhold Niebuhr 72
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 74
IN THE WIND 75
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 76

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 77
FICTION BETWEEN TWO WORLDS by Philip Rahv 77
THE OLD SOUTHERN STORY by Jonathan Daniels 78
THE SCIENCE OF POWER by Adolf Sturmthal 79
RECENT FICTION 80
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 80
DRAMA: LUCID INTERVAL by Joseph Wood Krutch 81
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 82

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

A Hull-Jackson Ticket

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, January 15

WASHINGTON is currently engaged in a game of blind man's buff with all but one player blindfolded. The President, it is assumed, knows what his Administration is up to. Everyone else is groping. It is obvious that he has been pursuing a policy of deliberate befuddlement. The trouble is that he has succeeded too well. He has confused his allies no less than his enemies.

Since the first of the year he has made three major speeches: his opening address to Congress, his budget message, and his "plate-side chat." The first was a straightforward statement of anti-dictatorship, non-isolationist policy, but it was immediately followed by the President's refusal to take the initiative in applying this policy to Finland. The second was an admirable defense of his spending policy coupled with a recommendation for budget economy. The third was a warning to his party not to lose the independent vote; it failed to tell how to hold this vote.

All is confusion, principally, of course, because there has been no answer to the key questions: Will the President run for a third term, and if not whom will he support? If his political plans were known, other pieces of the great puzzle would start falling into place.

The President himself supplied no clues on Jackson Day, but by dovetailing his speech with those of Attorney General Robert H. Jackson in Cleveland and Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace in Des Moines it was possible to make out a good prima facie case for a third-term intention. Indeed, the case was too good. It was too obvious that the President, in writing his own speech and approving the other two, was trying to revive third-term speculation, which had been obscured in the succession of booms for McNutt, Garner, and most recently Secretary of State Hull.

Instead of intensifying the impression that a third term is possible, the Jackson Day speeches had the opposite effect. The New Deal loyalists still hope the President will run, and they are still talking for effect of the chance that he would accept a draft nomination, but the grapevine carries apparently authentic stories that Mr. Roosevelt's intimates have despaired of persuading him to carry the awful burdens of his office for another four years, that he longs for renewal of the kind of personal relationship that is impossible in the White House and is literally counting the days until his term expires.

These stories account for the seriousness with which the recent Hull try-out has been taken. There can be no doubt that the President thrust Hull into the spotlight by talking up his availability to visitors and by underwriting his reciprocal trade program. In consequence of the President's strong support, it now appears that the Trade Agreements Act may be renewed despite Republican opposition and furious log-rolling by tariff-fed industries and agricultural interests. If it is, Hull's stock cannot but rise.

It is significant, too, that Attorney General Jackson has been advanced for the vice-presidential nomination on the Hull ticket. It is generally accepted as fact here that Jackson and Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas are the two men to whom the President would most willingly hand over his office. But neither is conceded a chance of getting the Presidential nomination. Jackson might get by as Hull's running mate, however.

Viewed in the light of this political possibility, what goes on in Washington is somewhat less puzzling. The President is trying to keep attention focused on foreign affairs. He has won general acceptance of his foreign policy, which is also Hull's. He has ridden it back into high public favor if the polls of public opinion are to be trusted. It is a horse whose rider might be successfully changed in midstream. Where domestic policy is concerned, the President has given enough ground to his critics to shut them up. Robert Taft and the other Republican hopefuls can mutter about balancing the budget, but they can't justify any more red penciling than the President has already done unless they start crossing out national-defense items and brave the popular demand for more ships, guns, and airplanes. The President's compromise strategy also has gone a long way toward reuniting his own party and creating a situation in which Hull, who is essentially conservative, could run without compromising himself.

The jigsaw picture emerges, but there is one important piece missing. What about the liberals, the people who were for the New Deal before it was watered down? Have they disappeared? Would they be satisfied with the ghoulish comfort that Jackson might eventually get into the White House? They are weakly represented in this Congress, and their political effectiveness has been undermined by the split in the labor movement and other schisms. They are inclined to accept Roosevelt on faith, confident even when his immediate position displeases them that his general direction is good. They cannot be delivered in a drove to Hull or anyone else.

Conceding that there has been a swing to the right in public opinion, it has not been sweeping enough to wipe liberals off the face of the United States.

The President's greatest danger, if he is trying to hand the Presidency to a conservative on the theory that a liberal cannot be nominated, is that Congress will follow the figures in his budget message rather than the text. Competent economists expect a recession next spring. If it comes, the President's estimates for relief and public works will be tragically inadequate. There will be no government prop for business, and there will be hungry people. These consequences of this winter's policy of silencing conservatives by stealing their thunder will not be good advertising for a tired New Deal.

Liberals will have little voice in the Democratic convention, it is true, and even if the Democrats ignore them they cannot turn to the Republicans. But as Secretary of Interior Ickes has suggested, they might consider a futile third-party effort preferable to political orphanage. They will do nothing until the third term is definitely out, which may be one of the reasons for perpetuating the mystery.

Polling America

BY JAMES WECHSLER

TO 150,000 "men in the street," and women, the emissaries of the American Institute of Public Opinion last year propounded more than 500 questions. Should the Wagner Act be changed and in what manner? Do you know the words of the Star-Spangled Banner? Do newspapers lie, does Martin Dies? Where do you stand on Passamaquoddy, Tom Dewey, topless bathing suits, foreign policy, and shorts for women, and did you make any New Year's resolutions? Should the railroads be owned collectively; do you think so mildly or strongly? The replies were tabulated by men and machines in a Princeton, New Jersey, office; 106 newspapers published the findings several times a week as a candid-camera view of the American mind.

Dr. George Gallup, who guides the institute, and Elmo Roper, who directs the monthly survey for Fortune, are the leading lights of the flourishing public-opinion industry. Alumni of the school of market research, Gallup and Roper operate in visibly non-proletarian environments. Gallup divides his time between his duties as an advertising executive for Young and Rubicam and his supervisory work at the institute. When Roper isn't exploring the public mind for Fortune, he is running surveys for commercial clients who want private information on public preferences. The institute's surveys made their debut on front pages in 1935 shortly after the appearance of the first Fortune analyses. To advanced students there are some marked differences between the methods of Gallup and Roper, but in any general appraisal the similarities overshadow the contrasts. Critics of the polls make little distinction between them.

In some measure attacks on the polls stem from popular disbelief in the integrity of the findings. If Gallup's interviewers descend on 150,000 people a year, and Roper's surveyors question about 30,000, together they touch less than .002 of the population in a year. Most people think the accuracy of a poll proportionate to its numerical scope; so the suspicion grows that someone has been electioneering in the vicinity of the polls. Yet the Fortune survey, based on 10,000 personal interviews, not only forecast the Roosevelt landslide but came within .07 per cent of giving the precise plurality. More recently Gallup's institute, from fewer than 2,000 ballots, prophesied Governor Lehman's election over Tom Dewey within 1 per cent of the total vote. The secret of these success stories is simple: they prove that it is far more important to buttonhole a genuine cross-section than to correspond by mail with a million citizens whose names appear in the telephone book. The classic failure of the phone-book theory was the Literary Digest poll, which on the basis of 2,376,523 mailed ballots predicted that Landon was in. Nevertheless, it is still fashionable to ask, "Have you ever met anybody who knows someone who has met anyone who has been interviewed by the Gallup poll?" The odds are high that the answer will be no. The inference is obvious: Gallup makes up the answers as well as the questions.

As the polls grow older and their circle of chance acquaintances expands, this skepticism may quietly die out. Less likely to disappear is the school of thought which contends that the polls are intrinsically a menace to the republic: they reveal only the sum total of popular ignorance; they foster the heresy that Mr. Milquetoast has something to say and a right to be heard even between election days; they thereby imperil the structure of "representative government."

The right's laments are not a priori reason for cheers on the left. For if the right is afraid that the polls will disclose the majority will at embarrassing moments, liberals may legitimately fear the reverse—manipulation of the polls by the conservative interests which ultimately pay for them. The statistical accuracy of surveys of pre-election preferences is verifiable on Election Day; Gallup's findings on issues like the Wagner Act, which justifiably occupy the bulk of the institute's time, cannot be checked. If the results of a badly worded or miscounted poll are published at a critical legislative moment, the damage will be in proportion to the influence of the institute, and its influence is steadily mounting. When it reports that 75 per cent of the people who have any opinion on the subject favor another Congressional bounty for Martin Dies, the result is quoted in countless conservative editorial columns.

To what extent do these surveys offer authentic, meaningful glimpses into the American mind? I witnessed interviews in three cities, observing the "sample" persons questioned on a one-day Gallup—night watchmen, day nurses, policemen, bacteriologists, business executives, relief workers. Before interviews begin, two crucial steps in the manufacture of polls have been completed. The questions have been formulated and "pre-tested," and the cross-section has been selected. There is ample chance for sabotage along this assembly line.

Phrasing the ballots is a nightmare in semantics. At the Gallup Institute they are drafted by Gallup and four aides whose politics range from left Democrat to right Republican; the Fortune surveys are planned at editorial conferences in the Fortune offices with Roper and his staff. Roper voted for Norman Thomas in 1932 and for Roosevelt in 1936. Gallup is farther to the right but voices a faith in the "common man" that would not recommend him to the Union League Club. Both men are conscientiously groping for a vantage point above the battle where questions can be formulated in a spirit of peace and neutrality. Nevertheless, neither one escapes all the pitfalls of catechism construction. The most obvious can be indicated by a single case history. Roper conducted a test survey on the question: "Should the United States do all in its power to promote world peace?" Ninety-seven per cent of the answers were affirmative. To the same cross-section he addressed the question: "Should the United States become involved in plans to promote world peace?" Only 60 per cent said yes. The problem is rarely as simple as this exhibit might imply. While "involved" is a flagrantly "bad" word, the creation of a neutral vocabulary for polls is still an infant science. Nor are "bad" words the only device by which questions may be stacked. A recent Columbia University survey revealed the degree to which answers may be influenced by positive or negative formulation of questions and other variations in sentence structure.

Even if the poll makers lived in a shock-proof ivory tower, the chances of possible distortion would be many. As it is, they are constantly subjected to the slings and arrows of outraged pressure groups. When Gallup's institute reported that 42 per cent of America's Catholic population wanted the embargo on Spain lifted, its findings were at once assailed in Catholic press and pulpit. A priest informed Gallup that he had taken a "show of hands" in his own parish and his findings totally contradicted the institute's; hence Gallup must be either mistaken or mischievous. All partisan groups tend to inhabit a dream world in which they see only friendly nods. But their pressure may have its effects, however subtle.

What may prove more insidious than these demonstrations is the dependence of Dr. Gallup's industry on the good-will of a press which is predominantly conservative. The fees of subscribing newspapers support the institute; inevitably there have been rumors that the polls would be loaded to keep the clientèle contented. If editorial writers claim to speak for "the people" and these surveys reveal that they don't, Gallup's difficulties may become acute. So far there have been few illustrations of clear-cut bias, but the errors which have crept in dramatize the danger. In April, 1938, the institute asked: "In your opinion which will do more to get us out of the depression—increased public spending for relief and public works or helping business by reducing taxes?" When it reported that 79 per cent favored helping business, the result got widespread acclamation from tory circles. Was it a fair question? "Helping business" has affirmative overtones; "spending" is almost an epithet. Moreover, liberals argue that "spending" would "help business" while the stimulus of "reduced taxes" might prove negligible. Actually the question accepted a Wall Street diagnosis of our economic ills. More recently the institute queried: "Do you think that labor unions should be regulated to a greater extent by the federal government?" An overwhelming majority said yes. Such a poll could be used as evidence of popular clamor for federal curbs on labor unions. What would have happened if the question had posed specific federal restrictions instead of the general, amiable concept of "regulation"? Last April the institute asked: "Do you think there are any persons on relief in your community who could get jobs in private industry if they tried?" Sixty-nine per cent said yes. That was dynamite for the anti-relief offensive. But suppose the word "any" had been "many"?

These are random examples. In the course of a year the institute releases polls on more than 250 public issues; a large majority of them are susceptible to no such criticism. Moreover, there is evidence that the flaws are diminishing. One of the most conspicuous improvements has been the listing of "no opinions." When the institute took its first poll on the Wagner Act it reported that a majority desired alterations in the statute. What it failed to report was that nearly half the people interviewed had no opinion either way. The omission resulted in a woefully erroneous picture. The Roper poll has always reported its "no opinions."

In the fashioning of a "sample," the basic assumption is that from 3,000 to 8,000 people—if they are the right people—offer a pretty faithful picture of American thinking. Old-time "straw votes" were based on random interviews in the neighborhood saloon or on mail ballots from anyone who bothered to respond. Now it is recognized that a valid sampling must reach—in person—an accurate ratio (to the whole nation) of voters from each state, from rural communities, towns, and cities of varying size, of men and women, of different age groups and of every economic level, and of varying political allegiances. To get these proportions, election returns, census reports, and similar documents are constantly sifted. When an interviewer sets out he is not only given his printed sheets listing about fifteen questions, but he is told how many people in each category—"wealthy," "average-plus," "average," "poor-plus," "poor," "on relief"—must be accosted, on street corners or in their homes. A poll is normally completed within two weeks from the time the questions are sent out, and emergency surveys are sometimes rushed through in as short a time as twenty-four hours. With a staff of 1,000 interviewers who work part time for 65 cents an hour, Gallup can scarcely guarantee the integrity of each investigator. He believes none the less in maintaining a political balance in his field force: 35 per cent are Democrats, 37 per cent Republicans, 5 per cent belong to "other parties," and 23 per cent profess no allegiance. Roper employs only 72 interviewers, each of whom he knows intimately. With greater leisure to compile his Fortune surveys, he has wider opportunities for experimentation and checking. He suffers from the corollary disadvantage that if one or two of his staff go wrong, their defections will have proportionately greater impact on his results.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

What have the answers to good questions, addressed intelligently to the right cross-section, proved about America? Above all they have revealed an incredibly animated populace anxious to articulate its fears, resentments, and loyalties. Although probably less than one in twenty of those interviewed have ever heard of the Gallup Institute, only a handful won't talk. At first they suspect that the interviewer is a salesman; they are occasionally reluctant to disclose their political affiliations, especially if they are on relief; and they are frequently awkward in framing their beliefs. Yet there is a perceptible undertone of excitement in these interviews which the statistics don't record; to a host of Americans the polls represent a unique adventure in democratic life. On issues which have immediate personal impact, like involvement in war, they grasp at the chance to divulge what they are thinking, with the hope that someone in Washington will see the answers.

Cumulatively the polls reflect that strange blend of self-interest, idealism, and stereotyped reaction which is the essential nature of "public opinion." They reveal major shifts in enthusiasms, preferences, and prejudices. They have shown the degree to which Franklin D. Roosevelt is almost a deity to rank-and-file citizens and the degree to which propaganda against specific New Deal reforms has been able to overshadow the Roosevelt magic. They are less able to tell us where we are going, or to define precise attitudes toward particular developments on the way. There is no reliable barometer of intensity. Both the Fortune and Gallup surveys, for example, show an overwhelming desire to stay out of war, even if the Allies are losing, and, in percentages, a similarly sweeping sympathy for the Allied cause. At some point there may be a collision between these two aspects of America's split personality. If the Allies are losing and need men, which symbols—isolationist or interventionist—will prevail? To what extent will a sudden shock—like the bombing of London—invalidate the form-charts? In trying to evaluate intensity Roper employs a "menu" type of ballot giving a detailed series of choices within the framework of a single issue. Gallup sometimes has his interviewers estimate the vigor of responses; on other occasions they ask the person being interviewed to tell how "strongly" he holds a particular opinion. The first method places enormous responsibility on the interviewer's perception and is subject to individual variations in language. The second leads to all sorts of complications, as in the following dialogue which I witnessed:

> Q. Do you think that labor unions should be regulated to a greater extent by the federal government?
>
> A. (strongly) Yes.
>
> Q. Do you believe that strongly?
>
> A. (weakly) Yes.

A housewife vigorously asserted that she favored a third term for President Roosevelt. When asked whether she favored that strongly, she shook her head. Consider the following dialogue:

> Q. In general do you approve or disapprove today of Roosevelt as President?
>
> A. (strongly) I think he's doing a good job.
>
> Q. Secretary Wallace says the war in Europe has made it necessary for Roosevelt to have a third term. Do you agree?
>
> A. Yes, I think it does.
>
> Q. If Tom Dewey runs for President in 1940 on the Republican ticket against President Roosevelt running for a third term, which would you prefer?
>
> A. (strongly) Tom Dewey.

I heard a transit worker passionately tell one of Roper's interviewers that "the reds should all be shut up by the government," and in the next breath assert that the government should support all the needy "even if it means the end of the capitalist system." There is nothing extraordinary about these contradictions. But they make the polls far more useful as a mirror of the moment than as blueprints of the future.

If polls on great and dramatic issues like the war reveal divided impulses, opinion on issues like the Wagner Act is far more difficult to evaluate. Questions may reveal anything from elaborate confusion to unadorned ignorance. This dialogue was held with a night watchman:

> Q. Do you think the Wagner Act should be repealed, revised, or left alone?
>
> A. I guess it ought to be changed.
>
> Q. In what way should it be changed?
>
> A. Well, to tell the truth, I don't know much about it but I read all the time in the paper that it should be changed, so I guess there must be something wrong.

And this answer was received from a laundry owner after the same question was put to him:

> A. Yes, it should be repealed for a lot of changes. First, they got to figure costs. Wagner don't know anything; he has an income. They just figure minimum wages; they don't care where it comes from.

Such answers may not contribute a great deal to the sum of human knowledge about labor relations, but they do show the stealthy power of anti-labor propaganda.

Possibly the most grotesque interview I witnessed was this one:

> Q. Do you think that Germany is carrying on propaganda in the United States?
>
> A. Oh, sure.
>
> Q. In what way?
>
> A. Oh, by sinkin' our ships.
>
> Q. Why do you think they are carrying on such propaganda?
>
> A. I guess they want to get us into war.

More common is the simple confession of ignorance: to questions about the undistributed-profits tax, 70 per cent admitted that they didn't know what the controversy was about. That, too, is worth recording.

After watching fifty interviews I could cite a large number of cases in which the answers were based on half-knowledge and intuition. But against those I could cite many others in which keen insight was revealed by people who were, in a sense, just learning to talk because nobody had previously asked them anything. When Life published its pictures of the "Birth of a Baby," all the decency legionnaires cried out in protest. It sounded as if America were unanimous in its repudiation of the facts of life. The Gallup Institute reported that a large majority of the persons it interviewed approved of the publication. This was important and useful news, and it is not a unique example; the polls have encouraged the suspicion that Americans have minds. Undoubtedly there are "blanks," but one "blank" is no proof that "the masses is asses."

During the recent Congressional debate on foreign policy Americans were confronted anew with a twentieth-century phenomenon: government by telegram. At periodic signals from Royal Oak, Father Coughlin's faithful didn't walk, they ran, to the nearest telegraph office. Simultaneously the Hearst newspapers published coupons supporting the embargo which readers were implored to send to Washington. If legislators had relied on mails and wires for their judgment of popular feeling, they would have been obliged to conclude that the United States was pro-embargo. Both the Fortune and Gallup polls revealed the falsity of that view. Frank Gannett has demonstrated the potentialities of open-letter writing, bulwarked by newspaper advertisements, radio appeals, mass circularizing. In these clashes God is on the side of the biggest financial battalions; so are the newspapers. The polls represent a tremendous effort to democratize the business of pressure.

They also have a long-term function. Democracy has been throttled elsewhere because democrats underestimated the strength and momentum of the anti-democratic crusade. The polls act as storm warnings. They reveal anti-labor hysteria, susceptibility or resistance to reactionary slogans, fluctuations in attitude toward social reform. In recent years Americans have been disturbed by the spread of anti-Semitic propaganda. The Fortune survey on anti-Semitism provided documentary evidence of the degree to which anti-Semitism has permeated American life. For some time we have suspected the range of political corruption in a state like Louisiana. The Gallup Institute directly and privately asked the voters of that state whether they thought the balloting was corrupt. The answer was appalling.

But if they are to serve as a brake on active minorities or as a map for sociologists, the polls themselves must be free from suspicion. It is true that the enterprises are competitive, and if Gallup's findings are strikingly dissimilar to Roper's, someone is likely to investigate the discrepancy. It is also true that one major scandal would bury any polling business. But as long as the major polls are private investments, a measure of skepticism will survive. Although it would be just as perilous to place the taking of polls exclusively in the hands of a government agency, the existence of a government-sponsored poll, functioning side by side with private ones, might well lessen some of the present risk. This does not mean a vote of no confidence in Gallup or Roper; Roper himself has vigorously advocated government-run polls—a "TVA" for the opinion-finding industry. They are both making a brave, thoughtful, and impressive exploration of heretofore uncrossed frontiers. I am suggesting that the assignment is too formidable to be restricted to a few private persons, subject only to the restraints of competition and conscience.

The polls are likely to grow rather than diminish in significance. The charge that they threaten to usurp Congressional functions is double-edged. For it is relevant only if the gulf between people and Congress has ominously widened. That disclosure alone would justify the industry's existence.

The Pound and Franc Unite

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

THE course of this war is dotted with surprises. Nobody expected it to start with the present amazing alignment of powers: Britain and France against a Germany bound to the U. S. S. R. by ties of close friendship and various trade treaties, with Italy really maintaining its neutrality. Nobody could have predicted that for several months after its start the war would be limited to occasional skirmishes on the western front. But one of the many predictions made by military oracles has come true: the war is being fought most vigorously on the economic front.

In 1914 the economic strength of Britain and France was very great, the two countries having enjoyed a comparatively long period of unbroken peace. Their reserves appeared practically inexhaustible. Consequently each country followed its own economic course. British and French purchasing commissions worked independently abroad and even competed with each other for badly needed foreign goods. Today the Allies have urgent reasons to join economic forces. Not only have economic weapons increased in importance, but Britain as well as France entered this war with impaired resources. Britain embarked on the first World War with a balanced budget. Today the remaining burdens of that war of twenty-five years ago still affect the financial equilibrium of the country. War debts to the United States remain unpaid. The books of the British Treasury still carry a national war debt amounting to about seven billion pounds, annual interest on which represents a heavy burden on the taxpayers. In the past ten years France has never succeeded in balancing its budget. Aside from its "ordinary" budget, it has been compelled to carry an "extraordinary" budget, covered by loans and short-term debentures. In addition, the franc has deteriorated in value by about 90 per cent since the outbreak of the first World War. The years from 1919 to 1939 were marked by much more economic disturbance than those preceding 1914. Further economic progress was not attained. On the contrary, the total amount of British and French foreign assets was reduced during this period. Moreover, the economic systems of Britain and France were adversely influenced by ever-increasing preparations for war that started years before the conflict broke out.

To overcome these disadvantages a joint Anglo-French Economic Staff has been created. A common economy is expected to compensate for the reduced resources of the Allies and to enable them to fill the gaps in their economic reserves.

What are the tasks facing the Allied Economic General Staff? With headquarters in London, it is subdivided into six departments—for aviation, armament, raw materials, oil, food, and navigation. The aviation department's immediate task is the acceleration of aircraft production. At the beginning of the war Germany had a distinct advantage in this respect. It is imperative to increase Allied production so that superiority in the air may be attained in the shortest possible time. In the matter of armament the highly developed British industrial system has already been able to render good service to the French army, which relies on a smaller industrial base. The production of armaments is being divided according to a common plan, and supplies are being distributed to the best advantage of both parties.

The remaining four sections of the Economic General Staff handle imports from foreign countries and the problem of their transportation. In this sphere it was soon found that the financing of foreign purchases required entirely new regulations. Britain's chief economic weakness soon manifested itself: the pound's international rate of exchange could not be maintained at its peacetime level. During the comparatively short period which has elapsed since the outbreak of the war the pound has lost about one-fifth of its value. The franc has followed a parallel course. Moreover, the devaluation of the pound took place before there had been any considerable increase of British imports. The static character of the warfare along the western front has required no great replacement of war materials, and the Anglo-French armament industries have been able to cope with the limited demand. This premature devaluation of the pound bodes ill for the future. If at a time of limited imports the pound lost one-fifth of its value, it may be expected to lose much more after imports have increased to correspond with greater activity on the western front. To mitigate the severe financial shocks that would result from the consumption of huge stocks of war materials, the Allied Economic General Staff decided on common financing of all foreign purchases. In their relations to foreign exporters Britain and France are thus a single economic unit. And the alliance goes even farther. While a firm relation between the pound and the franc existed prior to the war, the recent agreement makes this relation absolutely fixed. To all practical purposes Britain and France have now a common currency, even though it is still called "pound" in England and "franc" in France. All foreign purchases are made jointly, and the bills—payable in England—are charged to separate accounts at a fixed ratio. Great Britain carries 60 per cent of all expenses accruing abroad and France 40 per cent, a ratio which Britain refused to accept during the first World War.

Two factors are responsible for Britain's decision to carry the financial burdens of the war at a ratio of three to two. First, Great Britain is an extremely wealthy country with foreign assets and gold reserves considerably in excess of those of France. Secondly, German propaganda has left nothing undone to separate France from Britain. The controlled German press refuses to accept France as an enemy. Mussolini's wisecrack, "Britain is determined to fight to the last Frenchman," was made into a slogan by the Nazi propaganda machine. German loud-speakers installed along the Westwall blare day and night trying to convince the poilus that they are being used for Britain's selfish imperialistic aims. The Anglo-French economic agreement is the Allies' answer to this German propaganda. It demonstrates their determination to achieve permanent cooperation on the basis of mutual interests. Also, the British are perhaps willing to carry the greater economic burden in return for the greater human sacrifices that may be demanded from the French. There are at present only a few hundred thousand British troops in France as against the almost four million mobilized Frenchmen. It is not expected that even in 1940 the numerical strength of the British expeditionary force will exceed one or one and a half million men. If the war develops large-scale actions in the near future or in the spring, French soldiers will be called upon to do the bulk of the fighting.

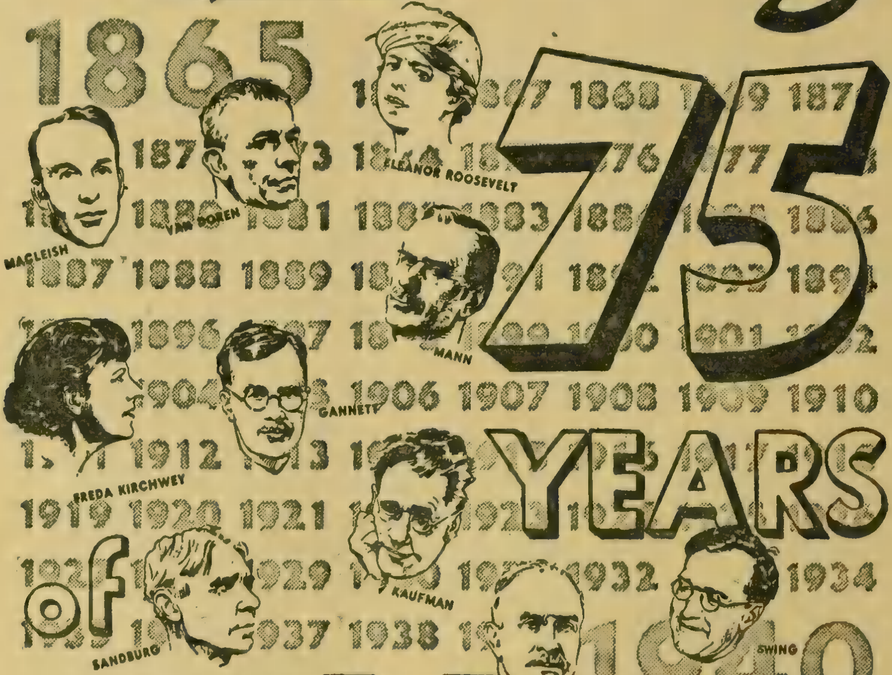
To the Germans Britain's assumption of the greater responsibility in financing the war demonstrates the stubborn determination of the English to mobilize and use all their resources. But the Germans cannot afford to admit that they are impressed. The old propaganda continues unabated in Berlin, and the Allies' economic cooperation is represented as another British trap laid for the gullible French. The Deutsches Nachrichten Bureau, the official German news agency, commented at length on the creation of the Economic General Staff, emphasizing that its remarks represented the official reaction of the Nazi government. The importance of the economic alliance was minimized in an explanation which bore all the marks of impotent fury.

> Following official cues [it ran] the entire British press and radio greeted this "economic alliance" with inspired hymns of praise whose extravagance made one suspect that something was to be hushed up. An examination of the purposes and consequences of the Anglo-French agreement confirms and justifies our suspicions. . . . Since all British gold reserves are exhausted, Britain has no gold at its disposal. During the past fourteen months Britain has sent no less than three billion dollars in gold to the United States. The losses of gold were sufficiently alarming to keep these shipments a closely guarded secret. At the request of the British government the Treasury of the United States ceased to publish the usual weekly reports concerning European gold shipments to the United States.
>
> To finance its American purchases, Britain has already been compelled to sell its shares of American corporations. Up to 50,000 such shares are being sold daily on American stock exchanges, a process which cannot of course be continued indefinitely. On the other hand, Britain spends considerable amounts in French francs for military purposes. If these francs and the dollars required for armament purchases were to be bought with English pounds, it would be impossible to hold up the pound on its declivitous course. Obviously, one of the main tasks of the Anglo-French agreement is to protect the two currencies and to enable both governments to dispose of the reserves of the two countries.
>
> To comply with these aims, France will be compelled to employ its still considerable gold reserves of almost 100 billion francs for the support of the English pound and to pay the bills of not only French but also English armament purchases in the United States. Furthermore, France will be compelled to cover British military expenses with francs at the pound's present rate of exchange. Thus France has renounced even the possibility of an independent exchange policy and hung the franc's fate permanently on that of the pound. Aside from using French gold for its own purposes, Britain has coupled its pound with the franc, thus dragging the franc into the abyss into which the pound, abandoned by all the world, has fallen.

Every sentence of this official German explanation is inaccurate. Anyone acquainted with the figures published by the Federal Reserve Board will be surprised to learn that Britain has no more gold at its disposal and requires the gold of the Bank of France to support the pound. There has been a fairly steady sale of British-owned shares on American stock exchanges, and it has in fact gone as high as 50,000 shares on a single day, as the Germans assert; but even if sales reached this figure every day it would take more than six years for the British to lose all their American holdings. The same Frankfurter Zeitung which printed the German government's fantastic explanation stated only a few weeks before that Great Britain's and Canada's financial reserves in the United States amounted to 1.8 billion dollars in gold and to 3.8 billion dollars in other salable assets. The sudden disappearance of these funds is a mystery. Only the German Propaganda Ministry knows the solution.

The Germans' unconcealed wrath testifies to the uneasiness with which official Nazi circles received the news of Anglo-French economic cooperation. In spite of what the Nazis say in their controlled press, France's position will be considerably improved, since it will be able to lean heavily on the enormous financial reserves and resources

Celebrating



1865
75 YEARS of 1940
ELEANOR ROOSEVELT
MACLEISH
VAN DOREN
MANN
GANNETT
FREDA KIRCHWEY
KAUFMAN SANDBURG
VILLARD
SWING

THE Nation

America's Leading Liberal Weekly

with a memorable

100 PAGE 75TH ANNIVERSARY ISSUE

Cover design by Georges Schreiber

ARTICLES • CRITICISM • STORIES • VERSE • CARTOONS • HUMOR

By THOMAS MANN · OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD · LEWIS GANNETT · RAYMOND GRAM SWING · ARCHIBALD MACLEISH · GEORGE S. KAUFMAN · ELEANOR ROOSEVELT · KEITH HUTCHISON · NATHANIEL PEFFER · KATHERINE ANNE PORTER · I. F. STONE · MAX LERNER FREDA KIRCHWEY · LOUIS FISCHER · CARL SANDBURG · HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON LOW · WILLIAM GROPPER · GEORGES SCHREIBER · JOHN CHAMBERLAIN · and others.

THE Nation's 75TH ANNIVERSARY ISSUE—

PUBLISHED FEBRUARY 10, 1940

will cover the period of America's coming of age, and trace the emergence of progressive thought as a dominant force in the social and political life of the United States—a story inextricably linked with the record of The Nation's growth. It will be both a stock-taking and a program, bringing the perspective of a great past to bear on the problems of a challenging future, and indicating the direction in which we may best

BUILD ON AMERICA'S HERITAGE

- "As a boy, struggling for an education in a small town in Wisconsin, I looked upon The Nation as representing the world of culture into which I hoped some day to find entry. As a young reporter for a conservative New York City daily, I learned to respect it as a militant weekly fighting for reforms I knew were needed.

"In recent years, I have learned to value and applaud The Nation's outstanding service as an able and courageous champion of the oppressed and underprivileged. In this material-minded America, where prejudice, publicity and propaganda are at the service of the rich and powerful, The Nation should be required reading for every opinion-maker."

H. V. KALTENBORN

- "For a great many years, I have been a reader of The Nation and one of its humble admirers. Its courageous and unselfish attitude in defending the rights and liberties of the common man has won for it the admiration of all people who believe in justice and liberty. I should be happy if I knew that its voice could be heard at every fireside in America.

"It should be an inspiration to you who have made this able fight to know that your words and efforts have given joy and satisfaction to the thousands of readers who have tried to follow your leadership in the battle for human progress and happiness."

SENATOR GEORGE W. NORRIS

- "The Nation has always reminded me of the youthful David— the lad with the slingshot who didn't pull his punches. It is hard to realize that David is going into his seventy-sixth year. Please accept this reader's salute. I know of no magazine with more consistent vitality and interest."

DR. GEORGE GALLUP

- "Heartiest birthday greetings. To every American who treasures, particularly in these trying times, our national ideals of justice, decency, and democracy, The Nation continues to be both a necessity and a stimulus."

CLIFTON FADIMAN

- "I prefer to express in versification
My candid notion of The Nation:
Some people idolize, some abhor it;
In a word, I am all for it."

FRANKLIN P. ADAMS ("F.P.A.")

- "Being among the Americans who were brought up with The Nation always in the house, I find that the first impression which comes into my mind is very much the impression one has of the weather. In my earliest memories I see my elders crying out on The Nation, dashing it impatiently down on the table with such words as, "Cantankerous!" "Contrary!" "Cussed!" I hear maiden aunts plaintively inquiring, "Doesn't The Nation ever like anything?" I hear my grandfather growling, "Trouble stick! Always stirring things up just to be pesky!"—but always, always I see The Nation steadily read, discussed, considered as inevitably necessary, a part of the life of American citizens with a decent intellectual self-respect, who want to keep on growing mentally, as the weather is a part of the lives of those who want to grow vegetables. And when the remembered reverberations of those cries of exasperation die away (they come first to mind because they were loudest) I see remembered pictures of somebody in the family sitting down near a lamp of an evening and reaching for the latest copy of The Nation with exactly the expression I know is on my face in 1940—confident expectation of a stimulating contact with intelligence, to meet which one's own rises with quickened zest."

DOROTHY CANFIELD FISHER

THE DEMAND FOR THIS ISSUE WILL BE GREAT— BE SURE TO GET YOUR COPY

YOUR REGULAR SUBSCRIPTION WILL INCLUDE THIS ANNIVERSARY ISSUE: 1 YR.—$5, 2 YRS.—$8, 3 YRS.—$11

● SEND IT TO A FRIEND

USE THIS INTRODUCTORY OFFER WHICH INCLUDES THE ANNIVERSARY NUMBER 13 WEEKS FOR ONLY $1.00

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY

THE NATION 55 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK, N. Y.

I inclose check for $............ Please enter subscriptions as indicated below:

......Years ......Weeks ......Years ......Weeks ......Years ......Weeks

Name.............................. Name.............................. Name..............................

Street.............................. Street.............................. Street..............................

City.............................. City.............................. City..............................

Donor.............................. Address.............................. 1-20-40

Extra Postage per Year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

of the British Empire. The immediate results of the agreement can be summarized as follows:

1. The stability of English and French currencies in their relation to foreign currencies and especially to the dollar will be increased. Britain and France together have foreign assets and gold reserves of from five to six billion pounds.

2. The trade of Britain and France and that of their two empires will be stimulated. Trade barriers between Britain and France will be partially removed. Since all English and French purchases from the United States must be on a cash basis, it is obvious that the Allies will try to buy as much as possible within their own empires, where practically unlimited credits are at their disposal and they need not draw on their foreign reserves.

3. As an ever-increasing section of the national economy is changed into a war economy under the direct control of the Allied Economic General Staff, the influence of the two states on their respective economic systems will simultaneously increase. In the process of this transition the sovereign rights of the two countries will be subjected to fundamental limitations, a fact which may be of extraordinary significance at a future date. The most important single feature of the Anglo-French economic agreement is that it will continue for six months beyond the duration of the war. Thus its final effect may be to change the entire economic structure of Europe.

Prior to the war Germany possessed the greatest industrial system in Europe. During the months that immediately preceded the outbreak of the war, German industrial production surpassed that of Great Britain by one-third and that of France by two-fifths. The two countries together, however, even without their empire possessions and dominions, take the lead from Germany. If this Anglo-French economic union can be maintained after the war, the combined industrial system will be definitely dominant in Europe. Certain events of past years foreshadow a development along these lines. The Ottawa conference of 1931 instituted closer cooperation between Great Britain and its dominions and colonies. This move turned out to be a step toward the consolidation of the British Empire along modern economic lines. Similarly, the present Anglo-French economic cooperation might result in a consolidation of Anglo-French economic relations which would persist long after the temporary emergency of war. The immediate importance of such a union to the rest of the world becomes clear when one considers that the Anglo-French bloc embraces more than five hundred million people scattered all over the earth.

Much is being said about the post-war reconstruction of a new Europe. Anglo-French economic cooperation may become one of the cornerstones upon which the work of reconstruction can be started.

Idealists as Cynics

BY REINGOLD NIEBUHR

NO NATION has ever been driven to political confusion in its judgments on foreign affairs by a greater variety of absolutist creeds than our contemporary America. The creeds are various, but they have in common the tendency to measure political realities, not in terms of possible historical alternatives, but by comparison with purely ideal possibilities. This is a fatal weakness in the realm of politics, for political values are highly relative. We never have the chance to choose between pure tyranny and pure freedom; we can only choose between tyranny and relative democracy. We do not have the choice between war and perfect peace, but only between war and the uneasy peace of some fairly decent and stable equilibrium of social forces. We cannot choose between violence and non-violence, but only between violence and a statesmanship which seeks to adjust social forces without violence but cannot guarantee immunity from clashes. We have never had the opportunity—and probably never will have—to choose between injustice and perfect equality, but only between injustice and a justice which moves toward equality and incorporates some of its values.

This obvious fact, to which all history attests, is denied either explicitly or implicitly by a wide variety of modern social creeds. These creeds, each of which probably has its own validity within measure, have combined their errors in such a way as to spread confusion. They have created an attitude of irresponsibility toward the tragic history of Europe and a spirit of cynicism in estimating the consequences of the war.

The pacifists and the Socialists are one in believing that nothing is at stake in the present European struggle. The Socialists take this position because they measure the evils of a capitalist society against the ideal possibilities of a socialist commonwealth of nations. The pacifists measure them against an ideal world in which there will be neither coercion nor resistance. The Communists and the national patriots make confusion worse confounded by insisting that these ideal possibilities have actually been realized in some nations. The Communists are certain that Russia cannot be imperialistic or prompted by nationalist motives; they believe that only capitalist nations can be imperialistic. This conclusion might give pause to the Socialists, who also believe that only capitalist nations are, or can be, imperialistic but who condemn Russia. Stalin may have corrupted the universalist ideal of socialism more than necessary; but history is bound to insinuate partial loyalties into universal ideals. The national patriots differ from the Communists only in their belief that it is America rather than Russia which is free of the egotism and imperialism they condemn in other nations. In either its communist or its American form the belief that one is free of the vices one sees in others is a comforting faith and betrays a self-righteousness as old as history.

Pacifism is usually the creed of only a small minority in any nation. It has achieved more than minority proportions in contemporary America largely because our churches are almost unanimous in their espousal of it. They have been driven to this position by their uneasy conscience over their hysteria in the last war. They have not been spiritually and morally profound enough to see that abstaining from all judgment between the contending forces is not the only possible alternative to proclaiming a "holy war." Pacifism is all the more popular in the churches because it is unconsciously mixed with the national fear of being involved in the war. In their anxiety to prove that they have purged themselves of the uncritical hysteria to which they yielded in the last war, the churches are inclined to identify religious perfectionism with the morally dubious impulses of an irresponsible nationalism. Religious perfectionism in ascetic terms probably has a greater validity than modern men realize. It may be a wholesome protest against all political relativities. But when a religious and moral absolute such as "perfect love" is introduced into politics as an alternative to the contest of power which is the very nature of politics, it breeds confusion. One form that this confusion takes is the disinclination of the pacifists to look at the horrible consequences of tyranny lest they be shaken in their conviction that nothing can possibly be worse than war.

The Socialists are inclined to cynical detachment from this war because they are secure in their conviction that war is the inevitable consequence of the capitalist economy. The genuine differences between Nazi tyranny and the cultural and social virtues of what is still left of civilization in Europe are thus obscured. It is of course important to be extremely critical of the motives and actions of the oligarchs who control modern democratic society. It is also well to remember that Hitler could not imperil all of Europe today if it were not for the treason of those oligarchs to the cause of democracy yesterday. It is also important to strive for a new organization of our economic life so that the capitalistic decay undermining the whole of Western civilization will not aggravate the anarchy of nations.

But it is hardly realistic to assume that a "new" society will automatically be free of national egotisms and rivalries, or even that the problem of preventing the "rulers" of a new society from becoming traitors to the essential interests of their commonwealths is permanently solved. Utopianism is always a source of confusion in dealing with immediate issues, because it accentuates the evils encountered by comparing them with perfections which history does not know and probably will never know. Many contemporary utopians, for instance, believe that a long-drawn-out war issuing in a stalemate would be a good thing because it would produce a general breakdown, in which the British tories and French reactionaries would be swept out before a socialist revolution. It is of course more probable that such a breakdown would bring, not socialism, but the totalitarianism from which Germany now suffers. If recent history has taught us anything it is that social organisms do not entertain the prospect of a breakdown, from which a new society is to emerge, with equanimity. Rather they seek to ward it off by reconstructions of their disintegrated economy under dictatorships. History ought therefore to have discounted social catastrophism as a political philosophy. Yet we find radicals who were once rigorous "social democrats" turning to catastrophism.

When utopian illusions are dispelled and one is not so certain what lies on the other side of social breakdown, either in terms of ideal possibilities or actual historical alternatives, one does not lightly hope for the breakdown of any social system in which there is still a degree of freedom and the possibility of achieving better social and economic adjustments. One hopes for such a breakdown only when any alternative is preferable to the existing tyranny.

The Communists, who still have a remarkably large following among intellectuals, add to the confusion of socialist utopianism by clinging to the absurd belief that utopia is in some measure a reality in Russia. This forces them to condone in Russian politics imperialist and nationalist motives which they profess to abhor in the capitalist nations, and to measure every political development by its effect upon Russian success. Thus they unite with the pacifists in deprecating American sympathy for Finland.

In this welter of conflicting dogmas it may be difficult to remember what ought not to be forgotten: that the anarchy of Western civilization has produced a particularly virulent form of tyranny in Europe; that this tyranny has destroyed every authentic form of culture in Germany and threatens every liberty in Europe; that the destruction of this tyranny, while only a negative condition of new health, is nevertheless a very important one. The fall of the Nazis will not of course of itself create a new Germany or a new Europe. The Allies, if victorious, will be tempted to take the French army's simple expedient for guaranteeing France against further German aggression. Whether another vindictive and abortive peace shall be made or whether Europe can lift the whole problem of security to a new level of international interdependence, is the paramount issue before Western society. A vindictive peace would mean that this war would be merely a milestone in the tragic course of European civilization toward ultimate disintegration.

Undoubtedly this issue will be fought out in the democratic nations on class lines, and the labor forces will have to make the largest contributions to a creative peace. But forces of sanity transcending class lines are engaged in the struggle. We may have reached a point in history in which the fear of alternatives too terrible to face will drive the usually stupid nations to seek security on a new level of creativeness. The fear of death, we are told, is an element in the travails of birth and furnishes some of the energy which makes birth possible. It is at any rate highly irresponsible to take a purely cynical attitude toward the possibilities of a decent peace. "If hopes are dupes, fears may be liars." Such an attitude is particularly blameworthy here because assumption of a responsible relation to this problem by America may well become a decisive factor in the peace.

However speculative the outcome of this tragic struggle may be, the attitude of cynicism, prompted by a disappointed idealism, is morally intolerable. But that is a lesson which our present generation of college students has yet to learn. They are now pretty generally engaged in proving that since all war news is propaganda they are absolved of the responsibility of seeking for the truth amid conflicting claims. In this they merely reflect the prevailing mood of their elders. America has contrived to brew self-righteousness, cynicism, idealism, and a fear psychosis into a pretty horrible mixture.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The Attack on the SEC

A HEAVY press attack on the SEC has developed as a result of its decision in the Consumers' Power case. Several of the biggest columnar guns have been brought to bear on it, and both the timing of their salvos and the nature of the high explosive employed suggest a common fire control and ammunition dump well camouflaged in the rear. The purpose of this bombardment appears to be to intimidate the SEC into reversing itself on the Consumers' Power issue.

One threat, developed by Frank R. Kent, is of a Congressional investigation, but there seems little likelihood of this being instituted at the present session, and probably Jerome Frank and his colleagues can treat this shell as a dud. More dangerous, perhaps, is the attempt of David Lawrence, among others, to outflank the SEC. Three of its five members, writes Mr. Lawrence, "must, in effect, confess by a reversal of their previous action that they allowed political motives and witch-hunting to be responsible for their refusal to approve a bond issue by Wendell Willkie's company, or else, by sticking to their guns, tie up new financing and new construction in 75 per cent of the utility industry, on which America has been depending for much help toward economic recovery in 1940."

What is it that the SEC has done to bring on this furious offensive? In the course of its duties under the Public Utilities Act it had to pass on a proposal by the Consumers' Power Company of Michigan, a subsidiary of Willkie's Commonwealth and Southern, to issue bonds totaling $28,594,000. Of this amount $10,000,000 was intended to finance new construction, while the remainder was required for the refunding of existing bonds carrying a higher rate of interest. The commission, by a majority, decided to approve that part of the bond issue that represented refinancing but refused to sanction the raising of new money in this form on the ground that the result would be to aggravate the already top-heavy capital structure of Consumers' Power. The common stock and surplus of the company, it pointed out, amounted to only 19.5 per cent of the total capitalization. In the case of the Detroit Edison Company and the Duquesne Light Company, comparable operating utilities, the ratios are 52.3 and 46.7 per cent, respectively, while a comparison made of the percentage of depreciated property applicable to common stock would be still more unfavorable to Consumers'.

Press critics of the SEC have seized on the fact that it has approved several recent utility bond issues which have been for companies with still lower ratios of common stock and surplus to total capitalization. But in each instance quoted these issues were purely for refunding purposes and therefore did not result in a lower ratio, as an increase in the loan capital of Consumers' would have done. This is a point most commentators found it convenient to overlook; nor did they mention the fact that while Consumers' is in a financial position to raise new money by the sale of common stock, these other companies are not.

Mr. Willkie has stated that a public sale of common stock of Consumers' Power is "impracticable," but he has not said why. Perhaps if he appeals to the SEC to reconsider its decision, as he still can do, he will explain his choice of this particular adjective. On the known facts it would seem that what he actually meant was that a common-stock issue would be extremely inconvenient for Commonwealth and Southern, which at present owns all Consumers' Power common and wants to maintain that position. In connection with the recent financing, it took up an additional 125,000 shares at a cost of $3,531,250, or $28.25 per share, which is the book value of the existing stock. This is a highly profitable investment, as is shown by the following statement of earnings available for common (on the basis of the stock outstanding on September 30, 1939) and dividends:

Calendar Year	Earnings per Share	Dividends
1936	$2.85	$1.60
1937	3.34	2.25
1938	3.31	2.00

Results for the first nine months of 1939 suggest that the full year will be at least as profitable.

With a showing like this there should be little difficulty in arranging equity financing for the purpose of supplying the funds needed for new construction. Back in December, when the case first came before the SEC, Otis and Company of Cleveland offered to underwrite the proposed 125,000 new shares "at a price substantially in excess of $28.25," and there can be no doubt, judging by market prices for the stocks of similar sound operating utilities, that a much larger issue could very readily be sold. Any investment banker would jump at the chance.

But Commonwealth and Southern, presumably, does not want to let the public in to dilute its valuable equity in Consumers' Power. Unfortunately, it could hardly subscribe $10,000,000 itself, for although its cash resources exceed this sum, thanks to the sale of its Tennessee interests to TVA, it has other subsidiaries to take care of. And it cannot raise new cash itself because, with arrears on its preferred stock amounting to $15,000,000, its credit standing is far inferior to that of Consumers' Power. It is possible that, faced by this dilemma, Mr. Willkie will have a change of heart and discover that an issue of Consumers' common stock to the public is not impracticable after all. But at the moment he seems to be taking the position that unless new financing can be arranged on the terms most profitable to Commonwealth and Southern, he will drop it altogether and blame the SEC for the cut in the Consumers' Power construction budget which will then become necessary. It is rather surprising that such a dog-in-the-manger attitude should be receiving so much support from journalistic guardians of the public interest.

The whole story throws a great deal of light on the utility situation and suggests strongly that the real barrier to increased capital investment in this very rapidly expanding field is not government regulation or high taxes but the obstructions placed by holding companies between operating utilities and the investing public. For years Mr. Willkie and the other holding-company bosses have been hammering on the theme that the root cause of the inability of utility corporations to raise new capital, particularly in equity form, was the New Deal's attacks on the industry. The truth is that a majority of the holding companies, whose stock for the most part never represented anything more substantial than the capitalized dizzy hopes of the boom era, are in such shape that nothing but a drastic use of the wringer could ever make them credit worthy. A great many of the operating companies, on the other hand, are in perfectly sound condition and always have been. It would be possible to quote many examples of such companies that paid substantial dividends on their common stocks all through the depression. The fact that these stocks can be bought on the market at comparatively low prices is a tribute to the bearish effect of Willkie's unjustifiable jeremiads rather than the result of any actual harm done them by New Deal agencies. But, no doubt, this situation suits the holding companies and their Wall Street controllers. So long as they are not in a position to provide new capital for the industry themselves, they prefer to put a damper on its provision from any other quarter. After all, if the result is to check new construction and thus hinder recovery, the press will always help to throw the blame on "that man."

In the Wind

JAY ALLEN, who has been lecturing extensively throughout the country, reports that audiences are uniformly "propaganda-conscious," and bitterly hostile to phrases reminiscent of the last war. "In the Midwest," Allen says, "you get the feeling that people are standing in the back of the hall with shotguns—waiting to shoot the first lecturer who mentions Belgian babies."

DEAN JAMES M. LANDIS of the Harvard Law School, whose decision saved Harry Bridges from deportation, is quietly trying to "deport" an American girl—with her consent. Engaged to an Englishman who will be in the trenches in two months, she wants to spend the intervening time with him, but the State Department has refused her a visa on the ground that her mission "isn't important." To State Department friends Landis has been pleading: "It's the most important thing in the world."

DIPLOMATIC NOTE: "A nobleman close to the entourage of exiled King Alfonso of Spain said tonight that rumors circulating abroad that Alfonso might soon return to Spain upon invitation of General Franco were 'absolutely untrue and above all premature.' "—United Press dispatch from Rome.

HEADLINE IN the Lowell (Massachusetts) Sun: "Officials Seek to Modernize Relief Department; Will Ask for Funds to Buy Addressograph Machine." . . . On Forty-eighth Street in New York there's a theater marquee reading: "She Gave Him All She Had, Every Day Including Sundays."

FRENCH "WAR-DEFENSE" regulations are causing a good many headaches for book publishers. Among the works that have been banned is Jack London's "Iron Heel," presumably because the French edition has an introduction by Paul Vaillant-Coutourier, who was a Communist.

IN THE SAME mail last week city editors got two releases from the publicity firm of Selvage and Smith. One was a story about Herbert Hoover's Finnish Relief Fund. The other was a plug for the Republican National Committee. . . . Heywood Broun's friends are collaborating on a book in his memory. . . . J. B. Matthews isn't talking to newspapermen these days. . . . Frank Gannett says: "I'll bet if I were President for six months we would have prosperity back."

HALF A DOZEN newspapers have launched a new stunt to boost their advertising appeal. The idea, originating in the Indianapolis Star, is to print "scented ads." The Star printed an ad for perfume in "perfumed ink"; it increased the ad's effectiveness, helped the paper's circulation, and pleased everyone except the printers. They complained that their wives were demanding to know where they had been all day.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

What Good Are Battleships?

IT IS good news, indeed, that there is a revolt on in Congress, that Senator Pat Harrison on the Democratic side and a strong group of the Republican minority have demanded the inquiry into army and navy budget demands so long urged in this column. With the New York Times also now favoring an inquiry, it begins to look as if something might be accomplished before long. I earnestly hope that if an investigation comes it will devote itself promptly to the question of battleships. The Navy Department has already announced that it wants two more. If these are granted, there will be ten of these monsters building. The seventh and eighth are already on the way and are to cost the Treasury no less than $90,000,000 apiece. The Navy Department, it appears, is now responding to pressure from the navy maniacs in the House and Senate and is actually considing increasing the size of these last two; it is to report also whether numbers nine and ten should not be of 80,000 tons—35,000 tons larger than any battleship now building in the world. The maniacs say that they want America to have not only incomparably the greatest fleet but ships of so great a size—costing probably $150,000,000 apiece—that no country will dare to attack us.

When the news was printed that some Congressmen were urging 80,000-ton ships, a cablegram from London stated that British authorities were utterly nonplussed by the report and could not understand why the United States wanted to build bigger ships when the whole trend in Europe was for smaller vessels. That this should be the prevailing opinion in England is hardly surprising. The British battleships have been nothing but a liability since this war began. One has been destroyed and another seriously damaged, and the others have been chiefly in hiding, precisely as they were during most of the last war. The only useful purpose they have served, so far as I can discover, has been to convoy Canadian troops from Canada to Great Britain. This has been done by "the main battle fleet," according to Winston Churchill. I have not seen this astounding fact commented upon in this country, yet there it is: the main battle fleet has been doing the convoy work ordinarily assigned to destroyers and light cruisers. This speaks for itself.

I should particularly like to hear the comment of those experts on both sides of the Atlantic who have been saying that even if the main fleet never moved out of Scapa Flow it was still performing a very useful service in that it was giving England control of the seas. Apparently that control was not so important that the main battleship fleet could not be taken away from England for a period of at least four weeks, during which time it was certainly not available to check any raids of Germany's remaining battleships and battle cruisers. The truth is that ever since the Royal Oak was sunk, the battleships have been hiding in various places, notably the Shetland Islands, which is one reason why German bombers have so frequently been visiting those islands. The fleet was rushed out of Scapa Flow when the Royal Oak went down for fear that the German U-boat was resting on the bottom. The Flow was dragged again and again by trawlers to see if the U-boat was still there, although it had come in on the surface with its searchlight going and had gone out on the surface after its successful attack.

An 80,000-ton battleship is such a monstrosity that it is hard to see how any intelligent man could urge it. There are very few harbors which such a ship could enter. It could not pass through the present Panama Canal, and the new locks would have to be widened to let it through. With the German pocket battleships being used, though with little success, as commerce destroyers, the time is certainly more than ripe for a careful inquiry into what purpose battleships serve anyway. Is their chief value to convoy troops and act as commerce raiders—work done successfully by the little Alabama during our Civil War and the light cruiser Emden during the World War? If we must have more ships, should we not build fast, heavily armored cruisers? It must not be forgotten that Admiral Sims, commander of our fleet in European waters during the last war, declared publicly that the only thing to do with our American battleships in the next war would be to send them up the Mississippi River and keep them there. If he were alive he would be the first to protest against 80,000-ton battleships. Why not 90,000- or 100,000-ton ships, if it is really true that the existence of two such leviathans would act as a complete deterrent to any naval attack upon us?

Finally this war is still young and we are not in any danger. It would be impossible to put an 80,000-ton ship in service under seven or eight years, and by that time either this war will be nearly forgotten or the whole world will be in ruins. To appropriate the sums the President is asking for will be to yield to hysteria and to act without intelligence.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

AMERICA is not Europe. No cold pogroms, no bombed civilians, no fascist terror. But wait. From the middle of 1935 to May, 1939, 300,000 refugees, nine-tenths of them native white Americans, entered California in cars, carrying all their belongings, their native tall talk, and their homespun ideas: independence—"We ain't no paupers. We don't want relief"; hope—"But what we do want is a chanst to make an honest living like what we was raised"; pride—"I've wrote back that we're well and such as that, but I never have wrote that we live in a tent." In California they don't get much relief; they are shunted from one jurisdiction to another because they are residents of nowhere. They are social outcasts. They find that the promised land is controlled by a few large owners. When they get work it's for wages that wouldn't keep a chicken alive, and when they resist to the point of organizing they are subjected to a police terror under the auspices of the Associated Farmers that feels just like fascist terror to the man who gets hit over the head.

The forced migration of thousands of people from Germany or the evacuation of children from London receives far more attention from the American press than the forced migration of thousands of men, women, and children from Oklahoma, Arkansas, Missouri, to California, Oregon, Washington, or wherever hope leads. Yet these American refugees are a serious and continuing threat to the way of life of all other Americans. What is needed is a first-class crusade that will not end until the migratory slaves are free to settle, with guaranties of economic security and self-respect.

We have had several excellent books dramatizing the great migration, including "The Grapes of Wrath," which is, by the way, still selling as fast as ever. "An American Exodus: A Record of Human Erosion," by Dorothea Lange and Paul S. Taylor (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2.75), is the latest and one of the best of the books devoted to the dispossessed farm worker. Miss Lange is on the photographic staff of the Farm Security Administration. Mr. Taylor is professor of economics at Stanford University and one of the best-informed men in the country on agriculture and its migratory workers.

With camera and typewriter Miss Lange and Mr. Taylor have covered all the territories—the Old South, the machine plantations to the west, the Plains, and the Dust Bowl—from which thousands of families have been swept toward the Far West, like so much top soil, by the ravages of nature, the encroachment of technology, and the desire of owners to substitute day laborers for tenants in order to avoid sharing AAA checks. Both the text and the many photographs of "An American Exodus" are excellent; together they provide a vivid story in brief space of the nature and extent of the disaster, and of the measures, so far very inadequate, with which it has been met.

The last chapter is headed Directions, which are badly needed. The authors point out among other things that as yet we do not even know the magnitude of the problem, and that reminds us that we do not know either with any accuracy the extent of our industrial unemployment. This would seem to be a primary task. We do know that the country requires fewer farmers rather than more and that about 21 per cent of our gainfully employed are in agriculture but received less than 9 per cent of the national income in 1938.

The authors reject the small subsistence farm as a solution; the advance of the machine, they think, should not and probably cannot be halted. They advocate associations of tenants and small farmers for joint purchase of machinery, large-scale corporate farms under competent management with the working farmers for stockholders, and cooperative farms. (I should advocate as well strong unions to improve present conditions and press for genuine solutions.) Finally, they emphasize that the agricultural problem cannot be isolated. "Industrial expansion alone," they write, "offers hope of permanently raising agricultural income to high levels and of employing at good standards the population produced but unneeded on the farms."

This is a large order, but it is the order of the day. The authors do not provide a blueprint. They do make the human and the economic dilemma clear. They also issue a warning. The European war "may appear to some like a life preserver thrown to the displaced. But the acceleration of agriculture will be felt most in those very forms which now are displacing and limiting the opportunities of our people. . . . The false prosperity of war is no solution to the problems we describe. It is more likely to aggravate them."

One of the more striking photographs in the book shows three families with fourteen children camping beside a huge billboard which advertises a fast luxury train. "Travel while you sleep." While we sleep the migratory worker continues to travel an endless road. Unless his dismal trek is brought to a close by a real solution, we shall wake up some fine day to discover a fascist fire, not three thousand miles away, but in our own back yard. It is already smoldering in California.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Fiction Between Two Worlds

THE NOVEL AND THE MODERN WORLD. By David Daiches. University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

IN THIS study of the relation of modern fiction to the state of modern civilization, David Daiches is obviously indebted to Marxism for a good deal of his insight into his subject. His theory is that the most serious and significant part of twentieth-century writing represents an "attempted adjustment" of literary artists to the peculiar and arduous conditions of a transition period between the decay of one code of values and beliefs and the establishment of another. He examines the work of Joyce, Conrad, Galsworthy, Huxley, Katherine Mansfield, and Virginia Woolf in order to discover individual variations of this effort at "adjustment" and to estimate their success or lack of success on this score. In addition, the book includes three essays in which the main theme and some of its tributaries are explored along more general lines.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

According to this view the contemporary writer is the denizen of an ideological no man's land. Thus removed from the norms of security, he is driven toward unceasing experimentation not only on the plane of form but also on the plane of meaning. Single-handed he must grapple with values, symbols, and moral formulas—precisely those elements of literature which in the past were provided by a stable and unified society. Hence technique is forced to solve problems which heretofore were outside its sphere. It has to devise ways and means of making private truths publicly credible, of rendering recognizable and convincing—"as a world apart, unjudged, unimportant, except for the importance the artist can give it by his method of presenting it—a shifting, neutral, arbitrary subject matter with no necessary or dependable emotions attached to it."

Mr. Daiches has made the experimental synonymous with the modern, and the modern with private standards of truth and a personal valuation of reality. In itself this approach is not new, for both revolutionary and traditionalist critics have used it extensively in order to explain as well as combat the chaos of belief that prevails in literature. Mr. Daiches, however, has applied this mode of analysis in a vivid and concrete manner. To confirm his principal concept he resorts neither to philosophical speculations nor to political moralizing; unlike some of his Marxist colleagues he is not addicted to manipulating, for the sake of immediate tactical advantage, such volatile, promiscuous, and easily reversible categories as "progress" and "reaction"; on the contrary, he confronts us throughout with specific and verifiable evidence drawn from actual works of art. In most cases he is able to establish an efficient correlation between the mutations of technique and the mutations of experience and consciousness. The result is that he clearly demonstrates that all experiments, no matter how formal they may seem, are at bottom experiments with nothing less than life itself.

But one dilemma implicit in his method—the confusion of the aesthetic value of the art-object with its social and historical origins—this critic has not escaped. For example, despite all the care and caution of his formulations, it nevertheless appears that "Ulysses" somehow falls short of achieving first rank as a work of fiction. Why? Because in a social sense it can be described as negative, indifferent; because its criteria of selection and significance have been not collectively but individually determined. As a social characterization this may be correct, yet in itself it does not constitute a test of the novel's literary merit. In fact, this confusion of genesis and value pushes Mr. Daiches into flagrant contradictions in his judgment of "Ulysses." On the one hand we are told that it is subtle and brilliant, "one of the great novels of civilization," and on the other that, stemming from a "defeatist desire to retreat from the contemporary situation," it represents a "flat, static, craftsman's world . . . not our world at all, nor anybody's world, but an artist's misunderstanding." Facing in two directions at once, this judgment of "Ulysses" is plainly unsatisfactory. Surely Mr. Daiches, if he wishes to be consistent, must either accept the full consequences of the utilitarian theory of art or else reject it altogether.

Since Marxists have been unable to prove that modern literature is inferior to the literature of the past, it seems to me they are not justified in condemning the spirit of individualism that animates it. Whatever our social needs may be, it cannot be denied that it is largely the strategy of individualism which has enabled the artist to survive in an environment inimical to his purposes. And though it is true that an art of "private truths" does not make for cultural integration, still it is utopian to expect the art of the present to incorporate a set of "public truths"—such as Marxism presumably offers—that so far have not been realized in the very structure of society.

PHILIP RAHV

The Old Southern Story

THE SOUTH TO POSTERITY: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE WRITING OF CONFEDERATE HISTORY. By Douglas Southall Freeman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

IN THIS brief book, which pretends to be no more than a series of essays about the records which Southerners, and a few others, made in memory or justification of their cause, Dr. Freeman has added such grace to his scholarship that what might be the dreariest bibliography is instead one of the clearest and most moving descriptions of the very human Confederacy which we possess. It is, of course, a Confederacy which did not begin in 1861 or end with Appomattox. Most of the material Dr. Freeman describes deals with such tangible things as time and battles, but the essence of the writings he discusses was such stuff as filled the hearts and preoccupied the minds of Southern generations. Such a book goes far to explain the continuing fascination that still in America attends the old Southern story which came to its climax in the fields of Virginia but grew in glamour steadily after defeat.

It was a strange literature which so compelled American thinking, North as well as South I think, to romantic attachment to the cause of the South. There are no great writers in the company of the record makers Dr. Freeman has assembled here. Indeed, in those days which both preceded and followed war the best American writers were understood to be living in the North and shaping their sentences to conform with Northern views. In the South in Dr. Freeman's listing there were soldiers and politicians writing as soldiers and politicians generally do, no better and no worse; there were solemn and sometimes rhetorical apologists; there were slim volumes of memoirs; there were letters; there was the stenographic report of an old lady in Birmingham testifying before an investigating Congressional committee. The huge, honest, unadorned Official Records kept the military story clear and straight. But somehow out of the mass of writing which was not in its component parts generally distinguished the emotional victory grew for the South, while the G. A. R. and the Republican politicians ruled the land. They were the Yankees who bought and loved "Gone with the Wind."

Dr. Freeman makes that process understandable here. From pages and volumes, many of which must make dull reading, he has drawn the human essence of that appealing Confederacy at war—a story of brave men and bad, simple and homesick and good, of women and generals and backwoods-men. The constitutional questions of secession, the moral questions of slavery are almost lost from memory in drama in which man attained dignity even in defeat. The war itself becomes less a war over a dispute than war in symbol for all times and all people, colored with glory certainly, but also, as Dr. Freeman points out, with sickening tragedy: "The hunger of Vicksburg and the terror of the Bloody Angle . . . the waning, three-day cry of Federals between the lines at Second Cold Harbor—'Water! For God's sake, water!' "

For any Confederates who may remain, Dr. Freeman has set forth in warmth and wisdom the details of their records. But he has done more than that. He has described the records to show that the Confederacy and its struggle for independence, or in rebellion (such terms are equally irrelevent now), is not merely a part of the history of the South but a stirring item in the dramatic history of man himself, of the veritable American. Far beyond passion, the Southern cause is now a part of poetry in which the homesick South Carolina boy, the impeccable Lee, the Richmond girls, even the mangled bodies in the Bloody Lane at Sharpsburg are as much the past of us all as Lincoln is. What the South has brought to posterity, as Dr. Freeman shows, is a past sad and angry, argumentative and dramatic, humorous too, and loving, and in the sum good and grand. It justifies the pride of Vermont as much as that of Virginia. The book could not be so American if it were not so Southern. JONATHAN DANIELS

The Science of Power

ACCENT ON POWER: THE LIFE AND TIMES OF MACHIAVELLI. By Valeriu Marcu. Translated by Richard Winston. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

DICTATORSHIPS are born when one established order is perishing and its successor is not yet ready to claim the legacy. When opposing social and political forces keep each other in check and neither is strong enough to vanquish the other, then a dictatorship steps in to submit both to its iron rule. Dictatorships mark the end of one period and the beginning of a new era. An old world declines and a new one is about to be born.

When Niccolo Machiavelli was appointed secretary to the Second Chancery of the "Ten of Liberty" in Florence, on July 15, 1498, he was given an unusual opportunity for observing the coming and going of despots in an age of transition. The European state system was breaking down in the struggle between the Catholic world and the new centralized empires in the West. Shifting trade routes were destroying the supremacy of the Mediterranean. New social forces, the burghers and peasants, were pressing forward, and the feudal rulers were in retreat. Power was destroyed and established almost overnight. Niccolo Machiavelli, himself powerless but close to the seat of power in Tuscany, set out to write what was to be the first modern essay of a science and philosophy of power.

As long as power seemed established forever, rooted in God, there was no reason to analyze how power was won or lost. It needed a crisis such as the one at the end of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century, shaking almost the whole of the known world, to induce men to examine what the rulers preferred them to believe an eternal, God-sent institution. In a period of constant change Niccolo Machiavelli believed that he could serve his ideal prince by describing the mechanism by which power is won, retained, or lost. Nevertheless, Machiavelli performed a revolutionary deed. To explain power in secular terms, to make it understandable to human intelligence, was a serious threat to a ruler in an age of absolutism.

Valeriu Marcu's book tells little about Machiavelli's writings. It is true that a long series of studies on this subject is now at our disposal. But the author gives us something else which adds greatly to our understanding of Machiavelli, namely, the historical and social background of his work. The struggle of the Medici, who won control over Tuscany at the expense of the two rival forces of the nobility and the populani, with the city business men and the guilds represents the typical three-cornered fight out of which dictatorships emerge. The Medici in Florence, the Borgias in Rome, the king in France were the rulers whose example inspired the little city clerk in Florence. From them he learned the art of winning and retaining power, of intriguing and betraying in the service of power, and he was the first to understand, from their example, that the main purpose of politics was success. He who was himself unsuccessful throughout his life, sitting in the anterooms of the powerful, pestered by petty money worries, came to establish one single yardstick of politics—success—and one end of politics—personal power.

But the little secretary who did all the work without obtaining more than passing recognition, who was an efficient though unpretentious diplomat, proved utterly helpless when he lost his job by a change in Tuscany's political situation. He pinned his hopes on his friends, whiling away his time writing books, waiting for another opportunity of working in the shadow of power. Fate, however, was against him. Moderate success came to him not in politics, where alone he appreciated and desired it, but through his comedy "Mandragola," which he wrote as a pastime.

Machiavelli knew power from the point of view of the ruler and from that of the masses. Perhaps the best part of Mr. Marcu's book is that in which he shows how Machiavelli spent his private life among the rabble of the city. He did not realize, as perhaps the author does not, that a new social force was emerging out of the depth of the city and the miserable huts of the countryside, and that Savonarola's iron rule was a forerunner of social struggles far more important for the history of the world than the conflicts between the despots of his age. Yet Machiavelli understood that the support of the common people alone could give the ruler lasting power. The common man, as Machiavelli saw him, could not yet aspire to rule himself, but he could bring about the rise and decline of the power of the great.

Almost every great man in history is judged by Machiavelli's yardstick of personal success. However, what Machiavelli had in mind was but one type of despotism, that for which personal power is the goal. He did not and could not think of rulers who sincerely aspire to power not for its own sake but in the service of an ideal. Napoleon III is a classic example of a modern dictator of Machiavelli's type, as Karl Marx has shown in his famous study. So are Hitler and Mussolini, and perhaps Stalin, to judge by most interpretations of his new foreign policy. To measure a man like Lenin, however, in the same terms would be completely misleading, for Lenin did not wish power for himself but for his idea, and he measured his own success not by the power he personally wielded but by the advance of the philosophy and of the party to which he devoted his life.

Machiavelli himself was more than a cold admirer of power. Throughout his life he dreamed of the unity of Italy, but he failed to see that the common people alone could make his dream come true. He believed that by brutal force and skilful and lying propaganda the masses could be coerced eternally into serving their masters' ends. Yet by advocating a citizens' militia he served the coming democratic movement, though he failed to understand the significance of what he was doing.

All politics are means to ends which power alone can realize, but the pursuit of power for power's sake is merely the symptom of a social crisis bound to decline when a new equilibrium supersedes the precarious balance of forces upon which dictatorships are built. Long as they may appear to contemporaries, dictatorships are episodes in the evolution toward a self-government of free men. And Machiavelli taught the technique of dictators to their enemies.

ADOLF STURMTHAL

Recent Fiction

ASK THE DUST. By John Fante. Stackpole Sons. $2.

YOUNG ARTURO BANDINI, a passionately confident young writer who resembles the legend of William Saroyan, is the hero and narrator of this, Mr. Fante's second novel. Living in a cheap California hotel and mailing stories to Eastern editors, following up the scripts with purely personal letters of thirty or forty pages which the editors sometimes buy and print as stories, he vacillates between ecstasy and degradation, exultant with the beat of warm Italian blood in his veins yet keenly self-critical, eyeing his own antics with the detached amusement of an outsider. Almost morbidly determined to immolate himself, he details his infatuation with a Mexican waitress who despises him because he sublimates his desire and is a Great Lover only on paper. There is a lot of lush sentimentality in the book, but also a glowing fervor of youthful intensity that lights up all but one or two banal episodes, such as Arturo's vicarious comforting by a middle-aged nymphomaniac. Even his final gesture of farewell, throwing a copy of his novel into the desert in which Camilla has disappeared, escapes utter melodrama because it is made up of that same mixture of laughing and crying that flavors the whole story. Together with the author's first novel, "Wait Until Spring, Bandini," the present book may well form a part of a larger series, a "Young Manhood of Arturo Bandini." Unless I miss my guess, Mr. Fante intends to give us further adventures of his ingenuous, impulsive hero, who may very possibly be Mr. Fante himself.

ACROSS THE DARK RIVER. By Peter Mendelssohn. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Whatever the Nazis may have done and may still do to civilization, they have supplied fiction writers with a fund of ready-made plots for thrillers. "Across the Dark River," the author of which is himself a refugee, tells the sufferings of a group of Austrian Jews who after the Anschluss are shorn of all their belongings and marooned on a sand bar between Austria and Czechoslovakia, later shunted back and forth by jittery Czech and Hungarian governments, and finally given temporary refuge aboard a vermin-ridden French barge in the Danube until the survivors of disease, exposure, and rifle bullets are rescued by an international refugee organization. The two central figures, who do most to sustain the morale of the pitiful little band as calamity after calamity threatens to annihilate them, are Baron von Roth (crime: one Jewish grandmother) and Jakob Weiss, a cobbler, who in spite of his Semitic name, is relatively "Aryan" but has a sense of decency and fair play that naturally clashes with storm-trooper ideals. Although every incident in this saga of persecution could probably be documented with newspaper reports, the plot moves so rapidly from episode to episode that it reads more like an adventure story than like a novel of protest. Perhaps, after all, the best we may hope for the future is that in days to come readers will turn away from stories like "Across the Dark River" and "Mr. Emmanuel" with a smile of disbelief, classifying us as a generation whose tastes in fiction ran to the bizarre and fantastic.

TO THE END OF THE WORLD. By Helen C. White. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

An ambitious, many-faceted chronicle of the French Revolution, without any of the usual clichés of that breed. Its central figure is a young priest, of aristocratic family but ascetic temperament, who, just as he is about to enter the ancient monastery of Cluny, is caught up in the whirlwind of the Terror and enlists his whole strength in the heroic underground struggle to keep the church alive in France during the years of anticlerical fanaticism. There must have been many priests like him who, not by intrigue but by unselfish devotion to their parochial duties in the face of persecution, endeared themselves to the simple peasants, to whom the Worship of Reason was never anything but a name.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

FILMS

THE film "Mice and Men" (United Artists) is apt to reopen in the movie columns the critical discussion of John Steinbeck's stunt story—so painstakingly has Lewis Milestone, producer and director, followed the original. There are small changes: Lennie is less stupid in the picture, and Curly's wife has a bit more soul, but otherwise the plot and the lines are the same. Hollywood for once displays deep respect for a serious writer. Can it be that "Mice and Men" was from the beginning a Hollywood story?

It is as a rule no virtue for the movie version of a novel or play to keep too close to the letter of the original. The film, as a different medium of expression, has its own laws. These are necessarily violated by mere photographic reproduction, however perfect it may be. Steinbeck's story touched upon an important theme at those few points where the account of the clinical case left space: the loneliness of the farmhands and their longing for a piece of land of their own. Of course, one could not expect Hollywood to accentuate social themes. But on second thought I am not able to praise its shrewd capitalization of the sensationalism of the original.

On the indicated level a marvelous job of production, direction, and acting has been done. That one is never really captivated by the Lennie of Lon Chaney, Jr., is not the actor's fault, and it would be a gross injustice to call him the weakest of the lot. He is as good as if not better than Burgess Meredith as George, but no enduring interest can be held by the repetitious, unchangeable stupidity of the character he has to play. A broken leg or an undeveloped brain as such is not dramatic, and few people will persuade themselves into the suggested intellectual detour at the end of which, allegedly, Lennie stands as the symbol of a mysterious, childlike folk-soul. They will rather take their money's worth in sentimental or melodramatic sequences and a few beautiful shots of wide farm land. They will get, besides—and in this respect the picture represents respectable progress—some realistic scenes of ranch life, which is usually romanticized. There is an unforgettable dinner sequence in which the girl (Betty Field) can no longer bear to watch or listen to her husband and father-in-law as they eat. The epigrammatic realism of this scene moved me more than the overplayed sequence in the bunk house where one farm hand after the other displays his good heart while waiting for the shooting of the dog. What is missing here is missing throughout the picture—sharpness and complete truthfulness. But I need not criticize John Steinbeck's story again.

"His Girl Friday" (Columbia) "from a play by Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur" is a remake of "The Front Page," the movie success of 1931 and stage hit of 1928. The original has been changed this time into one of those fast-moving and idyllic comedies in which the lovers behave like villains to each other—sophisticated is the usual word for the genre. Hildy Johnson has become a woman for this purpose. She has been married to the fanatical editor and divorced from him because there was never time for love. Coming to tell him that she is going to marry a simple insurance man from Albany, she soon finds herself, against her will, back on her former job as reporter. There follows the plot of "The Front Page," with the managing editor playing his tricks partly on the insurance man. By the change the accent is shifted to the lovers' quarrel, and the original story loses much of its sense and punch. Yet Rosalind Russell and Cary Grant give such entertaining performances that nobody in the roaring audience seems to notice the tastelessness, to say the least, of playing hide-and-seek with a man condemned to death. The tragic elements of the original story are misused for boy-meets-girl nonsense. Charles Leder has written the new version with great skill and Howard Hawks has directed it with liveliness but with too great a concern for the deaf.

FRANZ HOELLERING

In an Early Issue
"Church and State," by Don Luigi Sturzo
Reviewed by G. A. BORGESE

DRAMA

Lucid Interval

DURING the last few weeks I have spent a good deal of time wondering what a play by James Thurber would turn out to be. Obviously it could hardly contain either of his most frequently employed symbols, since his dogs do not exist, and his women—who unfortunately do—would not be allowed to reveal themselves on the stage with that completeness which contributes so greatly to their lack of charm. It seemed to me that if he actually did succeed in creating a dramatic equivalent of his familiar pictures and text, the result would be like Strindberg only different. It would have the grotesque logic of a bad dream, but it would also be funny in some very upsetting way.

The actuality recently revealed on the stage of the Cort Theater turns out to be a hilarious farce pretty certainly destined to great and well-deserved success but by no means so nearly sui generis as one was inclined to anticipate. Mr. Thurber's collaborator and featured performer, Elliott Nugent, appears to have been an important contributor, and "The Male Animal" is revealed as approximately one-fourth recognizable Thurberian madness and one-fourth mild social protest. The remainder is skilful domestic farce of a thoroughly American kind and not wholly unlike the vehicles which the Nugent family used to provide for itself in the twenties. The central character, a mild young professor in a Middle Western college who raises a storm in a teacup when he proposes to read Vanzetti's farewell letter to his class in English composition and then, in the midst of it all, has to endure the presence of his wife's old football-playing sweetheart, is unmistakably related to all Mr. Thurber's thoroughly bedeviled males. For that matter this hero's comic rebellion and not over-successful determination to behave with a primitive virility hardly native to his character also suggest one of Mr. Thurber's favorite themes. But the fact remains that the treatment is fantastic in a traditionally farcical way rather than in the more disturbingly insane fashion one has come to expect in his other work.

The incident of the teacup and the incident of the door knob, to speak cryptically, are probably his and are not wholly uncharacteristic. So too, one imagines, was the bit about the wife who was necessary to her husband because she alone could fix the ribbon in his typewriter, though the elimination of this bit by Mr. Nugent was, according to Mr. Thurber's published account of his agonies, the beginning of their collaboration. But even such incidents as these would represent for Mr. Thurber relatively lucid intervals and do not wholly obviate the impression that, delightfully funny though the play is, it is not quite what one expected. Mr. Thurber's Strindbergian quality has been described by innumerable adjectives ranging from the homely "goofy" to the portentous "dissociated," but perhaps the most general statement of the difference between the atmosphere of this farce and the atmosphere which he usually generates would be achieved by saying that while the world of his text and pictures is a private world, the world of "The Male Animal" is a public one. The wife, the husband, and the ex-football player are immediately rather than remotely recognizable and so are the predicaments in which they find themselves. The symbols are equally familiar instead of being, like those which Mr. Thurber commonly employs, part of a private mythology of his own invention. But it would be less than fair not to repeat that "The Male Animal" provides a highly entertaining evening and that the performances of Mr. Nugent as the professor and of Leon Ames as the football player are especially good.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

TO ITS existing set of Verdi's "Otello" (M-152: 16 records, $24), made a few years ago by singers, chorus, and orchestra of the Milan Scala, Victor has now added a set (M-620: 6 records, $12) made by leading singers, chorus, and orchestra of the Metropolitan. The older set offers the entire work, the new one only a few of the best-known arias and ensemble numbers; and the older one offers the work much better sung and more agreeably recorded than the excerpts of the new one. The constricted, threadbare sound of Martinelli's voice these days is in sharpest contrast with Nicolo Fusati's youthful warmth; and while Jepson's and Tibbett's voices are fine, hers does not have the loveliness of Maria Carbone's, and his lacks the weight and darkness and richness of Apollo Granforte's. Nor do the two Americans achieve the style in which Carbone and Granforte sing this Italian music; and Tibbett's American pronunciation of Italian is hard to listen to. And the new set, finally, offers the excessive sharpness of some present-day recording.

Record companies, an executive remarked to me recently, are in business not to produce art but to make money; and in the record business, as in the toothpaste business, money is made not on the quality of a product but on its name. I don't mean that the quality is necessarily poor: a celebrated artist is sometimes celebrated because he is a great artist. But in this Metropolitan "Otello" set, certainly, Victor is selling an undistinguished product on the strength of a distinguished name—which is exactly what the Metropolitan itself is doing. In the performance of "Otello" that I attended, Tibbett—whose boyish face peeping out at one through make-up and false whiskers, and whose gestures right out of dramatic school have provided a good share of the things that have made me laugh at the Metropolitan—contributed a comically villainous Iago that I might have ascribed to the stage director's malice if I had not known it was to be ascribed to his helplessness. Most revealing was what happened in the very first scene, in which Tibbett, with nothing to sing or do, should have kept himself rigorously within the stage picture contrived by the director, but in which instead he destroyed illusion by presenting the distracting figure of an important star waiting for his part to begin, bored meanwhile by the action around him, and drawing attention away from it, now by fussing with his cloak, his sword, his stance, now by conversing with another singer, now by turning to look the audience over—his power to destroy the scene's effect in this way evidently greater than the director's power to stop him.

Ah, yes, the star system, you will say. Yes and no. It depends on what is done with the stars, on whether they are used for the operas, or the operas for them—whether, that is, a manager decides to produce "Otello," assigns roles in the production to his outstanding singers, and gives to conductor and stage director the authority to make the best use of the singers' capacities and limitations; or whether, casting about for roles in which to exploit a singer's box-office appeal, the manager lets a Tibbett have his fling at Iago.

On the other hand consider the revival of "Orfeo" last year. The prestige of the Metropolitan's name is based on historic performances in which the great stars of the past were subjected to the authority of great conductors—the 1909 performances of "Orfeo," for example, in which Homer, Gluck, and Gadski sang under Toscanini. This prestige was attached last year to a production that had Thorborg's superb performance as Orfeo, but that suffered from scandalously inferior singers in the other roles, and from Bodanzky's heavy-handed conducting. There may not be as great singers today as in 1909, or as many of them; but I am not sure the Metropolitan has all it could have; and I know that from those it had last year it could have put together a more respectable cast for "Orfeo." Nor are there Toscaninis to be picked from trees; but "Orfeo" might have been conducted by Reiner, who has been drifting around doing odd jobs like the brilliant Philadelphia Orchestra "Falstaff" and "Figaro" and "Meistersinger" while Bodanzky was producing those driven, tight performances at the Metropolitan, and who will go on conducting an orchestra in Pittsburgh while the entire German repertory at the Metropolitan is handled by a young conductor of phenomenal technical equipment who has yet to acquire depth and breadth as a musician.

But as a matter of fact the Metropolitan has had one of the greatest singers of all time, Kirsten Flagstad, whose voice today shows the effect of its misuse through managers' conscienceless greed and her own recklessness—five years not only of incessant Brünnhildes and Sieglindes and Isoldes but of Brünnhildes, Sieglindes, and Isoldes four times in seven days, three times in three consecutive days—whereas Caruso never sang more than twice a week. The loveliness, the incredible freshness of the voice when it was first heard here were due to the fact that it had never been taxed in this way—for one thing that Flagstad had sung very little Wagner and a great deal of Italian opera. And with its performances of Verdi positively disreputable and Mozart out of the repertory altogether for lack of singers, the Metropolitan, looking about desperately for new roles for Flagstad, could think of nothing better to do than to put on "The Flying Dutchman" so that she could sing Senta. However, even that is better than putting on "Louise" for Grace Moore.

Two good Handel records from Victor are E. Power Biggs's of the Organ Concerto No. 2, played with the Fiedler Sinfonietta (15751, $2), and Webster Booth's of "Comfort Ye, My People" and "Every Valley Shall Be Exalted," sung with the London Philharmonic (12598, $1.50). And Paul Robeson sings the Russian folksong, "Night," in English and Russian very well, but introduces Negroid syncopations into the Lermontoff-Gambs "Lullaby" on the reverse side (26409, 75 cents).

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

What Does France Want?

Dear Sirs: I have just finished reading the first piece of Nazi propaganda which has ever caught my eye in The Nation. I refer to Robert Dell's The Menace of a Great Germany, in the December 23 issue.

No more effective argument is available to Hitler, both for German consumption and for world consumption, than that "French imperialism," having learned nothing and forgotten nothing, wants to repeat, in still more drastic form, the crimes of Versailles. What Dell advocates in effect, is to chop Europe up into a series of statelets, each about as big as a tennis court, though he pays lip service to the idea of one big federation for Europe economically. It would be interesting to watch him hang himself in trying to unravel the crazy crisscross of provincial interests, each seeking protection against the other, which such a return to stark eighteenth-century madness must necessarily involve. It may or may not be true, as the Iron Age recently reported, that the French are now trying, via Belgium, to barter their surplus iron ore for German surplus coal. But true or premature, the fact remains that no stable Europe is possible until all the ingredients of economic life are scrambled in the same frying pan.

If a victorious France splinters Germany again and holds it down for another generation, a still more voracious German nationalism will feed on the unworkable injustices of such a Dictat until it is strong enough to create still another pre-war situation followed by a third World War. If France really means to go for the map of Europe like a hobo reaching for a dish of free lunch, that of course is its business, just as it is undeniably Mr. Dell's privilege to let cats out of heretofore well-guarded bags. But Americans will perhaps be pardoned if they temper the platonic idealism with which they have been expected to regard the war and simply shrug their shoulders, as France prepares to set the clock back.

Little wonder that honest enemies of Hitlerism are just as well satisfied that the Allies are reluctant to state their war aims. More to the point, little wonder that the British embassy in Washington, which is more practical in these matters, has for some weeks been conversationally warning its American friends not to mind any overexcited French talk about the next partition of Germany.

ELIOT JANEWAY

New York, January 11

Robert Dell's Solution

Dear Sirs: Eliot Janeway's extreme indignation at one of the proposals in my article appears to have prevented him from reading it very carefully. If he will look at it again he will find that I did not propose "to chop Europe up into a series of statelets." Germany is not Europe. Nor did I "pay lip service" to the idea of European economic federation. I said that a European customs union was essential and that, without it, Europe would perish. Nor did I propose that a victorious France should "splinter Germany again and hold it down for another generation." What, by the way does "again" mean?

Mr. Janeway apparently thinks that the break-up of Germany into its constituent parts would intensify German nationalism. I am convinced, on the contrary, that it is the only way of getting rid of it, for I do not accept the thesis that it is due to the Treaty of Versailles. I have given some reasons in my article for not accepting it, and I could have given them in more detail, had space permitted. My arguments in favor of my various theses may or may not be valid, but they need to be refuted. I regret that Mr. Janeway did not attempt to refute at least some of them.

I am convinced, as I said in my article—Mr. Janeway seems to have forgotten it—that political federation, the United States of Europe, is the only solution of the European problem. We must get rid of national sovereignty and suppress political and economic frontiers. Frontiers should be cultural. This solution would make it impossible for any country to dominate or hold down another and would make the existence of even very small countries possible. The Swiss Confederation has four million inhabitants speaking four different languages and contains more than twenty cantons, some of them extremely small, but the system works admirably and there is no "crisscross of provincial interests, each seeking protection against the other." European federation might ultimately increase the number of cultural frontiers, but what if it does?

What Mr. Janeway reports about the private conversations of the British Embassy in Washington is interesting, if it is accurate. It does not surprise me. Whatever Lord Lothian may be saying now, he started the pro-Nazi movement in England by his articles in the London Times on January 31 and February 1, 1935, and he is one of the men most responsible for the "policy of appeasement" to which we owe the present war.

ROBERT DELL

New York, January 15

The Streit Plan

Dear Sirs: Oswald Garrison Villard refers, in your issue of December 23, to "Clarence Streit's plan for the federalization of Europe." Clarence Streit has no such plan. In his "Union Now" Streit proposes a federation of the world's existing democracies, with the addition of other states as soon as they are prepared to guarantee to their nationals the civil liberties and rights which are enjoyed by citizens in a democracy. Streit explicitly rejects the idea of a European federation both because of the impracticability of uniting democracies with totalitarian states and dictatorships and because of the difficulty of determining where "Europe" ends. England as the center of the British Commonwealth of Nations carries Europe westerly to Alaska; the U. S. S. R. reaches eastward to the same territory. Robert Dell, in your same issue, clearly differentiates between Streit's idea and a federation of Europe—which he prefers.

W. EDWIN COLLIER

Philadelphia, January 12

The Real Catholic Press

Dear Sirs: There is no doubt that Mr. Southworth intended to make an accurate presentation of the facts about the Catholic press in his December 16 article, He did not succeed because he is not a Catholic and therefore, while he can cite figures and quote excerpts, cannot evaluate influences. For instance, it is true as he says that the diocesan papers have an enormous circulation, but—and this is what Mr. Southworth could hardly know—they make almost no impression on Catholics because so few read them. Catholics buy their diocesan paper but do not even intend to read it, just as they contribute to the Catholic university and do not intend to send their sons there.

Catholic magazines, however, are bought to be read and are read. Social Justice is far and away the most influential Catholic magazine. And it is Catholic; it is useless for the authorities to disown it since we all know that it could not be published if Father Coughlin's immediate superior or the authorities in Rome decided that it should not be published. And this is the problem which keeps Catholics of good-will awake nights. Why do not the bishops of the United States ask for an investigation of Social Justice by the proper authorities in Rome, an investigation similar to the one which led to the condemnation of Action Française? That rabble-rousing journal was put on the Index, and its editors, management, and supporters were excommunicated because it "used the church for the political ends of the group while pretending to serve the church." A more exact parallel would be difficult to find. Of course it was another Pope who condemned Action Française. Pius XII has restored it to favor after accepting retractions differing hardly at all from those which Pius XI had considered inadequate guaranties of good behavior.

Mr. Southworth is correct in his estimation of that suave Jesuit journal America as the most important magazine of reaction on the "approved" list. But he fails to emphasize the growth in recent years, in numbers and influence, of magazines of opposite tendencies. The Catholic Worker, only a few years old, has a circulation of 150,000 and is growing steadily. The Queen's Work and Christian Social Action have large and increasing circulations. And this is true of less well-known pro-democratic publications such as Our Lady of Perpetual Help, the Michelman, and a great many others.

Few are less inclined than I am to minimize anti-democratic tendencies in the church, and no one is more puzzled or dismayed at the failure of our clerical authorities to control the un-Catholic activities of Catholic priests in our press and in other less open ways. But that does not blind me to the fact that there are quiet voices in our press speaking the language of strict Catholic morality and offering here as in France a growing hope of change and reform. The non-Catholic who fails to give due weight to the best we have to offer not only presents an incomplete picture; he also misses a chance to encourage a movement which may be as important to this country as it will certainly be to the church. RUTH O'KEEFE

Lynn, Mass., December 9

Mr. Hall Sums Up

Dear Sirs: Mr. Southworth insists that the Catholic Press Association—which, with some publicity, celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary in 1936—was founded in 1890; he cites an article which plainly deals with a "progenitor" of the C. P. A. He does give us a chortle by describing that grand old historian Tom Meehan as a priest. Whereas I said wealthy laymen controlling Catholic papers are "a rarity," he cites one, then is stopped. He says Social Justice until January 9, 1939, printed ecclesiastical "permission to publish"; if he will look again, he will find no reference at all to such permission.

As for the hoped-for bill of particulars—well, for whatever reason, none is given. There are several admonitions to me to read various propaganda pamphlets. For the rest, Mr. Southworth pleads "reasons of space" kept him from trying to substantiate his unsupported charges. To my citation of William Philip Simms and Hugh Gibson, Mr. Southworth merely says of these distinguished and objective eyewitness commentators that they don't know what they are talking about. Well, let us send it now to the jury of Nation readers, even though it is regrettable they must judge with no evidence even yet submitted. FRANK A. HALL,

Director, N. C. W. C. News Service

New York, January 9

Mr. Southworth, Ditto

Dear Sirs: That "grand old historian" Thomas F. Meehan—I should not have called him "Father" but I trust I did him no harm—writes that on the first Wednesday of May, 1890, Catholic press representatives met in Cincinnati "and then and there the Catholic Press Association of America was founded." There is not the slightest indication that the article deals with a "progenitor" of the C. P. A. Social Justice until the issue of January 9, 1939, carried on its editorial page Father Coughlin's name and under it "by permission of his superior." These are verbal quibbles.

I mentioned the books I did because, since they were published in Franco Spain, they should be acceptable evidence to Mr. Hall, but the N. C. W. C. News Service insists on being now as during the war more pro-Franco than Franco himself. The books were possibly "propaganda pamphlets," but they were written as pro-Franco propaganda and published under an official censorship powerful enough to ban the Pastoral Letter written last August by the Spanish Primate. (Both the Pastoral and its banning, facts demonstrating the shallowness of the Catholic victory in Spain, have been ignored by the Catholic press in the United States.)

Let me say in conclusion that Mr. Hall correctly interprets my opinion of the testimony given on the Spanish struggle by his "distinguished and objective eyewitness commentators."

H. RUTLEDGE SOUTHWORTH

New York, January 12

CONTRIBUTORS

KENNETH G. CRAWFORD, Washington correspondent of the New York Post and The Nation, has just been elected president of the American Newspaper Guild to succeed the late Heywood Broun.

FRITZ STERNBERG, a German economist now living in the United States, is the author of "From Nazi Sources: Germany's War Chances."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at the Union Theological Seminary, delivered the Gifford lectures at the University of Edinburgh last summer.

PHILIP RAHV is an editor of the Partisan Review.

JONATHAN DANIELS is editor of the Raleigh, North Carolina, News and Observer and the author of "A Southerner Discovers the South."

ADOLF STURMTHAL was for many years head of the Research and Publications Department of the Labor and Socialist International.

LOUIS B. SALOMON is a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 27, 1940 NUMBER 4

The Shape of Things

REPRESENTATIVE FRANK HOOK OF MICHIGAN has already made public most of the material contained in the article by James Wechsler which appears elsewhere in this issue. We do not begrudge Mr. Hook the scoop. As we go to press he is fighting to head off the renewed appropriation for the Dies committee, and the exposure is timely. For almost two years Dies has been spending taxpayers' money to track down "un-American activities." He has discovered atheism in the New Deal, the hand of Moscow in the C. I. O., and the finger of Berlin in the German-American Bund. At the same time he has found it possible to hobnob with Merwin K. Hart, whose unsavory connections are set forth in the Wechsler article, and to exhort meetings indorsed and packed by Christian Fronters. To what should be his acute embarrassment, it now emerges that Hart is a close collaborator of the Front and that the Front itself is the center of a plot to destroy the "American way" so prominent in the rantings of Mr. Dies—and to do it through violence and terror. His contention that it was through his probing that the Department of Justice was put on the trail of the Christian Front is feeble to the point of fatuousness. If he knew of the Front's "un-American activities," what was he waiting for? Was it that Mr. Dies wanted to shun publicity? Or was he touched by the "Martin Dies for President" campaign in Father Coughlin's Social Justice?

*

IF LOW COMPANY PROVES THE UNDOING OF Mr. Dies, his position is comfort itself compared with Coughlin's. The priest's wriggling and squirming since seventeen of his men were picked up for conspiracy have been unholy, to say the least. Panicky at first, he told the press that he "had roundly disavowed" the specific Christian Front whose members were under arrest, had branded them fakers, and had refused a money contribution from them. In truth, he had repeatedly extolled John F. Cassidy, one of the ringleaders of the group, and the money he had spurned came not from these men but from a rival gang, the Christian Mobilizers. But in this case the lie was dangerous. Hit-and-run tactics and so crass a betrayal of his followers might ruin his organization. Coughlin reconsidered and emerged with as oily a performance as ever dripped from his microphone. He called himself "a friend of the accused," and dwelt fondly on their pure family life, their "Christian" background, their Irish names. Although he admitted no connection with "any unit of the Christian Front," he considered himself in a position to refute the statements of the Justice Department agents concerning the haul of munitions. The Springfield rifles turned out to be innocent sport guns or antiquated heirlooms handed down to these Christian young men by their Revolutionary or Civil War ancestors, and the home-made bombs were tin cans used for "photographic" experiments. The Catholic Tablet speaks of the prisoners as "seemingly poor, unfortunate victims of their own excessive patriotism" and calls them "misguided." Who misguided them? The Catholic Commonweal provides the answer: "Father Coughlin, the Tablet, Social Justice, and their many abettors and sympathizers must bear the direct responsibility for the plight of these seventeen young men."

*

MR. CHURCHILL'S ADVICE TO THE NEUTRAL states of Europe to align themselves with the Allies has not been well received by those to whom it was addressed. Public opinion in most of these countries is in substantial agreement with the main theme of his speech —that their hopes of future independence are bound up with an Allied victory. The small neutrals are aware, too, of the danger that they may be forced into the war one by one as the exigencies of German strategy dictate. Each, by itself, is comparatively weak, but if they acted as a unit they would bring overwhelming strength to the Allies and write finis to the Hitler plans of domination which are a menace to them all. But at this stage in the war there seems little chance of any such development, and for this Britain and France are themselves largely to blame. Had they given Europe real leadership in the organization of collective security, neutrals would not now be cowering in their storm cellars praying that by some miracle the whirlwind will pass them by.

*

THE RELUCTANCE OF SWEDEN AND NORWAY to go openly to the aid of Finland is clearly connected with their fears that the result would be an attack by Germany and the merging of Europe's two wars. At the same time they are not prepared to leave the Finns altogether in the lurch and are therefore employing the "non-intervention" technique. As a result a comparatively large number of volunteers are finding their way to the Finnish front, and despite Russian protests, Norway and Sweden are continuing to send supplies of their own as well as permitting the transit of armaments made available by the Allies. Whether more active measures should be taken appears to be a question on which public opinion is acutely divided, particularly in Sweden, where former Foreign Minister Sandler has spoken strongly in favor of the dispatch of troops to assist in the defense of the Aaland Islands, and of definite military collaboration between the Scandinavian countries. Meanwhile, military operations in Finland appear to have been slowed down by the weather. The Soviet air force, however, remains extremely active and is making a special effort to smash the port of Abo, which is Finland's chief link with Sweden. Continual raids on this and other cities underline Finnish appeals for more material aid from the outside world, and particularly for fighting planes.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 8, 1897.

*

HOWEVER GREAT FINLAND'S NEEDS MAY BE, its prospects of obtaining financial assistance in this country for the purpose of buying arms have been seriously dimmed. The first flush of indignation at Russian aggression and of enthusiasm for Finnish courage has given place to an acute attack of isolationism. The President's letter to Vice-President Garner and Mr. Bankhead on the subject of loans to Finland was extremely cautious. He suggested merely an increase in the funds of the Export-Import Bank so as to make possible credits for the purchase of agricultural surpluses and industrial goods, excluding implements of war. Everybody knows that Finland's urgent needs are not for food, but it has been hinted that it would be possible for it to resell the goods obtained and use the cash to buy arms elsewhere. Whether so devious a method will appeal to Congress is still uncertain. A number of Senators have made known their opposition to any loans to Finland. Since nobody suggests that Russia will declare war on us, even if we supply Finland with arms, this Congressional hesitation must be ascribed to the belief that the war between Russia and Finland cannot long be separated from the war between Germany and the Allies. Hence the fear that commitments to Finland will lead to commitments to the Allies. But if Finland is crushed and the Russian army sweeps on into Scandinavia, the danger of our involvement will surely be greater.

*

BRITAIN'S BLOCKADE AND OTHER MEASURES of economic warfare are proving inconvenient and irritating to this country just as they did from 1914 to 1917. Some weeks ago Mr. Hull protested against the forcing of American ships into control ports, and so into zones forbidden them under the Neutrality Act. Now an even stronger protest has been made, charging discrimination against American vessels at Gibraltar and demanding that the situation be corrected. Meanwhile a new controversy has been started by British assertions of the right to detain and examine mails carried on American and other neutral vessels. In a note dated December 27 the State Department pointed out that it considered this procedure contrary to Article I of Hague Convention No. 11, which declares: "Postal correspondence of neutrals and belligerents, whatever its official or private character may be, found on the high seas aboard neutral or enemy ships is inviolable." Britain's note in reply insists that this immunity does not cover parcels and applies only to "genuine postal correspondence." It therefore claims the right to examine all mail to make sure that it is "genuine" and does not contain contraband such as securities, money, or industrial diamonds. This reasoning seems to us to conform with the letter rather than the spirit of the convention. In any case the British government is foolish to attempt to make the blockade absolute at the cost of antagonizing American opinion.

*

WASHINGTON REPORTS INDICATE THAT NO immediate action will be taken against Japanese trade with the expiration of the trade treaty on January 26. In an effort to conciliate American opinion at this critical stage of its East Asia policy, Japan has announced that there will be no discrimination against imports from the United States unless this country takes steps against Japanese trade. The State Department has allowed word to go out that it will take no action as long as negotiations are under way. Senator Pittman, on the other hand, has pointed out that there could be no agreement based on equal rights as long as Japan continued its "New Order in East Asia" policies. Although there has been a flood of inspired articles from Tokyo recently indicating a more conciliatory attitude toward the United States on the part of the new Yonai government, there has been no suggestion of a change in Japan's basic China policies. The opening of the Yangtze, as Senator Pittman points out, is but a minor aspect of the situation. All trade in the occupied sections of China is under the control of Japanese agencies; all regulations, duties, and laws governing this trade are, for all practical purposes, made in Tokyo. For the moment, however, circumstances have played into the hands of the United States. The European war leaves Japan more dependent than ever on American economic assistance. The long-term interests of American trade, as well as the immediate interests of the Chinese people, can still be salvaged by prompt action along the lines outlined in last week's issue of The Nation.

IN TURNING BACK A JAPANESE OFFENSIVE north of Canton, the Chinese have scored a victory which, from preliminary accounts, appears even more significant than that won at Changsha three months ago. The Japanese followed up their initial successes too rapidly, with the result that they were attacked simultaneously on both flanks as well as in front, suffering a severe defeat. Their advance had taken them as far as Yingtak, an important railway center eighty miles north of Canton, but the Chinese counter-attack has forced them back a full fifty miles and placed them in a more vulnerable position than when the offensive started. This rather startling setback, coupled with notable Chinese victories in northern Hupeh and southeastern Shansi may serve as a further obstacle to the early establishment of the Wang Ching-wei puppet government. Equally embarrassing, from the Japanese point of view, has been the publication in the Hongkong Ta Kung Pao of the purported terms of the agreement between Wang Ching-wei and Japan as furnished by two of Wang's most important aides. The terms go far beyond the notorious Twenty-One Demands in reducing China to a condition of vassalage to Japan.

William E. Borah

SENATOR BORAH was intellectually the ablest man in the Congress of the United States, with a reputation which reached to the Europe he always refused to visit, although he was for years chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. Yet he was a contradiction, an enigma, a mystery that no journalistic observer of his thirty-three years of service was ever able to explain adequately. Within party lines he was fearless and independent, often espousing unpopular causes to which the leaders of his party were opposed. He did not hesitate to demand the release of political prisoners when the war madness was still at its height. He was ever ready to uphold civil rights, and he was the foe of corrupt big business and monopoly. Yet he could not support such human and humane legislative proposals as woman suffrage, the abolition of child labor, and the pending anti-lynching bill because he felt that they jeopardized states' rights, even though the two former were legally added to the Constitution. His attitude toward that document was almost like the worship of a fetish.

Despite this long record of independence Senator Borah could never bring himself to cut loose from his party ties except in 1896, when he plumped for Free Silver. He ardently desired the election of Theodore Roosevelt in 1912, yet he would not become a Progressive. His whole heart was with Senator La Follette when the latter ran independently for President in 1924, but he would not speak out for him, although he had begged and received from his Wisconsin colleague a letter of indorsement for his own candidacy. Often it seemed as if his interest in an issue waned when it disappeared from the front pages. Still he was no publicity seeker. He could have made large sums of money by lecturing throughout the country, but he deliberately sought to restrict his utterances to the floor of the Senate so that they might carry the more weight there, and when he spoke the seats were filled and the galleries too. He had statesmanship, and his leadership of the fight against the United States' putting its name to the iniquitous Treaty of Versailles was of the highest order. Yet it is not too much to say that Borah made Harding and Coolidge possible. After saying that Coolidge was unfit to be President he became his supporter and for a time cooperator; after having said that Hoover was unfit to expend $100,000,000 in behalf of the Russians he declared that Hoover was the best-fitted man in the United States to be President. When questioned concerning this inconsistency he declined to answer.

Borah was a speaker whose words never failed to carry weight. One instinctively felt that he was one of the last links with the period in which there were intellectual giants in the Senate. Certainly no American ever served his state, his country, and his people more faithfully and more loyally. His bitterest opponents recognized his devotion to duty, his rugged adherence to principle, his freedom from any improper control or motive whatsoever. Yet he could not bring himself to take the leadership of the progressive forces in the United States which could have been his for the asking. That is the tragedy of Senator Borah's life—and not merely the fact that he failed to enter the White House, as he could have. In view of the completeness with which he spent his powers in his Senatorial duties, it seems paradoxical to say that he nevertheless denied the fulness of those powers to his countrymen, and yet the paradox is fact.

Is Mediation Possible?

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

ON HIS regular page this week Oswald Garrison Villard makes as good a case as can be made for an immediate peace in Europe. He tells what he would do if he were Mr. Roosevelt. He would, he says, offer mediation every day in the week. And he would invite the Pope to join him in asking the European neutrals to demand that the belligerents state their peace terms. He believes that one more effort should be made to bring Hitler and the Allies together. "The alternative," he says, "is a knockout blow inflicted by one side or the other, or a stalemate with all Europe going to pieces from economic and financial exhaustion."

In every country pacifists like Mr. Villard cling to the desperate hope that somehow the war may be ended before it begins in bitter earnest. They share his conviction that any peace is better than war; that no evil was ever cured by the greater evil of mass destruction; and that, in the particular issue of the present struggle, Germany "can no more be cleansed of Hitlerism and National Socialism by forces from the outside than it was purged of militarism by the Allies and the United States in 1918."

It is impossible not to sympathize with this position even when one dissents from it. It carries all the appeal of decency and some of the appeal of reason. Certainly victory over Hitler is not enough; it is only the beginning of peace. And peace will not grow out of victory. It will have to be fought for on an even wider front, and in the post-war struggle for peace the United States will have to be counted among the leading combatants. But in my opinion, the defeat of Hitler is a prerequisite to the fight for peace; and I cannot help wondering, after reading Mr. Villard's impressive plea, just how he visualizes the process of bringing the war to an early end.

Let us suppose that Mr. Villard is the President of the United States and can follow his own advice. He offers mediation, publicly, to all the belligerents. The Allies, for obvious reasons, delay their reply. If they reject the offer out of hand they lay themselves open to an effective attack by pacifist and pro-appeasement forces. If they accept—but they cannot possibly accept unless it is understood in advance that the war shall go on while mediation is under way. And they cannot accept on any condition without abandoning their one clearly enunciated war aim—the "end of Hitlerism." In any case they will do well to think the proposal over for a few days. Because clearly the President has maneuvered them into an uncomfortably hot spot.

Meanwhile Hitler is laboring under no such difficulties. He has everything to gain and nothing to lose by a prompt acceptance. He becomes again the man of peace in the eyes of his people, and he thrusts upon the Allies the responsibility for keeping the war going if they refuse. Hitler accepts and asks for an immediate armistice. He points out, quite plausibly, that it is impossible to discuss peace while ships are being sunk and guns roaring. He offers to ground his planes and call home his submarines, provided the British and French simultaneously lift the blockade. This is a reasonable demand from every point of view except that of licking Hitler. It is a demand that a neutral mediator will find it hard to refuse.

But if the Allies are still hesitating, this demand will resolve their doubts. They cannot lift the blockade. To do so would be to surrender all the strategic advantages they have won or hope to win. With the blockade lifted and the processes of mediation under way, Hitler can import and store up oil and iron and foodstuffs, he can shunt populations from place to place and crush internal resistance, he can turn Poland and the Protectorate into true German lands and mend his fences in the Balkans.

For Hitler delay is all to the good—as long as the blockade is lifted. For the Allies delay is fatal—unless the blockade is continued. So Britain and France are cast in a thoroughly unsympathetic role. They accept mediation grudgingly if at all, and insist upon their right to continue seizing their enemy's ships and strangling his economic life. Hitler makes no conditions. He asks only an end to the struggle while peace is being discussed.

If I were President of the United States I would hesitate to offer these easy advantages to Hitler. I would not give him the chance to pose before the world as a generous, decent, peace-loving fellow. I would not make it possible for him to demand a breathing-spell in which to prepare for the next round of his battle. I would keep in mind the unspeakable fate of those parts of Europe that have already fallen into his hands, and I would in no way impede the belated efforts of the French and British to prevent the westward spread of Nazi dynamism.

If I were President I would offer no mediation as long as Hitler remained in power.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 85

EDITORIALS:

WILLIAM E. BORAH 87
IS MEDIATION POSSIBLE? by Freda Kirchwey 87
THE CHRISTIAN FRONT AND MARTIN DIES by James Wechsler 89
MASS MURDER IN POLAND by Howard Daniel 92
TRADE TREATIES AND "REALISM" by Maxwell S. Stewart 94
INDUSTRIAL FARMING—PREVIEW by Arthur Eggleston 96
THE CRIME OF GEORGES BONNET by Robert Dell 99
IN THE WIND 100
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 101

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE TELEPHONE COMPANY by Hubert F. Havlik 102
"WITHOUT ARCHITECT OR PLAN" by Bertram M. Gross 103
NEW LIFE INTO OLD FORMS by Selden Rodman 103
CALIFORNIA by Ruth Pielkova 104
THE AMERICAN NEGRO FAMILY by Melville J. Herskovits 104
WAR-TORN CHINA by Maxwell S. Stewart 105
SHORTER NOTICES 105
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 106
DANCE: THE DANCES OF MEXICO by Virginia Mishnun 107

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

The Christian Front and Martin Dies

BY JAMES WECHSLER

WHEN the FBI exposed the Christian Front's terrorist conspiracy, it also shattered Martin Dies's conspiracy of silence. After the arrests government officials said they had merely "scratched the surface" of the intrigue. That was an overstatement. For investigation into the origins and growth of the Christian Front leads not only to the seventeen who plotted violence but to the priest whose sermons inspired them. It leads not only to shabby tenements in Brooklyn but to ornate homes on Park Avenue. And from these Park Avenue residences of the Front's "fellow-travelers" it leads to the doorstep of Martin Dies.

The interlocking relationships are largely a matter of record. They are corroborated by material in the record of the Dies committee itself and supplemented by correspondence that has just been revealed. Pieced together, the exhibits show that while Martin Dies was chairman of the Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, he was collaborating with men who were the "respectable" periphery of the Christian Front. The exhibits may also show that while Dies hounded the left, he deliberately granted immunity to the right.

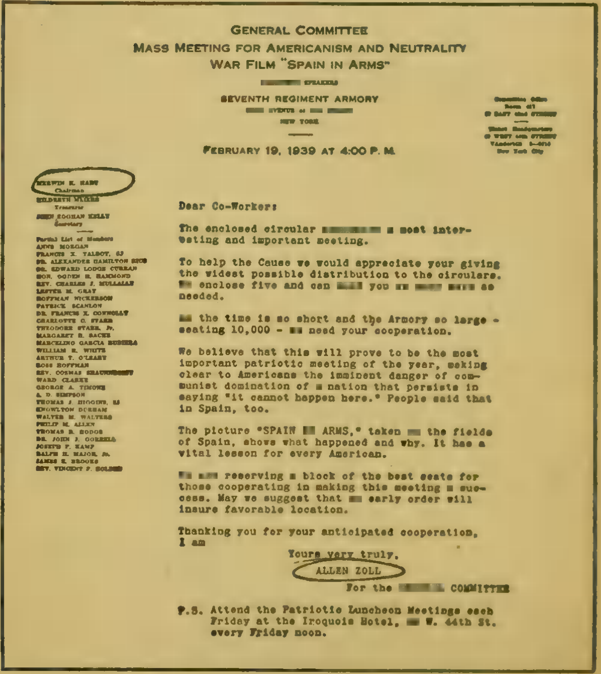
The story is chiefly about the relations of two men—Merwin K. Hart and Martin Dies. But there are a number of other names—names like Allen Zoll, John E. Kelly, James True, John Trevor, and William Dudley Pelley—which help to illuminate the record.

On December 8, 1938, Dies was the guest speaker at a luncheon in New York officially sponsored by the New York State Economic Council, whose president is Merwin K. Hart. While the council's perennial mission is to combat social legislation, Hart's activities and connections are a good deal more varied. At this luncheon Fritz Kuhn and James Wheeler-Hill, secretary of the Bund, were guests, and their names appeared on the advance list. When a Times reporter asked Wheeler-Hill the significance of their presence, he replied: "We have many friends on the council." During the luncheon members of the Christian Front distributed leaflets announcing a mass-meeting of their own. Reporters who covered the affair say that Dies could not have overlooked the Front's presence; he was practically surrounded. Hart presided.

Eight days later there was another luncheon. Dies wasn't present, but Hart was. The luncheon was ostensibly sponsored by the now defunct American Patriots, whose president was Allen Zoll. Zoll presided; and the fact is worth noting because Zoll's connections with both Hart and the Front are beyond dispute. Only the night before, he had appeared as a speaker at the Manhattan Opera House, on the same platform with John F. Cassidy, one of the Christian Front men just arrested by the FBI. On July 2, 1939, Zoll was arrested for trying to extort money from officials of station WMCA in return for calling off the Christian Front picket line. Other speakers at the American Patriots luncheon included General Van Horn Moseley and John E. Kelly, whose Christian Front link I shall cite later. The principal address was delivered by Merwin K. Hart.

If Dies was innocent of the facts concerning his host in December, 1938, he presumably knew better a month later, especially in view of the fact-finding facilities of his committee. Yet on January 26, 1939, Dies and Hart once more performed a duet. On that day there was a meeting of the "American Coalition" at the Carleton Hotel in Washington. This is another thinly disguised wing of the anti-democratic machine; its promoter is John B. Trevor, millionaire patrioteer and a close associate of Hart's. One of the Coalition's chief sponsors is James True, notorious anti-Semitic pamphleteer. At the meeting there were two notable addresses. One was delivered by Martin Dies, the other by Merwin K. Hart.

Less than a month after this joint appearance with Dies, Hart reappeared, surrounded by familiar faces. This time he was running a mass-meeting at the Seventh



GENERAL COMMITTEE
MASS MEETING FOR AMERICANISM AND NEUTRALITY
WAR FILM "SPAIN IN ARMS"
[illegible] SPEAKERS
SEVENTH REGIMENT ARMORY
NEW YORK

FEBRUARY 19, 1939 AT 4:00 P. M.

MERWIN K. HART
Chairman
HILDRETH MEIERE
Treasurer
JOHN EOGHAN KELLY
Secretary

Partial List of Members
ANNE MORGAN
FRANCIS X. TALBOT, SJ
DR. ALEXANDER HAMILTON RICE
DR. EDWARD LODGE CURRAN
HON. OGDEN H. HAMMOND
REV. CHARLES J. MULLALAN
LESTER M. GRAY
HOFFMAN NICKERSON
PATRICK SCANLON
DR. FRANCIS X. CONNOLLY
CHARLOTTE C. STARR
THEODORE STARR, Jr.
MARGARET H. SACHS
MARCELINO GARCIA BURGERA
WILLIAM R. WHITE
ARTHUR T. O'LEARY
ROSS HOFFMAN
REV. COSMAS SHAUGHNESSY
WARD CLARKE
GEORGE A. TIMONE
A. D. SIMPSON
THOMAS J. HIGGINS, SJ
KNOWLTON DURHAM
WALTER M. WALTERS
PHILIP M. ALLEN
THOMAS R. HODGE
DR. JOHN J. CORRELL
JOSEPH P. KAMP
RALPH H. MAJOR, Jr.
JAMES E. BROOKS
REV. VINCENT F. HOLDEN

Dear Co-Worker:

The enclosed circular [illegible] [illegible] most interesting and important meeting.

To help the Cause we would appreciate your giving the widest possible distribution to the circulars. [illegible] enclose five and can [illegible] you [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as needed.

[illegible] the time is so short and the Armory so large - seating 10,000 - [illegible] need your cooperation.

We believe that this will prove to be the most important patriotic meeting of the year, making clear to Americans the imminent danger of communist domination of [illegible] nation that persists in saying "it cannot happen here." People said that in Spain, too.

The picture "SPAIN [illegible] ARMS," taken [illegible] the fields of Spain, shows what happened and why. It has a vital lesson for every American.

[illegible] [illegible] reserving [illegible] block of the best seats for those cooperating in making this meeting [illegible] success. May we suggest that [illegible] early order will insure favorable location.

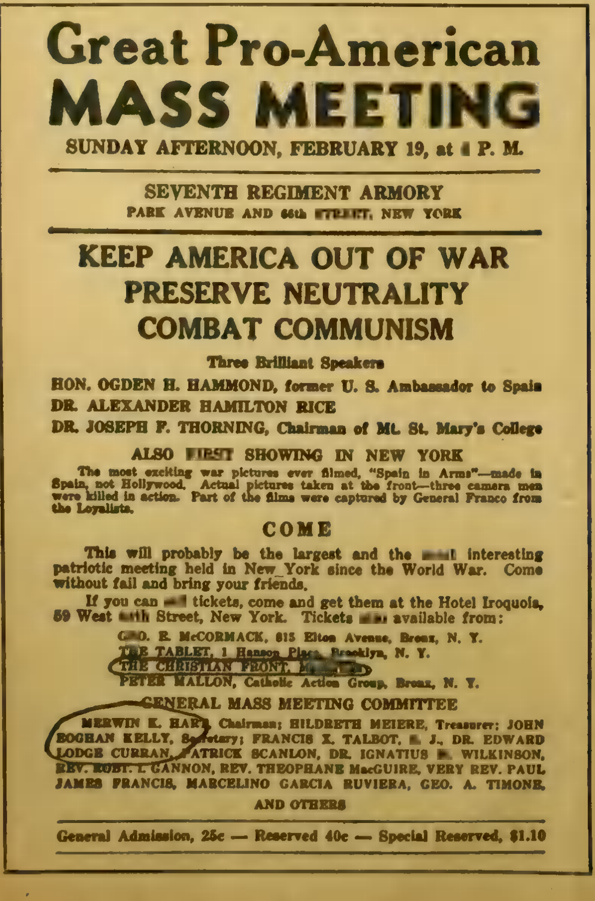
Thanking you for your anticipated cooperation, I am

Yours very truly,
ALLEN ZOLL
For the [illegible] COMMITTEE

P.S. Attend the Patriotic Luncheon Meetings each Friday at the Iroquois Hotel, [illegible] W. 44th St. every Friday noon.

Regiment Armory in New York. Officially it was called a "pro-American" meeting, as the accompanying photostats show. That was transparent window-dressing. In fact it was a pro-Franco demonstration; more important, it showed Hart again collaborating with the Christian Front. As the leaflet reproduced here shows, the Front was one of the chief agencies of ticket distribution for the meeting. The mimeographed letter, also reproduced here, indicates that Allen Zoll actively aided the sponsoring committee, of which Merwin K. Hart was chairman. Zoll issued an appeal for support of the meeting on the committee's stationary (see facsimile); and in the same letter it was stated that tickets were available at the Hotel Iroquois. That hotel was Zoll's and Kelly's headquarters. Another major figure in the committee's preparations was Bernard D'Arcy, agent for Social Justice in New York. On the same stationary and in the same vein D'Arcy wrote to his followers: "I am assisting the committee to make a big success of the mass-meeting described above." On February 5, 1939, D'Arcy and John F. Cassidy were jointly advertised as speakers at a Christian Front mass-meeting; on June 25, 1939, at another Christian Front meeting, D'Arcy delivered a eulogy of Cassidy.

The armory mass-meeting was Hart's show. His chief aides were Zoll, D'Arcy, and John E. Kelly; and the "mass base" of the meeting was the Christian Front. Special seats were reserved for Christian Front members who arrived late because they had been out picketing. When they entered, carrying Coughlin's picture aloft, "the speaker was drowned out by applause," according to the New York Times. Prominently listed on Hart's sponsoring committee for the affair were Edward Lodge Curran, who has frequently appeared on Christian Front platforms, and Patrick Scanlan, who has made similar appearances and whose paper, the Catholic Tablet, is a virtual house-organ for the Front. Inside the armory only Coughlinite literature was sold. Merwin K. Hart presided at the meeting.



Great Pro-American

MASS MEETING

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 19, at [illegible] P. M.

SEVENTH REGIMENT ARMORY

PARK AVENUE AND 66th STREET, NEW YORK

KEEP AMERICA OUT OF WAR

PRESERVE NEUTRALITY

COMBAT COMMUNISM

Three Brilliant Speakers

HON. OGDEN H. HAMMOND, former U. S. Ambassador to Spain

DR. ALEXANDER HAMILTON RICE

DR. JOSEPH F. THORNING, Chairman of Mt. St. Mary's College

ALSO FIRST SHOWING IN NEW YORK

The most exciting war pictures ever filmed, "Spain in Arms"—made in Spain, not Hollywood. Actual pictures taken at the front—three camera men were killed in action. Part of the films were captured by General Franco from the Loyalists.

COME

This will probably be the largest and the most interesting patriotic meeting held in New York since the World War. Come without fail and bring your friends.

If you can [illegible] tickets, come and get them at the Hotel Iroquois, 59 West [illegible] Street, New York. Tickets [illegible] available from:

GEO. E. McCORMACK, 815 Elton Avenue, Bronx, N. Y.
THE TABLET, 1 Hanson Place, Brooklyn, N. Y.
THE CHRISTIAN FRONT, [illegible]
PETER MALLON, Catholic Action Group, Bronx, N. Y.

GENERAL MASS MEETING COMMITTEE

MERWIN K. HART, Chairman; HILDRETH MEIERE, Treasurer; JOHN BOGHAN KELLY, Secretary; FRANCIS X. TALBOT, S. J., DR. EDWARD LODGE CURRAN, PATRICK SCANLON, DR. IGNATIUS [illegible] WILKINSON, REV. ROBT. I. GANNON, REV. THEOPHANE MacGUIRE, VERY REV. PAUL JAMES FRANCIS, MARCELINO GARCIA RUVIERA, GEO. A. TIMONE, AND OTHERS

General Admission, 25c — Reserved 40c — Special Reserved, $1.10

COMMITTEE ON MASS MEETING FOR AMERICA
Madison Square Garden
Wednesday, Nov. 29
8:30 P.M.

Congressman
MARTIN DIES
Principal Speaker

MERWIN K. HART
Chairman
JEREMIAH CROSS
HILDRETH MEIERE
Vice Chairmen
MARY VAIL [illegible]
Treasurer
RALPH C. TOBIN
Secretary
KNOWLTON DURHAM
JOHN B. TREVOR, JR.
GEORGE A. TIMONE
FRANK FOX
W. B. McKELS
MILTON W. HARRISON
JOHN D. DUNLOP
PHILIP LIEBMANN
ROBERT [illegible]
[illegible]
LAWRENCE B. ELLIMAN
WALTER [illegible] WALTERS
[illegible] M. HARRISS

MAJOR GEN. [illegible] F. O'RYAN
Chairman
Honorary Committee of Sponsors

Headquarters
Room 417
[illegible] East 42nd Street
New York City

MUrray Hill 2-[illegible]

On the stationary of the committee promoting the meeting, you will note that John E. Kelly is listed as secretary, under Hart. Kelly's work for Hart was not confined to this venture. Actually the mass-meeting was run by the same men who controlled the American Union for Nationalist Spain—chief pro-Franco propaganda agency in the United States. The president of Franco's union was Merwin K. Hart. The secretary was John E. Kelly. And Kelly also figures in the Christian Front network. He was especially prominent at a meeting held at the Great Northern Hotel on May 24, 1939. Jointly sponsored by the Christian Front and Zoll's "American Patriots," this meeting was an anti-Semitic orgy according to newspaper accounts. Zoll gave one of the main addresses; Kelly, Hart's Man Friday, gave the other.

Numerous other case histories of meetings and manifestos could be cited, dramatizing the collaboration between Dies, the well-dressed sympathizers with the Front, and the rowdy Front members themselves. There is, for example, the case of Robert Appleton. Appleton appears on several of Hart's committees; he is closely identified with Hart, Trevor and company. He is also the man, said the New York Post on November 30, who provided free office space for Joe McWilliams, formerly a key figure in the Christian Front and now leader of the Christian Mobilizers. On December 4, 1938, Dies appeared as the guest speaker at a luncheon sponsored by the American Defense Society. Robert Appleton is president of the American Defense Society.

In December, 1938, Dies could plausibly have feigned ignorance of the Coughlinite network. A year later he was still openly flirting with the same men and movements. By that time the testimony of witnesses before his own committee had established the anti-Semitic links of Zoll and Kelly; and by that time no G-man was needed to demonstrate their link with Hart. But in November, 1939, when Dies decided to launch a new self-promotion drive, he conceived a Madison Square Garden meeting in his own honor; and he chose Hart to direct the proceedings. Soliciting help from business men, Hart made clear that the initiative for the meeting had come from Dies, not himself.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Hart attended to all the details. The sponsoring committee which he assembled has a reminiscent look: it is a cross-section of those who served on Hart's pro-Franco committee—A. Hamilton Rice, Hildreth Meiere, Ogden Hammond, George Timone; and of the Christian Front's fellow-travelers—George Harvey, John Trevor, John B. Snow, and Robert Harriss (the last-named is Coughlin's long-time associate and author of his monetary program). Once again the members of the Christian Front provided the "mass base." Admitted to the balconies on free tickets, which they boasted they had obtained en bloc, they cheered wildly for every speaker except Jean Mathias, commander of the Jewish War Veterans, whose presence was an obvious concession to the amenities.

Dies delivered the principal address. Merwin K. Hart presided. In his book "America, Look at Spain," Hart had written: "American citizens may heed the clear lesson of Spain and draw their own conclusions as to the consequences if they permit state or federal statutes to curb their right to own and if need be to carry arms, to protect themselves against the Communist menace."

Less than two months after the Garden meeting, the FBI caught the Christian Front in possession of weapons alleged to have been stolen from National Guard armories.

I have not dwelt at length on the strong foreign allegiances of the men whose domestic "mass base" is the Front. Hart's services to the Franco regime are well known. The Dies committee exhaustively probed the pro-Loyalist agencies here; it never touched the pro-Franco agencies. This negligence was typical of the virtual whitewash it provided for rightist groups. Was the whitewash deliberate? Reproduced here is a letter, written two months after the Dies committee was set up, from William Dudley Pelley, head of the Silver Shirts, to David Mayne, then his Washington agent. Note that in this letter Pelley boasts: "The conference verified belief that we may safely continue in the understanding that Dies will not go out of the way to call us or to embarrass us—True—Father Coughlin—George or the Legion." He obviously referred to the Silver Shirt Legion.

On July 26, 1939, Pelley, who had criticized Dies for taking pot shots at rightist groups, wrote to the same man:

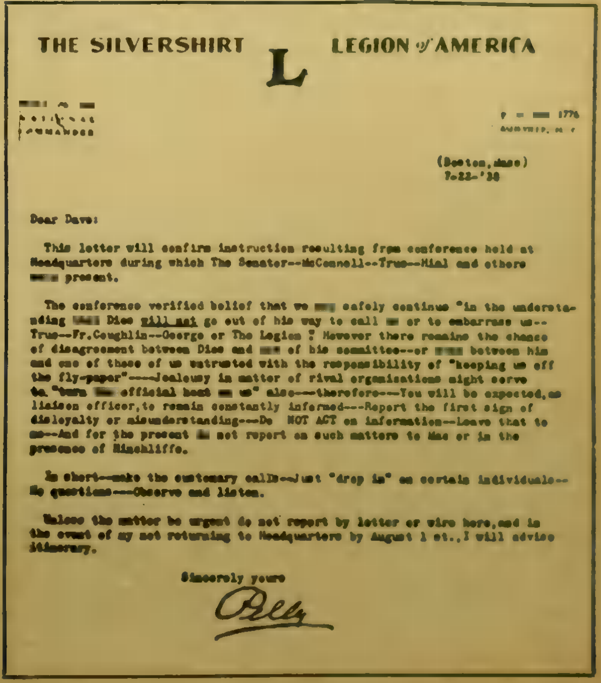
> As to the booklet [attacking Dies] which although caustic was not intended other than to create the general impression that there existed between Dies and myself a personal "gripe" sufficient to keep us apart from any form of cooperation . . . and was actually intended . . . to offset any rumors—in the event of suspicion—that he and I through mutual contacts have an understanding.
>
> Realizing that I owe him much—I want you to "contact" one close to him and advise—"that I covered the matter in a much too realistic manner—and will take proper steps in Texas among his and my friends to convince him of my appreciation and sincerity."

And as late as August 25, 1939, when the Dies committee was allegedly "getting" Pelley, the chief of the Silver Shirts wrote to Mayne:

> Recalling that there existed a gentleman's agreement I do not feel disturbed over the present state of affairs even though the sub-pena [sic] has been issued—however I trust you to make discreet calls ascertaining Martin's attitude and if I may continue to depend upon past advice to the effect that he would not require my presence unless forced to do so.

The Dies committee never found Pelley. Under insistent pressure it did publish some anti-Pelley evidence. It never summoned Coughlin or True; it did put Deatherage on the stand. Were these weak stabs at the right merely concessions to popular suspicion? Had there been a "gentleman's agreement" between Martin Dies and William Pelley, as these letters boast?

The chain of documentary and circumstantial evidence is beginning to emerge. But it is already clear enough to make mandatory a full and exhaustive investigation of the background, connections, and activities of Martin Dies.



THE SILVERSHIRT L LEGION of AMERICA

(Boston,Mass)
7-22-'39

Dear Dave:

This letter will confirm instruction resulting from conference held at Headquarters during which The Senator--McConnell--True--Mial and others were present.

The conference verified belief that we may safely continue "in the understanding that Dies will not go out of his way to call us or to embarrass us--True--Fr.Coughlin--George or The Legion" However there remains the chance of disagreement between Dies and one of his committee--or even between him and one of those of us entrusted with the responsibility of "keeping us off the fly-paper"---Jealousy in matter of rival organizations might serve to "turn the official heat on us" also---therefore---You will be expected, as liaison officer, to remain constantly informed---Report the first sign of disloyalty or misunderstanding---Do NOT ACT on information--Leave that to me--And for the present do not report on such matters to Mac or in the presence of Hinchliffe.

In short--make the customary calls--Just "drop in" on certain individuals--No questions---Observe and listen.

Unless the matter be urgent do not report by letter or wire here, and in the event of my not returning to Headquarters by August 1 st., I will advise itinerary.

Sincerely yours

Pelley

Mass Murder in Poland

BY HOWARD DANIEL

It is our duty to cleanse this land ruthlessly of all scoundrels, robbers, Poles, and Jews.—Albert Förster, Nazi leader of Danzig.

THE German occupation of conquered Poland is something quite different from the usual military occupation of a conquered country. Behind the hermetically sealed frontier the depopulation of vast areas which fall within the German Lebensraum is being carried out with characteristic German Gründlichkeit. It is vae victis again, a repetition of the laying waste of Italy by the barbarians, but with this difference: the Gauls who sacked Rome had no philosophy of killing and destruction, whereas the highest Nazi official in German Poland, Governor General Hans Frank, is the man who when Reich Commissar for Justice enunciated the famous doctrine Recht ist was dem deutschen Volke nützt, Unrecht was ihm schadet—anything that benefits the German people is justified. Evidently the annihilation of millions of Poles and Jews falls under this head.

There have been previous German administrations of Poland, but they were not like the present one. During the first World War when the Germans occupied Poland nothing happened to the population at large. Even the Jews were invited in the famous Yiddish letter of General Ludendorff—"zu di Jidden in Paulen"—to cooperate with the German administration. Of course the war had a serious effect on Polish life, but the invaders made no attempt to interfere with it fundamentally.

At the beginning of this present war a Polish buffer state was spoken of, but the idea was abandoned. Now it is plain that the Germans plan nothing less than the total destruction of Poland. In a recent speech to the House of Commons, Neville Chamberlain said that evidence considered by his government, checked by all the sources available, showed that the Nazis were carrying out "a policy of deliberate depopulation" with special emphasis on the liquidation of intellectuals. This tallies with an interesting report which has just come from Berlin. Secret instructions from the Gestapo, the real rulers of the conquered nation, to General von Rundstedt, one of the highest army commanders in Poland, reveal that a rate of 5 per cent per month has been set for the liquidation of the Polish intellectuals. An extensive campaign of sterilization is planned for 1941, in preparation for which a large force of S. S. medical specialists has already been sent into the country.

In carrying out their policy of destruction, the Germans have started with the easiest victims, the Jews. The persecution of Jews in the newly conquered territory is infinitely worse than in Greater Germany. As one eyewitness of both terrors puts it, "even the frightful events of last year's November pogroms in Germany are pale by comparison." In Germany the feelings of the great mass of the people have always been a strong brake on the brutality of the S. S. and the Gestapo. And in addition the presence of many foreigners in the Reich has had the effect of restricting the torturing and killing to the privacy of government buildings and concentration camps. But in Poland there has been no such brake, and the unrestrained violence of the Gestapo and the S. S. has ranged all the way from confiscation of property to murder.

It seems certain from the reports of the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and other reputable welfare agencies working in and around Poland that at least 80 per cent of the 1,500,000 Jews in the German-occupied areas are completely dependent on public relief. The economic position of the greater part of the Polish Jews has for years been worse than that of Jews in other countries. Hundreds of thousands have not been able to meet their most urgent needs without assistance. After having been pauperized for years, they now face the alternative of emigration or extermination. The possibility of emigration is being used as a stick to beat a ransom in foreign currency out of them. At the present moment all the facts point to extermination. The "Black Book" to be published shortly by the Jewish World Congress estimates that the Jewish toll in dead since the second world war began amounts to no less than 250,000. If there is any inclination to regard Jewish reports as exaggerated, an account of the terror published in the Breslau Schlesische Zeitung will dispel it. The account is based on German police reports in the province of Lodz. It reads:

> A hundred Jews were executed because during the house-to-house search for arms many Jews offered resistance. Acting on a report which came to the police that Jews surrounded a synagogue in Lodz in order to prevent Germans entering, fire was opened on the Jews and hundreds of them were shot. . . . Jewish streets were blocked hermetically. Jews were strictly forbidden to approach the local peasants because it was alleged that they were obtaining milk, potatoes, and vegetables for hoarding. As there was a typhoid epidemic, Jews were permitted to consult Jewish doctors on condition that these doctors prepared their own medicines. In the town of Sieradz thirty-six Jews were shot because they had fired on German soldiers; ninety-one Jews were publicly > flogged because they had omitted to salute police officers in Pabianee. In the town of Kolo 217 Jews were publicly flogged because of a theft of provisions. Among the thieves were the town rabbi and thirteen of his scholars. . . . The work of the authorities was simplified because in some houses many Jews committed suicide before they could be arrested. In many houses the Jews resisted with iron rods and hatchets. More than 100 of these criminals were executed on the spot.

Some of the official German measures show clearly that the action against the Jews is part of a carefully calculated plan to remove them from most of the occupied area by creating conditions intolerable or impossible for human life. Jewish bank deposits must not exceed 2,000 zloty (formerly about $400). Anyone possessing more than this amount of money was ordered to give an inventory of all his possessions, including clothes and household goods, before January 19 on pain of extreme penalties. The clothes and household furnishings are for the Baltic Germans, who came into the conquered areas short of almost everything. Without a special permission which is either very expensive or impossible to obtain Jews are prohibited from buying shoes or clothes. On the flimsiest of excuses bank deposits are confiscated. Enormous levies and fines have been imposed on whole Jewish communities for crimes which the Gestapo alleges have been committed. Dr. Szoszkes, a well-known banker of Warsaw and a vice-president of the Warsaw Jewish Community who has just arrived in this country after escaping from Poland, reports that the Nazis extorted 12,000,000 zloty ($2,400,000) from the Warsaw community alone before he left. The much smaller community of Lublin had to raise 1,000,000 zloty at forty-eight hours' notice, half of this in gold and jewelry.

A recent order from the German administration in Cracow that all male Jews between sixteen and sixty will have to serve a period of forced labor, and the latest news about the Jewish reservation in the Lublin district indicate that male Jews who escape death will be herded in concentration camps so gigantic and brutal that Dachau and Buchenwald will seem like kindergartens by comparison.

Jews are forbidden to change their place of residence, and many streets are barred to them at all times. They are not permitted to be out of their houses—those who are lucky enough still to have a roof over their heads—between 9 p. m. and 5 a. m. without written permission from the police. The inhabitants of whole towns and villages have been driven out at thirty minutes' notice. Nominally they are permitted to take with them a few pounds of goods, but anyone who has had experience with the application of regulations by the Gestapo knows that it would be a lucky person who got away with more than he had on his back. The S. S. and Gestapo go out of their way to round up Jewish Laborites and Zionists, who are given special "treatment" or even killed outright.

In the train of war, starvation, and torture has come typhus. At the moment a typhus epidemic is raging in Warsaw, Lodz, and many other cities. It is hardly accurate to say that there are Jews still living in Poland. They are all dying, but for some the tempo is slower and more painful than for those who were dispatched in the market-places, falling into graves dug with their own hands. A plan to set up a ghetto in Warsaw where nearly four hundred thousand Jews would be confined in the space of a few city blocks appears to have been held up, probably because of the typhus epidemic and the fact that most of the buildings in the selected site were ruined by the bombardment. The reservation that is being created around Lublin, formerly a flourishing industrial city in East Poland, will be not only for Polish Jews but also for Jews from Greater Germany, especially from Austria and the Bohemian Protectorate.

Conditions in the no man's lands surrounding the German-occupied areas are little better. A representative of a welfare agency who recently visited the Suwalki district along the Lithuanian border writes:

> We found two children of about twelve years of age, fourteen women, and fifteen men. This was the third day they had been on the frontier in sub-freezing weather. Most of them were unable to talk coherently but kept screaming to us and crying to be taken away. I learned that each day they had been visited by German guards and searched to the skin again and again to make sure that they had not succeeded in hiding some money or valuables. One man with a bandaged leg had had the wound opened when the Germans ripped off the bandage to see whether he was hiding any money. With the aid of the peasants, some of whom I saw standing about crying while we talked with the refugees, they had built crude unroofed huts which offered some protection against wind but none against rain. One young woman had died during the night and her body lay on the field covered with a burlap bag.

Jews who lived in the Russian-occupied areas or who managed to escape there are better off. With the exception of a small number of upper-class factory owners and business men, the 1,500,000 Jews in what is now Russian territory have not been robbed of their property. While most of the government offices have been taken over by Ukrainians, several high positions have been filled by Polish Jewish Communists. Henryk Grünbaum, son of a well-known Jewish leader, has been appointed governor of Galicia. A Cracow lawyer, Droppner, has been appointed mayor of Lemberg. In small towns, it is reported, many Jewish non-Communists have been given government positions.

The Nazi authorities have encouraged the mass exodus to Russian territory, and at first the Russians did nothing to stop it. Of late an attempt has been made to prevent any further entry since the number of immigrants is presenting a problem. With the exception of orthodox Jews and Zionists, whose activities are curtailed in Russia, the situation of the newly arrived Jewish population is, considering the circumstances, satisfactory. A case has come to my knowledge of a young Jew whose relatives had all his papers in order for his emigration to the United States. He has decided to stay in the Soviet Union, where a job as a skilled worker has been offered him.

The economic condition of the 100,000 Polish Jews scattered through Hungary, Rumania, Lithuania, and Latvia is almost hopeless, but at least they are outside the annihilation taking place in Poland.

The horror of Poland is not very different from the hell which is war. We are witnessing the execution of a cold-blooded plan to eliminate those "inferior races" unfortunate enough to dwell in that part of Europe marked by Hitler as German Lebensraum. The outcry of the whole civilized world was needed to stop the Turkish atrocities in Armenia. To remain silent now is to condone an unspeakable crime. There can be no neutrality toward this mass extermination.

Trade Treaties and "Realism"

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

OPPONENTS of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act pride themselves on what they like to call hard-headed realism. Most of them readily concede that Secretary Hull is motivated by sincere idealism. They will even admit the essential truth of his contention that the reciprocal pacts have checked the deterioration in international trade. But they insist that we dare not allow idealism or a sentimental interest in world trade to interfere with the legitimate interests of American business men and farmers. There has been just enough sentimentalism in the claims made for the Hull trade program to make these tactics effective.

The Administration has sought to meet the attack by presenting facts showing that the gains from the pacts have far outweighed the losses. This has not been difficult. Twenty-two agreements have been concluded, covering three-fifths of America's foreign trade. During the two years of 1937 and 1938 our exports to the countries with which we have trade agreements rose 61 per cent over the pre-trade-agreement period of 1934-35, whereas our exports to other countries gained only 38 per cent. Our imports from countries with trade agreements increased only 35 per cent in the same period, leaving the United States with a substantial net gain in exports. Our export surplus in 1938 was higher than in 1929, while that of 1939 was only slightly lower.

This would seem pretty conclusive evidence that the United States has not been taken for a ride. It suggests, on the contrary, that this country has taken advantage of its economic strength to drive some pretty sharp bargains. If, as now seems possible, we find ourselves possessed of nearly all the world's available gold supply in the not too distant future, we may wish we were not such sharp traders.

But that is not what troubles our realists. They are concerned, they say, about the farmer. Ironically enough, the strongest attacks on the trade agreements are being made today in his name—ironically, because farmers, more than any other group, have benefited by the pacts. Theirs is America's principal export industry, and they are therefore the chief beneficiaries of any increase in trade. Moreover, special attention has been given to farm products in the pacts thus far concluded. Countries which have made agreements have granted concessions on about three-fourths of the agricultural products they normally import from the United States. Included are tariff cuts on fresh meats, bacon, ham, lard, fruits, vegetables, and grain. Great Britain, the world's leading wheat market, removed its discriminatory duty on American wheat as part of the Anglo-American pact.

In contrast, the reductions granted by the United States on farm products entering this country have been negligible. Only 14 per cent of our total agricultural imports have been affected by tariff concessions granted under the trade pacts. Sugar alone accounts for almost half of this total. And the reduced duty on sugar has been largely offset by rigid quota restrictions. The only tariff cut on a farm product which opponents of the Hull program have been able to make much use of in their campaign has been the reduction in the duty on cattle in the Canadian agreement. But even here the facts are against the opposition. Instead of being ruined by the importation of 225,000 cattle a year, domestic cattle producers are receiving 60 cents a hundredweight more for cattle today than they were three years ago when the Canadian trade agreement went into effect. Moreover, they enjoy a larger portion of the home market than they did in 1929. Imports of farm products as a whole have risen substantially in the past few years, but the bulk of the increase has been in products not affected by the trade-agreement program. The increase may be attributed chiefly to the drought and enlarged domestic buying power. It has in no sense been harmful to American agriculture.

To the protectionist it seems incredible that the United States could make as many concessions as it has made in the twenty trade agreements still in effect—and extend these concessions under the most-favored-nation clause—without disrupting the American economy more than the facts seem to indicate is the case. That such a disruption has not occurred may be explained by the fact that most of the American concessions have been made on tariffs that had no real economic justification. Many of the concessions have been on commodities like manganese which the United States cannot produce in sufficient quantities for its own needs despite tariff protection. Others have been on special grades of commodities which differ basically from the grades produced in this country and are, in fact, non-competitive. Still other concessions, such as the cuts in the duties on sugar, cattle, and shoes, have been made in connection with quota limitations which amply protect the domestic producers. And not a few of the reductions have been on duties which were so high as to be prohibitive rather than protective.

Nor has the extension of American tariff concessions to other countries under the most-favored-nation clause had the disastrous effects predicted. This is due to the safeguards which the State Department has employed in applying the policy. Concessions are usually granted only on products or grades of which the negotiating country is the chief supplier. For example, the tariff reduction on cattle in the Canadian agreement was restricted to cattle weighing over 700 pounds, excluding the smaller Mexican breeds.

Facts such as have been cited indicate that the "realism" of the protectionist opposition to the Hull trade policy is hardly more than a combination of provincialism and ignorance. But there exists another type of realism which cannot be disposed of so easily. Among those opposed to the trade pacts is a small group which regards the Hull policy as a nostalgic attempt to restore a world economy based on the principles of laissez faire. In this view there is at least a germ of truth. A large measure of the support for the trade-agreement program has come from those whose economic philosophy found expression in the Van Zeeland and similar plans. Mr. Hull's own background is essentially that of a free trader, and there is no reason to believe that he has drastically modified his views. Laissez faire economics collapsed with the failure of the 1933 World Economic Conference. It can no longer be doubted that we are entering a period of increasing economic controls. It is fair to ask, therefore, whether the Hull trade policy can be reconciled with a realistic program of domestic planning. On the answer to that question, rather than on the price of cattle, should rest the true realist's attitude toward extension of the Trade Agreements Act.

In reply it should be emphasized that trade is important in any type of economy. The exchange of something you have in abundance for something you badly need is good sense and good economics under any system. An increase in trade is beneficial since it implies a more efficient use of a country's natural resources.

The reciprocal trade program provides a flexible machinery for increasing trade which is adaptable either to planning or laissez faire. This flexibility is illustrated by the fact that the United States has been able to conclude a trade agreement with the Soviet Union as well as with Great Britain and the Scandinavian countries. It is true that no agreements have been concluded with the fascist countries, but this is because of their refusal to accept the basic American principle of non-discrimination. The fascist conception of trade as a political weapon rather than a means of improving living standards is perhaps the controlling factor in their rejection of the most-favored-nation principle.

Drawing by Eva Herrman

Secretary Hull

It is obvious that tariff bargaining is in no sense inconsistent with the flexibility which is essential in market-place economy. Yet it can just as readily be adapted to planning. Tariff-making is inevitably a form of economic control. The agency which determines the tariff rates is, whatever else it may be, a planning agency. For years these powers rested solely in Congress. And the experience of these years showed very clearly that a popularly elected body, subject to pressures of all types, is not a fit agency to assume this responsibility. Nearly all countries go farther than the United States in leaving the details of tariffs and quotas to administrative bodies. Only under these conditions can there be any hope that the commercial policy will be relatively free from the influences of special interests.

The weakest of Mr. Hull's arguments, from a realistic point of view, is the contention that his program affords the only lasting basis for peace. Again no one doubts Mr. Hull's sincerity. But the skeptic is to be pardoned if he fails to find that five years' experience with the trade-agreements program shows it to have made any measurable headway against economic nationalism or the other factors making for war. This is not so much a criticism of the Hull policy as of the arguments that have been offered in its defense. However, we should not allow the value of the policy to blind us to its very real limitations. The reciprocal trade program represents the one real effort made during the thirties to stem the tide of economic nationalism. If it has failed, a large share of the blame must be placed on the totalitarian powers. Yet some blame must also rest on the program itself. For, with all its merits, the reciprocal program is too limited in scope to compensate for the basic blunders in commercial policy made by the United States from 1919 to 1933.

Space does not permit a detailing of these blunders here, but in the main they sprang from a failure to recognize and adjust our policies to our changed position as a creditor country following the war. The situation was aggravated by the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff of 1930, the collapse of the World Economic Conference in 1933, the passage in 1934 of the Johnson Act, forbidding loans to countries that have failed to meet former obligations, and the devaluation of the dollar in 1935. Contrasted with these powerful nationalist influences, the reciprocal trade program dwindles in significance. It has scarcely made a dent in our protective trade walls. It has not produced a passive trade balance, such as America's creditor position requires. On the contrary, as suggested above, the United States seems to have used its superior bargaining position to swell its export balance. The increasing hoard of gold at Fort Knox is silent testimony to the continued unsoundness of our policies, despite Mr. Hull's valiant efforts. He is doubtless as aware as anyone of the inadequacy of the agreements. But the Republican outcry against the minor concessions proposed in discussion of the Argentine pact is a striking demonstration of the obstacles which he faces.

Adjustment of our commercial policy to hard facts may be "unrealistic" to the Republicans. It may antagonize some voters, as Representative Treadway of Massachusetts suggests. But by greatly increasing trade it would provide jobs throughout the country, particularly in farm areas. And, if pursued vigorously, it might yet reverse the nationalistic tides which threaten to destroy the basis of international relationships. While the Hull trade program may be an imperfect weapon, it is the only one immediately available for the purpose. Therein may be found the realism of Mr. Hull.

Industrial Farming—Preview

BY ARTHUR EGGLESTON

San Francisco, January 12

FEW Congressional committees have ever stood, pencil in hand, taking notes on a social revolution. That, however, is what the La Follette Civil Liberties Committee is doing in California. It is taking notes on what is perhaps the most important change in national life since the era of small shops and small factories closed and great industrial and business empires took over. Farming as a way of life is going to smash under the impact of drought, depression, dust storms, and the great ribbed tires of the all-purpose farm tractor. It is going to smash under a burden of debt and insecurity, land exhaustion, and lack of credit. The California investigation offers a preview of what is going to happen to American farming and of what the change will mean in political, economic, and social life.

Disclosures made before the committee about violence and vigilantes in California's rural area, about strikes and the suppression of civil liberties with the connivance of local law-enforcement officials, have had sensational headlines. We have become familiar with similar ingredients of labor strife from the La Follette committee's exposure of the machinery of anti-unionism in Harlan County, Chicago, Cleveland, and other places. But new and ominous developments have been revealed by the California hearings—something more serious than interstate transportation of strike-breakers, the sale of industrial munitions, the use of labor spies and back-to-work movements, and refusals to bargain collectively. Evidence before the committee records the birth of a new era, an era in which the working farmer-owner is being replaced by "employer-growers who produce on factory pattern and hire and fire disorganized workers in the manner of industrialists." This new employment pattern has shattered the old relationship between farmer and hired man and as yet provided no satisfactory substitute. The effort to create one has lined up California's false-front, industry-financed farmer organizations against the labor movement.

The employer-growers are opposed to any attempt, even by the state or the federal government, to step in between them and the underprivileged class doing the farm labor. Testimony showed that they have refused to take part in any proceeding which would interfere with the unilateral fixing of wage scales and conditions of labor for migratory farm workers. Even impartial wage boards are fought. The announcement by representatives of agricultural industrialists at the Los Angeles hearings that they are willing to bargain with workers must be taken as the sign of a last-minute but probably not lasting repentance.

The changing economic conditions revealed by the investigation have reached their farthest development in California, but they are spreading over the whole country. Traditional patterns of land use are being broken and others substituted in Arizona, Oregon, Idaho, Utah, Washington, New Mexico, Texas, and Florida—on the Atlantic seaboard as well as in the cotton South and Southwest and the Corn Belt. Industrialized and mechanized agriculture, in conjunction with other forces, is making migratory farm workers out of farm-owners, tenants, and share-croppers. Dr. Paul S. Taylor, University of California economist, testifying before the La Follette committee, said: "Every American farmer who is in the path of those forces is potentially an agricultural laborer who some day may be forced to depend for sustenance on wages earned by working on the land of another."

In California an army of some 200,000 migratory farm workers exists "outside the general social, economic, and political life of the state." The problem of protecting their civil liberties, including their right to organize and bargain collectively, is a large one, as Governor Olson told the committee. They have no bargaining strength and not much prospect of acquiring it very soon. Disfranchised through inability to establish residence, they "lack the means of political retaliation for unfair or illegal treatment." Against them and against their efforts, as well as those of government, to better their condition stands one of the strongest and most militant employer organizations in the country, the Associated Farmers, whose principle is collective action by employers to prevent collective action by employees.

It has been disclosed to the committee that among the founders of the Associated Farmers and the heavy contributors to its funds were banks, railroads, public-utility corporations, major oil companies, cotton-seed-oil and ginning companies, metropolitan employer associations, can, box, and lumber companies, sugar refineries, canners, and processors. There wasn't a farmer in the lot, as that term is understood, when the Associated Farmers was brought into existence in 1934. The organization has received $178,542 from 1934 to the present time, and only 26 per cent of it came from rural areas. And this sum of $46,472, listed as from "county units of Associated Farmers" on the committee records, was not necessarily from farmers. The committee is now awaiting evidence which will show how much of it came from local units of the same big industries, from their corporate farms, gins, canneries, and packing houses.

The evidence about the make-up of the Associated Farmers is bound to have a tremendous effect in Congress and in states like Minnesota where the Associated Farmers of California hope to form units. Congress has been warned to be on its guard against lobbies "purporting to represent the farmers of California" when it studies proposals to eliminate farm laborers from social-security, labor-relations, wages-and-hours, and other social legislation. Such a warning was delivered to the La Follette committee by Governor Olson in person in the following words: "If you have occasion in the future to hear from lobbies of this character in Washington, I would suggest that you inquire closely concerning the type of farming interests that they represent in this state, and determine for your own satisfaction if you can whether or not these lobbies are maintained by actual farmers in California or by interests that masquerade as farmers." It was for this statement, as much as anything else, that the Associated Farmers in convention assembled a day or two later attacked Governor Olson and every single suggestion he had made for government measures to alleviate the condition of the migratory farm laborers. Yet it is important to note that they have not attacked the testimony about their financing.

Nor have they questioned the evidence that a sharp distinction must be made between the traditional working farmer-owner of America and the great corporate enterprises which carry on the large-scale industrial farming of California. As Dr. Taylor expressed it, "The recurrent conflict between employer and employee in the agricultural and processing industries of California and in areas of neighboring states where similar conditions prevail has been heralded widely as a conflict between 'embattled farmers' and 'farm laborers.' To describe the issue in these terms, however, is to mislead all who understand the words 'farmer' and 'farm laborer' as they commonly are used in other parts of the United States." Where is the hired man-farmer relationship, for example, between the employees and the management of the Balfour, Guthrie Company, a British-controlled firm and a member of Associated Farmers, which owns growing, processing, and packing facilities, works 5,800 acres, and had a pay roll in 1938 of about $300,000? Or of the gigantic DiGiorgio Corporation, worth $10,500,000 in 1938? The Earl Fruit Company, DiGiorgio's wholly-owned subsidiary, has land worth $5,500,000 and an irrigation system valued at over a million. This company also owns a winery that will produce 6,000,000 gallons a year and a 95 per cent interest in the Klamath Box Company. In 1939 it hired 5,220 farm workers at the peak of the season, and its pay rolls for the year were approximately $2,200,000. Its marketing outlets include the Baltimore Fruit Exchange, which it owns, an interest in a New York fruit exchange, and auctions in Chicago, Cincinnati, and Pittsburgh.

Senator La Follette wanted to know about its labor policy. The answer was that it paid the prevailing wage rate in the area as a minimum. Had the corporation ever taken part in any collective bargaining with its workers? "No," was the answer, "we have found it was not necessary." Had the corporation, in any of its activities, had any agreements with labor organizations? Not to the witness's knowledge.

One of the two most determined strikes of agricultural workers that California has seen took place last year at the Earl Fruit Company ranch near Marysville. A number of pickets were arrested for violating one of those famous anti-picketing ordinances which the Associated Farmers have persuaded numerous county boards of supervisors to pass. Senator La Follette asked what was the purpose of the ordinance and what was permitted under it.

> A. Its purpose was to preserve the peace and it permitted peaceful picketing.
>
> Q. And what is your idea of peaceful picketing?
>
> A. There isn't any such thing.

In Sutter County, where the Board of Supervisors submitted a similar ordinance to the county unit of the Associated Farmers for their approval before passing it, the sheriff had never read the law; he thought it allowed two men to picket but not three. These county ordinances as a rule ban all picketing inasmuch as they prohibit "one or more persons" from engaging in it.

When the inquiry swung to the violent Stockton cannery strike of 1937, it developed that union officials had told the sheriff they were ready to return to work and open the cannery if the specially mobilized deputies did not prevent them.

"In the face of this," said Senator La Follette, "you took no steps to stop the posse from forming?"

"They were already on the way," said the sheriff. "I couldn't reach them."

"You could have prevented them from forming."

"I thought the best thing to do was let them come in," was the reply.

The result was one of the bloodiest battles of the past several years. Industrial-munitions purchases in that county totaled $2,215; among them were 446 pick handles, 11 shotguns, 1,675 shotgun shells, 351 rounds of pistol ammunition, 12 rifles, 1,140 rounds of rifle ammunition, one tear-gas gun, and 104 rounds of tear-gas ammunition.

Their gross income, the value of their products, and their cash expenditures for hired labor show that the large agricultural employers control farming in California. Large-scale farms, that is, farms with an annual gross income of $30,000 or more, constitute only about 2 per cent of California's total farms, but they produce nearly 30 per cent, by value, of all agricultural produce, and they spend 35 per cent of all cash paid to agricultural workers. The demand of the employer-growers for complete control of wages is assigned as one of the chief causes of California's agricultural-labor conflicts, which are out of all proportion with those of the rest of the country. Each year more than a third of the nation's agricultural strikes occur in California.

There seems little chance that collective bargaining will take the place of the ex parte fixing of wages and conditions which is believed to underly so much of the trouble now. It certainly will not until agricultural labor is given the protection of the National Labor Relations Act. In the absence, too, of the protection given low-wage areas by the wage-and-hour law, the only solution, according to evidence before the committee, seems to be special wage boards, which will hold public hearings and fix wages under governmental authority wherever the employers are the recipients of federal benefit payments. The Congressional provision for public wage hearings under the Sugar Act in the sugar-beet industry has been cited as precedent. There has been no strife in the beet fields since the passage of this act, which provides that growers who accept benefits must pay the wages fixed by the Department of Agriculture after public hearings in the various sugar-beet areas. Governor Olson tried to make use of such hearings to head off the recent Madera cotton strike, which was the result of unilateral wage-fixing. Figures introduced into the evidence show that in 1938 federal agricultural conservation payments to 8,700 California growers totaled $3,356,361. Of this group, 204 members of the Associated Farmers received $1,107,544.

When the California hearings are over and the La Follette committee makes a report to Congress, the refusal of large growers to deal with their field-factory employees on a collective basis, the unprotected status of these workers, and the resulting disproportion of strife will probably call for remedial recommendations. Such recommendations must take into consideration the very legitimate fears of growers, brought out by several witnesses, that the perishability of their crops entitles them to some protection against the delays that may grow out of collective bargaining. It is doubtful, though, whether either the La Follette committee or Congress will pay much attention to the plea of Associated Farmers' representatives that everything would be lovely in California if it were not for Communists and agitators and the C. I. O.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

The Crime of Georges Bonnet

BY ROBERT DELL

IT IS usually wise to take with a grain of salt any information given out by the German government, but I am convinced of the authenticity of the information concerning Georges Bonnet reported from Berlin in the New York Times of January 17. The documents published by the German government, purporting to show that Bonnet just before the Franco-German peace declaration of December 6, 1938, indicated France's willingness to give Germany a clear way in Eastern Europe, confirm the information that I myself obtained in Paris last May. It is, however, impossible to subscribe to the German thesis that the change in French policy after March 15, 1939, was a betrayal of the Franco-German understanding of December 6, 1938. The German government betrayed that declaration and violated the Munich agreement by invading and annexing Bohemia and Moravia. Nor was the change in French policy due, as the German government pretends, to British influence. Chamberlain's speech in the House of Commons on March 15 is sufficient evidence of this, for he announced then that he had no intention of altering his policy. The change in French policy, like the change in British policy, was due to the pressure of public opinion.

Georges Bonnet remains a member of the government—although he is now Minister of Justice instead of Foreign Minister—probably because Daladier himself was so completely compromised that he dared not get rid of him. Starting July 28, 1939, L'Ordre published a series of articles by that very able journalist André Stibio, on The Past, Present, and Future of the Daladier Experience. Stibio said that it was to be regretted that Daladier had "established his power and gained his immense popularity by the most disastrous swindle at the expense of peace" (la plus funeste escroquerie à la paix), that is to say, the Munich agreement. What Stibio thought even less excusable than the signature of the agreement was Daladier's defense of it after he had signed it. He should, Stibio said, have frankly admitted that he had been wrong, told the French people the truth about Munich, and solemnly put an end to the policy of concessions, whereas he allowed his head to be turned by flattery and tried to justify a policy that he knew to have been disastrous. Munich was followed by "a sort of Franco-German honeymoon," by which "the mistrustful peasant, who calls himself a Jacobin," was taken in.

The German documents show how far the "honeymoon" went. They make it clear that, as nearly all well-informed people thought at the time, the Franco-German declaration of December 6, 1938, although innocuous in appearance, covered an understanding to give Germany a free hand in Eastern Europe. Before the declaration was signed, German Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop appears to have made it plain to Bonnet that, to quote the Berlin correspondent of the Times, "Germany regarded Eastern Europe as her own private sphere of interest and considered the French military alliances with Poland and the rump Czechoslovakia to be 'atavisms' that the new and powerful Germany could no longer accept." Bonnet signed in full knowledge of this attitude.

The documents published by the German government include reports, telegraphed to Berlin by the German ambassador to Paris, Count von Welczek, of various conversations that he had had with Bonnet. The remarks attributed to Bonnet in these reports are so characteristic of that gentleman that it is impossible to doubt their accuracy. On January 26, 1939, Bonnet made a speech in the Chamber in which he reaffirmed the interest of France in Eastern Europe and insisted on the maintenance of the alliance between France and Poland. According to the German ambassador, Bonnet read several passages of this speech to him before it was delivered and said that some of them were meant only for internal consumption and that France adhered "to her present policy on Eastern Europe," that is, the policy of giving Germany a free hand.

Naturally, the speech excited the wrath of von Ribbentrop, who instructed the German ambassador to protest against it on the ground that it would give Poland and Czechoslovakia the impression that France "was taking up again a policy of encirclement directed against the Reich." Bonnet, according to the German ambassador, denied this and said that in foreign-policy debates in the Chamber things were often said that obviously were only for internal consumption.

On February 6, 1939, Ribbentrop, according to the German documents, complained to Robert Coulondre, the French ambassador to Berlin, of Bonnet's speech on January 26. Coulondre replied that it was difficult for France to renounce Eastern Europe while making concessions in the Mediterranean, but that it would undertake no policy in Eastern Europe that would disturb Germany.

The Munich agreement provided for a guaranty by England, France, Germany, and Italy of the new frontiers of Czechoslovakia. In an article published in The Nation on October 22, 1938, I declared this guaranty to be "an insult added to injury" and "a piece of arrant hypocrisy." This was afterward proved to be true by the fact that the guaranty was never given even by England and France. The German documents provide further evidence that I was right. It appears from them that the question of the guaranty was discussed between Ribbentrop and Bonnet before the signature of the declaration of December 6, 1938. In the course of this conversation, according to the documents, Ribbentrop said that Germany would regard a French guaranty to Czechoslovakia as a form of intervention in Germany's sphere of interest. Bonnet gave him to understand that, although "France was forced by the pressure of events to foresee the possibility of guaranteeing the Czechoslovak frontiers," as the promise of the guaranty had been the price paid for the Czechoslovak renunciation of the Sudeten territory, France would in certain circumstances regard a four-power guaranty of the Czechoslovak frontiers "as an onerous remnant of the defunct French-Czech alliance that was of no particular importance."

The Franco-German "honeymoon" manifested itself in the secret negotiations early last year between influential groups of French and German industrialists and big business men, which had official approval in both countries. The French group proposed close commercial relations between France and Germany which would have amounted almost, if not quite, to a customs union. The proposal was aimed against England and would almost inevitably have led to a Franco-German alliance, although its authors disclaimed any political aims. Not to be outdone, Chamberlain sent a delegation of British industrialists to Berlin to conclude a commercial agreement. The events of March 15 put an end to both schemes.

One of the worst results of the "honeymoon" was the free hand given to German propaganda in France. When I returned to Paris in the middle of July German propaganda had made ravages on French opinion, and the Abetz scandal had made it clear that German money had been pouring into the country. Most people in Paris believed that Bonnet himself distributed the German funds to the French press, just as Poincaré distributed funds supplied by the Russian government before the last war. The scandal broke when the news-editor of the Temps and the business manager of the Figaro were arrested for receiving German money. The latter died in prison. A veil of secrecy was then drawn over the affair, and the public was given no further information. This was not surprising, for Abetz, the German agent involved, was on terms of friendship with Bonnet and his wife. He was finally called upon to leave France, and his attempt to get permission to return, although it had influential French support, was unsuccessful. When I arrived in Paris in the middle of July the morale of the French people had been seriously undermined, but, as has always happened, the menace of war united them, and when I left Paris for Geneva on August 28 their morale was splendid.

André Stibio said in the articles already mentioned that Daladier's conversion after March 15 was sincere and had been lasting, and his opinion was shared by others in a position to know and in whose judgment I have confidence. Nevertheless, it is not to the advantage of either England or France that the men responsible for the blunders that led to the present war should be still in office. At the least, Bonnet ought to go.

In the Wind

DURING THE recent West Coast deportation hearings on Harry Bridges, Examiner James M. Landis and Bridges never conversed outside the proceedings. One day, however, a Coast newspaper published pictures of Landis and Bridges with the captions reversed. The next morning Landis found a copy of the paper on his desk with this notation in Bridges's handwriting: "Look out—or you'll be deporting yourself."

THE ELKS LODGE of Cincinnati invited Martin Dies to address one of the meetings. Dies agreed, and the date was set for February 19. Now members of the lodge are threatening to withdraw the invitation because of the financial terms set by Dies's lecture agent. He proposed to assign 200 tickets to the Elks to sell for $2.50 each and retain 600 for himself to sell at $10, giving the Elks $2.50 on each and keeping the remainder except for a $500 fee to Dies. While the Elks are considering canceling the affair, the Cincinnati Business League is investigating the promotion methods of The Great Investigator's promoter.

OVER ITS story of the President's message to Congress the Chicago Daily News carried the banner headline: "Roosevelt Calls for Unity." Directly below appeared the picture of a woman; it was captioned "Unity Freeman-Mitford."

IN ITS DECEMBER 30 issue Liberty magazine carried an article by H. G. Wells on British war aims. In the article Wells sharply attacks Chamberlain. The Canadian edition of the weekly carried a box explaining that Mr. Wells's views "do not necessarily represent those of Liberty's editors."

ADVERTISEMENT IN a Berne, Switzerland, newspaper: "We are going to see the price of stone and marble rise. Take advantage of my very reasonable prices and give me your orders without delay. If you don't need a tombstone now for one of your family, order one for yourself. I will keep it without charge in my shop till the day when it can be used."

READER'S DIGEST recently ran this heading over an article: "Give 'Em Grade A." And directly below: "Condensed from Fortune."

[Readers are invited to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

SOMEBODY asked me the other day what I would do in the matter of mediation in the present war if I were President of the United States. I replied that I would offer mediation on even Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and odd Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, with all Sundays thrown in for good measure. In other words, I favor continuing mediation. I should also, were I Mr. Roosevelt, immediately ask the Pope to join me in getting the heads of Italy, Spain, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden to sign a joint request to the belligerents that they once more state their peace terms, without recriminations and without self-laudation—just in the fewest words possible. It would then be possible to see whether they should be invited to send representatives to discuss, together with representatives of the neutral states, the question of a settlement.

I know that there will be strong dissent from some of those who read these words. I have had the reasons against such a move stated to me over and over again in Germany, Holland, England, and the United States. In London a high official thought the difficulties in the way of even formulating exact terms very great. I replied that I knew more difficulties than he did, because I had just been in Berlin and had heard the matter discussed there. But whatever the obstacles, right-minded men everywhere I went were of the opinion that one more effort should be made to see if the Allies and Hitler could not be brought together. The alternative is a knock-out blow inflicted by one side or the other, or a stalemate with all Europe going to pieces from economic and financial exhaustion. The fighters will lose nothing if the President makes this effort. They can go right on bombing and sinking ships and guarding both sides of the Rhine. If the effort comes to nothing, the military situation will not have been changed.

Naturally the first objection is, "But how in the world could you get Hitler to consider setting up small Polish and Czech states—no sane man believes that it would be possible or desirable to reconstitute the old Czechoslovakia, and Poland cannot be restored without a war with Russia?" To this my answer is that no man can foretell what Hitler will do, but that I am more than ever convinced that there is a split both in the German army and in the German Foreign Office and that considerable elements in both of them would like peace negotiations for various reasons. Hitler and his generals must also be aware of the total lack of enthusiasm for the war, even opposition to it, on the part of the bulk of their fellow-countrymen. The officer in the Frankfort tram who said openly one day, "Why, the spirit of the people in this city about the war is devastating. It is better at the front," revealed a great deal. I do not know whether those dissenting governmental and military forces, plus the attitude of the public, are sufficiently powerful to induce Hitler to consider terms which would be a profound humiliation and defeat for him. Nor does anyone else know. I am only urging that the method suggested above be resorted to in order to ascertain this.

More than that, I am convinced that if such an offer were made by the Pope, President Roosevelt, and the heads of the countries I have enumerated, it would not be possible for Hitler wholly to suppress the news of the move. If he did try to conceal it and it leaked into Germany, it would do him a tremendous amount of harm and increase the ill-will of the majority of his people toward him and the war. Similarly, I cannot think of any better anti-Hitler propaganda than to publicize his refusal to reply to an offer from such sources. The news would be bound to get into Germany and would immediately raise the question why he had taken this extraordinary attitude against such important mediators.

Of course much would depend upon how confident the pro-Hitler generals are that they will win the war next spring. Undoubtedly many military men and a great many civilian officials believe that they will win easily. The stake that Hitler and his gangsters are playing for is the domination of the European world. They may be willing to gamble their lives and the success of their party on the chance of rising to a height of power never before achieved in the history of Europe. On the other hand, if they lose they lose everything; they will be lucky if they get off with exile like that of the Kaiser at Doorn. That is the exact situation. The question each reader of these lines must decide for himself is whether he thinks that this statement of the case warrants one more effort being made before such blood-letting takes place that no further effort to stop the war will be possible until a knockout blow has been delivered or all Europe is completely finished. I hope that no reader will overlook the fact that Germany can no more be cleansed of Hitlerism and National Socialism by forces from the outside than it was purged of militarism by the Allies and the United States in 1918, when our joint efforts, plus the Treaty of Versailles and the inflation, produced a vastly more dangerous militarism than that of the Kaiser.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Telephone Company

A. T. & T.: THE STORY OF INDUSTRIAL CONQUEST. By N. R. Danielian. Vanguard Press. $3.75.

AMERICAN TEL & TEL: THE STORY OF A GREAT MONOPOLY. By Horace Coon. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

UNTIL now the student of corporate business, its operation, financing, and regulation, has had relatively little information on the affairs of the giant of corporations, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. As a result of the Federal Communications Commission's recent investigation, there is now an abundance of data, which, though of public record, is far too technical and complex, and too inaccessible, to be of great service to any except specialists. A general summary has been sorely needed, and the two present volumes are designed to fill that want.

Of the two books, Dr. Danielian's is by far the better done and the more comprehensive; it bears the unmistakable marks of a skilled hand and an inquiring mind. Fortunately, the scope of the book is broad and the subject-matter well balanced; thus the treatment of the immediate problem of the control of the price of telephone service is not allowed to overshadow the less pressing but far more basic aspects of the A. T. and T. as an organization of economic and political importance. In readable fashion Dr. Danielian tells of the beginnings and growth of the Bell System of telephone service and of the course by which the control over the system was transferred from a group of small-time Bostonians to New Yorkers with plans for a nation-wide monopoly.

Dr. Danielian lays to rest the myth that the A. T. and T. is a "publicly owned" institution by virtue of the fact that its 18,662,275 shares were owned in 1935 by 664,095 stockholders, and that no single person held as much as 1 per cent of the total shares. These data do not accurately represent the situation, for 50.5 per cent of the total shares were held by 5.2 per cent of the stockholders, and 1,034 persons held 16.6 per cent of all shares. In contrast, small holders, with ten shares or less, comprised 57.5 per cent of all shareholders, but owned only 9.9 per cent of all shares. Thus, while it is true that telephone-company shares are somewhat more widely scattered than those of other corporations, nevertheless, the majority ownership is highly concentrated, and, as Dr. Danielian shows, control is lodged in the hands of a self-perpetuating management.

Every chapter of "A. T. & T." is illuminating and challenging. The much-publicized research activities of the A. T. and T. are carried on not only for the purpose of improving performance and advancing technical knowledge but also for the protection of the present domain of A. T. and T. from invasion by newcomers armed with patents upon new and competing techniques. Patents have played a large part in the struggles between A. T. and T., Radio Corporation of America, General Electric Company, and others for the control of communications, broadcasting, and motion pictures. From time to time, after tests of strength and considerable maneuvering, these contests have been settled by various private agreements to divide the contested field and thus to preserve monopoly.

The contrast between the telephone company's dividend policy and its treatment of workers is very telling. From 1929 to 1935 approximately 185,000 persons lost jobs in the Bell System (including the Western Electric Company), some because of change from the manual to the mechanical switching system, others as a result of the "speed-up" in pace of work, and still others because of the decline of traffic and the cessation of new construction. Yet while Bell System employment in 1935 was almost 40 per cent less than in 1929, dividend payments in the same period had increased. The far-famed $9 dividend was paid regularly. Total stock outstanding, on which dividends were paid, increased by 5,400,000 shares. From 1932 to 1935, inclusive, it was necessary to dip into surplus to pay dividends. Dr. Danielian is justly critical of the A. T. and T. policy of maintaining dividends and reducing employment and pay rolls, which, if followed everywhere, intensifies the disparities between rigid and flexible elements in the economic system, restricts expansion of investment and consumption, and increases economic instability.

Space is lacking to sketch even briefly the nature of the material in the remaining chapters. These include a damaging analysis of the Bell System's pension plan; a description of the way in which A. T. and T. benefited by federal operation during 1918; a vivid, and sometimes too detailed, account of the A. T. and T.'s attempts to mold the public mind and "sell" the system; a résumé of the behavior of telephone profits; a clear-cut summary of the problems involved in regulating the A. T. and T. as a public utility; and, finally, a suggestive chapter on political economics, which includes Dr. Danielian's specific recommendations for control of the A. T. and T.

A work of this kind is bound to be controversial, more as to interpretations of facts and conclusions than as to the facts themselves. Dr. Danielian hits hard, but, it seems to the present reviewer, fairly. The A. T. and T. may feel aggrieved at being singled out for special attention and analysis, when, in some respects, it has a cleaner record than that of many other large corporations. Yet it cannot hope to escape the attention that it richly deserves, for as a modern super-corporation its functioning presents clearly and insistently the major issues in the social control of business. Certainly whoever is interested in the origins, development, behavior, and consequences of modern business enterprise will welcome Dr. Danielian's able, suggestive, and penetrating treatment.

Mr. Coon's book suffers by comparison with that of Dr. Danielian. It stresses the earlier history of the A. T. and T. and skimps on the analysis of the behavior of the full-grown system. It may be of value to the reader who looks for a rapidly moving narrative, enlivened by the "color" of personalities and not too burdened with evidence and proof. But it is far too superficial to be of great use to the serious student of economics.

HUBERT F. HAVLIK

"Without Architect or Plan"

REVOLUTION IN LAND. By Charles Abrams. Harper and Brothers. $3.

OF ALL our myriad social and economic headaches, the land problem is undoubtedly the one that has received the least attention during recent decades. Although theorists, politicians, and special interests, as well as local and federal government, have busied themselves with closely related problems, such as conservation, housing, zoning, erosion, no one since Henry George has tried to deal with the land problem as a whole. No one, that is, before Charles Abrams, former counsel to the New York City Housing Authority, wrote "Revolution in Land."

In fact, "Revolution in Land" bites off far more than Henry George ever tried to chew. It attempts to trace the economic evolution of land from feudalism to monopoly capitalism. It tries to analyze the farm problem in toto, as well as the New Deal's farm program. It surveys the position of land in economic thought. It dissects the construction industry. It analyzes mortgage financing and real-property taxation. It traces the course of federal land policies and federal housing policies. It asks for an integrated, long-range approach to the problem.

Unfortunately, the reader is sometimes forced to question whether Charles Abrams has not also bitten off more than he can chew. His approach is so all-embracing that at certain points in the book the author could have devoted an entire chapter to the astronomical problem of land in motion without causing much surprise to the average reader. But the difficulty, essentially, is not that too much has been bitten off, but that there has been too little chewing. There is often a disconcerting vagueness in terminology, too great a shying away from basic problems, and too little constructive criticism.

Yet despite these faults—or perhaps because of them—the book is what can be unreservedly classed as "stimulating reading." First of all, it raises a myriad pressing questions. Moreover, it minces no words in showing the necessity for a coordinated policy of urban and rural zoning, federal land purchase, federal housing, and federal farm aid.

> In no case are the expenditures [writes Abrams, referring to government housing programs] part of a permanent working program. In no case are fundamental changes of any kind contemplated. FSA has developed a few farms for selected tenants. USHA has undertaken a small housing program for urban wage-earners. Farmers have been subsidized. Bank deposits have been guaranteed. Old home mortgages have been refinanced. New home mortgages are being insured. Yet as a whole these measures utterly lack integration. We have simply underpinned, here and there, as cracks appeared in the walls that support almost the whole economic structure. We have done it without architect or plan. . . . Perhaps this has been possible because we were reluctant to think through the whole complex and difficult problem, and we were very quick to assume, on the slightest of all possible evidence, that somehow the weakness in the land economy would disappear and all would be well again with those involved with it.

Furthermore, the book presents a striking, albeit oversimplified, picture of the evolution of land. In earlier centuries land was a dominant economic and political force. Today, says Abrams, its former position has been lost; it is the slave of industry. On the one hand, industry has triumphed over agriculture. On the other, once the early period of speculation was over, it refused to invest even in urban land; there was more liquidity, more profits, in railroads, automobiles, and steel. And to make matters worse, the declining rate of population growth means that there will always be an oversupply of land and that land values will never rise. Accordingly, if nationalization of land becomes absolutely necessary, it will not be because of the excess profits that Henry George thought the inevitable result of private property in land but for "the opposite reason that land today yields excess losses."

Finally, an enthusiastic word must be said for the style in which the book is written. Abrams's prose is beautifully rhythmic—at times almost Spenglerian, although lighter and more concise. Few books dealing with economic problems can compare with it in liveliness and fluidity of expression. For this reason alone—if not for the book's ambitious scope—it deserves a place of honor upon the bookshelves of the serious reader.

BERTRAM M. GROSS

New Life into Old Forms

THE CONNECTICUT RIVER AND OTHER POEMS. By Reuel Denney. Yale University Press. $2.

THIS is the most brilliant first book of poems to appear since "In Dreams Begin Responsibilities," but whereas Mr. Schwartz unevenly gyrated on the plains of heaven between the gods of form and meaning, Mr. Denney always keeps at least one foot on the ground. The result is less spectacular, certainly. Mr. Denney attempts no ambitious syntheses of Aristotle, Marx, and Freud. Nor does he achieve any of the originalities of rhythm or symbol that made Mr. Schwartz's book an experimental landmark. He does, however, through a quiet conjunction of acute hearing and clear thinking, achieve both a style that is his own and a uniform record of successful communication that in the serious poets of the post-Auden generation is unique.

Mr. Denney's title poem is a sort of social "Bateau Ivre," owing something to Crane and Spender as well as to Rimbaud, sifting the heritage of New England with more discrimination than is usual, rejecting the generation that "brought the fans but not the hold-stench home," accepting entirely only

Our bride . . . the river in the valley
And all the hills around that did not die
When father moved his office into death . . .

Mr. Denney, like every true poet, can write in the traditional forms. Even the "anapaestic" comes to life, and sometimes he blows so much new life into old forms that they bulge. Though always moderately, he uses Hopkins's device of spinning a line out suddenly with extra syllables like a whip. Boldly and successfully he fuses the unexpected Elizabethan words—encysted, signet, perfect—with the contemporary. The Iroquois "packed a wicked arrow." The Hammer-Thrower, in the finest poem about an athlete I have seen, is "golden-jointed and new-eyed." And symbolically as well, the past is used to illuminate the present: "The old men rake the leaves. The thin skies hone the spire."

We would recognize in Mr. Denney an "intellectual" poet without being reminded that he teaches English in Buffalo and heads a City Planning Association. The miracle is that while he never discards his learning he is never encumbered by it. The secret of this is that Mr. Denney is looking for life rather than knowledge. The search is illuminated by the knowledge, and when the poet says, "Call all the birds of Audubon!" the reader moves forward toward the bird rather than backward into the book.

> Science is what the world is, earth and water.
> And what its seasons do. And what space fountained it.
> It is forges hidden underground. It is the dawn's slow salvo.
> It is the closed retort. And it is not yet.

The italics are mine. SELDEN RODMAN

Californiana

NAVAL SKETCHES OF THE WAR IN CALIFORNIA. By Gunner William H. Meyers. Designed and printed by the Grabhorn Press. Random House. $25.

SELDOM in one book has historical and typographical interest been more arrestingly combined than in "Naval Sketches of the War in California," by Gunner William H. Meyers. The portfolio of sketches was acquired by President Roosevelt some years ago, and this volume of reproductions was undertaken because of his recognition of their rare historical value. In an introduction Mr. Roosevelt gives some, but not all, of the reasons for the annexation of California, which was decided on just after the outbreak of the Mexican War, and recalls the real danger of violation of the Monroe Doctrine by certain European powers which were casting greedy eyes on California, where revolt against Mexico simmered. This foreword is followed by a detailed account of the campaign by Captain D. N. Knox. His narrative explains the sketches.

Of chief interest, however, are the quaint water colors, executed with delightful naivete by the young artist-gunner. With a genuine flair for landscape, he sketched the barren, desolate harbors along the coast from California to Panama. Ships too must have fascinated him, for his picture of his own sloop of war, "the good ship Dale," and of other naval vessels are done with meticulous attention to detail and sometimes with real beauty.

Spirited sketches of naval bombardments showing the loading and firing of cannon give amusing glimpses of old-time techniques. And in numerous battle scenes on land the diminutive warriors, for all their occasional woodenness, have a comical, sprightly life, particularly the Mexicans in their multicolored uniforms. Horses, too, share the emotions of their riders, sometimes rearing and prancing, sometimes hunched in abject misery, or, again, scuttling ignominiously out of danger.

The colored reproductions, done by means of linoleum cuts, are a new departure in the work of the Grabhorn Press and will delight amateurs of fine printing. For the historian, these eyewitness sketches of half-forgotten battles by sea and land, whose results were of such vital importance to our national development, throw new light upon a hitherto obscure phase of American expansion. RUTH PIELKOVA

The American Negro Family

THE NEGRO FAMILY IN THE UNITED STATES. By E. Franklin Frazier. University of Chicago Press. $3.

THE Negro family has many characteristics which make it a special problem in the study of American institutions. In desertion and illegitimacy rates, in the role of father and mother within the family and the attitudes of collateral relatives, as well as in other aspects, it is found to differ from the general American pattern. The Negro family thus offers a twofold challenge to students; one methodological, the other historical.

Professor Frazier paints his subject on a large canvas, but this in no wise impairs his attention to detail. The book is both extremely well organized and engagingly written; not the least ingredient of its charm is the almost Biblical terminology of the titles given its parts and chapters.

The first part of the book treats of the Negro family during the period of slavery. The development of the post-Civil War family is next discussed—the adjustments that had to be made by the newly freed Negroes, and the importance during this period of the Negro mother and grandmother. The development toward the conventional type of American family with the father as its acknowledged head is then described. The account of the effect of the great northward migration on Negro family ties is a distressing tale of disorganization and desertion; the contemporary situation, considered in the final section, In the City of Rebirth, shows how the initial clash between the older established families and the aggressive newcomers is working out. No better presentation of the mores of Negro middle-class life is to be found anywhere, while the discussion of the black proletariat shows a fine grasp of the situation in which the Negro worker is caught.

Mr. Frazier takes it for granted in his discussion, however, that all African patterns have been completely forgotten, and that only the tradition of slavery remains as background:

> Probably never before in history has a people been so nearly completely stripped of its social heritage as the Negroes who were brought to America. Other conquered races have continued to worship their household gods within the intimate circle of their kinsmen. But American slavery destroyed household gods and dissolved the bonds of sympathy and affection between men of the same blood and household . . . of the habits and customs as well as the hopes and fears that connected the life of their forebears in Africa, nothing remains.

From this starting-point further assumptions follow. "The family" has valid meaning only as it signifies the accepted pattern of white family organization; "morality" is morality solely in terms of the values of the white American majority.

Yet, one must ask, does not this position attempt the logically almost impossible task of proving a negative; and does it not deny the pluralistic nature of social phenomena? We are told that Africanisms persisted in the West Indies. Was the situation in the United States so different?

It is not possible in the space of this review to document the answers to these queries. Yet, as one case in point, one may well wonder whether the facts of Negro life under slavery are sufficient of themselves, without reference to African custom, to explain the importance of the mother in the Negro family. For the regions of Africa from which the slaves were drawn not only contain many cultures in which descent is counted on the mother's side, but exhibit the attitudes engendered by a type of family organization based on a man having a number of wives. In such an organization, while a child shares his father with the children of other women, he shares his mother only with his "real" brothers and sisters. One must ask if such traditions and attitudes have not been reinforced by the situation of slavery rather than suppressed.

Professor Frazier, it is to be feared, has not ranged as widely over the materials dealing with African social organization as he has over data on the American Negro family, and the day has gone by when the problem of Africanisms in New World Negro life can be discussed without an adequate command of African ethnology. With such equipment he would realize that his account of a Negro family reunion could with a few changes in wording be placed before almost any Africanist as a satisfactory generalized description of the ancestral rite of an aboriginal African group. Yet this American Negro family comprises persons who hold higher degrees, and is one of those "black puritan" groups which Mr. Frazier cites as an important force in acculturating Negro family life to general white patterns.

While this book, therefore, is a major source of facts concerning the present organization of the Negro family in this country, its historical interpretations must be regarded with some skepticism. Yet it must be stressed that in taking his uncompromising interpretative stand, Mr. Frazier does a service by bringing to the fore the issue of the African background of American Negro life. For this is one of the most vital elements in the psychological foundation of race prejudice in the United States, just as it is the most important single factor in the spiritual demoralization that comes to many Negroes from their deep-seated conviction, which I believe is a false one, that they have no past except in slavery.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

War-torn China

CHINA AT WAR. By Freda Utley. The John Day Company. $3.75.

"HUMANE ENDEAVOR": THE STORY OF THE CHINA WAR. By Haldore Hanson. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

CHINA'S misfortunes in the past few years have conferred one indirect benefit on the outside world. For the first time we have been given, not one or two good books on that distant land, but a whole series of them as experienced correspondents have journeyed through the country and put their findings to paper. Miss Utley's volume is distinctly a war book. It portrays the horror, the suffering, the inefficiency, and the idealism of a China fighting against great odds. It is primarily a factual account of day-to-day events as the author traveled from Canton to Hankow, and thence to the front. The closing chapters contain a brief review of recent political developments and an evaluation of China's prospects for victory. The author has great sympathy for the Chinese, and her adventures, like those of anyone who visits China today, make absorbing reading. Old China hands may find many of her observations a little obvious, but for those who do not know China intimately her account will be definitely more readable and instructive than the esoteric books of persons long resident in China.

Although fundamentally the same type of book, Mr. Hanson's volume is much more substantial. Mr. Hanson, an Associated Press correspondent in Peiping, lived in China from 1934 until last spring. Few other correspondents have visited as many sections of the war front. He was in Peiping when the war started, having just returned from an extended trip to the Yangtze Valley. He was the first American to visit Paotingfu after the capture of that city, and was arrested for his zeal. Afterwards he penetrated the Japanese lines and covered nearly all of the Eighth Route Army's zone of operations. After a visit to the mecca of modern China—Yenan—he spent three months in southwestern China visiting Chiang Kai-shek's base of operations. On the basis of this unparallelled experience, Mr. Hanson has written the most complete of all the recent books on China and one of the most interesting. The chapters on the guerrillas are particularly fascinating. No foreigner except the Snows and Agnes Smedley have spent so long a time with the Eighth Route Army, and Hanson's material is by far the most up-to-date available on the Communists. Although not as politically astute as some observers, he is an excellent reporter. One does not need to accept his rather uncritical picture of the central government or the Eighth Route Army in order to profit from his experience and reportorial ability.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Shorter Notices

J. PIERPONT MORGAN: AN INTIMATE PORTRAIT. By Herbert L. Satterlee. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

This biography of the elder Morgan is by Pa's son-in-law, who explains in an introduction that "no book, magazine article, or newspaper story about Mr. Morgan has heretofore been written with his permission or with that of his family, and none has had their approval." The italics are ours. It need hardly be added that Mr. Satterlee does not regard the banker as a robber baron. The biography is curiously bucolic in tone: "In December (1891) Mr. Morgan's old railroad enemy Jay Gould passed away, and E. H. Harriman was the only man left who antagonized him in the transportation world." This is the domestic view. Father must not be antagonized. The government was constantly annoying him: "It was while he was kept at home with a bad cold that the United States government brought suit to dissolve the Steel Corporation." When Junior worked his way up from the bottom of the ladder, there was rejoicing. "On January 1, 1892, Jack was admitted to partnership in Drexel, Morgan and Company . . . and it was a proud and happy day for both father and son." He was a religious man, and his great wealth did not embarrass him in the performance of his duties as a parishioner: "Mr. Morgan attended the morning service at St. George's as usual, joined in the singing of the carols, and passed the plate." Mr. Satterlee writes that "people who are not familiar with the history of business in the United States during the last decade of the nineteenth century and the first decade of the twentieth century may wonder why, in this portrait of Mr. Morgan, only casual mention is made of the large purchases and sales of securities . . . which passed over his desk during those interesting years." After getting to know Mr. Satterlee better, we do not wonder.

ENGLAND'S MONEY LORDS. By Simon Haxey. Harrison-Hilton Books. $2.50.

Simon Haxey has carried out an elaborate and useful piece of research which proves all too well the unpleasant amount of truth contained in that favorite fascist epithet—"plutodemocracy." The British House of Commons has long contained a majority of Tories who, in addition to representing their constituencies, are members of and agents for a small and narrow class. As this book shows, in the achievement of the position of Tory M. P. brains and eloquence are of much less importance than cash and connections. Tory local organizations expect a candidate to pay his own heavy expenses and contribute generously to the local funds. As a result the average Tory M. P. is the son of well-to-do parents, educated at one of the great "public schools" and at Oxford or Cambridge. If not a business executive, he is likely to be a landowner, a military or naval officer, or a practitioner of one of the more lucrative professions. Either directly or by marriage he is probably related to a titled family. He is a director of one or more great corporations, has an income around $40,000, and can expect to leave a fortune of nearly $1,000,000. He has a town and a country house, belongs to an exclusive club, and is a devotee of hunting, fishing, shooting, or golf.

This composite portrait is built up from the facts and figures provided by this book. They include a fascinating diagram showing the relation of members of Parliament to a small group of aristocratic families, and an analysis of business interests indicating that almost all leading British corporations have their Parliamentary spokesman. This may account for the fact that the cruder forms of corruption are much less prevalent in Britain than in this country.

MUSIC

COLUMBIA'S January records being late, I will go on for the time being with the subject of opera. And what I would like to point out first is that on this as on other musical subjects discussion continues to be carried on in the terms of certain ideas no matter how many times these ideas are shown to have no basis in fact. In the case of opera one of the ideas is concerned with the effect of government subsidy: repeatedly one encounters the statement that the greatness of the Vienna Opera, among others, was one that could be achieved only by a subsidized company which was able to ignore the box office, and that the defects of the Metropolitan's repertory and productions during the Gatti regime, on the other hand, were due to the fact that it had to pay its own way—which it did by giving popular operas, by giving more performances than could be kept up to a high standard, by merely throwing together, under these mass-production conditions, performances with a few popular stars.

This statement is based on a wrong notion of the purpose and the effect of the Vienna Opera's subsidy. Whether it came out of the emperor's pocket or out of the republic's treasury, its purpose was not to make the management indifferent to what happened at the box office, but to cover the deficit that was inevitable under prices scaled to make the performances accessible to persons of small incomes. At that point the difference between Vienna and New York ends; from that point on they are alike: like the Metropolitan directors the Austrian emperor or government expected seats to be sold and performances to be given that would cause the seats to be bought.

But the similarity goes farther. You may have read the New York Times correspondent's reports of the defects in the Vienna Opera's repertory and productions during the last years of the Austrian republic—among other things the performances thrown together with a few popular stars. From my own seven months' experience in Vienna in the winter of 1928-29 I can testify that these reports were correct—that many of the performances were as poor as those that were to be heard at that time at the Metropolitan. And it may seem at first that they were poor for the same reason—that the Vienna company, too, had to attract audiences with popular stars in popular operas, and that it operated under even worse mass-production conditions, since it had to give performances seven days a week not for twenty-four weeks but for ten months of the year, and to work during the remaining two months at the Salzburg Festival.

But the fact is that under the same working conditions the Vienna company had a period of extraordinary brilliance early in the century—the period on which its fame and the current views about subsidized opera rest. And if under the same conditions the results were different—if repertory, singing, staging, and all the rest added up to productions that are still talked about today—the reason was solely in the fact that the artistic director of the company was Gustav Mahler, with all this meant in taste and personal force. The decline to the 1928-29 level began with Mahler's departure; but even in 1928-29 I heard several performances of memorable quality in Vienna—those conducted by Richard Strauss. Mahler went to the Metropolitan; and the fact is that there were great productions there also in the early years of the Gatti regime—those which represented the taste and authority of Mahler and Toscanini; that it was the absence of such taste and authority that brought the Metropolitan to the low level of the later years; that only with their return will the productions acquire distinction once more. As yet they have not returned; and the situation is like the one in a European Foreign Office, where the ministers who come and go count for less than the permanent undersecretary who remains: Mr. Johnson has been able to renovate the orchestra and restore a few important works to the repertory; but Messrs Ziegler and Lewis, who have remained from the Gatti period, keep the Metropolitan today essentially what it was then.

Mozart's Mass in C minor received its first New York performance from the Schola Cantorum, which pointed out "the unfortunate fact that even recognized choral masterpieces, if difficult, are heard very infrequently in New York," and that Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, for example, "has been given on only four occasions in the last twenty years." The C minor Mass has some extraordinarily beautiful sections and a few passages of great power, but I think W. J. Turner goes too far in ranking it with the Missa Solemnis and Bach's B minor Mass: I don't think it reaches the spiritual heights of the one or has the sustained constructive power of the other. Its companion work is rather Verdi's Requiem.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

B. H. HAGGIN

DANCE

The Dances of Mexico

ODOR of roses and excrement . . . a shower of sparkling fireworks, the flash of white teeth in a brown face, gleaming granadas piled high under ancient colonnades, copper pots reflecting the sunlight . . . a pockmarked six-year-old selling lottery tickets with a grim insistence. Pottery the color of soft, rich earth, hand-loomed textiles in brilliant shades, and tawny leatherware mingle with the sleazy rayons in ice-cream colors, glass jewelry, and second-hand hardware —rusty screws and nails cast off like scum from the great industrialized world. An ulcerous hand drips pus into tortillas. Files of silent Indians drive loaded burros before them, their women following with downcast eyes. Exchange of goods and of talk, splashes of laughter in seas of silence. Heaps of refuse where hungry dogs pick their food . . . corners where drunkards sleep, where women pick up their skirts to squat, where a man whispers to a girl, where an agrarian leader outlines his plans to a few trusted men . . . soft voices, sharp haggling, the twang of a guitar, the tolling of a bell. Red roses, calla lilies, and sky-blue paper flowers on a gold-leaf altar. A peasant chases his wandering sow out of the church. And as the steady beat of the drum grows louder, a single flute enunciates its theme. The dancers, fantastically attired in masks, wearing elaborate costumes and headdresses, have begun an ancient dance, weaving through the streets of the town till they come to the atrium of the church, where they will dance throughout the day and night. Sweetness and sweat of fiesta.

Some place in Mexico it's always fiesta time. Each village celebrates the day of its patron saint with a fair, festivities, fireworks, church services, and dances. These religious celebrations provide an excellent opportunity to study the indigenous dances of the country. Many of the dances now performed on a Catholic saint's day are modified primitive rituals that were offered to Aztec gods in the days before the Conquest. When the Spaniards conquered Mexico with the sword and the cross, thousands of converted Indians built Catholic churches which they decorated with primitive carvings. On some of these seventeenth- and eighteenth-century buildings one finds, on either tower, the symbol of the two pagan deities, the Sun and the Moon. The ritual dance performed today in honor of a Christian saint is as strange a T. R. . . . AND F. D. R.!

1940 is a year of taking stock—of great decisions. For a true perspective on the immediate past, read

CRUSADERS for AMERICAN LIBERALISM

by Louis Filler

It brings to life, in an exciting story panorama, the great reform movement in pre-War years. It demonstrates that democracy has worked and how it can work again. It portrays to the thousands of readers of Lincoln Steffens' Autobiography the story of all the fighters against reaction. Novelists, editors, lawyers, journalists, statesmen, financiers—they joined forces in the greatest liberal offensive of modern times. Their dramatic history, told here in full for the first time, is a book for today.

"Reads better than a detective story... One of the most fascinating books of our time." —George Seldes

"A first-hand contribution to an understanding of the times." —Charles A. Beard

"Makes the movement live again...Will stand as one of its worthy memorials—and perhaps a forerunner of a new criticism of American life." —R. L. Duffus, N. Y. Times Book Review

422 pages, $3.50

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO.
383 Madison Avenue New York

Parallels, and Measuring Rods, for Today...

The Poison Trust (Pure Food and Drugs)..."The Treason of the Senate"... Labor's Showdown in the Haywood Trial . . . The Panic of 1907...La Follette's Fight with the Railroads...The Insurance Investigations . . . The Story of Frenzied Finance . . . many other outstanding stories.

ORDERS are now being taken for the Index to Volume 149 of The Nation, covering the period July through December 1939. Send your order with remittance at 15c a copy to

THE NATION, 55 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK CITY

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

THE NATION will deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Readers Service Division

The Nation - 55 Fifth Avenue - New York

compound of paganism and Catholicism as the church on which its shadow falls.

Spanish civilization has, of course, been a dominant force in Mexican life and, consequently, in the Mexican dance. Three other influences, though of infinitely lesser impact, must also be noted: the French, the Negro, and more recently the American. The French influence, which was introduced in the mid-nineteenth century, was of brief duration, and since the forms of national aesthetic expression had already crystallized, effected few changes. These appear mostly in the furniture and architecture of urban homes of the middle and upper classes and in the literature produced by these same groups. In the dance, modifications are shown in costuming and in the introduction of French soldiers in some of the religious war dances and carnival dances. The Negro influence is visible in Vera Cruz and Oaxaca, where it has slightly affected some of the social dances, such as the danzon. Along the Costa Chica and inland from the Pacific there are Negro colonies which have never mixed with the native population. Here a variety of totemic dances of African origin can be seen. But owing to the isolation of these communities, they constitute a special type which has not contributed to or been affected by the general stream of the Mexican dance. The American influence is really that of modern industrial civilization, which arrived in Mexico with American capital. As yet it has not radically altered the life of the nation, though specific localities have undergone tremendous changes and almost all localities have undergone slight changes. In the dance this influence is even slighter than in social and economic life, though it exists in the jazz of a brass band accompanying a religious dance, in the gawdy rayon of a costume, and in the fox trot, pronounced "fawx," which has invaded some of the remotest villages. But the sum of the impact of all three cultures is as nothing compared to the deep infiltration and wide distribution of the Spanish culture, much of which still exists in the arrested form imposed during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

Throughout the centuries that have intervened between the Conquest and the present day, the Indian has responded to the Spanish culture in a number of unvarying modes. In some instances he has refused to function in the new civilization and has retained old habits and customs in a virtually unchanged state, yielding only an exacted surface obedience to the new masters. In other instances he has eagerly accepted the foreign patterns, incorporating them with established primitive forms which he still follows. Here the Spanish elements serve as an enhancement and decoration for what is still a basically Indian design for living. In other cases the eagerness to accept Spanish ways has been so great that the old has completely given way to the new, and only a few ineradicable hints of the pre-Conquest days remain, like the tenacious thorns of a cactus. In still other cases the Indian and Spanish cultures have interfused and mingled so harmoniously as to destroy the salient characteristics of each in the evolution of a new type. The resultant genre is neither Indian nor Spanish but typically Mexican.

The first three attitudes can be clearly seen in the ritual dances that take place during fiestas. The occasion for their performance is generally a Catholic celebration, but often the dances themselves have no connection with the Catholic tradition. There is good reason to believe that the "Volador," performed during Holy Week, is a sacrificial rite connected with an agricultural deity. When I witnessed it in the sierra of Puebla last spring, I asked some of the villagers why they did the dance. They answered that they had to perform it to insure good crops. Yet the ostensible occasion for the dance is the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Actually the dance has nothing to do with the Christian religion. It is a highly dangerous and spectacular ritual in which the participants dance in turn on a two-foot platform placed fifty feet above the ground on the upper extremity of a slender pole. After this, suspended by ropes attached to their bodies, they fly head first through the air in ever-widening circles until they reach the ground. Very often one or more of the performers never complete the dance but fall from the pole and are hurled to their death either before or during the flight. Despite government discouragement and actual prohibition, the dance persists. This is in large part because of a belief in its magic properties. From a description of the "Volador" written by an early Spanish chronicler one can see that it has hardly altered since the sixteenth century. Thus it provides an excellent example of the first attitude, the retention of primitivism. In this case the only influence of the new culture is found in the performance of the dance during Easter.

The dance of the "Moors and Christians" is an instance of the second attitude, which, while incorporating Spanish characteristics, subordinates them to the Indian elements. An Indian rhythm and dance concept triumph over a theme and costume that are distinctly Spanish. The dance originated in the "Moresque," which was extremely popular in Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, and which dealt with a sword combat between Moors and Christians. In adapting it the Indians have identified themselves with the conquerors, and have become the champions of the church against the heathen. In some versions lengthy dialogues in formal Spanish verse occur. A manuscript in my possession taken down in Chilpancingo, Guerrero, extends to thirty-five typewritten pages. In other versions there is no talking at all. Sometimes the dance consists of continuous mock skirmishes with flashing swords. At other times it is performed on horseback. In the execution of the dance the Indian element in rhythm and movement is dominant. Though the subject matter is Spanish, it is used decoratively in much the same fashion as a story is used by the European classic ballet as an excuse for a dance, as a thread on which to hang the movement.

The "King's Dance" exemplifies the third attitude, in which Spanish characteristics dominate. This is shown in its rhythm, manners, and quality of movement, although the dance does not appear to be an adaptation of any known Spanish dance. Its origin cannot be traced, but it seems to be a dance of some antiquity created by the inhabitants of the New World in complete harmony with the Spanish modes. Its psychological origins probably lie in the Indian's desire to emulate his conquerors. In the pointed toe work and air of would-be elegance it is unmistakably Spanish of the eighteenth century. It is mincing and courtly in its every gesture despite the occasional interpolation of Indian elements, which in this case appear more as gaucheries than as distinct attributes.

All the Mexican ritual dances can be considered as expressions of one of these three attitudes, exhibited in varying degrees: unmixed Indian, further classifiable according to region; Indian elements dominant, Spanish subordinate; Spanish elements dominant, Indian subordinate. These categories are not rigid. There are an infinite number of variations within the groupings; not all the dances of the second and third categories exhibit racial dominance in equal degrees or in similar ways. There are dances all along the scale, and at the central point the division of dominance is equal. Often it is the never completely reliable testimony of the senses that will designate a dance as a member of one rather than of another classification. Neither subject matter, costuming, nor musical instruments have been used as a basis for differentiation, though they are useful and highly suggestive as indications. It is the rhythm, choreographic plan, and type of movement which have served as the basic criteria.

The fourth attitude, which occurs in the very midpoint of the scale, where Spanish and Indian characteristics meet with equal force, is expressed in a large but homogeneous group of social dances. These mestizo dances of regional character originated some time after the Conquest and are performed at social gatherings, fairs, fiestas, weddings. The possible origin of the "Huapango," the most widely distributed of the group, is in the Spanish Fandango, which was popular in Spain during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In the Mexican wooing dances, as in the Fandango, the partners never touch each other though they dance in pairs or in two facing lines. The rhythm is maintained, as in many of the Spanish dances, by stamping feet. Yet the rhythm itself is distinctly not Spanish. It is also distinctly not Indian. It is Mexican as is no other dance or music of the country. It represents the most striking manifestation of cultural interfusion in the dance. Though the dances are lively and spirited, they lack Spanish sensualism. They bear the imprint of the Indian's restraint and quietness. The purely Spanish dance combines two elements—a sustained languorous movement interrupted by sudden, staccato gestures. But the Mexican social dance exhibits neither of these qualities as opposing entities. It is a more moderate dance in which these two elements modify rather than contrast with each other. In some of the Mexican dances, as in the woman's part of the "Sandunga," dignity prevails, and the movement is gliding. In the man's part of the "Sandunga" and in the man's and woman's parts of the "Jarabe," there is a constant broken movement. The abrupt hold and sustained gesture of the Spanish dance have merged into a gay, continuous stamping trot, the characteristic feature of the Mexican social dance.

The Mexican dances express, in concrete form, a basic national problem, the conflicts and adjustments of two races and civilizations inhabiting a single land. The various ways in which it has been and is being resolved in the dances are the same four methods of adjustment which can be seen operating in every activity of national life. VIRGINIA MISHNUN

Coming Soon in The Nation
Report from the Finnish Front
BY LELAND STOWE

High Praise from those who know!
SIDNEY HOOK'S
Important New Book
John Dewey
A SYSTEMATIC PRESENTATION OF JOHN DEWEY'S LEADING IDEAS

"Professor Hook has certainly written the best exposition of Dewey's philosophy available anywhere outside of Dewey."—HERBERT SCHNEIDER, in *The Journal of Philosophy

"Sidney Hook comes closer in catching the spirit as well as the logic of John Dewey than any other man of his generation. His intellectual portrait of the 'grand old man' seems to me extraordinarily true."
—DR. H. M. KALLEN, *The New School for Social Research

"A brilliantly executed performance for which there was a genuine need." —ELISEO VIVAS, in *The Nation

"Sidney Hook's book seems to me to give as brief and clear a statement of Dewey's essential ideas as anyone could do. . . ." —IRWIN EDMAN, *Columbia University

"Dewey's creative thinking . . . is exceptionally well brought out with the added increment furnished by Sidney Hook's own incisive and logical mind."
—ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES, in *N. Y. Herald Tribune "Books."

"This is a superb book . . . I know of no one better qualified to interpret the significance and meaning of John Dewey's views than Sidney Hook."
—PROFESSOR JOHN L. CHILDS,
Teachers College Columbia University

At All Bookstores $2.00

THE JOHN DAY CO. • 2 West 45th Street ■ New York

READ:
"Jesuits, Jews and Freemasons" in the February issue of
THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC
A New Magazine Devoted Exclusively to the Field of Catholic Controversy

EDITED BY FORMER ROMAN CATHOLIC PRIESTS

Up-to-date, Authentic Information on the Political, Social and Religious Activities of the Catholic Church

Chief Editor: DR. LEO H. LEHMANN

Order your copy now:
Subscription $1.00 a Year
(Copies of first issue in January still available)

THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC
229 West 48th Street, New York, N. Y.

For the enclosed $1.00, please send me The Converted Catholic for one year, beginning ☐ Jan. ☐ Feb.

Name..
Address...
....

Letters to the Editors

The Sick Railroads

Dear Sirs: The health of our railroads is of vital importance to the country. One-third of them—more than 76,000 of their 238,000 miles of track—are in bankruptcy. Their outstanding capital of almost 20 billion dollars is woefully shrunken. Almost 6 billions of investments are tied up in the bankrupt roads. The ICC has reported that in 1938 American railroads carried one and a half billion tons of freight; their passengers traveled some 22 billion miles; the wages of nearly a million employees amounted to not much less than 2 billion dollars.

Many of these roads have remained in the toils of bankruptcy despite federal statutes of 1933 and 1935 enacted to revive them. For this, economic conditions rather than the courts or the ICC are perhaps responsible. It is, however, widely recognized that the double-barreled jurisdiction of the courts and the ICC as created by those laws is unsound in principle and has failed in practice.

To remedy the situation both Senate and House in 1939 proposed far-reaching new laws which will doubtless be debated during this session of Congress. The Senate plans a new special Railroad Court. The opponents of this idea argue that such a court would open the way for mining, oil, and motor courts, on down to a court for delicatessen stores. Thoughtful men look on such a system as a blow at the American conception of the relation of our federal judiciary to the state.

The efforts of the House follow closely the pattern of the industrial-reorganization act of 1937-38 enacted under the lead of Congressman Walter Chandler and of William O. Douglas, then chairman of the SEC, now Justice of the Supreme Court. They would create functions for the ICC similar to those created by the Chandler Act for the SEC in respect of industrial reorganization.

The extensive investigations which Mr. Douglas conducted convinced the SEC that industrial reorganizations were dominated by insiders—old management, bankers, underwriters, and the like. The main feature of the Chandler reorganization statute was its constitution of the SEC as a body, not of coordinate jurisdiction with, but of advisory service to, the courts and also to the security holders. Thus the vice of double-barreled jurisdiction, similar to that embodied in the railroad-reorganization statutes, was removed, yet the service of an expert governmental agency was assured to give impartial advice to the court and all parties in interest. The Chandler Act also assured a fair and equal opportunity for small interests as well as large to have a genuine voice in reorganizations.

We note, then, that two sharply conflicting theories of railroad legislation are to be laid before Congress. These will probably be the subject of wide debate.

There is one unfortunate point of agreement between the two new proposals. Both have taken from the 1935 railroad statute a series of provisions giving the ICC and the courts strict control over committees of security holders —going so far indeed as to provide fine and imprisonment for wrongdoers—yet at the same time expressly reserving full freedom to the large interests to act together, namely, "groups of not more than twenty-five bona fide holders of securities or claims or groups of mutual institutions."

How will the public welfare be affected by such restrictions upon the free formation and activity of the characteristic independent committees of the past, while full freedom of action is granted to small powerful groups? Will railroad reorganization as carried out under either the Senate or the House proposals be dominated by the huge insurance companies? Is such domination desirable? Is it in line with that "democratization" which has been assured to industrial reorganizations? These are questions of no little moment.

JAMES N. ROSENBERG

New York, January 19

Nature's Miracles in Finland

Dear Sirs: Isn't nature wonderful! Her works as reported in official and unofficial dispatches from Helsinki reveal extraordinary power and variety. For example, she appears to have given the intense cold of northern Finland a selective quality: it freezes Russians stiff, but leaves Finns untouched. Then, too, missiles fired from rifles and cannon easily penetrate Muscovite bodies, but fall harmless at the feet of Finns. It must be so, because, by Helsinki reports, something like half a million Soviet soldiers have been "annihilated" without a single Finnish soldier being killed or wounded. A new mathematics comes into being, sub-zero like the temperature, when more Russian soldiers are killed than there were on the entire front. Yesterday, in Arctic air, I saw a Russ who wasn't there.

Even light does not act according to the usual laws. To the human eye it exposes Russian soldiers as ragged, hungry, gloveless, and freezing. To the Russian camera it shows them heavily clothed, with felt boots and thick gloves and a captured supply wagon disgorging a big supply of black bread.

This peculiar operation of natural laws in Finland seems forceful enough to project its influence across the seas by a kind of radio wave which softens the brains of newspaper editors, so that they believe anything that's told them. Not a skeptical voice is heard. Nine Finns kill 700 Russians; 38 Finns exterminate a division of 18,000.

The Russian armies have been thwarted in their first operations and in some sectors thrown back with heavy losses. From stupidity or overconfidence or enthusiasm they have made a military mess of it by outrunning their supply. But because the Russians have been stupid is there any reason why we should be simpletons and believe every fantastic tale that is told? H. G. P.

Washington, January 19

Hallett Abend's Travels

Dear Sirs: Maxwell Stewart, in your issue of November 11, reviewed my latest book with sympathy and understanding, but criticized the way I run my job here as New York Times correspondent.

"Failure to bestir himself out of Shanghai into the interior of China," was his expression. I have been out here for nearly fourteen years, and I am certain no foreign correspondent has traveled as far as I have in that time. Except for Sinkiang, Thibet, and Kweichow, there is no province that I have not visited many times. My expense accounts in the New York offices of the Times will attest this boast, as will a review of the date lines of my cables and mail stories.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Ca.

Before this war broke out I maintained sub-correspondents, full-time men, in Peking, Nanking, Hankow, and at one time I also had a full-time man in Manchuria. Part-time men are now in Hongkong and Hankow, in addition to full-time men in Peking and in Chungking. All of these men work entirely under the direction of this office. With a "set-up" of this kind it would be easy for me to stay in Shanghai month in and month out, and to count upon the reports of my scattered staff, but this I have never done. At least twice annually I visit and inspect our sub-offices, and also make excursions into the surrounding territories.

I think that those who censure me for a supposed failure to "bestir myself out of Shanghai" do so because they are disappointed that when I do go to the interior I do not take along rose-colored glasses. HALLETT ABEND

Shanghai, December 12

Note of Praise

Dear Sirs: Louis Fischer's first article on Soviet Russia Today, in The Nation of December 30, is to me the first logical, sensible, informative explanation of why Joe and Adolf got together.

I also think you were quite right to rebuke Sheen for his funeral oration on Heywood Broun. His conduct was utterly and unjustifiably shameful. I am glad you collected a few of Broun's best gems and reprinted them.

T. SWANN HARDING

Falls Church, Va., January 3

Mr. Meehan to You

Dear Sirs: Having been an attentive reader of the 149 volumes of The Nation, I note on page 27 of No. 1, Vol. 150, in a letter to the editor from H. Rutledge Southworth, this reference to myself: "Let me cite my authority, Father Thomas F. Meehan who wrote in America, June 24, 1939, etc., etc." (Italics mine.)

Now I began my newspaper work in this town in November, 1873, and have been laboring under the delusion that I carefully concealed its intent and purpose—you know, Jesuit in disguise, etc.; or to quote the pertinent old Punch saga:—

> They both belong to the Society
> I can tell a Jesuit by his look
> Half cunning and half piety
> Disraeli has it and my cook

It has gone along without question until Mr. Southworth tears off the disguise and reveals me in Holy Orders. I take it amiss though. It must have been professional jealousy that prompted him to keep the fact hidden until this week. If it had been disclosed a few days earlier I am sure I would have been rewarded for all these years of loyal service by one of the vacant archbishoprics of Chicago or Milwaukee.

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

New York, January 14

Correction

Dear Sirs: An error was made in your contributors' column in the issue of January 13, which carried my article, Twilight of the Chain Gang. I am working on the prison-labor problem under the New Deal and not on the "convict lease system." As I say in the article, the convict lease system was abolished finally in 1927.

WALTER WILSON

East Chatham, N. Y., January 18

Protection of Foreign Born

Dear Sirs: I am writing to invite the support of readers of The Nation for a work which I am certain will meet with their approval.

You must be aware that the existence of the war in Europe has intensified the efforts of demagogic alien-baiters who seek to destroy our rights as Americans behind the subterfuge of attacking the so-called alien. Because I am anxious to do my part in helping to defeat this attack upon American democracy, I have agreed to serve as co-chairman of the Committee of 100 Sponsors for the Fourth Annual Conference of the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born. Dr. William Allen Neilson, president emeritus of Smith College, is serving with me. An important undertaking of the conference is to prevent the passage of any of the seventy "anti-alien" bills in Congress. These undemocratic proposals for deportation of noncitizens, for concentration camps, for registration and finger-printing are a menace to the continued existence of American democracy.

In preparing for this important conference, the committee is handicapped by an extremely limited budget. Contributions are urgently needed if the work is to be carried on. They may be addressed to me at Pre-Conference Headquarters, Suite 1505, 79 Fifth Avenue, New York

ERNEST HEMINGWAY

New York, January 10

German Communists

Dear Sirs: In his second article on Soviet Russia, in The Nation of January 6, Louis Fischer wrote: "German Communists are returning from Russia to Germany under a promise of immunity."

Mr. Fischer does not substantiate that assertion, and I wonder whether he can. According to my knowledge, numerous former Communists and Socialist workers have been arrested in Germany since the outbreak of the war, and there are more Communists in prisons and concentration camps than ever before. Their lot has not improved as a result of the Hitler-Stalin pact. On the contrary, those Germans who formerly worked for the Communist Party have to fear the closer cooperation of the secret state police in both countries against any kind of internal opposition, and therefore also against German Communists who do not subscribe to the totalitarian rule of Hitler or Stalin. HANS BERG

New York, January 20

CONTRIBUTORS

HOWARD DANIEL is an Australian who after the 1938 pogrom in Germany went to Central Europe to work on refugee problems.

ARTHUR EGGLESTON, labor columnist for the San Francisco Chronicle, was cited in The Nation's Honor Roll for 1940.

ROBERT DELL, distinguished English journalist, regards France as his "second country."

HUBERT F. HAVLIK is in the Department of Economics at Columbia University.

BERTRAM M. GROSS has written on housing for Harper's, the New Republic, and other magazines.

SELDEN RODMAN is the editor of the "New Anthology of Modern Poetry."

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS, professor of anthropology at Northwestern University, has specialized in the field of Negro culture.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

Birthday Greetings

[Next month The Nation will celebrate its seventy-fifth anniversary, and we have already received many messages of congratulation and comment. We are grateful for these greetings—even the critical ones—and plan to print as many as we can find space for in the next few issues.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

HARRY HOPKINS
Secretary of Commerce

Although the editorial viewpoint of The Nation has not always coincided with mine, nevertheless I have found your publication a stimulating habit for many years. Its broad, liberal approach is particularly refreshing during these tumultuous days that are upon us now.

UPTON SINCLAIR

The Nation has come to my desk fifty-two times a year for I cannot remember how long, but it must be over thirty years. That represents fifteen hundred issues, "all different and no two alike," as we used to say when I was a boy. I have thought different thoughts about each one. I have found myself in agreement with The Nation much more in recent years than I used to be, and I have always found information and interest. To those who have kept it going all these years I owe a sincere tribute of thanks.

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL
Vice-Chairman of the TVA

Under its present editors The Nation each week is demonstrating that intensity of feeling need not be synonymous with dogma and intolerance, and that idealism need not beget self-righteousness or lack of humor. The Nation may find the second seventy-five years the hardest, but they will undoubtedly be no less useful ones.

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

I got aboard The Nation in the middle eighties as a student in the University of Kansas. It was recommended by the head of the English Department in that far day to students in English as a model of dialectic and controversial writing. I was amazed as a boy from a little country town to know that such a point of view as that which The Nation held could be maintained, for I was a deep-dyed conservative. But gradually The Nation got me. The first paper I subscribed for after coming to Emporia and buying the Gazette was The Nation. And it has been a thorn in the flesh ever since. I and my kind have needed it and I think it has done its job well. I may be called a lifetime subscriber and such as I am, "Well, you made me what I am today, I hope you're satisfied"—I know of nothing less complimentary I can say to you on this great birthday.

JOHN M. COFFEE
Representative from Washington

I congratulate The Nation upon having achieved seventy-five years of life. Its longevity in these hectic days of short-lived periodicals should be an encouragement to all liberals throughout America. Its championship of unpopular causes, of humble groups and citizens, its fearless portrayal of international events, its depiction of the progressive issues confronting the nation, its literary tone and quality have all endeared it to the intellectual liberals of America. May it continue on the course to ever greater prestige and influence!

I have not always agreed with The Nation's editorial policy, or with its opinions, but on the whole I have found my reactions coincide with it. Regardless of one's agreement with editorial opinions, no fair-minded observer can fail to accord to The Nation an accolade of hearty appreciation for its provocative and challenging articles, its debunking researches, its laying of hands upon hallowed arks of the covenant, its refusal to be cowed by tradition, and its unwillingness to be intimidated by the "sacred cows" of modern life. May its shadow never grow less and may its influence expand! We need colorful publications of the character of The Nation in the United States. We suffer from a paucity of such literary deflaters of pomposity.

The Nation readily discerns the feet of clay possessed by tory strutting statesmen. It keenly penetrates through the camouflage with which certain super-patriotic persons and groups surround themselves. It blows aside the aura of sacrosanct respectability which too often befogs the judgment and heart of Casper Milquetoast liberals. May your tribe increase!

CULBERT L. OLSON
Governor of California

The long and checkered history of American journalism has had at least one bright and steady beacon of truth, integrity, and liberalism for the past seventy-five years in The Nation.

I read The Nation with interest and with profit during the many years when Mr. Villard was its editor and mainstay; and I have read it with equal interest and profit during its present editorship. The Nation's numerous articles on the California scene have evoked much comment out here; and I believe I am right in saying that the influence of the magazine upon public opinion has been a real factor in making possible our present progressive Democratic administration.

CAREY McWILLIAMS
Commissioner of Immigration and Housing of California

I began to read The Nation while I was in college (1922-27), and I have been a consistent and diligent reader from those years on to the present time. I doubt if I have neglected many issues during the last twelve years, as I usually manage to go through each number pretty thoroughly. This should be some indication of my opinion of The Nation. I think that those of us who live in the West have a peculiar and special affection for The Nation because of the fact that the local press, as in Los Angeles, has always been so atrociously bad from every point of view. The Nation may be important to liberals and progressives in the East, but it is vital to those who reside in this land of sunshine among the kind of county sheriffs that Senator La Follette has been quizzing so effectively for the past ten days. Here on the West Coast The Nation has been a real influence. If I may say so, I think the magazine showed marked improvement during the period when Max Lerner was on the staff—a steadier and more consistent approach, less emphasis on indignation and greater stress on political realities, and a willingness to gamble now and then on developments which might at first have given rise to theoretical misgivings. If you ever need any copies of past issues, let me know; I think I have most of them on file.

THE Nation

VOLUME 150 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 3, 1940 · NUMBER 5

The Shape of Things

THE VATICAN'S REPORT OF MASS KILLINGS of Catholics in Poland shows that the earlier stories of atrocities against the Polish Jews could scarcely have been exaggerated. It is difficult to imagine worse conditions than those imposed upon the Polish population, including the clergy, in the sections of Poland now incorporated into the Third Reich. The names and addresses of nineteen priests known to have met death at the hands of the Germans are listed. Tens of thousands of Poles have been driven from their homes and forced to migrate, without property or personal possessions, to the sections of the country not annexed to the Reich. They have been crowded into factories, barns, and camps and kept there for weeks without heat in Europe's coldest winter in fifty years. No estimate is even ventured as to the number who have died under these conditions. That the Vatican, which was unperturbed by the mass killings by the insurgents in Spain, should suddenly awaken to the atrocities committed by an Axis power is of great political as well as humanitarian significance. It suggests that the breach between the Nazis and the church has reached a stage where the two can no longer work side by side in international affairs. The fact that these stories were released over the Vatican radio may be expected to have a profound effect in Italy. For Mussolini, despite his personal anti-clericalism, can scarcely expect under the circumstances to lead his Catholic population into war on the side of priest-killers.

*

THE TRADE TREATY WITH JAPAN EXPIRED without sensational developments either here or in the Far East. For the moment no action is likely to be advocated by the State Department. The Administration appears to be satisfied to hold the threat of retaliatory measures as a club to force a change in the Japanese policy toward American interests in China. Japan, for its part, is desperately anxious to avoid incidents which might lead the United States to utilize the weapons now at its disposal. The resumption of the anti-British campaign, involving new restrictions against Tientsin, seems to represent a typical Japanese effort to divert the attention of the public during this crisis. Unfortunately for the success of this strategy, British and American interests in China are closely linked, and it is doubtful whether the army extremists, who are opposed to an agreement with the United States in any case, will be careful to distinguish between the two. Nor is the United States likely to be reassured as to Japan's good faith by a renewed campaign of brutality against foreign civilians in China. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee meets this week to consider the Pittman and Schwellenbach embargo resolutions introduced last spring. Although public-opinion polls show 82 per cent of the American people in favor of stopping the export of war materials to Japan, it is probable that there will be a delay unless those opposed to aid for Japan are more articulate than they have been in the past. Another loan to China has been suggested as a means for salving our consciences while maintaining our war trade with Japan.

*

HAVING REFUSED TO GIVE CREDIT TO THE Allies and forced them to count their dollars carefully, the United States is hardly in a position to grumble if they fail to buy here as freely as we should like them to do. Nevertheless, some bitter protests have been heard because Britain has ceased to import tobacco and fruit from this country and has sharply reduced its takings of certain other goods below the normal level. Apart from the importance of economizing dollars, the ban on tobacco is inspired by the necessity of giving support to Turkey, on which the Allies must lean in order to safeguard their position in the Near East. Another complaint is against the large orders which Britain has placed in Argentina on condition that increased quantities of British goods are taken in return. This action is said to be hampering American trade in that country, but considering the barriers we persist in maintaining against Argentinian goods, we can hardly make out a very good case. In any event the war has enlarged American exports as a whole even though particular commodities have been hard hit. December exports were at a ten-year peak, and for the final quarter of 1939 sales to Latin American countries were 41.3 per cent higher than in 1938. Total shipments to Britain and France have notably expanded and the former alone is now said to be spending at the rate of

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

$9,000,000 a week. Not unnaturally this buying is concentrated on goods not easily obtainable elsewhere, with airplanes, machine tools, and chemicals the leading categories.

* * *

CANADA HAS NOT FOLLOWED BRITAIN IN arranging a political truce for the duration of the war. On the contrary, party strife has grown more acute. In the fall, Premier Duplessis of Quebec forced an election in that province as part of the nationalist campaign against participation in the war and suffered a severe defeat. But since then the federal administration of Mr. Mackenzie King has been sharply attacked on another flank by political groups who favor the war but are critical of the way in which it is being waged. There have been accusations of lack of energy, inefficiency, and favoritism in the placing of contracts. These attacks came to a head on January 18 when on the motion of Premier Mitchell Hepburn the Ontario Legislature passed a resolution censuring the federal government for failing "to prosecute Canada's duty in the war in the vigorous manner which the people of Canada desire to see." The Conservative opposition in the Legislature unanimously supported this resolution, but ten members of Mr. Hepburn's own Liberal Party refused to follow him. This incident appears to have been the decisive factor in persuading Mr. King to appeal to the electorate for a new mandate. Parliament met for a new session at Ottawa on January 26 but only to hear that it would be dissolved immediately with a view to a general election at the end of March. Taken by surprise, the opposition, which had expected at least a short session during which they could develop their offensive against the government, reproached Mr. King for trying to escape from his critics by a "snap election." The campaign threatens to be both bitter and confused, with the Liberals badly split by the personal feud between King and Hepburn. Progressives will no doubt attempt to raise the question of the wartime suppression of civil liberties, but in the general mêlée there is danger that this important issue will be shoved aside.

* * *

EVEN MORE SERIOUS POLITICAL ISSUES ARE disturbing the Dominion of South Africa. There former Premier Hertzog recently brought forward a resolution favoring an immediate and separate peace with Germany which was defeated by 81 votes to 59. This is not a very large margin, but it indicates a weakening in Hertzog's position in the House of Assembly since September 5, when his anti-war stand was voted down by a majority of only 14. This may be the result of the definitely pro-Nazi sentiments he expressed in the course of the debate, apparently to the disgust of some of his followers who, while believing that neutrality would be in South Africa's best interests, are by no means ready to whitewash Hitler. However, Hertzog is likely to continue in command of sufficient strength both in the country and in Parliament to place a severe handicap on Premier J. C. Smuts's conduct of the war. Moreover, the differences which have hitherto separated his group from Dr. Daniel F. Malan's Nationalist Party now appear to have been overcome by his acceptance of the principle of complete separation from the British crown. Henceforth the opposition in South Africa proposes to run neutrality and republicanism in double harness. It is difficult to see how a revival of the tragic rift between the Africander and British elements in the dominion is to be avoided.

* * *

R. C. LEFFINGWELL, REPUTED TO BE THE "brains" of the house of Morgan, has submitted a memorandum to the Temporary National Economic Committee diagnosing our economic ills and proposing remedies. His most interesting suggestion is the need for a mild shot of inflation with a view to widening profit margins and thus encouraging our dispirited entrepreneurs. Mr. Leffingwell is on firm ground in his criticism of the mercantile policies pursued by this country ever since the last war. One of the consequences of those policies is our steadily increasing hoard of gold, which is at last beginning to be recognized as a major financial problem. As Mr. Leffingwell rightly points out, it would be "sheer lunacy" to raise the price of gold any farther, while decreasing it would be politically impossible and dangerously deflationary. He therefore suggests that commodity prices should be allowed to rise gently, thus reducing the "present gross disparity" between the gold price and the commodity price level. The result would be, he says, to save business from being squeezed between high costs and low prices. His memorandum does not, however, make it clear what changes in monetary policy would produce this effect. Actually prices of basic commodities have shown a definitely upward trend in the past four months. Industrial goods have remained comparatively steady, thanks, at least in part, to the restraining influence of the TNEC. This, perhaps, is the real object of Mr. Leffingwell's criticism. But in this field prices depend less on direct market influences than on planning by industrial executives who have been encouraged by the TNEC to look for results in greater turnover rather than in higher margins. Judging by 1940 corporation reports now being published, this policy has hardly been destructive of profits.

* * *

GOVERNOR LEHMAN'S PROPOSED INCREASE in surtax rates for New York State appears to have met no better fate than the President's proposed defense tax based on capacity to pay. The situation is in many ways an ironical one. In both the state and nation, critics of the Democratic administrations have based their fire chiefly on the recurrent unbalanced budgets. They have talked economy but have presented no plan under which the budgets could be balanced. Governor Lehman's tax is an eminently sound one. Described as a tax on the "middle brackets," it falls most heavily on the upper income brackets. Ninety-five per cent of families—those with incomes of less than $3,000—would be wholly unaffected by the rise, while the brunt of the tax falls on the $6,000 and over brackets, a group that can afford the modest increase. In the howls of protest which have gone up against the tax—which always seem inversely proportionate to the number of persons affected by the proposed levy—the groups which have been urging a balanced budget are especially conspicuous. It now appears that in New York the Republicans do not want a balanced budget after all; they would prefer to make a few feeble gestures in the direction of economy and then wait until next year in the hope that by some lucky accident revenues will be greater than anticipated. A more irresponsible attitude toward the financial problems of government would be difficult to find.

*

THE WAR HAS TRANSFORMED PUERTO RICO from a poor relation into a potential "Gibraltar of the Caribbean," reports from that island seem to indicate. Tremendous progress has already been made toward carrying out the Administration's $27,000,000 program for converting the island into a military, air, and naval base capable of guarding the Panama Canal and the north coast of South America from attack by a major power. A huge area in the northwestern part has been cleared for an air base. Approximately 2,500 of the 10,000 troops scheduled to be stationed on the island are already at their posts. The strategic importance of Puerto Rico in America's new defense plans has not been without incidental value to its population. The army and navy, we are told, are placing great emphasis on public-relations work with the natives. Moreover, the Administration seems to be making a belated but none the less real effort to attack the island's economic problems. An economic mission has been invited to come to Washington to assist in drafting a program for relief and economic rehabilitation to be considered at this session of Congress. Meanwhile the demand for immediate independence seems to be subsiding. The Nationalist Party under Pedro Albizu Campos is still for independence, but it stands alone. Among the larger parties, the Popular Democrats under Luis Marin have definitely forsaken independence as an immediate issue, while the members of the Union Republican Party have indicated their intention of removing all mention of independence from their party platform. The attitude of these parties is at least a realistic one, because once the island is fortified the chances for independence will become slight indeed.

THE FILM VERSION OF "ABE LINCOLN IN Illinois" opened in Washington last week at the RKO-Keith theater. As an advance build-up the management conducted a contest to find a "perfect double" for Lincoln within the city limits. Scores of photographs were submitted; finally the judges selected that of Thomas P. Bomar, secretary of the National Alliance of Postal Employees, as the closest likeness. Amid considerable fanfare Mr. Bomar was summoned to the Carleton Hotel. He was showered with eulogies, compelled to face a battery of cameras, and presented with two front-row tickets for the première, where he was to receive a $25 award. There was general agreement that Mr. Bomar was an amazing "double" for the Great Emancipator; if there was any pronounced difference, it was that Mr. Bomar's complexion was perceptibly darker. But not dark enough to excite any grim suspicions until somebody, after the ceremony, noticed his address. He lived in a Negro neighborhood. On the night of the opening Mr. Bomar went to the theater. Outside he saw a picket line of Negroes protesting against the exclusion of their race from the theater. Mr. Bomar went in anyway, and the doorman, eyeing him a little suspiciously, didn't interfere. But the presentation was omitted; the climax of the Great Contest was unaccountably skipped. Mr. Bomar just sat in the front row of the theater waiting for his cue; it never came. The next day there was a brief press notice that Mr. Thomas Bomar had won the contest. But the usual tub-thumping never took place. He was a Negro.

Lewis in a China Shop

FOR a man who in his time has done as much backtracking as John L. Lewis, the C. I. O. leader is rashly casual about the bridges he burns behind him. It is not enough for him to tell his assembled United Mine Workers that the New Deal has failed here, there, and the other place; he must renounce Roosevelt, suggest that the Democrats would have to be "coerced or dragooned" to give him another nomination, and prophesy that should that high-handed technique succeed, the President would face "ignominious defeat" at the hands of the electorate. As to whether or not this is the long-heralded break between Lewis and Roosevelt there would seem at first glance to be scant room for speculation. But circumstances have on more than one occasion changed pre-convention gall to post-convention nectar. They would almost certainly do so again if the Democrats should submit to the "coercion" Mr. Lewis warns of. And that possibility gives his words a flavor of tactical strategy rather than finality.

Lewis's tactics have two possible objects: to scare the convention away from any thought of a third term by threatening the loss of the powerful C. I. O. support, in which case the break with Roosevelt would be completed, or to use the same threat to bring Roosevelt and the party around to a more militant pro-labor stand, now and at the convention.

With the second of these objects, at least, we can find no quarrel. We share Lewis's rejection of the notion that the Democrats, or any other party, should be permitted to take labor's support for granted. We believe, too, that the President has yielded far too much to the reactionary wing of his party: in the matter of relief cuts, as attested by his budget speech and by the shocking WPA prosecutions in Minneapolis described elsewhere in this issue by Dwight Macdonald; and in the campaign of subtle red-baiting which he has come to tolerate if not to encourage. Moreover, we appreciate Mr. Lewis's obvious desire to balance the influence of the Southern reactionaries and the Northern city machines with a strong labor counterweight.

Nevertheless, we are convinced that Lewis's tactics are self-defeating and dangerous. He did not warn Roosevelt that further surrenders to the right would undermine his labor support; there was no question of alternatives. His attitude, on the contrary, was wholly negative: the New Deal was a proved failure, Roosevelt had already surrendered, and there was no good in him or in his works. The results of this categorical and petulant approach can differ only in their degree of infelicity. The most obvious and probably the least important is the awkward position in which Lewis would find himself should Roosevelt or a candidate picked by him get the nomination. Lewis can hardly prefer a Taft or a Vandenberg, or even a Dewey; and to launch a third-party effort on such short notice would certainly be feeding peanuts to the elephant.

More serious is the rift which Lewis's action is bound to cause in the C. I. O. Sidney Hillman's powerful Amalgamated Clothing Workers, the Textile Workers under Emil Rieve, the Industrial Councils of New York, New Jersey, and California, and various local unions have already indorsed Roosevelt for a third term; and the United Rubber Workers, the United Automobile Workers, the United Retail and Wholesale Employees, and the Federation of Hosiery Workers will in all probability follow suit. Lewis's own Mine Workers, unprepared for the quick turn of events, brought in no fewer than forty-seven third-term resolutions. Disunity in the ranks of American labor has had a major part in weakening the New Deal along the very lines that Lewis deplores. By his latest move he not only has made peace with the A. F. of L. less likely than ever, but he has divided his own house as well. It is this failure to carry along the whole C. I. O. which underscores the doubtfulness of his strategy. Effective, it would have been dangerous; ineffective, it is futile as well as dangerous.

On the Balkan Fence

THIS week-end the Balkan Entente, composed of Turkey, Greece, Rumania, and Yugoslavia, is holding a meeting in Belgrade. With the exception of Turkey, which is strongly committed to assist Britain and France in certain contingencies, these countries wish to remain strictly neutral. They may pray quietly for an Allied victory, knowing that if the Nazis win they must face a bleak future, but like other neutrals they want to stay peacefully on the sidelines and carry on as profitable a business as possible with both sides.

Under these circumstances it might seem a wise course for these countries to join in a defensive alliance for mutual aid against any invader and for mutual resistance to the pressures constantly exerted by both belligerents. Such a scheme may in fact come under discussion at the present meeting. There are, however, many obstacles to be overcome, the most serious being that some of these countries are much more dangerously placed than others. The one subject to the most immediate threats is Rumania, which, it is reported, is anxious to obtain guaranties of military aid in case of attack by either Germany or Russia. It is extremely doubtful whether its partners in the Balkan Entente will be willing to provide a pledge of this kind. The Greek government, for instance, is Germanophile, even though Greece relies in the last analysis on the British fleet for its defense. Turkey, on the other hand, is already in Berlin's bad books and might risk some additional displeasure. But it is still on nominally friendly terms with Russia, although the relationship is much cooler than it used to be, and it would hesitate to commit itself to waging war if the Soviets moved against Bessarabia.

It seems likely, therefore, that Rumania will have to continue its efforts to maintain its neutrality unaided by extraneous guaranties, apart from those given by the Allies, which it regards as hardly an unmixed blessing. Nevertheless, in some ways its position has been growing rather stronger. Russia's involvement with Finland has both lessened the immediate danger of an attack on Bessarabia and encouraged the Rumanians to prepare more strenuously to defend it. Nor is the threat of German invasion so acute as a few months ago. There are, indeed, signs that Berlin is in a serious dilemma regarding Rumania. Partly because of transport difficulties, aggravated by the freezing of the Danube, and partly because of the aggressive commercial and diplomatic campaign of the Allies, it has not been receiving oil, grains, and other commodities in the quantities it needs. Each new form of pressure it puts on King Carol is met by counter-pressures from Britain and France, which, thanks to their gold and their financial control of the Rumanian oil industry, are occupying an economic line very hard to assail. The threat of military action remains as a German trump card, but its effectiveness is declining for a number of reasons. Paramount, perhaps, is the difficulty of moving except in conjunction with Russia, whose appeaarnce on the Balkan scene might involve a definite split with Italy. Again there is always the problem of how to kill the goose without destroying its egg-laying capacity. Lastly, there is the fact that the Allies might welcome an invasion of Rumania since it would provide them with the flank they are obviously seeking in order to end the deadlock on the western front. In view of these considerations, it seems probable that the German high command will hesitate a long time before it orders a Rumanian Blitzkrieg, and that King Carol will maintain his position on the fence even without physical support from his Balkan neighbors.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Purge by Passport

THE four-year sentence imposed on Earl Browder is fantastically excessive. It is only less grotesque than the five-year term which United States Attorney Cahill asked; and it can only be interpreted in the extra-legal terms of America's political temperature. Both the harshness of the punishment and the approbation it received from the press reflect the degree to which anti-red fevers have risen. Browder is only the first victim.

The case itself rested on a narrow, technical point. Since the statute of limitations had expired, Browder could not be prosecuted for traveling under a false passport, as he had done in the 1920's. His offense was traceable to one word written in 1934. When applying for a passport in that year, he was asked whether he had had one before; he answered "none." In 1937 and 1938 he returned to the United States from trips abroad carrying the passport he had obtained in 1934; and the government charged that his entry constituted unlawful "use" of a passport obtained by false statement.

If the offense was real, it scarcely represented a major menace to the republic. More flagrant violations by non-political travelers have been less severely punished. It is not even certain that the government case will survive the scrutiny of the higher courts. The section of the law under which Browder was prosecuted is ambiguous: there is no clear statement that it is intended to apply to citizens; and the fact that lack of a passport is no bar to the reentry of a citizen into the United States strengthens the claim that the section was exclusively aimed at aliens. Browder is a citizen.

But because he is also a Communist, there have been no newspaper editorials in which the severity of his sentence is even mildly deplored. We have heard no commentator hint that if Earl Browder had been John Smith he might have been treated more leniently. No columnist has bothered to point out that men from Justice Brandeis down have frowned on the practice of imposing consecutive rather than concurrent sentences, as Judge Coxe has done in this trial.

If the Department of Justice had merely prosecuted the case and requested a punishment commensurate with the crime, and if this case were an isolated one, there would be little ground for alarm. After all, the New Deal didn't bring the subject up; Browder did, when he told the Dies committee of his travels in the 1920's. Apparently confident that the statute of limitations protected him, he made the confession in full view of press and public. He was wrong; the Administration's failure to exploit his error might have provided dynamite for its right-wing enemies and embarrassed its own efforts to prosecute right-wing terrorists. But while these facts may justify the launching of the prosecution, they do not explain Mr. Cahill's effort to transform a technical violation into something approaching high treason. The case called for a responsible effort to make the punishment fit a minor crime. Instead, Mr. Cahill talked grandiosely of the "sacred right of passport"; and editorial writers assured Browder he was lucky to live in a free country.

Browder's courtroom demeanor was impressive. His subsequent Madison Square Garden address, in which he reproached the New Deal for "betraying" the Communists and boasted that Communists had once shaped Frank Murphy's policies and written New Deal speeches, hit a new low in political immorality. But this gratuitous gift to Martin Dies's war chest is relatively unimportant; the real question is what Browder's sentence portends.

The passport laws were originally designed to curb the influx of suspect aliens in war time. Now they are becoming an instrument for purge by technicality. Communists have no special claim to immunity from them, but neither is there any excuse for a sudden and sweeping descent on violators because they are Communists. The succession of indictments handed down since the Browder prosecution was launched testifies that this is happening; behind the camouflage of passport accusations and similar non-political charges, an anti-Communist drive is under way. Revolutionaries are accustomed to such maneuvers by a hostile state and cynically regard them as an occupational risk. To democrats they are a storm warning. For they are invariably a prelude to indiscriminate war against the left. There is no evidence that the Communists or other left groups are guilty of unlawful political acts such as those charged against the Christian Front. But there is a growing clamor to eliminate them by "technical knockout" if other avenues are closed. In the same week that Browder was sentenced, the Fortune poll reported that 40 per cent of America wanted free speech for the left curtailed; it defined "left" as "Browder, Communists, reds, radicals, Norman Thomas, Socialists." In that atmosphere nobody is safe.

Children in a Democracy

NOT for many years has the American social structure been subjected to a more searching scrutiny by a semi-official body than it underwent at the White House Conference on Children in a Democracy held recently in Washington. On the assumption that the America of tomorrow is being formed in our children of today, the social and economic conditions affecting childhood were rigorously appraised. It was acknowledged, for example, that the safety of our democratic institutions requires that as many families as possible be enabled to earn a decent income. And figures were assembled showing that nearly three-fourths of the families in the United States do not have enough income to give the children an adequate diet. Between six and eight million children are to be found in families dependent on government aid or some form of relief. Figures were also assembled showing the effect of this poverty. Forty per cent of city families live in houses without central heating; one out of six in houses either unfit for use or in need of major repairs. Half a million children under sixteen have cut short their education in order to go to work. At least ten million school children have defective eyesight, and a million and a half have impaired hearing. Approximately a quarter of a million mothers and their babies have no medical care at childbirth or immediately thereafter.

Facts such as these, far too often overlooked if not actually suppressed, provided the basis for the conference discussions. Consideration was also given to the special problems of children in minority groups, as well as to religion, education, and recreation. While a two-day conference was not expected to produce a program for the solution of all these problems, it did make many useful suggestions. It advocated, for example, that in addition to maintaining work relief for employable adults and grants in aid for dependent children, the federal government assume at least partial responsibility for general relief. Similarly, the conference went on record as favoring an expansion of the low-cost housing program with special attention to rural areas, where half the country's children live. It recommended federal grants in aid to the states for education, and made a number of specific proposals for the improvement of our educational system. And it set forth an elaborate public-health program with special reference to the needs of mothers and children.

Most of the conference discussions dealt with what might be called the physical basis of democracy. It was recognized that true democracy cannot flourish as long as a few children are privileged and the majority are denied the opportunity of developing into normal, healthy, trained citizens. But the necessary psychological atmosphere of democracy was not neglected. In discussing family life it was pointed out that democracy must begin at home—that it must not only be inculcated but practiced in the home if the child is to grow up with an appreciation and understanding of the democratic process. Similarly, the section of the conference dealing with education felt that the child's learning experience should include participation in the activities of community life. Only in the field of religion did the conference seem to dodge the basic issue. It recommended making "more available . . . the resources of religion as an important factor in the democratic way of life," but failed to consider the basic problems raised by the coexistence of autocracy in religion and democracy in politics.

Another grave omission in the findings of the conference was the absence of any reference to the democratic value of youth's own efforts to face and solve its problems. We trust that it was not fear of the Dies committee that accounted for the absence of any approbation of the work of the American Youth Congress. Except for these omissions, the findings of the conference are honest and courageous and well deserve the study of every American interested in his country's future.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 113

EDITORIALS:

LEWIS IN A CHINA SHOP 115
ON THE BALKAN FENCE 116
PURGE BY PASSPORT 117
CHILDREN IN A DEMOCRACY 118
DIES, 345; DECENCY, 21 by Kenneth G. Crawford 119
WPA CUTS—OR JAIL by Dwight Macdonald 120
WAR ON THE SHORT WAVE by Henry B. Kranz 123
SLUMMING WITH ZANUCK by Michel Mok 127
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 128
IN THE WIND 129
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 130

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 131
THE MUSE AT THE MICROPHONE by John Peale Bishop 132
CYCLES AND THE SYSTEM by Paul M. Sweezy 133
MUSSOLINI'S BATTLES by Gaetano Salvemini 134
SHORTER NOTICES 135
DRAMA: BAGDAD ON THE SUBWAY by Joseph Wood Krutch 136
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 136
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 137

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

■

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Dies, 345; Decency, 21

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, January 29

DIES got 345 votes and decency got 21. It was as simple as that and as bad as that. Neither the blustering arguments of conservatives who led the movement for continuation of the Congressional Committee for Investigation of Un-American Activities nor the elaborate sophistries of liberals who went along could conceal the issue. The question was whether a committee whose rules of procedure resembled lynch law, a committee which had shown itself both unscrupulous and inept, was to be given a vote of confidence and a new lease on life. The answer was almost unanimous approval of a resolution renewing the committee's authority for one year followed by appropriation of $75,000 to defray expenses.

The House answered the question with its eyes open and all the facts before it. In debate on the resolution almost every speaker who did not attack the committee outright offered some apology for its misconduct. Two members of the committee—Casey of Massachusetts and Voorhis of California—admitted that they had not been able to reform the Dies procedure. Congressman Hook's evidence that Chairman Dies had consorted and collaborated with patrioteers on the periphery of the Christian Front cordite ring and that William Dudley Pelley of the Silver Shirts has boasted of immunity from investigation was in the record where everyone could see it.

Yet only twenty-one members voted no when the roll was called. It was an extraordinarily bad score even for the House the 1938 reaction built. The principal reason for the stampede was, of course, the fear of many members that dissent would cost them their seats. They knew the Gallup poll had recently shown overwhelming public sentiment for continuation of the committee. A vote against the resolution would be called a vote for communism. It would be a custom-made slogan for opposition candidates in the fall campaign.

Some members who would have voted against the resolution had they followed conscience rather than political judgment were consoled with the Lippmannesque reasoning that the committee could be excused for using un-American methods because it was investigating un-American activities. Since it was poking into the affairs of the political underworld, it had to borrow underworld tactics—"it takes a crook to catch a crook." It is the same mental process by which ordinarily kindly citizens shrug at third-degree methods in the back room of the police station. If the rubber hose is used occasionally on an innocent man, one must not be unduly disturbed because the guilty deserve to be beaten and mistakes will happen.

That argument wasn't used in debate, but it appeared in several influential columns and editorial pages. It was effective. Most members speaking in support of the resolution gave Dies credit for jailing Earl Browder and Fritz Kuhn, although one was a victim of the Department of Justice and the other of New York State officials. Both were under investigation for their crimes before Dies got around to them. No one, except Dies himself, had the crust to credit the committee with the Christian Front arrests. He put in a claim from his sick bed in Texas. The other achievement most generally credited to Dies was education of the public to the ways and wiles of the Communists. The information that Communists get into liberal organizations and then by dint of energetic and systematic work try and sometimes succeed in making them toe the party line seemed to be new to Congress. Any liberal joiner could have told them about it, or they could have read about it in any one of a dozen periodicals long before Dies took his feet off a cloak-room chair.

There was only one lengthy defense of Dies. This was an extension of remarks by Representative Cox of Georgia, the one-man angry mob of the House. He asserted that there couldn't be anything to Hook's documents because Dies had been threatened with physical violence by the Christian Fronters and criticized in Pelley's periodical.

Some of the speeches against the committee were more substantial, but none of them went into the question of Dies's responsibility for the hysteria that translated itself into an assassination plot in the little minds of seventeen Brooklyn boys. In the process of getting publicity for its chairman, carrying on the left-wing political feuds of its research director, J. B. Matthews, and arousing fears that a Communist revolution is just around the corner, the Dies committee unquestionably has contributed to the growth of such crackpot aggregations as the Christian Front.

The most important speeches of the debate were those of Casey and Voorhis, the two liberals added to the personnel of the committee last year. Casey told the House how Dies held a meeting with himself at six p. m. on a Sunday night to receive Matthews's report on consumer organizations, how in this report Matthews, "a renegade Communist and formerly associated with Consumers' Research, Inc.," had declared rival consumer organizations communistic, and how all this had then been represented as the conclusion of the full committee. He also told how, in the final report of the committee, which he signed, the C. I. O. Electrical Workers' Union had been declared Communist-dominated on no more evidence than a hearsay report that its president once spoke at a meeting of the American League for Peace and Democracy. Voorhis supplied the information that he had proposed rules of fair conduct for the committee which had been rejected on the ground that they would "hamstring" its operations. But the two liberals both urged continuation of the committee.

The question now is what the committee will do with its $75,000. Will it take its courage in hand and investigate Father Coughlin, the spiritual inspirer of the Christian Front? Asked this question from the floor, Voorhis indicated that he would favor such an inquiry but pointed out that he could not speak for his colleagues. It is doubtful whether the committee, even now, will take on the radio priest. It may investigate Merwin K. Hart and some of the other lesser lights named by Hook as Christian Front collaborators. Will it reform its methods? Casey and Voorhis probably will be able to force some improvements, but it must be remembered that they were on the committee when the consumers' report was issued. So far as is known, Dies offered no promises to House leaders in exchange for their support of his renewing resolution beyond the understanding that he would not conduct hearings between the political conventions and the November election.

He has intimated to a few friends that he is tired of it all, wanted the renewal merely for vindication, and now will be content to let Casey and Voorhis have their innings. But he has smelled the headline ink, and no such resolution is to be taken too seriously. If Dies doesn't use his new coil of rope to hang liberal candidates in the forthcoming campaign, as he did in 1938, there will be a lot of surprised and disappointed Republicans—and not a few Democrats.

WPA Cuts—or Jail

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

WHEN Frank Murphy became a Supreme Court justice, he left to his successor, Attorney General Jackson, one awkward and embarrassing piece of unfinished business—the mass trials of WPA strikers which the Department of Justice has been carrying on in Minneapolis since last fall. Awkward, because the Minneapolis trials are flagrantly incompatible with the New Deal's frequently avowed devotion to democracy and yet the President's relief strategy appears to demand that the trials be carried through to the end. Embarrassing, because Attorney General Jackson, like Murphy, is personally honest and liberal, with little stomach for the dirty work his department has undertaken in Minneapolis.

The trials have received almost no attention in the national press, for excellent reasons. The situation at present is that 162 citizens of Minneapolis have been indicted by a federal grand jury on charges which can send each of them to the penitentiary for two years and subject him to fines up to $10,000. To date, 37 have been tried. Of these, 33 have been convicted and 4 have been acquitted, 2 of them on instructions from the judge. These 162 men and women are charged with having "intimidated" fellow WPA workers during last summer's WPA strike and with having "conspired" to do this. As I shall presently show, the trials are frame-ups in the sense that the government is perverting the intent of legislation in order to railroad the defendants to prison.

There is no dispute about what happened in the strike in Minneapolis. The strike was called by the Minneapolis Building Trades Council and was backed by the whole union movement of the city, A. F. of L., and C. I. O. alike. The mass of unskilled WPA workers was strongly organized by the Federal Workers' Section of General Drivers' Union, Local 544. This local, led by the Dunne brothers, has for years been the heart of the Minneapolis trade-union movement; it won nationally famous strikes in 1934 and has supplied the generalship which has made Minneapolis the best-organized major city in the country. The teamsters have done a notable job of organizing the unemployed, and when the WPA movement started last July, Minneapolis strikers quickly took the lead in militancy and effectiveness. At the height of the strike about 90 per cent of the local WPA projects were closed down.

The present defendants are being tried for their alleged presence on mass picket lines which were thrown around the chief projects. There was some violence on these picket lines—fist fights, feminine hair-pulling, and the usual police clubbing and shooting. There were two deaths—of a policeman and a bystander. The policeman collapsed on strike duty and died in the hospital. Although the press reported he had been beaten to death by the strikers, the hospital records show he had an acute heart condition and died of heart failure. This is now admitted even by the prosecution. The other death was that of a middle-aged workman who was killed by a stray bullet, presumably from a police gun, since no evidence has been brought forward at any time to show that the strikers were armed. On the day this bystander was killed, seventeen of the pickets were injured by police guns, clubs, and tear gas severely enough to require hospitalization.

Burlingame, Cal.

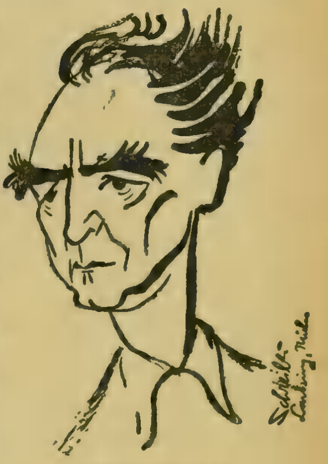
The strike in Minneapolis was finally called off on July 21, after the union had obtained relatively favorable terms. The pay cuts were not rescinded, but it was agreed that strikers would be taken back on the WPA rolls without prejudice; in places where the WPA workers put up a less effective fight, the usual practice was to blacklist all strikers.

But this was by no means the end of the story. Three days after the strike was settled, a federal grand jury began an investigation which had been prepared for by several weeks of intensive espionage by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Victor Anderson, young and ambitious United States Attorney for the Minneapolis district, did a thorough job on the case, building it up in collaboration with the FBI and the reactionary city administration of Mayor Leach. The grand jury sat for three weeks and heard almost two hundred witnesses. On August 18 indictments against 103 strikers were handed down charging "intimidation" of WPA workers, a felony under the Woodrum Relief Act of 1939. In most cases the "conspiracy" charge was also thrown in for good measure.

The 162 indicted strikers are a cross-section of working-class Minneapolis. There are college kids, housewives (a third of the defendants are women), war veterans, skilled craft workers, Negroes, Jews, Catholics, Irishmen, Swedes, people of all ages and races and religions. They have been treated as though they were dangerous criminals. United States Attorney Anderson refused to make public the names of those indicted, on the ground that they might "escape." At first, arrests were made in the small hours of the night, by armed deputy marshals who routed the victims out of bed and carried them off to jail. The pounding of these homegrown Gestapo agents on the door was the first intimation many of the defendants had that they were "wanted." Later arrests were made in daytime, the captives being paraded through the streets in handcuffs. As the strikers arrived at the Hennepin County jail, they were "mugged," and the photographs were released for publication in the local papers.

Federal Judge Bell set bail for the first forty-three defendants arrested at the fantastic figure of between $5,000 and $10,000 apiece. (Former Judge Manton's bail was $10,000.) This for workers who were completely without resources and had been earning about $60 a month on WPA, and who furthermore had not the slightest temptation to "escape" since they would have been ineligible for relief in any other place. The total bail set for these forty-three defendants came to $213,000. At the local rate of $75 a thousand for bail bonds, it would have taken $16,000 to get them out of jail. It was pressure from local unions that forced a reduction of the total bail to $57,000. As security for this bail from the bonding companies, the unions voted to put up the Labor Temple—a remarkably generous, and rare, gesture of solidarity between organized labor and the unemployed.



Justice Murphy

For purposes of trial the defendants have been divided into ten groups, according to the time and place of the violence in which they are alleged to have taken part. There were eight defendants in the first trial, which involved, among other things, a knife attack on a picket by a man appropriately named Slaughter. (It was Slaughter's victim who was on trial.) The jury consisted of seven farmers, a lumber salesman, a former deputy sheriff, a real-estate dealer, a restaurant owner, and a hardware dealer. In this as in later trials the judge was Matthew M. Joyce, formerly chief counsel for the Minneapolis and St. Louis Railway. He instructed the jury to acquit two of the defendants. Five of the remaining six were found guilty of intimidation, and four of them were also found guilty of conspiracy.

Three days later, on October 20, the second trial ended, with three out of four defendants found guilty. Anderson then moved for a mass trial of no fewer than ninety defendants, all charged with violence on the picket line around the sewing project. Judge Joyce cut the number down to twenty-five at a time. He overruled the defense counsel, Tom Davis, who wanted a seventy-two-hour recess so that he could have an investigation made of each of the seventy-five talesmen from which the jury was to be picked. Davis was also overruled when he asked permission to question each prospective juror.

The reason for Davis's solicitude about the jury panel was that it had been made up of names submitted by county attorneys and other court officials, by postmasters, and by the Minneapolis Junior Chamber of Commerce. Fifteen of the names had been taken at random out of rural telephone books. Only one man on the whole panel —he didn't get on the jury—had any sort of a union past; he had been a member of one of the Railway Brotherhoods fifteen years ago. The defense soon exhausted its allotment of ten challenges, and another typical federal jury filled the box—five farmers, a filling-station owner, an accountant, a road-grader operator, a non-union carpenter, a salesman, a garage owner, and a housewife.

In the course of this trial, which dragged on for a month, Anderson put 158 witnesses on the stand. Suspicions have been voiced that his strategy was to build up so huge a court record as to make the cost of an appeal prohibitive. (The defense must have all testimony printed at its own expense in order to take an appeal.) Whatever his motives, he dragged the case out interminably. The defendants showed plenty of spirit, cracking jokes about the glass-framed American flag behind the judge's chair—"Even the flag is framed in this courtroom." One of the prisoners admitted she had called non-strikers names, adding, "Anyone that crosses union picket lines is a fink, scab, or rat." When Anderson asked her if she would call him that if he did, she replied that she would. It is charged, by the way, that some of the defendants were not even on the picket line on the day in question, and that many of the indictments are the result of grudge or spite accusations by personal enemies. In his final speech Anderson threw a red scare into the jury with such statements as, "Minneapolis is not going to become the Moscow of America so long as I am district attorney." With the issue defined as communism versus Americanism, the jury returned a verdict of guilty on both charges for all twenty-five of the defendants. It seems clear that, with juries of this sort, the trials still to come will have the same outcome. As for the "Moscow of America," it is the trials themselves which are giving Minneapolis a Muscovite flavor.

It is hard to see how the charges are anything but a gross perversion of the clear intent of the Woodrum Relief Act of 1939. The section of that law forbidding "intimidation" of WPA workers was put in to protect them against political pressure, particularly against New Deal pressure. That it would later be used to send strikers to prison could have been in the minds of few if any Congressmen when the bill was passed. The "conspiracy" clause in the same act was aimed at contractors who might try to get together and defraud the government on materials for WPA projects. (The $2,000 fine bears out this interpretation: such a fine makes no sense whatever applied to WPA workers.)

The "conspiracy" charge is really a revival of an old legal weapon much used against labor back in the unenlightened days of Cleveland and McKinley. The New Deal is picking up this club again, just as Assistant Attorney General Arnold has begun once more, after a twenty years' lapse, to use the anti-trust laws against organized labor. In these trials it has been most effective. Judge Joyce's charge to the jury in the first trial stated that to be guilty of conspiracy it is not necessary that a defendant know the other defendants previously or that he be present at the conception of the plot. "Those who come in later and cooperate to obtain the unlawful results of a conspiracy become partners and assume responsibilty for that which went before," he said. By this definition, any striker is guilty of "conspiracy" the moment violence starts on the picket line. "This is the most outrageous thing I have ever witnessed," said a prominent Minneapolis lawyer after sitting in on one of the trials. "If these people have done anything, why not try them one by one in a police court where such offenses should be examined?" His question is unanswerable. Fist fights and hair-pulling are normally matters for the police court, not for the federal grand jury.

Attempts have been made to pass off these trials as the excesses of a local federal attorney. It is reported that Attorney General Murphy was "pained and disgusted" at Anderson's vindictive attitude. But Murphy, pained or not, never interfered, for the good reason that the trials represent the direct and conscious policy of the White House. The whole machinery was set in motion by President Roosevelt. The day after the policeman died, before it was generally known that he died not of a beating but of heart failure, the President announced that the Department of Justice was beginning an investigation of the Minneapolis WPA strike. A few days later Murphy specified Minneapolis as a place where "evidence of labor racketeering or criminal conspiracy against the nation's relief program may result in indictments." On the following day, with the strike still hot in the nation and hottest in Minneapolis, Roosevelt gave his press conference his famous personal message to WPA strikers: "You cannot strike against the government." He underlined this by giving special permission to quote his words directly.

Just how much the Federal Bureau of Investigation has had to do with building up the case against the strikers is not known. There have been indications that the G-men played a major role, under cover. One of Anderson's chief advisers in the grand-jury investigation was Daniel M. Ladd, who is in charge of the Chicago office of the FBI. In the third trial a police sergeant became flustered under cross-examination. Asked, "Did you discuss your testimony with anyone?" he replied, "I just merely rehearsed—I mean, just went over my testimony with Noonan and J. H. Rice." These two men are FBI agents. An even worse slip was made by the Minneapolis Tribune when it reported on July 24: "The FBI agents, about twenty-five of them, were in a good position to learn what took place around the sewing project in the series of riots July 14, it was disclosed Sunday. Wearing overalls and other articles of workmen's clothing, the agents, posing as pickets and onlookers, mingled with the crowd surging around the project building."

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

President Roosevelt has made it quite clear where he stands in the Minneapolis affair. On August 3, as the grand jury was beginning its investigation, he nominated Linus Glotzbach, Minneapolis WPA administrator, for promotion to Regional Director of WPA for the Seventh District. It was Glotzbach who insisted on keeping the projects open, under heavy police guard, although the usual policy was to close down all projects where mass walk-outs occurred. Glotzbach worked closely with Mayor Leach and Governor Stassen, reactionary Republican politicians, to smash the strike. At the request of Minneapolis unions Senator Lundeen moved in the Senate that Glotzbach's nomination be sent back to committee for action at the next session of Congress. This automatically suspended the promotion. Roosevelt has now reintroduced Glotzbach's nomination and apparently intends to fight it through the Senate.

There was violence in many cities during the WPA strike, and yet only in Minneapolis has the government taken legal action of this sort. Why? In Minneapolis the WPA workers put up the most effective fight. To smash this strong WPA union is the chief aim of the trials. But the strategy does not stop there. There are indications that the government is trying to strike at the powerful General Drivers' Union, Local 544. The St. Paul Pioneer Press reported, "Activity of 'higher-ups' in Local 544 during the WPA strike is being investigated by the federal grand jury." And the Minneapolis Tribune noted, "Witnesses who told about union operations in connection with the strike spent more time in the jury room than did those who told of interference with workers." The government seems to be interested in Local 544 for two reasons: (1) 544 organized the Minneapolis unemployed and supplies them with extremely competent leadership, and (2) the leaders of the local have played the chief role in the conversion, since 1935, of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters from a craft union of some 60,000 members into a semi-industrial union of 400,000 members, with contracts covering all over-the-road truck drivers in eleven Middle Western states. The existence of such a huge body of militant union members in so strategic an industry as trucking is a real threat to the New Deal's current plans for war-time "coordination" of unions, particularly when the union is politically as antagonistic to the Administration as is 544.

What of the future? Judge Joyce is due back in Minneapolis on February 10 for the fourth trial. President Roosevelt seems to be determined to go on with the trials. When the subject was brought up at his press conference on December 12, he reiterated his prohibition of "strikes against the government" and added that WPA workers not only may not strike but must also be careful not to "create a disturbance or disrupt the peace." Through the Minneapolis prosecutions Roosevelt is serving notice on WPA workers that they had better take quietly and submissively the pay cuts and decreased appropriations the future holds in store for them if they want to keep out of the federal penitentiary.

War on the Short Wave

BY HENRY B. KRANZ

FOR twenty-four hours every day since September 1 scores of short-wave stations have filled the air with sound. From London and Berlin, from Paris and Moscow come salvos of accusation and hate, of lies and vilification. To the military, economic, and diplomatic war fronts has been added a fourth—that of radio propaganda.

This front has already found its war correspondent—the short-wave monitor. He sits in the listening room of a broadcasting company, with the loud-speaker on the ceiling connected with a short-wave receiving station. His ear roves the ether while his hand makes notes. When he strikes an important item, he passes it along to the news commentators.

As a correspondent of this new type, I hear about half a million words a week—brightly colored news broadcasts, propaganda speeches, the clamor of politicians, speeches addressed to countrymen in enemy camps. I hear kings and statesmen, officers and privates, scientists, artists, workers—all possessed by a sense of the righteousness of their cause. I listen to a different station every fifteen minutes, returning to each in succession from five to ten times a day to get a panoramic picture of the methods and goals of the forces on this front. Often a strange voice will bring an exciting piece of news—a battle in the air, a ship sunk—hours before it comes over the ticker of the news agency. It was a correspondent in the radio war who first gave America the news of the signing of the Soviet-German pact and first announced the Russian advance into Poland.

Reichssender Berlin, the official German broadcasting service, with six stations speaking in ten languages to all corners of the earth, and the British Broadcasting Corporation of London, with nine stations sending out fifteen-minute news bulletins in seventeen languages no fewer than forty-nine times a day, are the most active. England and Germany not only compete for the attention of millions of listeners in enemy territory and neutral countries but also carry on a running debate with each other. Berlin's radio salvos are the more booming and insistent, especially when given in German for the benefit of the fifteen million Germans outside the Reich. London is fairly mild except when it is urging the malcontents in the Third Reich to rise and throw off the Nazi yoke. (I have heard that two exiled Viennese actors are the voices of these broadcasts.)

In English and other foreign languages Berlin is much more moderate. "Lord Haw-Haw," an announcer with an Oxford accent whose identity is a puzzle to the British, attempts to ape the milder English tone. Completely different techniques are used by the same broadcaster, depending on the audience he has in mind. Many stories told in German transmissions are not given in English. They would sound too gory and blatantly propagandistic. Broadcasts in English for America and in Afrikaans for the Boers of South Africa are expressed in much more vigorous language. All German broadcasts end with the stubborn battle-cry: "Germany fights for the removal of an injustice, the others for its continuation." The theme of all German stations is, Am deutschen Wesen wird die Welt genesen (the spirit of Germany will cure the world).

In the daily schedule of a Berlin station approximately four hours are given to reports in various languages of the latest events in the war. These are embroidered with partisan comments and with quotations from native and neutral papers. Three hours are used for announcements which are actually disguised propaganda: discontent is increasing among the British laboring class; wives of soldiers get only half as much support in the British Empire and France as in Germany; the submarine and mine campaigns are so successful that soon England will have no food or raw materials; the Scandinavian countries and Belgium are cooling toward the Allies; according to the Paris Jour French soldiers have no shoes; there is unrest in India (an Indian physician is brought to the microphone to tell the world of the horrid destruction perpetrated by the British in his homeland) and also in Palestine and South Africa; the dominions are groaning audibly under their war burdens. Included for contrast are reports on the quiet and order in Bohemia and the purposeful reconstruction work in Poland. The British blockade is asserted to be a complete failure; we hear a child tell how you can get everything your heart desires in Germany—butter, milk, meat. (But a few hours later a speaker may thunder about the ruthless hunger-war the Allies are waging against German women and children.)

Intimate views of the war and home fronts are put on the air two or three times a day. The microphone visits a submarine dock. It interviews officers of the army and navy who have covered themselves with glory. It visits a camp for Hitler Girls, or reports a conversation with an English woman who is joyously astonished at the peace and order in Berlin, the lights and laughter, the theaters sold out, the stores crammed with the most magnificent goods. "You can see," cries the Berlin radio, "that the blockade is a complete failure. Germany already rules the waves. And Russia will send us everything we need."

More time, from four to six hours a day, is given to out-and-out propaganda, chiefly savage assaults on the British Empire. The English have long been set on dismembering Germany, which is fighting only for its existence; Chamberlain owns thousands of shares of war-industries stocks; Churchill is "world famous for his lies and boasts"; Eden is "known for his good tailor and his poor speeches."

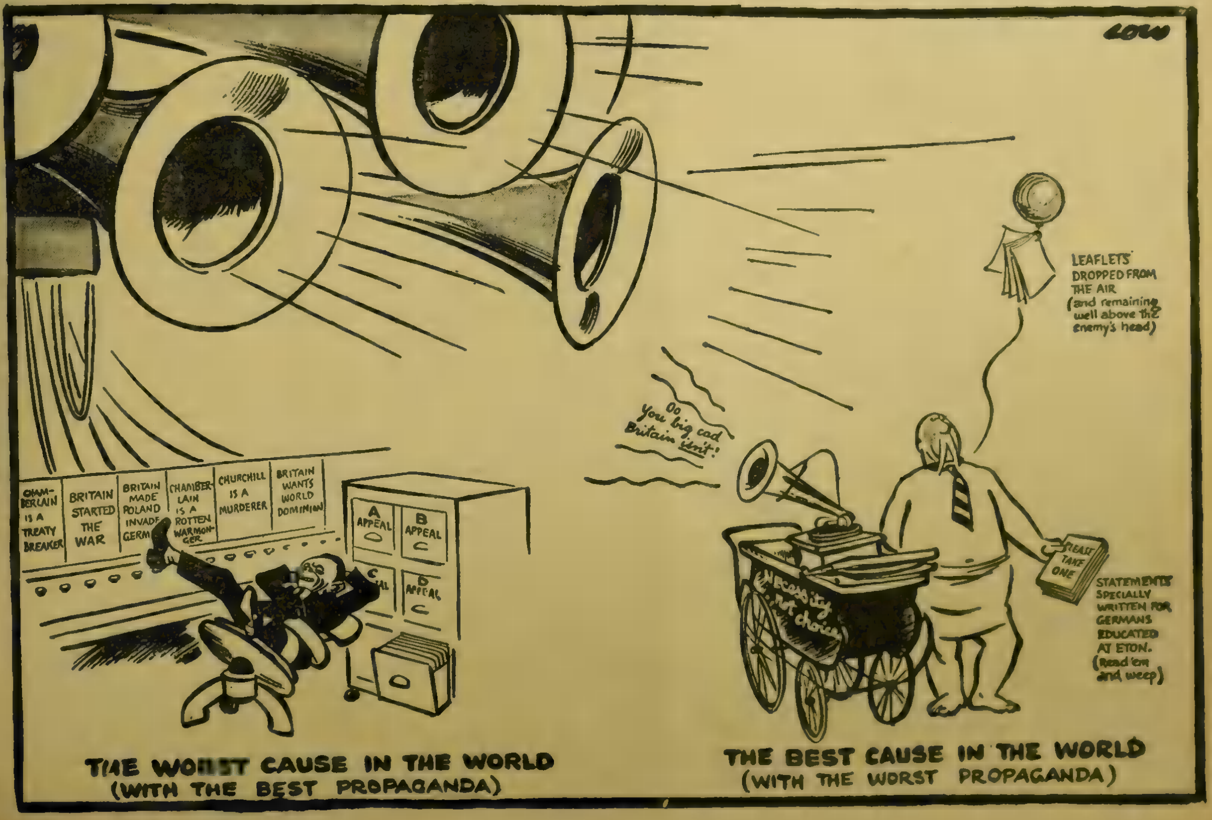
"We are desperately fighting the Jewish-plutocratic spirit of England," is Berlin's newest line. Every week a new supply of mutilated German corpses is found in Bromberg and Posen, evidence of the "inhuman brutality" and the "low level" of the Poles. Polish Jews are pictured as "the scum of humanity, filthy, verminous, and crawling"—probably in a report by a "soldier just returned from the Polish front." The Jews in England and France, the brothers of these Polish Jews, are the real "war-inciters." Coughlin's Social Justice is quoted to show that this war was cooked up by the Jews, who were also responsible for the attempt on Hitler's life in Munich. That the American embargo on the sale of arms was lifted through the efforts of the Jews is clear, avers Berlin, from the remark of the Jewish banker, Baruch: "Why shouldn't we sell arms to the Allies? If we don't, others will."

Again and again the German radio paints the French poilu as a poor devil who is picking the chestnuts out of the fire for the British Tommy. "England expects every Frenchmen to do his duty," it shouts. "We have no grudge against France. Doesn't France realize that it is fighting for the benefit of the plutocratic Jewish gentlemen of the London Stock Exchange?" The Führer asks nothing more than their rightful place in the sun for his eighty million people. England, with forty million people, rules a fifth of the world's surface, and "we Germans, the most capable and industrious people on earth, have not enough to eat." "We did not want the war, it was forced upon us, and we did not want to go to war against Poland either."

Bernard Shaw's utterances are quoted in support. Or perhaps a reference is made to the Berlin correspondent of the Rome Tribuna, who reports that the simplest man on the street in Germany knows that England is waging this war against the entire German people, not just against Hitler. Hungarian, Spanish, Belgian, and Japanese papers are drawn upon, but the favorite sources of confirmation are the Russian and Italian press. Hugh Johnson, Lindbergh, and Ford are often quoted a few hours after publication. Statements by H. G. Wells and G. K. Chesterton are exhumed from their books to prove that the English have always been hypocrites, shopkeepers, and aspirants for world domination. The "narrow circle of British Jewish-plutocratic capitalists" and the British Intelligence Service are blamed for all sorts of things: for explosions in Rumanian oil fields and Yugoslav factories, for the murder of the Rumanian Premier, Calinescu, and for the Bromberg massacres.

Three times a week, at 2:15 and 6:15, New York time, one can hear the voice of the editor-in-chief of the Berlin station, Hans Fritsche, speaking for fifteen minutes on the events of the past few days. He passes for a Berlin counterpart of Noel Coward. Here are samples from his speeches: "Too bad that television isn't further advanced, so that I could let you see a few of the pictures that appeared in the Berliner Illustrierte. In England pictures like these would be stored in an armored safe with two guards before it. They are photographs by our fliers who recently paid a visit to England: shots of the Thames estuary, the London docks, the Firth of Forth. If I were an Englishman and saw these pictures I'd break out in goose-pimples that didn't come from the lack of wood in the fireplace. . . . Lately the B. B. C. took up an old idea and reported that discussion of a tunnel under the Channel had been resumed. We can understand that. Didn't a Danish trade delegation to England make a detour through Switzerland, instead of going by water? The neutrals already know that the road to England is the road to death. . . . After we spoke of the 'winged eagle,' the well-known symbol of the German air force, we heard B. B. C., to our astonishment, oppose the British falcon to the German eagle. It seems that the eagle gave the lion such a pecking and plucking that English propaganda has abandoned the lion for good. They did it on purpose, people tell us, because the falcon is a much nobler animal than the eagle. We merely remark that the falcon has been known to eat doves for dessert. Shame, shame, falcon, is that democratic?"

Berlin has for some time been using the following trick to attract listeners. A musical program is announced, perhaps a series of waltzes. But after the second piece one hears a voice saying, "The richest country with the poorest population, England, is fighting the poorest country with the happiest people, Germany." Then another waltz is played. And in the next intermission one hears, "Germany is the most peace-loving country on earth. In the last three centuries England has waged 144 campaigns, France 89, but Germany only 39, of which 14 were against Austria and 16 against Bavaria, to establish the unity of the Reich." London countered with a better trick to bring German listeners to their radios in spite of the imminent danger of the concentration camp, beginning its broadcasts with the announcement of the names of from six to ten German fliers or sailors in English prison camps. It assumed that no worried mother or



LOW
CHAMBERLAIN IS A TREATY BREAKER
BRITAIN STARTED THE WAR
BRITAIN MADE POLAND INVADE GERM
CHAMBERLAIN IS A ROTTEN WARMONGER
CHURCHILL IS A MURDERER
BRITAIN WANTS WORLD DOMINION
A APPEAL
B APPEAL
C AL
D APPEAL
Oo You big cad Britain isn't!
LEAFLETS DROPPED FROM THE AIR (and remaining well above the enemy's head)
Necessity not choice
PLEASE TAKE ONE
STATEMENTS SPECIALLY WRITTEN FOR GERMANS EDUCATED AT ETON. (Read 'em and weep)
THE WORST CAUSE IN THE WORLD (WITH THE BEST PROPAGANDA)
THE BEST CAUSE IN THE WORLD (WITH THE WORST PROPAGANDA)

wife, eager for news of this kind, would let herself be frightened away from the radio by the Gestapo.

London exploits the Nazi ban on listening to foreign broadcasts. "Your leaders have told you that you are not to listen to foreign broadcasts because they are bad for your nerves. But it is your memory and thoughts they are afraid of. We in England have no fear of the truth. Our papers even publish the daily programs of the German short-wave stations. But ten of your people have already been condemned to long prison sentences for listening to our talks."

The Overseas Service of the B. B. C., like the German stations, carries on a campaign of attack and vindication. It makes daily assaults on Hitler and his "henchmen." "They have made themselves rich and sent millions out to neutral countries while the people go hungry. They have robbed you of every liberty, turned you into slaves without freedom of speech or freedom to work. . . . Hitler has always lied to you. He said that he was persecuting the Communists to save Europe from Bolshevism, and he allied himself to Stalin. He declared that he wanted a racially pure Germany, and now he is ruling Czechs and Poles. He solemnly declared that Poland was his good friend. You have seen how he kept his word. And you can read what he thinks of you in 'Mein Kampf.' In it he says, 'The great mass of the people believe a big lie quicker than they will a small one.' " It often plays a few sentences from a phonograph transcription of a speech by Hitler or Goebbels or Hess, and then adds the comment, "His words are not worth the paper they are written on or the air into which they were bellowed." I consider this method of direct refutation one of the most telling techniques of the radio propaganda war. A quotation from "Mein Kampf," always with a mention of the exact page, followed by an excerpt from a later speech of Hitler's has a dramatic and convincing effect.

The Nazis always insist that they are fighting for their lives because their enemies "want to dismember Germany." London's view of where the war guilt lies is very different: "We always want peace. But we were tired of mobilizing every few months because Hitler had overrun another helpless little country. England does not want world empire; it is prepared to give all its dominions and colonies independence when the time is ripe. But Hitler stole every vestige of national self-determination from Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland." To substantiate such attacks, it broadcasts daily reports which may be classed as "disguised propaganda"—accounts of massacres in Poland and of unrest in Austria and Bohemia (these are always immediately labeled lying reports by Berlin). It repeats little stories to show what hard times the Germans are experiencing. A professor in Switzerland received a letter from a friend in Berlin which said: "My dear friend. Don't on any account believe that we have not enough to eat here. Our food is at least as good as what you get at the St. Antoine Hotel in Geneva." And London adds, "The German censor did not know that St. Antoine is a Geneva prison."

London has learned much about propaganda from the Nazis. The B. B. C. gives not only the news but newspaper comment from all over the world. (Of the American press, the New York Times, Herald Tribune, and Post and The Nation are often cited. Among the favorite writers are Dorothy Thompson, Oswald Garrison Villard, and Ludwig Lore.) A moving report of the tearful farewells of the Baltic Germans may be followed by an appeal to German workers, in German, by a Labor Party leader: "Isn't it amusing to listen to what Goebbels has to say since Ribbentrop had a champagne banquet with Stalin in the Kremlin under Lenin's picture? Now the Nazi watchword is 'Down with Capitalism.' Before it was 'Down with Socialism.' The truth is that the National Socialists are neither Nationalists nor Socialists. Our message to you is, We are fighting not only the brown Bolshevik but also for your freedom."

The German army is incited to revolt, now by a French, now by an English veteran of 1914: "They have dismissed or shot down your most able generals. Can you be sure that Brauchitsch still believes in Hitler?" A joke is made of the accusations with regard to the Munich bombing. "So we English are supposed to have done it. Perhaps they will dig Churchill's cigar ashes or Chamberlain's umbrella out of the ruins, as evidence against us." Of the submarine and mine campaign a speaker says, "The extent of Hitler worship can be seen in a Christmas article in Göring's paper, the Essener Nationalzeitung. It declares that 'the Führer is to the German people what Jesus was to the world two thousand years ago. The Führer is the Messiah sent to liberate the German people from slavery.' And what do the assistants of this Messiah do? On Christmas night they torpedo the steamer Stanholme without warning, just as the crew is celebrating Christmas below decks—one of the most gruesome acts of this war." Recently London has made the distinction between Hitler and Germany less often. It indicates more and more emphatically that the economic resources of the great British Empire are inexhaustible, that Germany is cut off from all the world, and that Russian help will never come.

The Berlin radio, in accordance with the German nature, affords only a meager amount of humor. However, there is a comic called Charlie who gives a one-man show in English every Wednesday night. He specializes in topical parodies on American popular songs. "I can't give you anything but love, baby," will be changed by him to Chamberlain singing to a German child, "I can't give you anything to eat, baby." Every Saturday there are a few rhymed verses on current events by the "week-end poet," but they are dull and humorless. The best humor comes from the American Fred Kaltenbach, of Waterloo, Iowa. Every Monday night he addresses "dear Harry" and "the folks back home," all of whom, investigation has proved, are greatly annoyed by his attentions. He is a former member of the American Legion and his wife is a former secretary of Göring's. He warns the United States against entering the war: "Will England or France pay? Did they pay for the last war?" And he goes on, "Talking about Christmas, I want to make a few belated presents: to Chamberlain I want to give a new umbrella, to be opened whenever one of these German planes flies over London, so he won't be recognized. To Halifax, a brand-new iron halo, with adjustable supporters, to be worn either inside or outside his derby. He has earned it as the British heavyweight champion of international morals. To Churchill, past master of the seas, a packet of invisible paint for his ships; and an out-size foghorn for the Ministry of Information, plus a medal for deceiving the English people about the number of sunken ships."

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

What is the effect of these battles on the radio front? The question is hard to answer because we cannot count the number of listeners or learn their reactions to what they hear. But their interest is revealed by the vast and growing use of short-wave sets throughout the world. While they are prohibited in Japan, short-wave facilities are almost universally owned by radio listeners in Argentina, Bulgaria, Costa Rica, Cuba, Honduras, Netherland Indies, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, Norway, Portugal, and Rumania; and they are achieving widespread popularity in Bermuda, Belgium, Brazil, British India, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Greece, Guatemala, Hongkong, Mexico, Palestine, Peru, Sweden, Switzerland, South Africa, Uruguay, and Yugoslavia. Recent arrivals from Germany and Austria tell me that "everyone"—excluding the Jews, who have no radios—listens eagerly to the B. B. C. broadcasts. In the last war, German propagandists admit, active propaganda was able to shatter German morale and make it ripe for collapse. Its effect on neutrals was also great. In the last war there was no radio propaganda.

Slumming with Zanuck

BY MICHEL MOK

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord;
He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored . . .
—"The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

MINE eyes have seen the glory of the coruscating assemblage that attended the private preview of Darryl F. Zanuck's film version of John Steinbeck's "The Grapes of Wrath" at the Normandie Theater in New York.

Mine eyes were dazzled by the diamonds, the sapphires and emeralds, the silks and satins, the sables, ermine, and fox of the lovely ladies who, on the arms of tailed-and-toppered escorts, swept into the lobby of the little picture house in East Fifty-third Street. Dressed in bibs and tuckers from the ateliers of Mainbocher and Molineux, the gals from Park Avenue came in gleaming limousines with their men-about-town to take a peek at the raggedy Joads and the miseries of their jaloppy migration.

Among the freshly pressed and perfumed pilgrims there were such Blue Book, Broadway, and Beverly Hills magnificos as the W. Averell Harrimans, the Theodore Roosevelts, the Sonny Whitneys, the William Paleys, the Gilbert Millers, the Irving Berlins, and Miss Hedy Lamarr, the "Ecstasy" lass, fully clothed for this occasion in pink satin and three or four feet of diamond necklace. Many of the women, in addition to baubles that would buy sizable farms, wore bunches of orchids the cost of which might have kept the Joads in sidemeat for a year; the plump torso of Miss Jane Darwell, the actress who plays Ma Joad in the picture, was covered with the blooms from chin to waist.

The preview was scheduled to start at 8.30. At 8.45 Mr. Zanuck himself arrived with Miss Dorothy Lamour, the whilom siren of the sarong. By that time the theater was filled with a swanky, glittering, noisily chattering, neck-craning, hand-waving crowd. Photographers dashed up and down the aisles, snapping the members of that small group of personages whose faces provide a never-failing treat for city editors' eyes. Only another dozen camera men and the strains of the Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde" would have been needed to turn the scene into a duplicate of a Metropolitan Opera opening.

Three rows in the parquet were occupied by officers and directors of the Chase National Bank and their ladies. The Chase National controls Twentieth Century-Fox, which produced the picture, and by an odd coincidence it is also one of the Eastern financial institutions, along with the Irving and Manufacturers' Trust companies and the National City and Central Hanover banks, which control the Western land companies that tractored the Joads, and thousands like them, off their farms.

The presence of the Chase National gentlemen and their resplendent women furnished a graphic and enlightening demonstration of the virtues of our system of free competition and individual enterprise without too much government interference or regulation. Here they were, having added greatly to their wealth by taking possession of the lands of the Joads, and about to wax still richer from the profits of a dramatization of the agonies of those unfortunately stupid and shiftless people. The Chase National, its sleek officials seemed to say, can't lose; it gets 'em coming and going.

After a newsreel the Okie odyssey was finally unveiled. In the dark it was of course impossible to get a clue to the reactions of Mr. Zanuck's chichi guests, and that, perhaps, was just as well. Except for a smattering of applause from the balcony when the migrant farmers at the government camp foiled the deputies' scheme to break up their dance and a general polite round at the finish, the invited audience witnessed the picture in silence. The crowd on the lower floor returned to its limousines after Ma Joad had made her final speech: "Rich fellas come up an' they die, an' their kids ain't no good, an' they die out. But we keep a-comin'. We're the people that live. Can't nobody wipe us out. Can't nobody lick us. We'll go on forever. We're the people."

Well, maybe so. Meanwhile, the Park Avenue gals and their escorts drove to Fefe's Monte Carlo for a little champagne supper tossed by Mr. Zanuck. From the Dust Bowl to the flowing one—Glory, glory hallelujah!

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The Golden Tide

A LITTLE less than a year ago, in the first of these columns, I drew attention to the problems created by our huge hoard of gold and suggested that, as nothing was being done to remove the causes of our persistent accumulation of this metal, the capacity of the Treasury vaults would be subjected to further strain. When I wrote, our total holdings were approaching $15 billion; today they are nearing the $18 billion mark, representing over 60 per cent of the world's monetary gold. And now the questions raised by this concentration of gold in one country are beginning to seep into the public consciousness. Bankers are making speeches about it; newspapers are publishing editorials. Is there any way of reversing the golden tide? Is our mass of bullion a genuine asset? What would happen if other nations entirely abandoned the use of gold as money? Is there danger of inflation owing to the injection into our monetary system of an amount of gold which enormously exceeds any monetary needs?

The advent of the war has not made answers to these questions any easier. It has, indeed, dried up one spring which fed the golden stream, for British and French nationals are now prohibited from transferring capital to this country. On the other hand, if the war continues long, purchases of the Allies in this country are likely to exceed by an ever-widening margin the total of goods they sell to us. The difference will be paid by means of their investments in this country and by gold. Over 50 per cent of the world's annual gold output comes from the British Empire, whose mines are marking up new records annually. There seems little doubt that the whole of this gold production will reach our shores, and in addition there will be a steady draft on the still large reserves of Britain and France.

So long as the war lasts, any attempt to redistribute our surplus gold is out of the question. If the plans of the Administration for promoting Latin American trade mature, we may be able to divert a small part to the banking systems of our southern neighbors. But a general restoration of the international gold standard cannot be contemplated until the world is at peace, and even then it would require a fundamental change in our attitude toward foreign trade.

We could, of course, decide to stop swapping our goods for a metal whose future value is problematical, but we should have to be prepared for very disagreeable consequences. At this time the United States Treasury is the only agency in the world prepared to accept all gold offered at a fixed price—$35 per ounce. No other country is able or willing to take on the burden of pegging the price at anything like this figure, and the result of our withdrawal from the market would be to place gold in the position of an ordinary commodity with its value dependent on the demand for dental purposes, jewelry, and so on. Inevitably the price would fall, for at present only a fraction of the annual output of the metal is absorbed by industry and the arts. Consequently we could no longer pretend that our gold reserves were worth $35 an ounce and would have to write off billions from the figure at which they are entered in the national books. Actually this operation would not make any difference to our real wealth, nor would it necessitate a deflation of credit. But its psychological effect would almost certainly be disastrous, and it is improbable that any government would dare risk the experiment.

The war also imposes a barrier against checking the gold inflow in this manner. For by ceasing to accept gold for goods and depreciating its buying power everywhere we would cripple the economic strength of the Allies and present Hitler with an advantage worth twenty army corps. Indeed, it is hardly too much to say that we would automatically insure a German victory.

This point is well brought out by Frank D. Graham and Charles R. Whittlesey in "The Golden Avalanche" (Princeton University Press, $2.50), which is the best exposition of the causes and effects of the American gold problem yet published. Nevertheless, the authors propose a method of checking gold imports which, if employed during the war, would prove a severe handicap to the Allies. Their suggestion, briefly, is that the internal price of gold should be maintained at $35 per ounce, but a substantial tax should be placed on imports. As a result, the dollar purchasing power of foreign gold would be reduced and its production discouraged. Probably foreign currencies would depreciate in terms of dollars because their present relative stability is dependent on the regular shipment of gold to offset our continuously favorable balance of international payments. In this case American sales abroad would under normal circumstances be reduced, and imports into this country be facilitated. Under war conditions, however, the Allies' needs for American goods might be so urgent that they would be forced to maintain orders here regardless of price and in this case might be compelled to increase gold shipments in order to obtain the same sum in dollars as before.

With the majority of Americans fervently hoping for an Allied victory in the war, it is doubtful if any policy which would definitely lessen their chances can be regarded as practical politics. When peace comes, it will be more possible to consider Messrs. Graham and Whittlesey's proposals on their economic merits. Even then, in so far as they proved effective in achieving their object, they would be equivalent to a reduction in tariffs drastic enough to produce a steady excess of imports over exports. Such a change in our international trade is, indeed, absolutely essential if we are ever to transform our gold hoard into a live asset. But before it can occur we have to surrender many cherished illusions. We have to accept the fact that trade is an exchange of wealth and that the man who tries to be always a seller and never a buyer ends by bankrupting both himself and his customers. For long years we have followed the tariff rainbow, but now that the promised pot of gold is ours we find it a staggering burden and wonder how on earth we shall ever get rid of it.

[In my next article I shall discuss the possible dangers to our domestic economy arising from our excessive gold holdings, together with some recent proposals by leading bankers for dealing with the problem.—K. H.]

In the Wind

STUDENTS AT Kalamazoo (Michigan) Teachers' College recently translated "Romeo and Juliet" into French and forwarded the manuscript to their French instructor, who was on a Christmas vacation in the Bahama Islands. When the manuscript was returned to the students, they found that the British censor had deleted a number of lines—in particular, all references to a "feud" or an "enemy."

SHORTLY AFTER the FBI exposure of the Christian Front plot and Coughlin's hasty disavowal of the Front, the editor of a well-known magazine had a private conversation with one of the Front leaders. "It looks as though Coughlin was running out on you," said the editor. "No, he won't do that," was the confident reply; "if he doesn't defend us we know enough about him to finish him—and we've told him so." Two days later Coughlin publicly changed his mind and embraced the Front again.

ANTI-NAZI DRAMA: Three men were sitting at a table in a Berlin cafe. One was reading a newspaper while the others talked. Suddenly the newspaper reader stopped, pointed excitedly to an article, and passed the paper on without saying anything. The second man looked at it, gasped, wrung his hands, but also said nothing. The third man jumped to his feet, exclaiming, "If you fellows are going to talk politics I'm leaving."

COLUMNIST ELEANOR ROOSEVELT recently ended her column with an appeal for help for Spanish refugees. Roy Howard's New York World-Telegram omitted the appeal. A few days later Mrs. Roosevelt asked for financial aid to Finland. This time her column was not cut.

THE REPORT that the arrested Christian Fronters stole arms and munitions from a United States army base was headlined in the Boston Post: "Trace Reds' Powder to Army Base." . . . The Chicago Daily News carried this headline on a recent column by Westbrook Pegler: "Pegler Urges Less Thinking at U. of C." . . . In the continuation head on an account of protests against exports of war materials to foreign countries, the New York Times blundered: "War Experts Held a Peril to Defense."

NEXT TO MANNERHEIM, the chief target of Soviet attacks on the Finnish government is Väinö Tanner, who has also been bitterly assailed in the Communist press throughout the world. It is not widely known that in 1937 Tanner was recommended for the presidency of the Finnish republic in a manifesto circulated throughout Finland. The manifesto was signed by Otto Kuusinen, new premier of the Russian-inspired Finnish "republic."

NAZI PROPAGANDA flooding the United States mails is still unbelievably crude. The latest "scoop" in the propaganda bulletin "News from Germany" is the tale that "Thomas Mann, the author and Czech citizen, has been interned by the British authorities." The story is attributed to "British newspapers." As most Americans know, Thomas Mann is right here—lecturing to American audiences.

ELMER RICE, the playwright, was telling friends recently of his only meeting with the late Congressman Sirovich. Sam Goldwyn was also present, and Sirovich was speaking to the two of them about the influx of Nazi agents into the United States. Goldwyn listened attentively; when Sirovich finished he shouted approvingly: "By God, you're right, it's terrible—this country is loaded to the hills with them."

A GOOD MANY years ago, before he had achieved worldwide recognition, Paul Robeson was invited to a dinner at a fashionable New York club. When he arrived he found that because he was a Negro he had to eat in a private room. Recently the same club invited world-famous Paul Robeson to another dinner at which he was to be one of the guests of honor. Robeson formally accepted the invitation—and carefully failed to show up.

ONE OF THE foreign lecturers who have been reciting pro-German doctrine to American audiences starts with a fatal handicap. His name, actually, is Baron Münchhausen.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. The $5 prize for the best item submitted in January goes to R. S. of Kalamazoo, Mich., for the first item printed above.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

If This Be Treason—

I AM guilty of another crime—at least so I am told. I had thought there wasn't another in all the category of wrongdoing which could possibly be attributed to me of which I had not already been declared guilty by somebody. Now it appears that I have sold out to the British, that I have been taken into camp by them—all because I have been praised and flattered for having published in London a certain article that gave pleasure to large numbers of people. Some warm friends have told me that I have become "much too friendly" to the British and have asked what the reason is.

Well, here is my explanation. In the first place, I have been in Germany and seen the Nazis in their stronghold, and after that I am prepared to embrace the Patagonians. In the next place, having something that might be described as human sympathy and perhaps even understanding of people, I was profoundly moved by the bearing of the British masses when the war came. I was in England at the time. My emotions were stirred. Why should they not have been, and why should I not have expressed those emotions on leaving the country. The words of mine that appealed to many persons were in praise of the plain people who are England. I said that there would always be with me hereafter "the quiet faces of those without uniforms, without titles, the plain people who carry on; who have nothing—yet if they have sons everything—to lose; who must pay and pay and pay, for these are England—the England that must be made free of war, free of fear, free of injustice—for them after the war must be built the England that is to come, better and finer than ever before." If that spells surrendering to the powers that be in Great Britain, to the specially privileged, I must indeed plead guilty to having been taken into camp.

Of course I have not changed my pacifist position. Of course I have not taken back one word of the many criticisms that I have written in past decades about British imperialism. I am just as much aware that the British Empire was built up by wholesale piracy, by the theft of lands, by cruel and unceasing wars. I said freely in England that this war was the result of a contest between idiocy on one hand and insanity on the other; that I thought 40 per cent of the blame for it rested squarely upon the last three British Prime Ministers. But all that is now over the dam. Whether they wished it or not, and many of them did not wish it, the rulers of England have actually come to occupy a position where they are defending everything that is decent in the life of nations. Naturally, since the war is here, is going on, I want with all my heart to have the Allies win—I am as much concerned for the future of France as for that of England. That does not mean that I therefore condone all the sins of the past, that I can excuse the incredible stupidities of British foreign policy at Versailles, and after, or that I no longer desire peace. It does mean that I think that everything that is honorable and possible should be done to save the British people from the threatened results of their leaders' mistakes.

Can any good come out of this war? I have never believed that any good can come out of war beyond temporary relief. It would be a fine momentary gain to purge Germany of the present government and to reconstruct a Czech and a Polish state. But, as I have said before, the real sanitation of Germany, the cleansing of the land of the horrible sins of which its rulers have been guilty since Hitler rose to power, must come from within. Only the Germans can do away with the Nazis and their totalitarian state. If, as so many people believe, this war is but one phase of a world-wide proletarian revolution, even that may not be accomplished. We tried purging Germany of militarism in 1917-18, and we know just what we got. At least we knew then that there were liberal forces in Germany to which the Kaiser's government might yield its power. We have no such assurance today; Hitler has destroyed them. And because resort has been had to war, England is risking everything upon the outcome of a struggle which may be lost by the blunder of a single general, as the Germans lost the Battle of the Marne, or of a single admiral, or of a war minister.

But the faces of those quiet English people continue to come back to me; they are my chief concern. It was not they who set up concentration camps in South Africa; nor was it their grandfathers who instigated the opium war in China. I feel akin to them since half of my ancestry is purely British. They have their faults, heaven knows; they still have their caste system, their lords and ladies. They have not yet seen to it that full justice is done to Ireland. Still, these are the people whom I would do anything—short of war—to help preserve. If this be treason, if this means that I have been purchased by the friendliness of my treatment in England, please make the most of it.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

THE first part of "The Censor Marches On" by Morris Ernst and Alexander Lindey (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50) arouses a positive nostalgia for that age of innocence ten and fifteen years ago when obscenity was a major issue. Then the word "totalitarian" hadn't been invented, Sumner, not Goebbels, was the name for censorship, and one of the compensations of returning from France was getting a blue-backed copy of "Ulysses" through the customs.

The old pattern of censorship was relatively simple. It was an attack from without—by a professional obscenity hunter, a customs official who had never heard of Michelangelo, or a post-office inspector on an off day. To be sure, the Sumners often won their cases by default through the simple device of picking on a bookseller who could not afford to fight or by bringing pressure to bear on public officials. But at least there was a chance of bringing the matter into court, where it could be subjected to public ridicule and judicial examination. When a few publishers decided to make a fight, they found judges with intelligence and a sense of humor who interpreted antiquated laws in such a way as to offset their more stupid provisions. The possible effect of a book on a child or an idiot is no longer the legal test of obscenity; classics and books of recognized literary merit have won immunity; a book must be judged in its entirety, not on the basis of isolated passages. The dissemination of birth-control information has become relatively free. The old laws remain on the statute books and should be repealed, but judicial interpretation plus nullification by a public opinion which is not so easily shocked as it once was have made the work of snoopers much harder.

Today, however, we are confronted with a new pattern of formal censorship which is more dangerous and harder to deal with for the simple reason that it is imposed from within. And this new kind of censorship, which, like all censorship, has come to have an increasingly political tinge, is in operation in the two industries in position to influence the largest sectors of mass opinion, the movies and the radio.

When the bill establishing motion-picture censorship in New York State was introduced in the legislature, some of the producers in California decided it must be fought. They sent a representative to New York to rally the support of exhibitors. But the exhibitors were not interested. On the contrary they wanted pre-censorship as protection against possible charges of violation of the already existing obscenity statute. Today the whole industry operates under the Motion Picture Code, which exercises a complete pre-censorship all the more drastic for being self-imposed. The radio industry also recently adopted a code. Whether it will follow the course of the movie industry in the direction of caution and more caution remains to be seen. As part of big business it is not likely to go out of its way to be hospitable to political opinion unfriendly to the status quo; and since the Federal Communications Commission has the power to allocate wave lengths and since the industry fears federal censorship, it seems more than likely that it will follow Hollywood's example. Nor will it be any less susceptible to the pressure of such groups as the Catholic church. (One of the framers of the movie code is reported to have been the Reverend Daniel A. Lord, S. J.) Neither the movie code nor the radio code is likely to come into court for judicial scrutiny, and it is difficult to make a burning public issue of censorship that is self-imposed.

"The Censor Marches On" makes lively reading, if only for the amusing views it provides of the minds of censors from Sumner to Will Hays; and it is an indispensable handbook for anyone interested in the workings of censorship That should be everyone. At the moment Americans are likely to be a little smug about their freedom of expression because the contrast between totalitarian nations and the United States in this respect is so vivid. This book is a timely reminder that the censor never sleeps, and that eternal vigilance, preferably with a little action thrown in, continues to be the price of liberty.

An exiled German writer is my authority for the latest story of the never-never land of the Motion Picture Code. He was engaged, after long negotiations and flying trips to Hollywood, to adapt "The Case of Sergeant Grischa" for the screen. Finally he found himself one morning actually at work. He had a three-hour conference with the manager of production. Before lunch he received a slip of paper asking him to come to Projection Room Number 8. He spent the afternoon in Number 8 looking at an old silent version of Don Juan. It was rather amusing, and though he was impatient he followed instructions and saw it through. Then he asked why he had been summoned. He was told that Grischa had been canceled and that it had been proposed that he do instead a talking version of Don Juan with Errol Flynn in the leading role. Hollywood, it seems, has discovered that pictures which do more than entertain don't pay except in cities like New York. And at least one German writer is twice a refugee, from Hitler and from Hollywood.

Harold Ickes deals with freedom of speech in another sector, the press, which exercises its own informal brand of censorship. He opens his book, "America's House of Lords" (Harcourt, Brace, $1.50), by reprinting the seven rules of conduct adopted in 1923 by the American Society of Newspaper Editors. He then measures the press by its own yardstick. And he could not have found a better stick with which to beat the publishers than this one of their own devising. Indeed, at the end one wonders why newspaper editors in convention assembled insist on turning out codes of ethics so nicely designed for the use of their critics. The answer is of course that editors in convention assembled are different from editors confronted with specific issues and pressures in the privacy of their own offices, and that high-powered spokesmen for the publishing business like Elisha Hanson operate on the principle that if the press talks often and loudly enough about ethics the public tends to take the word for the deed; finally, as long as the publishers control freedom of speech in the newspapers their critics won't get much of a press anyway.

Mr. Ickes analyzes the economics of the newspaper industry, its role as part and partner of big business; he discusses the rise of chains, the effect of advertising on a press which depends on its advertisers rather than its readers for financial support, and the development of radio as a rival of the press both as advertising and news medium. He points out that the radio serves as a check on the press and quotes President Roosevelt: "In some communities it is an unhappy fact that only through the radio is it possible to overtake proclaimed untruths or greatly exaggerated half-truths." This device is open to the President of the United States; it is not open to labor, which has little access to that freedom of the press the publishers are so pious about, though labor comprises a large section of the public opinion to which Elisha Hanson is always appealing. Publishers, as Mr. Ickes points out, are on the whole unfriendly to labor, first because they represent big business, and second because the press itself is a large employer of labor. The press is therefore allergic to the truth about strikes but has plenty of space for attacks on the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. Ickes devotes some thirty pages to the Chicago Tribune. Few would dispute its selection by the Washington correspondents as the "least fair and reliable" of our newspapers, especially after reading this account by an old Chicago hand. In another chapter he pays his respects to columnists. His book does not reveal any startling new facts; but in a little more than two hundred pages Mr. Ickes has brought together from reliable sources the pertinent facts about the American press which its readers should know. It is written with his usual gusto, but he gives credit where credit is due, and in my opinion his case is not overstated. It is a pretty damning case. MARGARET MARSHALL

The Muse at the Microphone

AIR RAID: A VERSE PLAY FOR RADIO. By Archibald MacLeish. Harcourt, Brace and Company. 75 cents.

AMERICA WAS PROMISES. By Archibald MacLeish. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. 75 cents.

"THE situation of radio is the situation of poetry backwards. If poetry is an art without an audience, radio is an audience without an art." So Archibald MacLeish wrote to James Angleton in a letter published last summer in Furioso. For a poet to allow his lines to be printed on so small a scale as that provided by the magazines of verse is to look for few readers or none. He is certain to find there no reader but himself. The audience which rightfully belongs to poetry and which surely can be brought to listen to simple, sensuous, and passionate speech is elsewhere. "Air Raid" is addressed to that immense audience which nightly hears the news broadcast. It presents through commentary and scene an imaginary event, but one all too probable in the contemporary world, the bombing of a hill town on the border of an unnamed country, the massacre of women and children. It is not quite accurate to call it, as has been done, a verse play for radio. Rather, it is the poetic equivalent of a report from the scene of a catastrophe.

T. S. Eliot wrote long ago, in his essay on The Possibilities of a Poetic Drama, of the advantage to the poet who wishes to reach a large audience of taking over an existing form, not merely because it was there, ready for his use, but because his audience has already accepted its conventions. "To have, given into one's hands, a crude form, capable of indefinite refinement, and to be the person to see the possibilities"—no words could better describe than Eliot's the fortunate position in which MacLeish found himself writing "Air Raid." His Announcer does nothing that any announcer might not do. At the same time, he is subtly translated in such a way that he carries out the part of the Messenger in a Greek play. The women from the tenement of the town are now heard singly and now they combine into a Chorus. They, too, do nothing strange. But to his form MacLeish has brought the consciousness of a poet. And having taken it from others, he has been able to concentrate almost the whole of his effort on finding an appropriate verse for the form.

For his verse there can be only praise. It is formal without being forced; it is elaborate and yet, if well spoken, should seem perfectly natural. It was, from all accounts, effective on the air. I have heard it only on the records. If it seems better read than heard, that is the fault, not of the poet, but of his players.

When war comes, it comes now to women. MacLeish has already said, in many of his poems, what he now allows one of his women in "Air Raid" to say, that life is more truly itself for them than it is for men. But they live unconsciously until told by a man what their lives are. The young woman lying beside her lover implores him to say that what they are living in that moment is happiness. "How can a woman know that the world is good? She can't tell. She can't and be a woman." But he only implores the moment to stay. Below in the courtyard the women chatter, neither knowing what is in store for them nor wanting to know. They are a nation without history, > the ancient nation

> Settled in the seasons of this earth as > Leaves are and oblivious as leaves.

It is against them—against life—that war now comes. And it comes by no apparent will of men. The Announcer says of the planes over the town:

> They move like tools not men;
> You'd say there were no men;
> You'd say they had no will but the
> Will of motor on metal . . .

The implications go beyond war. The enemy is mechanical, and the living are always its victims.

"Air Raid" is true. It is not tragic. For in taking consciousness away from his women the author has denied them the possibility of tragedy. Where there is no awareness, nothing is tragic. There is no one in the play who can both acknowledge and sustain defeat. So that, at the end, it is as depressing as a catastrophe. It is depressing as poetry has no right to be.

The conflict out of which all that is most moving in MacLeish's poetry has come is a conflict between silence and sound—between a sensuous sound and a spiritual silence. It is a conflict that lies at the heart of the age, and because this is so, MacLeish is a poet important to the age. For him the report of the senses has always been lively in the extreme. But they cannot prevent his asking the most pressing questions, and when no answer comes he knows he is in at a death of the spirit. He would deny that death if he could. He likes to end his poems on a question, for as long as his question is in the air, he can put off silence. In "America Was Promises" he attempts himself to supply an answer, to speak to Americans, as he believes the "speaking dead" would, were they, as he is, alive. But the answer when it comes fails to dissipate the silence. For all that it is delivered on a high pitch, it fails to convince us that what was once living is not now dead.

For this new poem MacLeish elaborates a form which he first worked out in "Public Speech." But public speech, even when made by a poet, demands ready solutions; it must point the way to action. But action is scarcely the way out of this conflict. It can be resolved, if at all, only through poetry.

JOHN PEALE BISHOP

Cycles and the System

BUSINESS CYCLES. By Joseph A. Schumpeter. McGraw-Hill Book Company. Two Volumes. $10.

PROFESSOR SCHUMPETER is preeminently an economists' economist. Following in the footsteps of a small but distinguished band of predecessors—one might mention Quesnay, Cournot, Walras, and Edgeworth as outstanding examples—he has written mainly for his scientific colleagues. His real influence consequently has been much more extensive than the general reading public is in a position to realize.

In a way this is inevitable, and Professor Schumpeter himself would doubtless be the last to complain. Yet it is open to a reviewer who disagrees with him on many points of fundamental importance to assert emphatically that his work deserves a much wider audience than it has yet reached, in this country at least. It is one of the many paradoxes of our present economic system that the worse it operates, the fewer really penetrating economists it seems able to produce. It is Professor Schumpeter's distinction to be one of a very few at a time when the system is working very badly.

"Business Cycles" is a somewhat misleading title for this comprehensive treatise. The subtitle, "A Theoretical, Historical, and Statistical Analysis of the Capitalist Process," comes somewhat nearer to indicating its true scope. But the careful reader will soon discover that the title is not capricious. For in Professor Schumpeter's view the business cycle is the inevitable form of capitalist development; and development, in turn, is the sine qua non of the capitalist system. In the absence of change, profit and interest would be wiped out by forces inherent in the system. Hence it follows that so far as the system possesses vitality it must also contain forces making for change. These forces consist primarily, though not exclusively, in technological innovation. But innovations are not introduced smoothly and continuously. In the nature of the case they come discontinuously and in clusters. The business cycle in its essence is nothing but the effect of the introduction and assimilation of these clusters of innovations.

In expounding this view of the capitalist process Professor Schumpeter makes use of two very important and closely related assumptions: (1) that innovations are typically financed through the creation of credit; and (2) that in each case they are introduced by a new firm and hence involve an act of net investment. Now it is possible to argue that these assumptions were borne out under nineteenth-century conditions but that in the latter-day economy of trusts they are no longer valid. There are reasons for believing that today innovations are predominantly financed out of depreciation quotas and furthermore that they tend on balance to displace labor. If this is so, they may not only involve no economic stimulus; they may actually operate to aggravate the problems of unemployment and depression so far as the great majority of the population is concerned. At the same time the widespread existence of monopoly may serve to preserve profits for the owners of a relatively few privileged corporations. Under these conditions no automatic decline or collapse of capitalism could be expected. Moreover, the introduction of innovations would not bring in its train the typical phenomena of the business cycle. This is not to affirm that such a system would be free from cycles. It does suggest, however, that a more general explanatory scheme than that put forward by Professor Schumpeter may be necessary if we are to avoid confining our theory to one particular phase of capitalist development.

It is possible that Professor Schumpeter would admit, perhaps even claim, that his theory is applicable primarily to pre-World War conditions; certainly he shows none of the orthodox economist's traditional weakness for constructing theories valid for all time and space. If so, there is not much to be said in criticism of the fundamental contour lines; they can be accepted with little reservation. At the same time, however, he should be willing to agree that his theory can, in principle at least, be subsumed under a more general theory applicable to the entire capitalist epoch.

On points of less importance there is, of course, bound to be disagreement. Here I shall mention just two such points. First, Professor Schumpeter's method of dealing with problems of money and total output seems to me to be less satisfactory than that of the Keynes school. I realize, however, that he would take strong exception to this view. Second, it seems to me that he draws too fine a line between "economic" phenomena on the one hand and "political" and "social" phenomena on the other. Methodologically and provisionally, any line can be drawn so long as it leads to useful results. But when a methodological scruple is carried over into substantive judgments on the course of events, scientific validity is sacrificed to theoretical purity. Capitalism is not only an economic process in the narrow sense, and to regard it as such, as Professor Schumpeter is inclined to do, inevitably leads to distorted judgments.

In spite of all reservations and criticisms, however, this remains one of the great economic treatises of recent years. Better than any economist since Marx, Professor Schumpeter has succeeded in viewing capitalism as essentially a transitional historical epoch with its own ethos and its own laws of development. He has brought to his work a wealth of learning and a keenness of insight which may well be the despair of lesser minds. Finally he has demonstrated once and for all the utter inadequacy of all merely "monetary" or "external" theories of the cycle.

"Business Cycles" is a great achievement by one of the half-dozen foremost economists of our time. No serious student of the problems which it treats can afford to neglect it.

PAUL M. SWEEZY

Mussolini's Battles

FASCIST ECONOMIC POLICY: AN ANALYSIS OF ITALY'S ECONOMIC EXPERIMENT. By William G. Welk. Harvard University Press. $4.

FASCIST ITALY. By William Ebenstein. American Book Company. $2.50.

PRICE CONTROL IN FASCIST ITALY. By Henry S. Miller. Columbia University Press. $2.

A BOOK entitled "Fascist Economic Policy" should be devoted to Fascist economic policy. But Dr. Welk gives over the first 155 pages of his book to a description of the origins of the Fascist movement and the political and administrative institutions of Fascism. In addition, he devotes an appendix of 176 pages to legal texts, most of which are concerned with the very machinery described in the first part of the book. To be sure, historical antecedents and political institutions cannot be ignored. But the author merely rehashes all the well-known slogans of "propaganda," adding an extravagant array of inaccuracies of his own.

No more than ninety pages deal with Fascist economic policy, and they, too, swarm with misstatements. For instance, on pages 160 and 220, the author credits the Fascist regime with having balanced the budget within its first two years. He should not have ignored the fact that the liabilities connected with the World War declined from 18.2 billion lire in 1921-22, the last pre-Fascist fiscal year, to 4.8 billions in 1922-23, the first Fascist fiscal year, and to 1.8 billions by 1925-26. With such a drop in liabilities the Fascist balancing of the budget represented no great heroic task. Moreover, the author should have pointed to the fact that the surpluses in the budgets from 1924-25 to 1929-30 were faked, as evidenced by the steady increase in the national debt, whether domestic or foreign, avowed or hidden, during those fiscal years. When speaking of the conversion of consols into redeemable bonds and vice versa, and of the loans which fill Italian financial history from 1934 onward, the author takes good care not to explain that conversions were never actually optional and loans never free. Thus, instead of stating that the government in 1935 "forced" the owner to reconvert consols into redeemable bonds, he writes that the government "agreed" to carry out that operation (p. 227), as if the owners of the bonds had required the government to do so. Again, on page 228, the author writes that in October, 1936, the government passed a decree "requiring" all owners of real estate to subscribe to a new loan. The correct word would be "forcing." On page 245, the author states that "millions of square miles of marshland" have been reclaimed under the dictatorship. The whole area of Italy does not exceed 120,000 square miles.

The author concludes that "while the leading economic policies adopted by the Fascist regime may have served to increase the country's economic independence and prestige, they cannot be said, so far at least, to have contributed to its economic advancement or to an increase in the economic well-being of the Italian people. Population growth, economic independence, and colonial expansion are being paid by the mass of the Italians through a lowered standard of living" (pp. 248-49). One may doubt whether Mussolini has increased Italy's prestige if by prestige one has to mean the respect which decent people feel for decent people and not the terror a gangster spreads around him.

In appraising the lowering in the standard of living of the Italians, the author accepts official Italian statistics on wages, cost of living, unemployment, etc., with the same candid faith with which a fundamentalist swallows all there is to be found in the Book of Jonah. Had he looked beyond official figures he would have reached a far more pessimistic conclusion than that which even official statistics cannot keep hidden.

Whoever turns from Dr. Welk's to Dr. Ebenstein's book will find all the information needed for a comprehensive and clear picture of political and economic developments in Italy since 1919. I believe I can affirm in all conscience that very few of the statements contained in this book could be challenged by those sharing Dr. Welk's point of view. I cannot quite understand, however, how a well-informed scholar like Dr. Ebenstein can have listed among the "indispensable" sources Mussolini's so-called "Autobiography." Mussolini himself let it be known that he never wrote a word of it, but that it was concocted by his brother Arnaldo and the former ambassador of the United States to Rome, Richard Washburn Child. The lies in this deliberate mystification were contributed by Arnaldo Mussolini and the inanities by Child.

Among Mussolini's infinite battles—the battle against bolshevism, the battle of wheat, the battle against birth control, the battle against unemployment, not to mention the battles against the Ethiopians and the Spaniards—the battle against the high cost of living deserved a doctoral dissertation. Dr. Miller has described with painstaking diligence the institutions created or utilized in Italy by the Fascist dictatorship to stem the high cost of living, from the first crude local committees which ought to have checked the mounting price of bread, to the elaborate system of national committees which is expected today to enforce "just prices."

Dr. Miller reaches the conclusion that "price control in Italy has been a success." However, on page 19 of his book we learn that by the spring of 1934 "prices were no longer declining but beginning to rise"; and on page 34 we read that by the fall of 1935 "it was clear to every student of the problem that local price control had been inefficient. It had suffered prices to rise without hindrance in the first nine months of 1935." This statement would lead us to the conclusion that the success of price-fixing became manifest only in 1936 and 1937, that is, after "central control" was set up, and particularly after "central control" had become "corporative control" in the spring of 1937.

In fact, during the last months of 1935 and the first months of 1936 there was no appreciable increase in the cost of Italian staple foods. But was this the effect of "central control," which had been set up in the autumn of 1935, or was it due to some other cause? In explaining this phenomenon Dr. Miller overlooks the fact that in the autumn of 1935 the

Burlingame, Cal.

League of Nations, because of the Ethiopian War, boycotted all Italian exports. Since Italian exports are mainly staple foods and finished goods, it is no wonder that there was no appreciable increase in the prices of these commodities. As soon as the League of Nations lifted its embargo on Italian exports, prices which had remained stable during the months of the sanctions began to soar once more to new peaks.

Dr. Miller lived in Italy from June, 1937, to April, 1938. During that period he was in a position to gather immediate and valuable information about the movement of prices from hundreds of housewives, workers, petty clerks, and professional men. It would not appear that he made the most of this opportunity.

GAETANO SALVEMINI

Shorter Notices

SIDNEY HILLMAN. By George Soule. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Some vital catalytic agent was lacking in the preparation of this book, which has all the ingredients of a first-rate piece of work but never quite comes off. Its hero, Sidney Hillman, is a dynamic, brilliant personality of great and growing importance in the current labor and political scene. The Amalgamated Clothing Workers, which he heads, is an example of progressive unionism and a pioneer in developing saner and more enlightened industrial relations in the United States. The author is a distinguished economist who published "The New Unionism in the Clothing Industry" (with J. M. Budish) in 1920 and has remained ever since in close contact with the special problems of the needle-trades worker. Yet when mixed together, all these promising elements result in a pot-pourri quite painfully dull and disappointing. The Hillman portrait is done in the Sir Galahad tradition of biography. In the background the narrative of the Amalgamated's career flickers like an old-fashioned movie, always on the verge of breaking down into whorls and splotches on the screen and the "Turkish March" on the piano. Like writers seeking to convey sex knowledge to children, Mr. Soule tends to linger over-long with the bees and the flowers, neglecting many of the facts of life—as they relate to labor and its leaders in these troublous times.

MEN, WIND, AND SEA. By Riley Brown. Carlyle House. $2.25.

The Coast Guard and the Lighthouse Service, recently unified, comprise one branch of the government service that functions with so much efficiency that we scarcely ever hear of it. Prohibition made us slightly conscious of the Coast Guard's existence, but in a manner not at all to its liking. This book, written by a member of the service, is a collection of anecdotes about its activities; but it shows only too plainly that intimate knowledge of the facts is no guaranty of a readable story. The adventures of the Ice Patrol, the burning of the Morro Castle, the sinking of the I'm Alone, to mention but a few, are all gripping stories; but it is only because they are so heavily freighted with excitement that they survive the author's adolescent pen. The Coast Guard deserved a much better press. Nevertheless, the book would make an excellent gift for boys from twelve to sixteen.

There are
64 VALUES
in LAFAYETTE'S
Radio Line

Whatever the radio you have in mind—portable, table model, automatic radio-phonograph combination . . . whatever the price you choose to pay, Lafayette has the set for you, and offers more for your money. More wanted features, more realism of reproduction, more cabinet beauty, more fine quality throughout. There are sixty-four distinguished models in the Lafayette line for 1940 — every one a value! Send today for Catalog No. 78S describing the complete line.

LAFAYETTE RADIO
100 SIXTH AVENUE ▪ NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
24 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
[illegible] Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

You may buy

BOOKS

through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to
THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

CONSUMERS UNION ANNOUNCES A
Life Insurance Advisory Service
•
OFFERING EXPERT INSURANCE COUNSEL AT EXCEPTIONALLY LOW RATES
under the direction of
E. A. GILBERT
Well-known Insurance Analyst
Co-Author of "Investing in Disaster"
•
RATES: FOR MEMBERS OF CONSUMERS UNION
General Insurance Counsel—$5; Specific Recommendations and Analyses of Policies—$1.25 per $1,000, with a minimum charge of $5.
(For Non-Members: $2 per $1,000 with a minimum charge of $10.)

CONSUMERS UNION OF UNITED STATES
17 Union Square West, New York, N. Y.

☐ I enclose $8, for which please enroll me as a member of Consumers Union. I understand that I will receive immediately the 288-page BUYING GUIDE, rating over 2,000 products by brand names, and, in the course of the year, 12 monthly issues of Consumers Union REPORTS (32 pages, illustrated).

☐ Please send me the Insurance Questionnaire and additional information on CU's Life Insurance Advisory Service.

Name..

Address..

....2 N L 10

DRAMA

Bagdad on the Subway

AS THE second offering of their second season the Playwrights' Company is presenting a romantic satire in eleven scenes entitled "Two on an Island" (Broadhurst Theater). Its author, Elmer Rice, was last year responsible for the only failure among the offerings of this group, and I complained that he seemed to have lost one of the most entertaining of his gifts—that for catching the gesture and accent of his urban contemporaries. I am happy now to withdraw that complaint without any reservation, and "Two on an Island" promises to be more than successful enough to reestablish him as a member in good standing of the Playwrights' Company.

The island in question is Manhattan itself, and the two who serve as hero and heroine are a boy and a girl arriving simultaneously from the hinterland. They do not actually meet until the last act, but they are, as the author points out, representatives of that great company completing the strange circular migration begun by their forefathers when the latter set out to conquer those great open spaces from which the new generation is returning for a new conquest. Through their eyes we see what is the real subject of the play—the panorama of metropolitan life sketched in broad, bold, and telling strokes.

Jo Mielziner has designed an extremely effective series of skeletonized and stylized settings, which include a subway and the gigantic head of the Statute of Liberty. Mr. Rice has provided a series of delightfully telling vignettes, and the combination is perhaps the most successful attempt ever made to state in theatrical terms the humors of O. Henry's Bagdad on the Subway. Mr. Rice's mood is, indeed, almost as unashamed in its humorous romanticism as was that of the author of "The Four Million." O. O. McIntyre would have loved the play, and it is only the author's shrewd observation and shrewd craftsmanship which lift it above the level of the familiar heartbreak-and-glamour style of contemporary romance. But it is above that level because, even when Mr. Rice uses a method almost broad enough to suggest the cartoon, the sharpness and directness of his observation, together with his extraordinary gift for recording the speech of real people, give the thing a sincerity and a verisimilitude wholly delightful. The theatrical method which he employs has been all but discredited by "advanced" playwrights who have used it as an excuse for laziness and inepitude, but Mr. Rice has rehabilitated it partly by the crispness of his atmospheric scenes, partly by the knowingness with which he has alternated them with the more fully developed scenes involving his hero and heroine, most of which are written with great vigor and originality. Take, for example, that in which the heroine is all but seduced by the illustrator for whom she is posing. Obviously this scene is inevitable in any such story. One is ready to assume that it could not be other than stereotyped and banal. Yet actually it is neither. Aided by the very fine performance given by Miss Betty Field, it becomes, instead, perhaps the best single scene in the play, freshly humorous as well as pathetic.

With "Two on an Island" Mr. Rice, I think, resumes his place among the best of our comic writers, along with the Messrs. Behrman, Barry, and Kaufman, and it is interesting to notice how different the quality of the wit of each one is. Mr. Behrman is literary and, in the most favorable sense of the word, artificial—not really of any time or any class; Mr. Barry speaks with the accent, idealized of course, of the smartest of the best families; Mr. Kaufman with that of Broadway and Twenty-one. Neither the comic insight nor the wit of Mr. Rice is like that of any of the others, and it rests, one might say, on a broader base, derives from the spirit of a larger mass of people. It is not merely that his favorite characters are landladies, taxi drivers, and the like, persons whose knowingness is combined with an innocent unsophistication. It is also that the whole flavor of his writing is more robust, more earthy, less narrowly local, and less highly specialized in spirit if not in manner. Of the four he is the most inclusively American, and without him the quartet would represent far less completely than it does the comic spirit of this nation.

"Two on an Island" probably owes almost as much to the author's skilful staging as it does to his writing. It also owes a great deal to a company of more than fifty persons, among whom some of the minor performers are excellent. I have already mentioned Betty Field among the principals. Others are Luther Adler as a Broadway producer and John Craven as the young man from Iowa. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

A BROADCASTING company's sense of its own virtue would do for an Inquisition burning the proper faith into heretics or a Soviet government bombing it into Finnish villagers. Anyone who cannot see in a musical program of N. B. C., Columbia, or Mutual the utmost in devotion to music, in understanding, in wisdom, is—in the eyes of N. B. C., Columbia, or Mutual—a person blinded by his own mean nature. But the people at N. B. C. who continue to fit late Beethoven quartets into half-hour periods every Sunday evening by slicing out movements are—in the eyes of anyone with real devotion to music and real understanding—barbarians blinded by their pretentiousness.

Bloch's Violin Concerto had a superb New York first performance by Szigeti with the Boston Symphony; and it was interesting to see that the audience, which was almost intensely quiet during the first movement, became restless and inattentive during the third, and in this way expressed a correct appraisal of the two movements. Bloch, that is, reverts in the third movement to what he has already said impressively and at sufficient length in the first.

Bloch, who is very particular about the kind of performances his works get, has spoken enthusiastically of the performances of his String Quartet by the Griller Quartet, which played it in New York recently (and then did a much less distinguished job with Mozart); and he supervised the Stuyvesant Quartet's excellent recording of the work for Columbia (M-392, $9). The work is characteristic in the intensity and complexity of its feeling, the richness and complexity of the idiom in which this feeling expresses itself, the remarkable sensitiveness to tone, and in particular to the tonal resources of the four strings in combination, which this idiom exhibits. These produce passages of unforgettable individuality and power; but the work is not without its occasional inferiority—the so-called second subject of the first movement, for example.

Another fine Columbia set (X-154, $3.50) offers Handel's Concerto Grosso Opus 6 No. 6 in an excellent performance by the London Symphony under Weingartner. But for the rest Columbia's January list offers several items that I consider wholly negligible: Reger's Suite for unaccompanied 'cello Opus 131c, however well played by Feuermann (X-152, $3.50); the Introduction to Act 3 of Wagner's Tannhäuser," however well done by the Paris Conservatory Orchestra under Weingartner (69793-D, $1.50); a wooden-toned recording of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony by Columbia Broadcasting Symphony under Barlow (M-391, $6). And as for Roland Hayes's Song Recital (M-393, $5), it is regrettable that no recordings were made of this artist's singing in its prime; but it is regrettable also that when Columbia does get around to it he records none of the songs of Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms that he sang so beautifully and can still do well, but instead the Dream from "Manon," Quilter's "It Was a Lover and His Lass," and Beethoven's "Adelaide"—these in addition to some old Italian and French things, Bach's "Bist du bei mir" (which Mr. Hayes thinks is a secular song), and two Negro songs, "He never said a mumberlin' word" and "Roun' 'bout de mountain." In these last three and in the thirteenth-century "L'Amour de moi" Mr. Hayes does his best singing.

The surfaces of these records show considerable improvement.

B. H. HAGGIN

FILMS

THE eagerly awaited movie version of John Steinbeck's "The Grapes of Wrath" (Twentieth Century-Fox) is one Hollywood production you cannot afford to miss: for its general excellence in direction, acting, and photography, for the fact that in places it breaks out of the strait-jacket of formulas and codes; for the significance of the whole undertaking, whatever its motives. With it a new period in the development of American moving-picture art could begin. But even if this hope is not confirmed, the standard which the film sets will remain. To make it a beginning instead of letting it be a mere single accomplishment is now—partly at least—up to the audiences. It would be a great pleasure to see the conventional school of producers that operates on the easy assumption that movies are and should be nothing but (mild) entertainment get a licking at the box office. But of course, no costly manifestation of a society, such as the press, the radio, and the movies, can be freer than the society itself.

Nunnally Johnson, who wrote the movie version, has done

Oswald Garrison Villard

has just returned from a journalistic assignment in Europe where his articles evoked the following comment from a foremost English liberal editor: "I can recall no journalistic achievement in recent years comparable with the effect your articles have had, not in this country only, but throughout the world."

More than ever timely today is his brilliant autobiography

FIGHTING YEARS

"Fascinating reading.... Contains much political history. . . . The accounts of American participation in the World War and the following peace-making are particularly pertinent today and should be given as wide circulation as possible."
—Social Studies. 2nd printing, $3.75

Harcourt, Brace & Co., 383 Madison Ave., New York

"One of the most important recent contributions to one of our most important problems."
—GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD'S

OUR MILITARY CHAOS

Out of more than forty years of study of our military and naval affairs, Mr. Villard discusses questions that become more vital every day — Why are we pouring billions into armaments that are useless for defense? Why do military leaders practically write their own arms appropriations? Why is there no unified plan of action governing the defense operations of both Army and Navy? "Essential to the understanding of our military policies."—FRANK C. HANIGHEN $1.75

ALFRED · A · KNOPF

LET'S BUILD OUR "HOME LINE"

TWELVE months ago, in the first of the Calling America Series of Survey Graphic, we attempted to turn outrage and protest at the persecution of minorities abroad into positive lines of thought and action and to strengthen our democracy at home. Last October we published as second in the Calling America Series: SCHOOLS—The Challenge of Democracy to Education. Now Comes HOMES: Front Line of Defense for American Life.

SURVEY
GRAPHIC HOMES
front line of defense for AMERICAN LIFE

In this issue nineteen experts explain in vivid and authoritative articles, charts and illustrations why a home in the very fullest sense of the word—the house itself and its setting in a neighborhood providing adequate amenities—stands far beyond the reach of millions of Americans to rent or to buy. Moreover, they point the way to a solution of the problem.

Under the editorship of Albert Mayer, architect, writer, consultant to official housing and planning authorities and of Loula D. Lasker as associate, this number answers the following challenging questions:

How do good homes strengthen our democracy? How are builders, financiers and planners attempting to solve the problems of the family who wants a real home? What is our government doing to raise the standard of home life? What progress has been made in the fields of public housing, investment housing, home and community planning? How can we solve the riddle of taxation in relation to housing? Where will the back-to-the-country movement lead? What sort of homes and communities can we expect in the America of tomorrow?

Contributors include Secretary Henry A. Wallace, Raymond V. Parsons, Irving Brant, Catherine Bauer, Edith Elmer Wood, Ira S. Robbins, Carl Feiss, Benton MacKaye, David Cushman Coyle, Charles Abrams, Lewis Mumford, Dorothy Canfield, Harold S. Buttenheim, John H. Crider, John Palmer Gavit.

INTRODUCTORY OFFER

Single copies of the February issue (not generally available on newsstands) sell for 40 cents. The annual subscription price of Survey Graphic is $3. For the next five issues—including the February issue—mail only $1 with the coupon below today!

SURVEY GRAPHIC N 2-3-40
112 East 19 Street, New York City

Send me five issues for the dollar I enclose. Include "Homes."

Name________________________

Address________________________

his work skilfully. Since "The Grapes of Wrath," unlike "Gone with the Wind," was not assigned the status of a super-production, Mr. Johnson had to cut sharply into the original. The whole last part of the book is out—the box-car camp, the flood, Rosasharn's miscarriage, and the very last scene. The picture closes with Tom Joad fleeing (to be "everwhere—wherever you look") from the government camp. And the family drives on, longing for work, Mother Joad summing up: "We're the people that live. Can't nobody wipe us out."

The tone of the original is often softened, the breath weakened, the scope narrowed, but what remains is still within its limits a passionate and deeply absorbing story. There are flaws. One never sees for example, the Joads or the other immigrants from the Dust Bowl actually at work in the green and golden valleys of California. Why? The contrast between their dreams of what fruit picking would be in a beautiful and fertile landscape and what it turned out to be in reality constituted a natural and very effective element in the original. Would it spoil our appetite for compotes if we could actually see how our fruits are picked? The movie version does not always tell the whole story, but neither does it lie; emotional formulations of little directive meaning are given a prominent place at the cost of concrete and intelligent conclusions. But as a whole the script preserves the spirit of the novel.

John Ford, the director, who last year did an unsurpassed job with "Stage Coach," again triumphs. It is he who made this picture what it is. Taste, economy, a sharp sense of artistic balances, and an admirable technical skill enable him to tell of human hearts where others would only report external actions. He is developing more and more a style of his own which combines realism with imagination. As a result he gives us pictures of life which mere naturalism could not achieve. Sometimes one feels that he would like to go a step farther, that he could heighten a scene, make its impact even stronger, that he could shake us where he only moves us—I hope he will one day be allowed to do it. In this film the children in Hooverville do not look really starved, and they do not behave as if they were. There are other retouchings, too, to match the script, but often the director overcomes the limitations imposed and turns them into virtues, achieving his result through implication. Special mention should be made of his camera man, Gregg Toland. The photography is exact and ingenious, and there are many unforgettable shots.

It remains to praise the cast, which in the chief parts and in the bits is equally perfect. Henry Fonda as Tom, Jane Darwell as Ma Joad, John Caradine as Casey play with an air of understatement which fits their stunned bewilderment when they find out what the world still is like in the midst of plenty. If their behavior for long stretches is rather lyrical than tough, it is not their fault. They have not been allowed to play the hardest and most bitter moments of the book. Not enough credit can be given to the supporting cast and its direction. These cops, vigilantes, emigrants, truck drivers, and gas-station attendants on U. S. Highway 66 supply a frightening reality; they are presented without any sentimental concessions. This cannot be said about the whole picture. But, nevertheless, "The Grapes of Wrath" is Hollywood's most distinguished offering. FRANZ HOELLERING

Birthday Greetings

[Next week The Nation will celebrate its seventy-fifth anniversary, and we have already received many messages of congratulation and comment. We are grateful for these greetings—even the critical ones. We printed some last week and shall run as many others as we can find space for in the next few issues.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

CHARLES POLETTI

Lieutenant Governor of New York

I am glad to have this opportunity to extend warm congratulations to The Nation on its seventy-fifth birthday. I like The Nation because its appraisal of current affairs and trends is keen and fair. It does not accept things on the strength of labels. I admire it because it is as critical of those persons with whose progressive views it is in accord as of those with whom it violently disagrees. In short, The Nation is an exceedingly stimulating and progressive force.

ALFRED A. KNOPF

I am poor at writing testimonials, but I can tell you that for twenty-five years I have never, except when I have been far from home, missed examining and reading at least part of an issue of The Nation. That's something. Good luck to it on its seventy-fifth anniversary!

RAYMOND GRAM SWING

I can think of no single periodical in the United States whose continued existence is of more importance to American democracy than The Nation. Not that it is consistently wiser than other periodicals, but I know of none which is more conscientiously aware of the problems of democracy or more loyally dedicated to the maintenance of civil liberties.

WILLIAM T. EVJUE

Editor, the Madison Capital Times

As the editor of a daily newspaper I look each week for the appearance of The Nation. I have been doing this for many years because The Nation has been an outstanding champion of an intelligent liberalism. The Nation is always a valuable incentive to the editor who seeks to mold, day in and day out, a newspaper that aims to give expression to the groups in the American scene that are trying to promote a better life for our people. The Nation has always been militant, aggressive, and fearless—refreshingly so to one who knows something of the pressures to which modern publications are subject. I congratulate The Nation on its seventy-fifth birthday and take this occasion to wish for it many more years of distinguished service.

STANLEY M. ISAACS

President, Borough of Manhattan

The Nation holds a high position among those publications which deservedly affect public opinion. It has always been a strong influence looking toward the development of progressive and liberal ideas. Its views have been expressed with courage and emphasis. On some occasions I have thought it over-critical to those in office, particularly during Theodore Roosevelt's time. But even to those who disagreed at times with the views expressed, it has always been a stimulating and exciting publication to read. In present hands and in these troublous times it is more essential than ever.

GEORGE FORT MILTON

It is indeed heartening news that The Nation has reached the seventy-fifth mile post of a distinguished career. As an inquirer into the field of American history, I have become familiar with its record in the days of Reconstruction. As a friend and warm admirer of Oswald Garrison Villard, I followed its course during the years of his direction. Since then I have observed the continuing vigor of high public purpose that animates its conduct.

From all these standpoints I admire The Nation—its history, its purposes, and the influence it has with liberal thought in the United States. I hope for it seventy-five more years of useful service.

GUY EMERY SHIPLER

Editor, the Churchman

What I think of The Nation can be given the truest emphasis if I put it this way: If every clergyman in the United States were a reader, the church would come far closer to being that dynamo for the development of justice and good-will which the religion it represents demands it should be. The Nation's sensitive insight, its intellectual fiber, its daring to say what others fear to say—these and a long list of other qualities are desperately essential in a journalism making for the fulfilment of our democratic idea. They give the paper a glorious right to touch off all the fireworks and devour all the cakes it can lay its hands on in celebration of its seventy-fifth anniversary of embattled public service.

OLIVER CARLSON

Director of Public Relations, California

My greetings to The Nation on its seventy-fifth birthday. It's the livest oldster I've seen—and, as you know, we've got a lot of lively oldsters out here. You've done a grand job. Best wishes and a long, long life to The Nation and its staff.

ELMER A. BENSON

Former Governor of Minnesota

I am very happy to greet you and the readers of The Nation on this its seventy-fifth anniversary. We all hope that all the issues of The Nation in the weeks to come may be as interesting and helpful as the many issues we have read in the past. I am always interested in reading The Nation, and I think most people are, because while we may disagree with the editors and those who contribute to The Nation on the non-essential, less important things, usually, I am sure, most of us agree with The Nation upon the fundamental and important things.

May you always continue to stimulate thought and discussion among your readers and especially so in the critical weeks and months immediately ahead of us.

ROGER BALDWIN

The Nation has been for years the stalwart champion of every cause on the fighting front for human freedom. It has been cool and clear-eyed even when others in the liberal camp have become excited and intolerant. Its news and comment are indispensable to an understanding of the major conflicts that mark the world's somewhat doubtful progress.

BISHOP FRANCIS J. McCONNELL

I wish to add my word of congratulation on The Nation's seventy-fifth anniversary. I have been a reader of The Nation for fifty years. It has always been a journal of outstanding distinction, but it has greatly improved in the last quarter-century. In the old days it commanded attention by a forthright honesty, altogether admirable but somewhat abstract and formal. In recent years the honesty is just as marked, but now takes larger consideration of things as they are, and has deeper sympathy with and regard for the fundamental human elements. In spite of itself the old Nation was aristocratic to a degree that was at times repellent. It is now the most genuinely democratic journal I know.

BENNETT CERF

Publisher, Random House

My congratulations to The Nation on its seventy-fifth anniversary. I consider it one of the three most important magazines in the United States. I hope they will be able to say as much for Random House when we celebrate our seventy-fifth anniversary—that will be in the year 2003.

IRVING BRANT

Contributing Editor, St. Louis Star-Times

When a radio direction finder is installed on a ship, it has to be calibrated to correct distortion caused by nearby masses of metal. For the past twenty-five years The Nation has been, to me, chiefly a calibrator of the news and editorial opinion of the daily press, correcting distortion, recording the true direction of the beam of truth. If there is a more vital function than that, in American weekly journalism, I don't know what it is.

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

As time passes, The Nation continues to reverse the course of nature. In its early days The Nation was sound, scholastic, dull, heavy, and very respectable. Today it is no less sound, but it is vigorous, lusty, interesting, and on occasion its intelligent views have even been regarded as "subversive."

Some years ago, before Villard assumed the leadership, I was asked at a dinner of contributors how I liked The Nation. "I don't know," I answered, "I never read any part of it except my own rare contributions." Today The Nation is something of a nuisance, for however busy I may be, I am uncomfortable until I find time to give it careful reading.

Congratulations on your progress! I look forward to the time when the circulation of The Nation will be to a greater degree commensurate with its influence and repute.

CHARLES H. HOUSTON

Outstanding Negro Attorney

Congratulations on the seventy-fifth anniversary of The Nation. Back in high school The Nation started me doing my own thinking. Whether I agree with it or not, I still always try to find the position of The Nation on every important public issue.

HELEN HALL

Director, Henry Street Settlement

One of the best things I know about The Nation is that we live in a country where it can be published. Its crisp, clear critical opinions which bring edge to the thinking of our times are invaluable.

And, purely between you and me, it gives me great satisfaction to think that anything as handsome has a woman editor! I grew up in days when we did not even let a woman vote, and the last twenty years have made such changes that the things we do still have a touch of adventure.

FLORENCE E. ALLEN

Judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals

Nothing is so essential to the preservation of our liberties as courage, unbiased discussion of public issues. In no journal do I find this quality exhibited in a higher degree than it is in The Nation.

HARRIET B. LAIDLAW

Congratulations, in this unstable and changing world, to The Nation on its seventy-fifth birthday. We need such a journal as The Nation—one that is spendidly American without any narrow chauvinism. I feel that we can trust its leadership, as it stands poised, alert to deal with crucial questions. There are a quick readiness and a certain healthy youthfulness and elasticity in The Nation that point to a future of usefulness, and that augur well for its rapidly spreading importance.

JACQUES MARITAIN

I am glad to know of the seventy-fifth anniversary of The Nation and to be able to congratulate it upon its long and worthy career. Its liberal values have made it representative of much of the promise of American life; and this is recognized in France today by those who are in the forefront of the struggle for the survival of civilization —a survival which, to my mind, requires first the renewing, even in social and political matters, of the true spirit of Christendom.

CONTRIBUTORS

KENNETH G. CRAWFORD, Washington correspondent of the New York Post and The Nation, has recently been elected president of the American Newspaper Guild.

DWIGHT MACDONALD, formerly on the editorial staff of Fortune, is now an editor of the Partisan Review.

HENRY B. KRANZ is short-wave monitor for the Columbia Broadcasting Service.

MICHEL MOK is a feature writer for the New York Post.

JOHN PEALE BISHOP, poet and critic, is the author of "Now with His Love" and "Minute Particulars."

PAUL M. SWEEZY is an instructor in economics at Harvard University.

GAETANO SALVEMINI, Lauro de Bosis lecturer on the history of Italian civilization at Harvard University, has recently published "Historian and Scientist: An Essay on the Nature of History and the Social Sciences."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 10, 1940 NUMBER 6

A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The seventy-fifth anniversary of a journal of opinion is a noteworthy event, and a magazine like The Nation, which has so often espoused unpopular causes, has powerful enemies as well as loyal friends. It is therefore a tribute to its usefulness that it has survived for three-quarters of a century.

I think no one would ever accuse The Nation of seeking to become a popular organ. It has, through its long history, often appeared to stand alone. It does not matter whether one agrees with The Nation or not. The important thing is that everywhere and always—particularly in a democracy—minorities shall have a means of expressing themselves, and The Nation, we all know, has often represented minority opinion and mighty unpopular minority opinion at that. It has not seldom vindicated the principle laid down by Voltaire: "I disapprove of what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it."

So I send hearty congratulations to The Nation on its seventy-fifth birthday. Having weathered the storms of three-quarters of a century, it ought to have little difficulty in rounding out a full hundred years.

Franklin D Roosevelt

Old Liberties for a New World

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

ANNIVERSARIES should be approached without awe. They should offer an occasion, not for mere reminiscence and even less for reverence, but for friendly reunion. One of the chief satisfactions of preparing this birthday issue of The Nation was the opportunity of renewing acquaintances with the journal in the various stages of its journey through stormy years, and with the men who made it. It was an enlightening experience and it brought surprises. Personalities emerged from what had been little more than imposing reputations. Frailties as well as virtues sprang alive from brittle pages. Wit ran through the years, lighting up eight-point columns. We met passion and inconsistency as well as sober judgment. There may have been giants in those days, but there were also, thank heaven, men.

We have tried to produce an anniversary number that brings out the qualities of mind and feeling in The Nation of past years and at the same time offers a cross-section of the problems most closely concerning us today. A few unbroken threads run through the volumes, and you will find them in the pattern of this issue. (Godkin's words on the impeachment of President Johnson, quoted on page 161, could be applied unchanged to the political prosecutions that are multiplying today.) Other threads have been snapped by the pull of events in these generations of swift change. In his essay on "Free Inquiry and Free Endeavor" I. F. Stone has shown both the continuity and the decisive shifts in liberal opinion during the years. Here, encompassed in the span of one journal's life, you find the whole story of freedom's struggle to adapt to, and so survive, the inexorable growth of industrial collectivism. Godkin didn't like labor unions. Naturally not. They interfered with a man's right to sell his services freely—wherever he chose and at the best price he could get. But neither did Godkin like the great corporations which rose to make that right an ugly joke and to turn theoretical freedom into actual slavery. The Nation fought against a tide that could not be turned; but today, it must be acknowledged, that tide has washed up on the beaches of our civilization the very problem of freedom so sharply recognized by the early editors of this paper.

It is, of course, the problem upon which all other problems converge. The collective nature of the industrial process has been accepted now by everyone. If it is denied by Republican politicians or unreconstructed Wall Streeters, you may be sure their denials are nothing more than moves in a game that is over. The question is not, how can we save free enterprise in a free market, with all the subsidiary freedoms that are supposed to flow from those two? The question is rather, how much freedom can survive the degree of collective control necessary to keep the industrial machine going; and where is that control to be lodged?

The unrelated social reforms of the first decade of this century provided some amelioration of conditions that had become unbearable and concealed without altering the outlines of that question. The boom of the twenties concealed them still better. But the thirties have posed it squarely, and some answers have been attempted. The New Deal is one. It is a fumbling answer, but perhaps no more fumbling than democracy itself. So in a sense it forms part of the question rather than an answer. If democracy can go no farther and no faster and no straighter than this, can it go far and fast and straight enough to get there in time? Fascism is another answer, and it is the one that is most likely to result from either a failure to get there in time or a refusal to attempt any answer at all.

Today we talk passionately, defensively, about democracy, which we properly equate with freedom. Its existence is threatened by armies abroad and by reactionary forces at home. But, at home and abroad, its existence is also threatened by its own failure. It has failed to keep the industrial machine running smoothly enough to keep men at work earning money enough to buy enough goods to keep the machine running. Whether Hitler could do better we don't know. His success in eliminating unemployment in Germany was probably only partly due to the needs of a voracious war economy. It was also due to a nation-wide organization of money, plants, materials, and men. If he wins the war he may possibly be able to organize Europe on similar lines, as a single industrial machine. Then the question I have put will be answered on one continent. But an answer based on universal slavery and state absolutism will not be accepted as final as long as democracy has the power to resist.

We don't yet know whether it has the power to make a successful resistance in Europe. The fight has only begun. We do not know how much America will contribute to the struggle, or whether it will help organize the peace. Fascism may lose the war but win the peace. A basic social change in Europe, not mere readjustments of boundaries, will be required if fascism is not to win.

Catastrophe does not loom so close in America. We have a little latitude for experiment and delay provided by our mighty physical resources and our distance from Europe and Asia. Fascism in action has attracted few of our people. The American on the cover of this magazine is not a man to be taken in by any two-penny Hitler. But look at his easy, humorous, confident, negligent pose. May he not smile too tolerantly at the antics of the street-corner Führers and feel too comfortably remote from the heat of foreign war? May he not let too much time drift by while the national machine jerks along in low gear? The danger in America springs from a tough confidence in our wealth, our stability, our recuperative powers. Even ten years of depression and a huge continuing load of unemployment have failed to dent that armor. We don't know yet how pressing is the need of solving our economic problem quickly in democratic terms.

One way or another, this main question of our time is discussed by most of the writers in this issue. Taken together they provide an informal analysis of the problem of freedom and organization. And from them it is possible to distil an equally informal program—a program for persons determined to preserve as much freedom as possible while working to establish the collective controls necessary to the survival of an industrial civilization.

Such a program cannot be carried out in war time or under threat of war. It is incompatible with aggression and equally incompatible with the structure of "peace" proposed by Hitler. It means that the United States must contribute both to the defeat of fascism and to the equally difficult task of constructing an organized peace when the war has been won.

Such a program demands, too, a militant and united American labor movement. The way to union between the two great federations seems long and full of obstacles, but it must be traveled, and with some speed. And the New Deal must be preserved. The reforms of the Roosevelt Administration provide an indispensable basis for orderly progress toward greater social control. But these reforms should, of course, be enormously extended. Collective control over our natural resources, the railroads, and other major monopolies must be accepted as obvious first steps in the direction of industrial planning and an equitable distribution of purchasing power.

And most important of all, such a program implies an effective defense of our civil rights. We are happy in having as President a man who so heartily supports the expression of minority opinion—including the "mighty unpopular minority opinion" ascribed to The Nation. But the President is himself under the fire of groups, strongly intrenched in Congress and the country, who are determined to abolish this ancient weapon of democratic change. Against such forces The Nation will fight with all its power and vigilance, as it has throughout the years.

The Shape of Things

WHERE WERE YOU ON THE EVENING OF January 9? To contemporary Washington, terrorized by the Dies inquisition, that question has become a litmus test distinguishing "Americans" from critics of Martin Dies. On that night six liberal Congressmen, a university professor, a member of the staff of The Nation, and several other persons attended a private dinner at the home of Gardner Jackson, legislative representative of Labor's Non-Partisan League. The principal item of discussion was the Dies committee. James Wechsler of The Nation submitted documented evidence, pieced together primarily from public records, showing the interlocking relationship of Dies, Merwin K. Hart, and the Christian Front—seventeen of whose members had been arrested the day before on charges of conspiracy. To the same gathering Jackson displayed photostats of letters supposed to have been written by William Dudley Pelley to David Mayne, Pelley's former Washington representative. The letters, which Mayne had sold to one of Jackson's aides, quoted Pelley as boasting that Dies had agreed to tread lightly, if at all, on Silver Shirt territory. On January 22 Congressman Frank Hook, one of those present at the dinner, issued a double-barreled attack on Dies based on this material; in the same week The Nation published an article outlining the same charges. Since that day not an item of proof has been produced to challenge the record of Dies-Hart-Front relationships. But it has been established that the Pelley letters were forgeries concocted by Mayne and accepted in good faith by Jackson and others. Dies's colleagues are now trying to bury the Christian Front connection in the collapse of the Pelley evidence. Logically they can't—because that connection is proved by letterheads, committee lists, luncheon programs, and a host of other unchallengeable documents. But campaigns of confusion are never logical.

*

IF DIES'S ASSOCIATION WITH FRIENDS OF the Front is beyond dispute, a number of other mysteries remain. It is now known that the man who sold the forged Pelley letters was in the pay of the Dies committee, ostensibly assigned to find Pelley, at almost precisely the time he was peddling manufactured goods to the committee's foes. A dispatch to the New York Sun on January 31 contained this disclosure, now confirmed in Washington; the same dispatch reported that on January 25—after the Hook blast—agents of the committee attempted to plant another set of forged documents on the committee's critics. The Hearst press has carried wild headlines announcing a "plot" to discredit Dies; is it conceivable that a real conspiracy was fomented by agents of the committee to forestall legitimate attacks? Granted that the Pelley letters were forged, further inquiry reveals that last November 21 Pelley's own organ, Liberation, carried a story almost duplicating the contents of the forged letters. The story asserted that early in the history of his committee Dies said to a Pelley agent, "I'm not interested in Pelley. On the whole I think he's done a darned good job," referring, according to Liberation, to Pelley's attack on the La Follette committee. As we go to press, Congressman Hook is demanding a sweeping inquiry into the whole Pelley episode. It is plain that the situation cries out for such an inquiry. But whatever its outcome, Martin Dies must still answer the bulk of the indictment, which remains intact—the story of his close relations with Merwin K. Hart and the "respectable" periphery of the Christian Front.

*

THE CONFERENCE OF THE BALKAN ENTENTE just concluded reiterated the desire of the participants to keep out of the war but failed to reach any definite agreement for mutual guaranties. The official communiqué issued at the conclusion was notable, however, for the stress laid on friendly relations with neighboring states and on the need for strengthening economic ties between all the Balkan countries. Translated into non-diplomatic language this means that the entente, originally formed to maintain the status quo against the revisionist claims of Bulgaria, is now anxious to appease both that state and Hungary, which is equally an obstacle to Danubian solidarity. According to some reports Rumania is now willing to return to Bulgaria a small portion of the Dobrudja as a conciliatory gesture. A much greater threat to the unity of Southeastern Europe, however, is the Transylvanian question. Both Yugoslavia and Italy have lately attempted to persuade Hungary to put its claims against Rumania in cold storage, at least for the duration of the war, but internal pressures make such a course practically impossible for any Hungarian government. Nor is it easy to see what economic concessions could be made by the Balkan countries to conciliate Hungary. In fact, an increase in mutual trade in the region, however desirable, would be extremely difficult to arrange because of the similar economies of the countries concerned. They all have agricultural surpluses and all need manufactured goods, and as a result seem destined to provide a commercial, if not a physical, battlefield for Germany and the Allies.

*

FROM FINLAND COMES NEWS OF DESPERATE fighting on the Karelian Isthmus front, north of Lake Ladoga, and in the "waistline" sector. Some advances are claimed by the Finnish army, which also reports the capture of many prisoners and much material. But the cables suggest that fresh Russian troops of a higher caliber are now on the firing line, with the result that the difficulties of the defense are increasing. Nevertheless, the Finns appear to be holding their own at least, for Moscow reports with monotonous regularity that "nothing of importance" is happening at the front. Were the Red Army making definite progress, these communiqués would hardly be so reticent. But the vast reserves of men and materials at the disposal of the Soviets must eventually take effect unless help on a larger scale reaches Finland. That is the point made again and again in a dispatch from Helsinki by Leland Stowe which will appear in our next issue. The contributions of the Scandinavian states seem insufficient to be decisive, though possibly they are being deliberately minimized. There is a report that Sweden has purchased 150 fighting planes in this country for resale to Finland in return for foodstuffs and raw materials which the latter can obtain here through the Export-Import Bank credit. The possibility of a private loan to Finland has also been suggested, but Wall Street, for all its hostility toward Russia, would probably consider that the risks involved were too great. Meanwhile, President Kallio of Finland has again voiced the willingness of his government to negotiate peace. Unhappily there seems small chance of a response from Moscow. The prestige of the U. S. S. R. is now involved, and on the scales of the new imperialism soldiers' lives seem to weigh as little as they did in czarist days.

*

INDUSTRIAL ACTIVITY IN DECEMBER, AS measured by the Federal Reserve Board index, reached a new record of 128, or two points above the previous high of May, 1929. This index, however, is not corrected for secular trends, and as population has increased some 8 per cent in the last ten years, it denotes a per capita production well below that of the last pre-depression year. Nor, unfortunately, can December's peak be regarded as a stepping-stone to higher things, for there are indications that since the turn of the year a new slide downhill has started. The wave of buying which drove the heavy industries forward in the final quarter of 1939 has spent itself, and with production now in excess of new orders backlogs are being rapidly reduced. New investment, too, is lagging except in a few industries, such as aircraft, which are benefiting from war orders. At the same time the contribution of the federal government to purchasing power is declining, and with the economizers now in the saddle in Washington it seems destined to suffer further shrinkage. The effects on industry may be seen in the figures for engineering construction awards for January, which are 38 per cent below a year ago. Public construction is down no less than 48 per cent, while private awards have advanced only 12 per cent. This indicates how large an expansion of private investment in this field is required to compensate for the drop in public investment. Business leaders tell us that the unbalanced budget is one of the chief causes of the lack of confidence which checks the use of private capital. But neither the striking cuts in expenditure made by the President nor subsequent Congressional prunings have roused business from its apathy.

*

CHAIRMAN MADDEN OF THE LABOR BOARD has at last had his day in court before the hostile House committee investigating the board. He said little that was new but much that has been deliberately overlooked or forgotten. He showed that the board, despite the charges of incompetence and unfair procedure brought against it, has made a far better record in the courts than any other administrative agency in our history. It has had twenty-two cases in the Supreme Court, been upheld completely in eighteen and partially in two more, and overruled only twice. That is the record of the board's first four years. Chairman Madden compared this with the record of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which lost every one of the ten cases taken to the Supreme Court in the first ten years of its history, and with the record of the Federal Trade Commission, which was fully upheld in only three, partly in only one, of fifteen cases during its first ten years of existence. It happens that this comparison is a trifle misleading, for both the ICC and the FTC had to face courts manned by reactionaries rather than Roosevelt liberals. It is an adequate answer, nevertheless, to the amateur constitutional lawyers who are constantly attacking the board's procedure.

*

THE ROOSEVELT REVOLUTION IN AMERICAN constitutional law continues with a ruling handed down by Justice Frankfurter in a Federal Communications case without dissent, even Justice McReynolds concurring "in the result" though not in the reasoning. Its effect is to free regulatory agencies from the constant interference of the courts in the minutiae of their procedure. That such a change was desirable was one of Justice Frankfurter's contentions in his classes in administrative law at Harvard Law School, and the support given this view by the court shows that he has been as successful a teacher at Washington as he was at Cambridge. "Courts," he said, echoing Holmes, "are not charged with general guardianship against all potential mischief in the complicated tasks of government." And Brandeis's plea in the St. Joseph's Stockyards case a few years ago is embodied in the warning that "interference by the courts is not conducive to the development of habits of responsiblity in administrative agencies." In this as in other ways the Roosevelt "revolution" in the Supreme Court is not so much the concoction of constitutional novelties as a return to the earlier and more liberal interpretations which were dominant in the court from the 1830's to the 1890's.

THE MOMENT WHEN WAR THREATENS TO spread over half the world and fascism is making its supreme effort would hardly seem the time for a League for Peace and Democracy to disband. Not only has the league done just that, but it has offered these very circumstances as the reason for its dissolution. "The coming of the war," its executive body declares, created the need for a "different program and type of organization." A new program was undoubtedly called for, but that would hardly require the scrapping of a painstakingly developed organizational structure. The reasons for the league's disappearance, we suspect, were more realistic. One was the unscrupulous smearing it sustained at the hands of the Dies committee; a minimum of truth and a maximum of falsehood make a potent mixture and in this case it did its work well. But the minimum of truth was in itself a factor, and one of no small proportions. Whatever the extent of Communist control, the party members and sympathizers in the league were among its most active and effective workers, and after the Russian-German pact their interest in the organization cooled. Refusal of the executive committee, by a fourteen-to-one vote, to condemn either the pact or Russia's share in the aggression against Poland lent color to the charges of Communist influence, and the attack on Finland hastened the end. The Finnish invasion was condemned, to be sure, but half-heartedly and seemingly more to keep in line with "previous policy" than out of any conviction comparable with the league's condemnation of Japanese, German, and Italian aggression. Dwindling financial support undoubtedly accelerated the collapse, but it would seem to have been a result rather than a cause.

*

A PARIS CORRESPONDENT REPORTED IN The Nation of February 22, 1866, that "an attempt is being made to curtail still further the already minute proportions of ladies' head-gear by suppressing that part of the bonnet which covers the ears." As we go to press seventy-four years later even that part of the "bonnet" which covers the head has been almost totally suppressed. This year, if ever, women's hats are a straw in the wind.

*

IN PREPARING THIS ISSUE, THE EDITORS HAD the generous help of several old friends. Paul Kellogg, editor of the Survey, and Lewis S. Gannett, of the New York Herald Tribune, advised with us on editorial plans, while Joseph Blumenthal, distinguished typographer and printer, who designed The Nation's present format, devoted time and technical skill to the problem of physical arrangement. To them and to every person who contributed to our seventy-fifth-anniversary issue we offer our warm thanks.

Shadow and Substance

SINCE emotional conflict is the foe of rational thought, it is hardly surprising that when dislike of Hitlerism and desire to keep out of war occupy the same breast some strange mental reactions should result. None of us have the slightest fear of being impelled to fight on the side of Germany, and therefore feel immune to Nazi propaganda; indeed, we are hardly aware of its existence. But we are very conscious of the pull which the Allies exercise on our sympathies and are sternly on guard against any attempt to strengthen them. Anything that sounds remotely like Allied propaganda immediately strikes a bell which warns us to discipline our unneutral feelings.

Consequently, while we do not need anyone to tell us about the horrors of Nazism, we are quite ready to listen to those who illuminate the tarnished scutcheons of Britain and France. We like to be reminded of the many imperialist adventures these countries have indulged in, of the imperfections of their democracies, and of the greed and stupidity of their ruling classes. Without quite realizing it, we provide a receptive audience for the propaganda of the Nazis and their variegated cooperators in this country, who are well aware of the most telling lines to use.

Now it is undeniable that Britain and France have much to atone for, as America has also, and democracy might well pray for less fly-blown champions than Messrs. Chamberlain and Daladier. But in respect to the issues involved in the war these things are not really relevant. To regard the conflict simply as a struggle between rival imperialisms is to mistake the shadow for the substance, for essentially it is a struggle between two totally incompatible ideas of man's destiny.

This is the point so forcibly made in Thomas Mann's article on page 174. On the one hand we have a conception of a progressive society which, often as it has betrayed the idea, is founded on a belief in the worth and dignity of each individual, of a society which, like our own, is dedicated to ideals of liberty and equal justice for all. The fact that all too frequently such ideals have been most honored in the breach makes them neither worthless nor impotent, for as long as society is committed to faith in them they cannot be wholly destroyed. It is because the National Socialist philosophy wholly repudiates these values that the outcome of the war will decide far more than the question of who is to be top-dog in Europe. If Hitler wins, his system will be imposed on the whole continent, his idea of progress—that of domination by a "master-race"—will mold its future, his creed of blind obedience to the godlike state will be stamped into the minds of the young. We may choose to shut our eyes to these implications of Nazism, to comfort ourselves with the thought that if Hitler wins security for himself and his regime he may modify his ideas and limit his ambitions. But if we do we shall be indulging in the ostrich tactics against which Mr. Roosevelt has warned us and ignoring the lessons of Czechoslovakia and Poland. Let us remember that for seven long years Mr. Chamberlain, together with a majority of the British people, fooled themselves into believing that Hitler could be pacified by judicious doses of appeasement. Many of us were agonized by their credulity then, and the fact that they were finally forced to recognize their error is no reason for its adoption here.

The most important thing for America to do with regard to the war is to understand it. Wishfully thinking that its results do not concern us will not suffice to keep us out. When actualities fail to correspond with hopes, defense mechanisms are pasteboard shields. On the basis of the present situation there is no reason to believe that the Allies are looking for or require our military aid. They do need our material and, perhaps even more, our moral support. In war, Napoleon once said, the moral is to the material as five to one, and in this struggle of conflicting moralities the imponderable factors may prove even more decisive.

Civil Rights and Wrongs

THIS session of Congress will see a renewed drive for legislation dangerous to civil liberties. The chances of its success are greater than ever. In the convergence of several widely different forces lies a threat to basic rights more serious than any this country has seen since the post-war reaction. Some will be tempted, indeed, to speak of a kind of pre-war reaction. We think that premature, and we hope it is unwarranted. But the danger lies in the fact that hitherto clashing political currents are uniting behind the movement for limitation of speech, press, and assembly. The oldest of these currents is represented by Dies. It springs from a desire to smear the New Deal as red. Within the Administration anxieties about the red label, a recognition of the grave potentialities in such organizations as the Christian Front and the Bund, and a new anti-communism born of the Nazi-Soviet pact tend to flow into the main stream of the movement. These currents are being strengthened by the attitude of labor unions hitherto free from red phobia but now very hostile to the Communists because of events abroad. The European war casts its shadow over the civil-liberties issue as it does over the problem of the budget, and in the minds of some people the need for a bigger navy seems to go hand in hand with a need to bring under surveillance groups suspected of sympathy with the invaders of Finland and the antagonists of the Franco-British alliance. To this extent, though to this extent only, is it possible to speak of a pre-war reaction. We ended one war to make the world safe for democracy by an attack on democratic rights at home. It would be a pity to start another in that way.

The Nation does not oppose proper and constitutional methods for dealing with private military or semi-military groups modeled on Nazi-Fascist lines, or legislation designed to deal with racial or religious slander, or requirement of full publicity on the sources of income of all publications and groups organized for propaganda. We already have a law providing for the registration of foreign agents, and the statute books contain ample provisions against espionage. Our war-time Espionage Act is still in force, and its terms are in fact so sweeping that they are a potential menace to freedom of speech and press. But we see no reasonable connection between legitimate measures of this sort, which can be enforced without impinging on civil liberties, and the kind of measures flooding the present session of Congress. Most dangerous of these, because it has already passed both houses, is the military-disaffection bill, a hardy perennial sponsored this year by Senator Walsh. Its terms are so broad, it was pointed out by a minority report in the House last year, that under it newspaper editors who oppose larger arms appropriations might be prosecuted and private homes invaded. Persons could be arrested for possessing literature which might lead to "disaffection" among soldiers or sailors. A measure of this kind would come more appropriately from Japanese militarists, who employ just such means to suppress "dangerous thoughts." Similarly un-American, in the true meaning of that much-abused term, are the Smith omnibus-gag bill, the federal-sedition bill, and the Hobbs "concentration-camp" bill.

The main strength of the current drive against civil liberties derives from the fears inevitably aroused in a period of social change. In this respect the present does not differ markedly from other periods of change in the seventy-five years of The Nation's history. The Radical Reconstructionists, the Grangers, the early labor leaders, the Populists, all looked as dangerous in their time as the New Dealers, and bogyman terms were used then as now to kill a reform movement by giving it a bad name. Reaction has found new and unexpected allies during the past year, but that only makes it necessary to fight the harder. In some ways we have less cause for hysteria than our fathers did. If a Browder answered "None" falsely to a routine passport question, a Berkman actually shot a steel magnate. Today The Nation fights legislation dangerous to civil liberties for the same reason as in the past. What is at stake is that right of free discussion without which peaceful reform is impossible. We apologize for repeating these platitudes, but it is all too clear that a good many people have yet to recognize their truth.

America Looks East

WITH the expiration of the trade treaty with Japan, the Far Eastern relations of the United States enter a new and crucial stage. If we look back over the past forty years we find that American policy in the Far East shows a remarkable consistency. The basis of this policy has been the belief that the interests of this country, as well as those of the world as a whole, are best served by a strong, independent China. This policy was incorporated in the Nine-Power Treaty of 1922 guaranteeing the territorial and administrative integrity of the Republic of China. Repeated flagrant violations of this agreement by Japan have led the United States to sever its treaty relations with Tokyo in order to be free to take such action as may be necessary in defense of America's traditional rights in the East. At least one observer—Walter Lippmann—sees the abrogation of the trade treaty as a major step toward war. Senator Vandenberg, who instigated the move, denies this but says that imposition of an embargo would bring this country to the brink of hostilities. In view of these alarmist statements, it might be well to consider, as realistically as possible, the dangers which lurk in the complex situation in the Far East today.

Lippmann fears that the Japanese will resort to more and more desperate expedients as their situation becomes more and more desperate, and will give vent to their anger by seeking to destroy the power of Britain and France in the Far East. The United States will presumably become involved in war by coming to the rescue of the Western powers, since their interests are in many respects identical with those of this country. No one can say that this cannot happen. The whole course of Japanese policy in the months immediately preceding the outbreak of the European war pointed in this direction. But since the signing of the Soviet-German pact destroyed the basis of Japanese foreign policy, Tokyo has directed its efforts toward an understanding with the West. Except for a spasmodic renewal of the Tientsin blockade, no new provocative steps have been taken against Britain or France. The fact that negotiations for the settlement of the border dispute with the Soviet Union have broken down places the Japanese under increasing pressure to patch up affairs with the West.

This development should also have considerable effect on American policy. For several months warnings have been heard that drastic action by the United States in imposing an embargo on war supplies might drive Japan directly into the arms of the Soviet Union. But once the embargo was imposed, Japan would hardly be worth courting as an ally, or worth appeasing as a dangerous enemy. Japan is cut off from all European sources of supply; this country has been furnishing over 75 per cent of its essential war materials and nearly a third of the foreign exchange needed to buy these products. Unless this aid is continued, Japan will rapidly degenerate into a third- or fourth-class military power.

It does not look as if an embargo were likely to be imposed, for a time at least. This leaves Japan relatively strong but, as Nathaniel Peffer points out elsewhere in this issue, completely at the mercy of the United States. If we are to judge by the Administration's present attitude, the Japanese could probably escape penalties altogether if they promised to recognize America's basic rights in China and gave evidence of being able to live up to this promise. Actually, however, Tokyo is in no position to make such a promise because the military clique which is in the saddle in the occupied sections of China would not honor it. Respect for American rights in China would involve abandonment of all that Japan has been fighting for these past eight years. The New Order in East Asia has had as its primary objective the closing of doors to Western trade in China, so as to reserve the Chinese market exclusively for Japan. We may assume, therefore, that Japan will not cease discriminating against American trade. This means that the United States may very quickly find itself in a position where it must either adopt concrete measures to force Japan to give way, or surrender all the advantages it has gained through termination of the treaty. Mild measures, such as the imposition of a 25 per cent countervailing duty, may be taken as a sign of weakness and are more likely to invite retaliation than is a complete embargo.

Fortunately, Japan's capacity for retaliation is drastically limited. It might take measures against American missionaries and business men in China. It might declare a blockade against China and interfere with American shipping on grounds that supplies were reaching the enemy. Farther it could hardly go. But as none of these steps would inconvenience the United States to anything like the degree that an embargo would affect Japan, this country could well afford to hold out for Japanese capitulation.

The danger that Japan might resort to war against the United States cannot be wholly ignored, but it is a comparatively minor risk. Japan is certainly in no position to fight a war with a major power at present. If a war did develop between Japan and the United States, the chances are that—like the present war in Europe—it would be an economic rather than a military conflict, and even this seems unlikely.

Recent political changes in Japan indicate that the military extremists are losing strength primarily because of the unfavorable foreign situation. Prompt and resolute action by the United States, as ex-Secretary Stimson has pointed out, is best calculated to strengthen the moderates against the clique which has brought Japan to the brink of ruin.

Godkin's "Nation"

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

FOUNDED immediately after the greatest war in history up to that time, The Nation reaches its seventy-fifth anniversary with Europe in the middle of a devastating and needless conflict. I often wish that Godkin were alive now to scourge the British statesmen so largely responsible for this war, for he had the most powerful editorial pen ever wielded in this country—a pen backed by a fund of knowledge and a passion for righteousness and justice never surpassed in the history of daily and weekly journalism in the United States. No man ever entered upon an American editorial career better equipped for it than he, with wide knowledge of this country, Ireland, England, and the Continent, experience as a correspondent in the Crimean War, and a magnificent style.

Mr. Godkin's editorial associate in The Nation's establishment was Wendell Phillips Garrison, son of William Lloyd Garrison, and later son-in-law of J. Miller McKim, a Quaker Abolitionist of Philadelphia, who had gone with Mrs. John Brown to Harper's Ferry to bring Brown's body back to molder in the grave. McKim contributed to the financing of the new magazine. Few people realize, perhaps, that the main purpose behind the founding of The Nation was to champion the newly freed slaves and to work for a square deal for them. That our government did so little for the former slaves seems incredible in these days of social security, WPA, and so many other enterprises for keeping American citizens alive and creating employment for them. The government of Andrew Johnson thought the establishment of the Freedmen's Bureau under the direction of General O. O. Howard all that was necessary. Had there been the vision then to create educational institutions for the Negro throughout the South, to purchase land for the settlement of capable Negro farmers, and to supply them with the necessary working capital and equipment, the whole story of Reconstruction must have been different, especially if right-minded and just Southerners of the type of Robert E. Lee, P. T. Beauregard, and John B. Gordon had been drawn into such an undertaking.

The Nation editors themselves had no such far-reaching vision, but they did make every effort for elemental justice for the freedman. Gradually, however, this prime purpose of The Nation became less and less important. Godkin had a genius for politics, for analyzing issues and exposing political frauds, and was far too big a man to be tied down to one cause. He had his limitations, which I have often stressed; they were the limitations of the followers of the Manchester school in England, of Cobden and of Bright. Labor questions Mr. Godkin rarely judged aright. On the question of the enfranchisement of women his blind eye was at the telescope, though he fought bravely for their higher education and achieved a great deal, much more than he has been given credit for. He was one of the first American editors of the post-Civil War era to sound an authoritative note in dealing with foreign problems; his "leaders" on Europe never failed to attract attention on both sides of the Atlantic. The measure of his judgment and power in dealing with domestic affairs is found in the fact that no historian can write of the history of the United States from 1865 to 1905 without turning to the pages of this journal. There is not another weekly embalmed in our public libraries that is so often quoted by historians and so regularly treated as an authoritative source.

If Godkin was, as James Bryce called him, "a stringent economist" of the "old orthodox type," he was always clearness and courage personified. "The paper was the man, and the man was the paper." And the man never advocated anything that he did not believe in with passionate conviction. Never did he stop to consider the interests of the stockholders; so that the paper was often in financial difficulties and was perishing when it came into the hands of Henry and Fanny Garrison Villard in 1881. Bryce also pointed out that Godkin's judgments were severe because of the rigidity of his standards; he might have added that these standards were higher than any so far set up in American journalism. Bryce, often a politician himself, felt that they were at times too high; he remonstrated with Godkin for not allowing sufficiently for the "difficulties in which honorable and public-spirited men are placed by the exigencies of practical politics." But Godkin, being wholly outside the political game, was able to see how bitterly the American people often paid for those compromises, how many times they were unnecessary, how often politicians compromised before there was any exigency.

I defy any fair-minded man to read The Nation of Godkin and Garrison and deny their high-mindedness and the extraordinary accuracy of their judgments as a whole when tested by the lapse of years. Of course they made errors, but their batting average remains amazingly high, much higher, I believe, than any of their compromising contemporaries. With thoughtful people it was Godkin's sincerity which counted. That offset his acerbity, the sharpness of his pen, his refusal to forgive or forget the peccadillos and sins of men sworn to serve the people faithfully and honestly. It is the unpurchasable integrity of these two editors which has made the pages of their Nation live to this day.

It is indicative of their influence that the author of the new book commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the publication of Bryce's "American Commonwealth" criticizes Bryce for having been so influenced by Godkin and his followers. Bryce to his lasting discredit, after having accepted great aid from Mr. Godkin, who read and revised both manuscript and proofs and even wrote a portion of the two volumes, never made adequate acknowledgment of Mr. Godkin's contributions to the "American Commonwealth," while thanking others like my father, who supplied the chapter on railroads. Yet Bryce, like every other commentator upon the American scene of that time, would have been under deep obligation to the editor of The Nation even if Mr. Godkin had never seen those epoch-making volumes until they came from the press. As William C. Brownell once wrote of Godkin, "real politics had been the study of his life," and he brought to bear upon them "the treasures of a mind stored in history and economics and statecraft, as well as trained by systematic reflection."

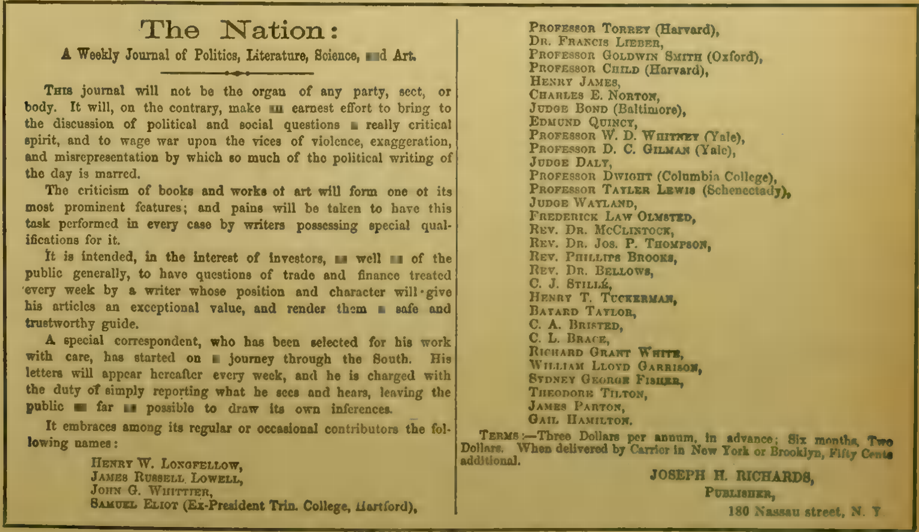
Equally free was the literary department of his Nation. There, since I am related to Wendell Phillips Garrison, and was bound to him by ties of deepest personal affection, I must let others tell the story. To quote Bryce again, "A better literary editor than Mr. Garrison it would have been impossible to find." Lord Bryce added in The Nation of July 8, 1915:

> He wrote very little himself. . . . But he was an excellent judge of good writing, and took endless pains always to search out not only the most accomplished writers but the men most competent to deal with any particular subject. His standard of excellence was as high as that of the best literary journals of Europe. It may, indeed, be doubted whether any of these journals maintained so uniformly high a level. The book notices for which he was responsible as editor were free from bias, were replete with knowledge, were thorough and discriminating in their treatment.

Mr. Brownell, long a member of the staff, admired Godkin fervently, and he too declared that Godkin was The Nation. But he added: "Yet it is also true to say that without Mr. Garrison The Nation could hardly have existed. He not only kept all the machinery going, but kept it working smoothly and in strict correspondence with its exacting standards. . . . His success was due to his character. To an extremely fastidious, even rigid, literary scrupulousness, he added a conscience that worked with it." Contrary to the general belief that the literary Nation of those days was extremely conservative if not reactionary, Mr. Brownell like others bore witness that Garrison "lived habitually on a plane where precedent and convention had in themselves no sanction, no meaning. And the columns of The Nation in many subtle ways were infiltrated with his moral independence and ideality."

Naturally the determination of Mr. Garrison to treat every book as a trust, to be reviewed only by the most competent men in the United States, Canada, or England, without regard to any timeliness, was the despair of the business office and a source of deep irritation to publishers, who were furious when a review appeared three or six months after the publication of the book. Even then the review often killed the volume or exalted it to the highest position. The reviews were never signed (the names of the critics were written against their articles in the bound office files), but invariably they showed that the writer knew as much about the subject as the author. Never was so great a reviewing staff brought together by any journal published in the English language.

Here are some of the names that prove this statement: Henry James (both father and son); William James; Charles Eliot Norton; Frederick Law Olmsted; George P. Marsh; James Russell Lowell, Longfellow, and Whittier; Chauncey Wright; William Dwight Whitney; Francis Wayland; Hermann von Holst; Thomas Wentworth Higginson; Carl Schurz; Willard Fiske; Leslie Stephen,



The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW,
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,
JOHN G. WHITTIER,
SAMUEL ELIOT (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford),
PROFESSOR TORREY (Harvard),
DR. FRANCIS LIEBER,
PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH (Oxford),
PROFESSOR CHILD (Harvard),
HENRY JAMES,
CHARLES E. NORTON,
JUDGE BOND (Baltimore),
EDMUND QUINCY,
PROFESSOR W. D. WHITNEY (Yale),
PROFESSOR D. C. GILMAN (Yale),
JUDGE DALY,
PROFESSOR DWIGHT (Columbia College),
PROFESSOR TAYLER LEWIS (Schenectady),
JUDGE WAYLAND,
FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED,
REV. DR. MCCLINTOCK,
REV. DR. JOS. P. THOMPSON,
REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS,
REV. DR. BELLOWS,
C. J. STILLÉ,
HENRY T. TUCKERMAN,
BAYARD TAYLOR,
C. A. BRISTED,
C. L. BRACE,
RICHARD GRANT WHITE,
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON,
SYDNEY GEORGE FISHER,
THEODORE TILTON,
JAMES PARTON,
GAIL HAMILTON.

TERMS:—Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS,
PUBLISHER,
180 Nassau street, N. Y.

[This statement of policy and list of contributors appeared first in the issue of July 27, 1865.]

A. V. Dicey, and Bryce among many from England; William Francis Allen; Michael Heilprin; Daniel C. Gilman; William Dean Howells; Simon Newcomb; Henry C. Lea; Fitzedward Hall; General Jacob D. Cox; Charles Francis Adams; David A. Wells; Asa Gray, the great botanist; Judge C. C. Nott; Charles W. Eliot; from the Harvard and Yale faculties a great number such as W. G. Sumner, Thomas R. Lounsbury, W. W. Goodwin, C. H. Toy, Charles H. Moore, E. W. Gurney, George L. Goodale, Basil K. Gildersleeve—the whole list would cover pages and would contain about every eminent name in the literary and university world of that period.

Both Godkin and Garrison were modest, retiring men; Godkin was shy, avoided all publicity, never made a speech or a public appearance, and was destitute of almost all the qualities that have distinguished so many successful American editors. He rarely sought the acquaintance of public men and never tried to influence them by personal contacts. For a time he edited The Nation from Cambridge, leaving the entire conduct of the paper to Garrison. With years his shyness increased; when he went to the Evening Post in 1881 he did not make a practice of knowing all the men on the staff and often failed to recognize some who had been years in the office. This naturally led to his being considered a snob—and he did have snobbish tendencies, for he never overcame the caste spirit which he had imbibed with his English education.

This tendency contrasted strangely with his sincere and complete faith in democracy and democratic institutions. Being an absolutely loyal American, with a great sense of humor for all his outward austerity, he was only amused by the story that he and his staff sang "God Save the Queen" before beginning the daily editorial council and by the constant assertion that he received Cobden Club gold from England for his advocacy of free trade. So far was he from being an admirer of the British Tories and Conservatives that he opposed England's war upon the Boers with the same vigor with which he had denounced Cleveland's Venezuelan message, with its threat of war against England.

As he grew older he dropped office duties and responsibilities more and more and was interested only in his contributions to the editorial page. "I see no visitors until one," he once said, "and at one I go home." To that home came many of the most intellectual and interesting and social-minded men and women of the day. For one whose orbit was so limited, he kept himself amazingly well informed about what was going on in public life; his correspondence, while never as voluminous as that of Garrison, was none the less of great value and interest. It must not be thought, however, that he was a conservative whose interests were bound up with those of the intellectuals and well-bred old New Yorkers in whose set he moved. Wall Street hated him and the Evening Post and The Nation. He was considered dangerously radical as well as cantankerous and atrabilious by the business world and most of the privileged, who often urged him "to go back where he came from." In labor circles he was believed to be a dyed-in-the-wool conservative and bitterly hostile to trade unionism. As a matter of fact he never deviated from his high liberal standards, and no influences could "reach" or affect him. He delivered the most tremendous and most sustained assaults upon political corruption in this country that ever came from any editor's pen, and never worried about what was said of him unless there were imputations against his good name or integrity.

Mr. Garrison lived only for his family and his work. Few men have had such rich stores of knowledge and left so few written records. He deliberately made up his mind that, except for the four-volume life of his father, of which he was the chief creator, he could not or would not be both editor and author, and so he put his rare knowledge exclusively at The Nation's service. That was his life; he poured all his creative ability into the successful effort to bring to literary journalism the highest scholarship and to political journalism the soundest as well as the most brilliant writing of the most competent men.

When Mr. Garrison relinquished The Nation in 1906, its circulation had shrunk to pitifully small figures. This was not merely because his age had taken toll of the weekly's freshness and variety. The field had changed. The war with Spain inaugurated not only a new political but also a new literary era. New England had flowered and withered. The imperialist period of our history was beginning. New times, new standards, new men. The Nation of Godkin and Garrison could not have lived longer. Its remodeling in 1918 into a journal far more akin in some respects to The Nation of 1865 was inevitable. But the past was secure.

What these men had given to their country was the most completely independent and uncontrolled journal that could be created, free from owner influence, free from any consideration of advertisers or readers. Nothing hampered them in carrying out their ideals. They were forward-looking, progressive, even radical for their times—often far in advance of them. The research student and journalist of today, looking over The Nation's files, often finds them academic, and even suggests that the paper was remote from the popular currents of its period. This is only partially true. The difficulty of the historian of 1940 is that he cannot project himself into the days in which these men lived; only rarely does he know or understand the America of Garrison and Godkin. When he does, as was the case, for example, with the historian James Ford Rhodes, he is aware that these editors knew their America, recorded its history, and helped to shape its political and social and literary thought more than any other editors of the time.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Villard's "Nation"

BY LEWIS S. GANNETT

I DOUBT that there was ever another such journalistic heaven as was The Nation in the early post-war years. I came back from France that autumn of 1919 with one ambition in all the world: to land a job on Villard's Nation. I knew what I wanted, and was blissful when I got it: half-time at first, and small pay.

Those were rousing days on Vesey Street. Every week's issue was a new adventure. The country was still in a state of war shock: it was blockading Germans, seeing reds under every bed, crushing strikes in the name of freedom. And yet there was a breeze of hope in the air, a stirring all around the world. The British Labor Party seemed about to reshape England by a peaceful, democratic revolution; the new German Republic was giving women the vote and establishing works councils in every factory; Russia was a land of wild surmises, where every new and hopeful experiment might be tried out for an eager world to watch. Here at home we had the Plumb plan, a sort of industrial republic for the railroads; new unions about to organize the steel mills; labor banks booming; a hope of a great Farmer-Labor Party—in 1924 it seemed about to flower with La Follette. And there was exhilaration in fighting the whole wicked world.

Was there ever a day when the American press did quite as much lying? Even the "crusading" New York World waited until after the steel strike was crushed to tell a little truth about it; we on The Nation had fresh news, not printed in the big papers, almost every week. The Times and the other papers were killing off Lenin and Trotsky and crushing the Russian Revolution three times a week; we had our own reports. We were the first to print, in the International Relations Section, the new Russian constitution, the anti-imperialist treaties, new land laws in the border republics, as well as to expose secret treaties pre- and post-war, suppressed reports of pogroms in Poland, and documents on skulduggery in five continents. It is almost impossible to believe today that a world could ever have seemed so full of hope—or so full of such sinister machinations as The Nation was privileged to expose, week after week.

It was an exciting office in which to work. Most of us were young, and a little afraid of austere William MacDonald, who set our grammar straight and threw out our more extreme effusions. (But it was MacDonald himself who, when New Yorkers were sleeping in the streets, wrote that famous editorial, Seize Every Empty House, which so shocked Oswald Villard on his return from the West.) When, in 1922, the staff celebrated Villard's fiftieth birthday, it seemed to many of us that he was a phenomenally well-preserved old man. Among ourselves, we said that we admired him because he had had the courage to change his views on so many questions after reaching the hale old age of forty, when most men's minds were crusted; but when we tried to suggest that to our chief, he would thunder that he had never wavered from the true Godkin-Garrison-Villard tradition.

Albert Jay Nock was halfway on and halfway off the staff, dreaming of his brief and brilliant Freeman; he would read bits of "Wolfville" and of Artemus Ward at staff dinners. Henry Mussey, in one of his unprofessorial interludes, was our managing editor. Soon after Mussey returned to academic pastures, Ernest Gruening breezed into the office, charging in a dozen directions at once. We saved Haiti week after week, until the grateful Haitians proposed erecting a statue to Gruening's living memory. We got the troops out of Santo Domingo. It was Gruening who planned and carried out the famous series of articles on These United States. He was a man of sterling editorial principles. If memory serves me right, he persuaded both Carl Sandburg and Edgar Lee Masters to write articles on Illinois, and then rejected them both as not up to our penny-a-word standard. With difficulty we reverent juniors persuaded him not to reject Dreiser's article on Indiana.

It was Ernest Gruening's comfortable theory that an article, if you keep it long enough, always becomes timely. No matter what world-shaking event blazed in the newspaper headlines, he could always rummage in a desk drawer and come out with a "timely" article to meet the situation. In off weeks he went back to saving Haiti. Mr. Villard sometimes thought that Haiti wasn't really lead-article subject matter more than once or twice a month.

Gruening also was the staff lowbrow. Most of us were soundly in awe of Carl Van Doren and Ludwig Lewisohn; if they said a poem was good, we believed it, whether we could understand it or not. I once innocently spoiled one of Ernest's efforts to prove that we were wrong. I was closing the forms at the Nation Press one Tuesday morning, when a printer came to me querying a four-line poem at the foot of a column. It didn't make sense, he said. I thought perhaps a line had fallen out, and tried to find the original manuscript; I sought vainly to telephone Carl Van Doren. Finally, I took the quatrain out, and somehow filled the space. Carl, when located, said he had never seen the lines; Ernest Gruening, we discovered, had composed a little free verse of his own, with no meaning whatever, and believed that no reader would recognize it as different from the modern poetry selected by our literary editor.

Those were the days when "Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana" won our poetry prize, Gruening and Villard's negative votes being outweighed by the enthusiastic juniors of the staff. Bob Benchley celebrated that poem with a famous parody, "Cold Mornings Have Been in Bensonhurst," and the prize-winner had cards printed reading, "Eli Siegel, Author of Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana."

Norman Thomas was with us for two years; shy Arthur Gleason tried for a time to match his analytic spirit with our crusading zeal. George Soule, now of the New Republic, was briefly on the staff; so was Stuart Chase, but he had a flip way of throwing custard pies in his paragraphs which irked Mr. Villard's sense of the paper's dignity. Mr. Villard was a fighting liberal who yearned to be a sound conservative. He never wanted to do what Godkin and Garrison would not have done, and he always had to be persuaded into any break with tradition. Such liberals are often more effective than those who battle on all fronts at once, yet I still think that Stuart Chase writes rousing American English.

We all had a reverence for good writing though we differed in our definition of the word "good"; and in those days proofreading was an art. George Schumm, who had given his life to proofreading for lost causes, was our tutor. (He had worked for twenty years with Benjamin R. Tucker, that philosopher of American individualism who never rated a showing in "Who's Who" but had a half column in the "Encyclopedia Britannica," by Prince Kropotkin; Tucker died last year, without an obit in the newspapers of his own country.) I remember a succession of evening sessions—we were eager to work overtime—at which we hotly argued the more controversial uses of commas, colons, capitals, and italics. Under Carl Van Doren's leadership we reedited the University of Chicago Style Book; and Papa Schumm held us to it rigidly.

Art Young The Nation, October 24, 1923

Introducing the Monster

"We feel that you folks ought to get acquainted with this fellow."

Carl Van Doren was, I still think, the greatest literary editor of this century. He had a genius for recognizing budding talent; the best young men and women in all the country's universities were proud to review for him; and when he painstakingly cut their prolix writing to the bone, and sent them proofs of his abridged versions of their scripts, they would write back thanking him, saying that they had not realized they could write so well. We believed in "editing," and learned to do it conscientiously. It was The Nation's province, then as now, to recognize the important in a swamp of ill-written words, and to snake it out of the mire. The Nation never paid well; but people wrote avidly, from universities and from mining camps, eager to tell a story that the newspapers were missing. (Silas Bent coined the epigram: "To read The Nation is a necessity; to write for it is a luxury.") Freda Kirchwey developed a special genius at reworking manuscripts which at first seemed impossible, preserving the personality of the writer yet organizing a mushy text into new coherence and force.

It wasn't only the inarticulate who wrote for us; some of the best writers in America appeared in our pages, often as not anonymously. I understood what style meant when, making up the editorial pages, I found it necessary to add or subtract a line from Ludwig Lewisohn's copy, to bring the columns out even. Usually it was easy to insert or excise an adjective, or rephrase a sentence, to fill or cut a line. But the smallest word changed in Lewisohn's text obviously spoiled the rhythm. That was true only to a lesser extent of Joseph Wood Krutch's flowing prose.

Arthur Warner, best loved and most crotchety of the staff, had a special collection of hobbies. He hated the invading automobiles; and he loved to write of good American food. To that writing he brought a passion born of the fact that his own diet was perforce almost entirely restricted to milk toast, made with whole-wheat bread. Warner was the staff handy man; it was he who exposed the "Myth of Calvin Coolidge" and therewith coined a phrase that became part of the language. Warner joined The Nation on his way out from the old New York Evening Post, then in the same building with us. He stopped on the fourth floor to report that he had been fired for writing a round-robin in behalf of a surreptitious newspapermen's union, and was promptly taken on The Nation's staff. Later, from our office, he made another effort to organize such a union; Heywood Broun became its president, and so in a sense Warner as much as Broun was founder of the now flourishing Newspaper Guild. Broun too joined The Nation as a regular when the World dropped him, and his shambling presence added a new note to our Thursday morning editorial conferences.

The Nation had inherited plenty of causes from Godkin and Garrison; each week it took on new ones. It was avowedly and outspokenly a fighting, muckraking magazine. In the early years we worked at getting the Allies out of Russia; soon we were feeding the victims of famine. We were the first to denounce the Treaty of Versailles. Ernest Gruening lived in a perpetual anti-lynching crusade, and kept a special eye on Mexico and the Caribbean. Bill Hard came up from Washington and announced his expectation of blasting five members out of the Harding Cabinet; ably assisted by the elder La Follette, Wheeler, Walsh, and others, he almost succeeded. We were always eager to second that grandest of all the old Romans, George Norris of Nebraska, in what then seemed his almost hopeless crusade to save Muscle Shoals from the spoilsmen; few then dared to dream of such a Utopia as the TVA of today. The fabulous Paul Anderson, who succeeded Hard as our Washington correspondent, of course dared anything—dream or attack—and was miraculously effective.

One morning Dr. W. J. Maloney walked into conference with a plan to scare Britain into recalling the Black and Tans from Ireland. Before noon The Nation's Committee of One Hundred on Ireland was born; within a few months the famous Commission of Inquiry was sitting in Washington, and the Black and Tan atrocities were forced on public attention. The lovely Muriel and the fierce Mary MacSwiney came to America under our auspices, and in time the Republic of Eire was born. We felt partially responsible.

We sent Carleton Beals to Nicaragua to interview Sandino, the little rebel general for whom the American army was hunting in vain; Beals found him, and The Nation scored an impressive "scoop." Mr. Villard sent me off to China just in time to catch the leaders of both wings of the embryonic Nationalist state idling in Canton. Joseph Wood Krutch, Tennessee-born, interpreted Darrow, Bryan, and the "monkey trial" in Dayton as only an enlightened Tennessean could. Freda Kirchwey was always discovering and defending rebels in the colleges; she was also the New Woman editor, the Sex editor, and the Modern Morals editor. She edited the symposium on "Our Changing Morality" which later appeared in book form; she also assembled the series of anonymous autobiographies of "These Modern Women," which, had they been signed, would have produced an even bigger stir. Civilization was at the crossroads every week; some flip editor suggested that as a standing head for our lead editorial.

Boardman Robinson The Nation, September 7, 1927

The noble succession of Van Dorens—Carl, Irita, Mark, and Dorothy—held the journal's literary standards high; there was a strange interlude when big-hearted John Macy dealt out books to reviewers selected rather for their need of money than for their authority. Macy's own criticism was incisive, his judgment of reviewers almost purely humanitarian.

Always "the Boss" was the heart of the paper. Villard's infectious moral indignation inspired us all; his natural gift for story-telling made his every return from an out-of-town crusade an adventure for the staff; his genius for friendship constantly brought new life into our pages. He had that capacity for perpetual excitement which is the essential of the good newspaperman. Sometimes we thought him too loyal to the Godkin-Garrison tradition; it was only after a long fight that Freda Kirchwey succeeded in introducing cartoons into the paper's chaste pages. When, in 1925, we actually printed a script for a "movie"—Mr. Villard insisted that we put that word in quotation marks, or else say "motion picture"—he felt we had betrayed him in his absence.

Sometimes, outvoted by his juniors, our democratic leader turned dictator, and vetoed our frivolous revolutions—in perspective one can see that he was often right. He wouldn't let us print an irreverent, rollicking piece that Bill Hard wrote about him, exposing him as a thunderer in public, who had "made more acres of public men acutely miserable, per unit of circulation, than any other editor alive," but a sunny story-teller in private, almost enjoying his own embittered indignations. Hard even burst into verse:

When Oswald isn't following his employment—his employment
Of devastating all the public scene,
His capacity for innocent enjoyment—cent enjoyment
Would make the joyous public man turn green.

We cussed him and loved him, listened and learned. The Nation of the nineteen twenties was a great school —for its editors and for America. What "Main Street," "Winesburg, Ohio," and "Spoon River" were in other fields of literature, The Nation was to journalism. It still is.

"Free Inquiry and Free Endeavor"

BY I. F. STONE

TO UNDERSTAND The Nation's past one must understand Edwin Lawrence Godkin. Godkin was more than the founder of The Nation. Though many other able and brilliant men contributed regularly to its pages, The Nation for more than thirty years was synonymous with Godkin and Godkin with The Nation. His approach to economic problems, that of a laissez faire liberal, still dominated The Nation at its fiftieth birthday, thirteen years after his death. Godkin's moralistic approach to politics and politicians, which made him seem a Jeremiah to his admirers and a cantankerous perfectionist to his critics, was also Oswald Garrison Villard's and may still be found in the pages of The Nation. Godkin's most admirable characteristic as an editor was his independence, and this is still The Nation's ideal.

Godkin's independence was part of the atmosphere in which he was reared. His father was a Presbyterian minister in Catholic Ireland, but one whose devotion to Home Rule cost him his pulpit. Godkin's basic ideas on economics and society were acquired in the '40's. He entered Queen's College, Belfast, in 1846, and there, as he wrote many years later, "John Stuart Mill was our prophet, and Grote and Bentham were our daily food." These writers, fast becoming little more than names, were once new windows on the world. To a generation brought up on the history of Greece as written by Whig or Tory to illustrate "the dangerous turbulence of democracy," Grote's "History," with its glamorous picture of Athenian self-government as seen through the eyes of a philosophical radical, came as an inspiring revelation.

The outlines of a collectivist future that Godkin always regarded as the shadow of outworn fallacies rather than of coming truths were already visible in positivism and the first writings of socialism, in Mill's own budding doubts, and in the very rationale of utilitarianism itself. But to the young men of the British middle classes in Godkin's student days, and for many years after, laissez faire liberalism was almost a religious faith. The complex of ideas that now provides the toothless apologetics of an American Liberty League was then a rich and blooming hope. Like Marxism later, it seemed to promise an end of tyranny, poverty, ignorance, and war; and like Marxism it seemed no utopian dream but a body of inescapable conclusions from the observed facts of history and human nature. The visible embodiment of these ideals, the proof of their practicability, the guaranty of their ultimate achievement, was America, as Soviet Russia was to be for many radicals in our time. "I have said," Godkin wrote, "that John Stuart Mill was our prophet, but America was our promised land. To the scoffs of the Tories that our schemes were impracticable, our answer was that in America, barring slavery, they were actually at work." Their knowledge of America, as he recorded it, was drawn largely from de Tocqueville, and they could have had no better guide, for the latter's vision was distorted neither by millennial delusions nor by aristocratic antipathy.

These were the sources of the ideals and preconceptions with which Godkin, after turning down the editorship of the Belfast Whig, came to America in 1856, "on the eve of the Presidential election. The air . . . full of the discussion about slavery. The excitement . . . tremendous." Three months after Appomattox he launched The Nation, its name the product of a boyhood admiration for a weekly of the same name established in Dublin in 1842 and described as "remarkable for its talent, for its seditious tendencies, and for the fire and spirit of its political poetry."

When the first issue of The Nation appeared, on July 6, 1865, Godkin was thirty-three. He was to change little, but America much, before he relinquished the editorship in 1899. The Nation and its founder started under certain initial disadvantages. Their idealism could have found no more incongruous setting than the America of the Gilded Age. The laissez faire that The Nation was to preach, though one of the favorite optical illusions of American politics and constitutional law, was never really a dominant American philosophy. Business men opposed government aid to workers and farmers, and workers and farmers opposed government aid to business. But neither opposed government aid to themselves.

If Cobden symbolizes British capitalism, Hamilton symbolizes American, and Hamilton, with his plea for protective tariffs and subsidies, and his frank manipulation of governmental devices to encourage enterprise, was no follower of Adam Smith. Free trade itself began to seem a device for maintaining British industrial supremacy; French and German policy alike soon turned Hamiltonian to build up national industries. Our business interests have always found their political vehicle in parties which never permitted lip service to laissez faire to interfere with aid to business—the Federalists under Hamilton, the Whigs under Clay and Webster, the Republicans through McKinley to Hoover. The Jeffersonians, it is true, believed that government best which governs least, but our parties of the lower middle class, whether under Jefferson, Jackson, Wilson, or Franklin D. Roosevelt, were as ready as the Hamiltonians to use state power, when in office, for the advancement of their own class interests and economic welfare. Our early working-class movements, as far back as the 1830's, were socialistic, and if British middle-class intellectuals in the '40's read Mill, American middle-class intellectuals in the '40's grew up in the shadow of Brook Farm, discussed Fourierism, and encountered socialism in Horace Greeley's Tribune.

Out of power each of the two major parties was wont to denounce the other for using the state for its own purposes, and laissez faire slogans came to be more and more strongly used to combat social legislation from the '70's on. Charles A. Dana set the fashion of preaching rugged individualism to workers while advocating higher tariffs for the manufacturers and bigger land grants for the railroad promoters. But to advocate laissez faire consistently and honestly, as The Nation and Godkin did, was to adopt a lonely and ineffectual attitude—hostile to the capitalist trend toward monopoly, hostile to the agrarian cry for regulation of railroads and business, hostile to the workers' attempts at collective action. In England the advocate of laissez faire marched in the triumphant ranks of the merchants and manufacturers; in America he fought a hopeless rear-guard action in the retreating forces of small business men, rentiers, and the Adams family. The Nation under Godkin attacked the Grangers, the Populists, the trade unions, the single-taxers, and the Socialists, as well as the trusts, the railroad barons, the tariff log-rollers, and the stockjobbing financiers. But the second group was to transform our economy and the first our politics until laissez faire liberalism, once a revolutionary and liberating force, became the slogan of reactionaries. The Nation, which was always liberal, thus grew less and less progressive. Finally, separated from the genteel and enlightened free-trade conservatism of the pre-war New York Evening Post, The Nation from 1917 on was to become what its founder would have termed "communistic."

SCHOLARS AND GENTLEMEN

Godkin and his pre-war successors labored under another disadvantage. They were not merely intellectuals; they were also gentlemen. They were fastidious to begin with, and history in the making is sadly unrefined. At their worst they grew querulous, and seemed to scold rather than instruct. Wendell Phillips Garrison, Horace White, Rollo Ogden, Harold de Wolf Fuller, Paul Elmer More, Hammond Lamont were all what it was once customary to term men of good family. Some of them, like Godkin himself as he grew older, tended to be snobbish. The pages of the old Nation are full of amusing illustrations of this tendency. It was always calling men it disliked "vulgar," and Dana found no better way to make Godkin writhe than by referring to him in print as "Larry" Godkin. To Godkin commenting on the Commune in Paris, "perhaps the most striking incident of the crisis" was that "veritable workingmen sit in council in the gilded saloons of the Hotel de Ville and are waited upon by lackeys in livery." Godkin could be more Tory than the Tories in his social prejudices. In 1900 we find him mourning the fact that since Peel's day the English upper classes "have never been content with a statesman of their own order" but had picked in Disraeli "a Jewish literary adventurer" (this was snobbery, not anti-Semitism) and in Joseph Chamberlain "a dealer in screws." Godkin wrote of Mill, "He suffered in his treatment of all the questions of the day from excess of culture and deficiency of blood"; but the judgment applies far better to Godkin and his pre-war successors than to Mill, for Mill's humanity in later years overcame his preconceptions and led him first to disavow the wage-fund theory and then to move toward socialism. It was easier for Godkin and his associates to see the absurdities than the strength of the new men and movements coming up about them: on the one hand the get-rich-quick vulgarians of capitalism, and on the other a procession of characters that seemed monstrosities to The Nation—Powderly and Debs, Donnelly and Bryan, a Coin Harvey and a Sockless Jerry Simpson.

Certain pages in the old Nation make strange reading. The Nation felt in 1865 that if the movement for an eight-hour day were successful, "the time is not far distant when all things will be in common and grass grow in Broadway." "Last winter," The Nation said in 1874 of the Granger movement for railroad regulation, "the Grangers came to the conclusion that what they wanted was reduction of the rates; next winter their fancy may take another turn, and they may think that each passenger ought to have a car for himself, with meals along the route furnished gratis by the company." In 1878 The Nation was worried because many newspapers, though "troubled by the growth of communism among the working classes in this country," yet favored the income tax. The Nation accused these newspapers of "forgetting that communistic ideas were started by the Western farmers in the Granger movement, and that nothing is more natural than that the doctrines about property which were promulgated passionately by persons who simply wished to impose on others part of the burden of carrying their goods to market, should have found expression in pillage and arson two or three years later among suffering operatives." In 1884 The Nation attacked the platform committee at that year's Republican convention for "catering to the tastes and dogmas of the Communists" because it proposed to bar contract labor, oppose acquisition of large tracts of land by corporations or individuals, and enforce the eight-hour law on government work. The Nation's advice on the Anarchist movement in 1887 was not to "be afraid of making 'martyrs' of their leading scoundrels by hanging them." "Debs Desperadoes" it named the Pullman strikers in 1894, and it called Altgeld "boorish, impudent, and ignorant" for objecting to the use of federal troops to break the strike. In Coxey's Army that same year it saw only "loafers and tramps." It defended Briand against Jaurès in 1911 after the former broke the French railway strike by martial law, and it disapproved when Lloyd George introduced a bill for sickness and unemployment insurance. It termed Theodore Roosevelt "reckless, cruel, and incendiary" in his attacks on the courts and supported Wilson in 1912, only to be disappointed when he surrendered to railway labor's demand for the eight-hour day in 1916. It thought the appointment of Louis D. Brandeis to the United States Supreme Court a mistake. The Nation felt that he had given no proof of possessing "the true judicial habit of mind."

Godkin Said—

We expect always to advocate a strict adherence to the Constitution, but not a strict construction of it. . . . No human wisdom could frame a detailed plan of government that would not at some period suffocate the nation if strictly construed.

The world has always been, is now, and ever will be ruled by brains, and the fight between progress and conservatism is to decide, not whether sloppy sentimentality or selfish tyranny shall get the upper hand, but what order of ideas brains shall serve. The reason why the whiskey ring is so powerful among us is that they have applied brains to the business of stealing and swindling, and good people have opposed to them nothing but rhetoric.

There has not been a single war of this century, not strictly defensive, which is not now condemned by the leading actors in it, and the public judgment every year follows more and more rapidly on the event, because the people in every country are every year less and less influenced by enthusiasm.

Aristocratic government was tried up to 1830, and that period was pronounced a failure. It converted the nation into an athlete of prodigious force, a bruiser of incomparable dexterity, who distributed black eyes and bloody noses over the whole earth but left his wife and family in squalor and misery. Middle-class government has now been tried ever since, and the result is a full and well-to-do merchant, whose muscle has all run to blubber, whose credit on 'Change is immense, but whose movements are so slow and uncertain and whose will is so feeble that his servants do not obey him and his neighbors laugh at him and his miserable work-people clamor every day more and more loudly for a share in his profits. [On English government.]

[The quotations from Godkin on these pages are taken from editorials in the earliest volumes of The Nation.]

LAISSEZ FAIRE PURITY

Labor didn't like the old Nation, but neither did Wall Street. The very first issue contained both an advertisement inserted by the leading financier of the time, Jay Cooke, and a criticism of him. In 1866, to those who would limit the franchise to men of property, it replied, "Wealthy men control our railroad corporations; what has been the degree of honor and regard for the public good with which these institutions have been managed?" Long before Matthew Josephson's "Robber Barons," The Nation was talking of our railroad magnates in the same terms. "No generation of feudal barons in the fourteenth century," The Nation said in 1868, ". . . ever . . . lived more openly or undisguisedly by force or fraud than do the railroad men of our time." Striking coal miners in 1871 seemed to The Nation to be engaged in an attempt to "corner" the public. But "the business of 'cornering' the public," The Nation pointed out, "that is, of extorting money from it by the sudden production of artificial scarcity for the benefit of one class or body, was first begun by capitalists for their own benefit, and they carried it on with the aid of legislation in nearly every civilized country for centuries, without admitting laborers to any share of the profits, or booty, whichever one pleases to call it." When Senator Hoar wrote Coxey that "5,000 or 10,000 men have no right to dictate to the other 65,000,000" in their demands for jobless relief, The Nation commented in a similar vein. "It is a pity," it said, "Senator Hoar did not find out sooner that he acted for a majority of the entire people, and not for 5,000 or 10,000 men. Since 1861 there have been twenty-two changes made in the tariff, all increases. Now nearly every one of these changes was made, not at the request of 65,000,000 people, but of small parties of men, sometimes solitary individuals."

In 1911 The Nation applauded when Justice Hughes for the Supreme Court held an Alabama peonage law unconstitutional, and when President Taft refused to pardon a rich man sentenced to prison for violation of the law. "Fines are not effective against men of wealth," The Nation declared, "imprisonment is necessary." In 1913 it attacked "our blatant Navy League" as formed in the interest of "battleship builders, organizers of ship trusts, and producers of nickel steel," and in a long editorial called attention to the revelations being made by "Dr. Liebknecht" in Berlin as to the part played by munitions makers in fomenting international ill-will. That same year, when the government opened its attack on George W. Perkins and the Harvester trust, The Nation dealt scornfully with the defenses customarily put forward by the trusts. "Out of court," The Nation commented, "the trust advocates never tire of inveighing against the outworn, medieval theory of competition in contrast with the new and 'inevitable' law of combination. In court they usually argue that there is no such thing as monopoly, and that equality of opportunity in business flourishes under the stimulus of scientific cooperation; cooperation being that principle of business by which George W. Perkins, instead of competing with his rivals, works harmoniously with himself."

The one public figure the old Nation really admired was Grover Cleveland, though it did not hesitate to criticize him sharply in the Venezuela incident. It stood as he did for a low tariff, economy, and clean government. In respect to this last issue The Nation was a little more than merely "goo-goo." It saw farther than the civil-service reformers with whom it went forth to battle against crooked politicians. It was not enough to place good men in public office. It was also necessary to strike at the causes of corruption. "The remedy," The Nation said after the Credit Mobilier scandal, "is simple. The government must get out of the 'protective' business and the 'subsidy' business and the 'improvement' business and the 'development' business. It must let trade, and commerce, and manufactures, and steamboats, and railroads, and telegraphs alone. It cannot touch them without breeding corruption."

THE OLD AND THE NEW

The Nation after the World War, though still an organ of middle-class intellectuals, came more and more to draw its strength from contact with and sympathy for the labor movement, and to seek a counterpoise to big business in social legislation and in the organization of farmer and worker instead of hoping for a return to laissez faire. The old Nation applauded the hanging of the Chicago Anarchists; the new fought for Sacco and Vanzetti. The old denounced Debs; the new, in 1920, urged its readers to vote for him or Christensen. The old Nation saw in social legislation a reversion to a medieval world of fixed prices and wages; the new Nation saw in it the beginnings of a new society.

But between the old Nation and the new there are also many bonds. One of the principal purposes for which The Nation was founded was to defend the interests of the newly freed Negro. It consistently opposed American imperialism and spoke in behalf of the Latin American and Filipino peoples we have from time to time oppressed and exploited. It never permitted loyalty to party or person to outweigh loyalty to truth. It always resisted jingoism and war. The yellowing pages, with their vigor, their learning, their wit, their irony, can still inspire as well as exasperate. Godkin and his associates hated cant, falsity, tyranny, buncombe. Godkin dedicated The Nation to the defense of "free inquiry and free endeavor." "Free endeavor," in the sense that Godkin understood it, is no longer The Nation's ideal; but "free inquiry" still is its language, in 1940 as in 1865.

Godkin Said—

If the devil himself were on trial, and it was found that the prosecutor was using his own weapons against him, the place of good and wise men would be on the devil's side. The devil is nothing in such a case, the maintenance of the principles against which he wars is everything. [On Johnson's impeachment.]

Well-informed and honorable men, knowing the difficulties of the work of government and fearing the consequences of error, hasten slowly and doubt intelligently at every step. They are, consequently, no match for bold and ready demagogues, unless they have public opinion behind them, like . . . "a strong wind blowing aft."

If there is one thing which experience is teaching modern nations more thoroughly than another, it is the comparative worthlessness of all political arrangements on paper, whether constitutions, treaties, or legislative acts.

The sin by which modern as well as ancient society has been most beset has been the sin of oppression, of indifference to human suffering. The political system of nearly every country in the civilized world, down to our day, has been based on the principle that the few ought to have power over the many, and ought to use it for their own benefit.

In these days, if the doors of the future are once thrown open to what are called "the masses," and they catch even one glimpse of the splendid possibilities which lie within it, it is in vain to close them again. The vision never leaves their minds.

When women vote we drop our aspirations. In that day how shall he run for the White House who wears overshoes and a bad hat and has the asthma slightly and carries an umbrella? Old stagers may then as well consider themselves razed from the book of honors, and look on photographs as a vain expense.

War and the Election

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

IT HAS been said that the 1940 Presidential campaign will be fought on the battlefields of Europe and Asia. In the sense that the various wars abroad will have a controlling effect on the economy, the thinking, and the politics of the United States in the next nine months, this statement is correct. So right, in fact, that no one can predict with precision what the issues will be or who the candidates. Reading President Roosevelt's mind would provide some of the answers but not all of them. To foretell the outcome, one would have to know as well what Hitler and Stalin are planning.

If war breaks out next spring on the western front, if incendiary bombs lay waste large sections of London, if the Russians overrun Finland and proceed to the conquest of the Scandinavian countries, if the Japanese take advantage of Britain's preoccupation with home defense to attack Hongkong—if all this happens, then American voters will be reluctant to change horses in midstream, will be disposed to concentrate on national defense, and will be little concerned with domestic issues. The worse the world turmoil, the greater will be the demand for retention of the party, the policies, and the men who have kept this country free of it.

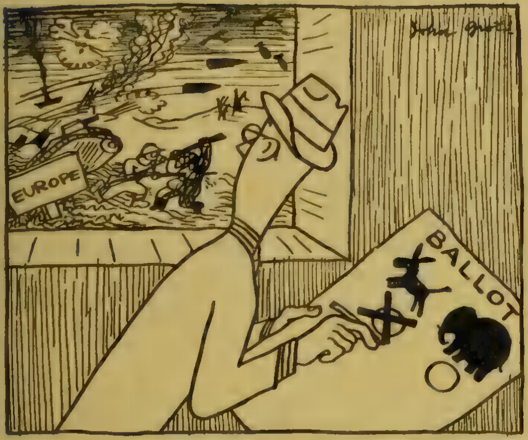
If, on the other hand, France and Great Britain should suddenly and unexpectedly make peace with the Nazis, if Russia should abandon its Finnish campaign and strike at Japan instead, if Japan under pressure should restore commercial privileges in China to Great Britain and the United States—if all these improbable events should take place, they would produce an entirely different set of circumstances in this country. The bottom would drop out of the new prosperity; there would be a quick revival of interest in domestic problems; there would be intense dissatisfaction with the party in power and a surge of sentiment for throwing the rascals out. Restoration of peace in Europe would be an unmitigated political calamity to the Roosevelt Administration.

Between these extremes of possibility, it is within the realm of reasonable speculation to assume that the wars of Europe and Asia will be intensified but not fought to any conclusion or otherwise terminated—except, perhaps, in Finland—before the Presidential election. Great Britain and France will continue to spend their cash in this country for airplanes, machinery, chemicals, and certain textiles, enlarging their orders as the rate of war destruction accelerates. Japan will continue to buy scrap iron and other necessary war materials in the United States while negotiations for a new commercial treaty proceed, with Secretary Hull using the advantage of Japanese uncertainty to drive some sort of bargain for protection of American interests in the Orient.

Assuming, then, that the war business gets better rather than worse through 1940, but not good enough to produce an inflationary boom, it is possible to draw in rough outline the economic background of the campaign. Steel will operate at or near capacity. Specialized war industries like airplanes will prosper spectacularly, carrying along automobiles and machinery. South America, cut off from German and to a certain extent British sources of supply, will buy a variety of United States manufactures. Prices, nevertheless, will remain fairly steady. With value of exports passing $350,000,000 a month at the start of the year, with unfilled airplane orders estimated at $700,000,000 in January and large plant expansion planned, the nation was already enjoying the first fruits of war economy as Presidential candidates started taking soundings of public opinion.

But there were soft spots. Europe was not buying American grain as it did in the early years of the World War. Farm prices were below parity and falling in relation to industrial prices. Almost 10,000,000 unemployed still walked the streets looking for work and finding none despite the increase in factory production, or subsisting on WPA wages, doles from local government, or the charity of friends and relatives. A WPA survey showed that only 12.7 per cent of the 775,000 reliefers dropped from federal rolls in July and August had found private employment by November; 28.4 per cent were on local relief; 26.7 had been taken back by the WPA; and the rest were drawing on meager savings or charity for support. Moreover, 77.2 per cent of those who had not regained their WPA jobs were earning less than they had previously received from the government in subsistence wages. Nowhere was their average higher than $14 a week, and in some cities it was less than $2.50. Unemployment was still the country's worst unsolved problem.

Yet the President, in his budget estimates for the fiscal year 1940-41 (beginning June 30, 1940), called for only $1,125,000,000 for relief, a reduction of more than $500,000,000 from the previous year and barely enough to carry an average case load of 1,350,000 as compared with the 2,000,000 on the rolls in January, when his recommendations were sent to Congress. Likewise, agricultural relief items were reduced to $900,000,000, some $400,000,000 less than the previous year's total. All this apparently was a concession to noisy demands from the conservatives for economy and a balanced budget and an attempt to avoid responsibility for an increase in the statutory debt limit of $45,000,000,000, which was approached to within a few millions even by the economy budget. But if the President expected Congress to kick over the budget traces, he was disappointed. The House and Senate sliced another $225,000,000 off the first four appropriation bills considered, in an attempt to keep within the debt limit and justify themselves in ignoring the President's demand for increased taxation in an election year.



Drawings by John Groth

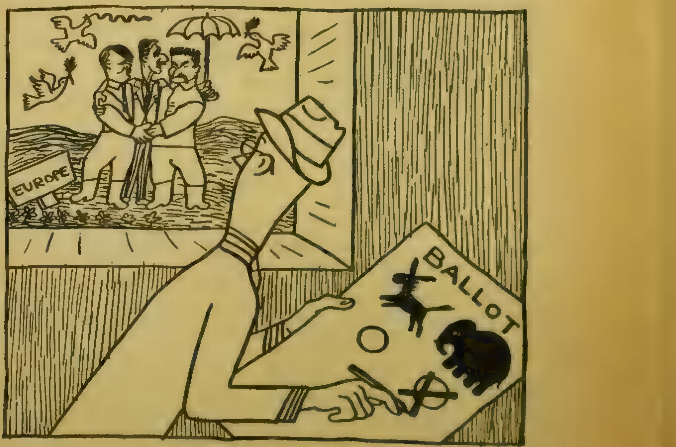
If War—

So unless the Congressional resistance to pressure for spending breaks down as the session progresses, the prosperity of 1940 will be a superficial prosperity from which thousands of workers displaced by machines and more thousands of small farmers and farm tenants will be excluded. As in the 1920's, however, their outcries may well be drowned by the happy cheers from the owners of industry and their employees. Then, too, there will be the question of responsibility. Should the urban unemployed and the dispossessed share-croppers blame President Roosevelt, who recommended the budget reductions, or the Congressmen who followed his course a logical step farther? In any event, what has always passed for prosperity will be with us.

For this prosperity the President will get most of the credit. His reputation as the friend of the humble citizen is well established, and he cannot lose it, whatever he does, in the next few months. By the same token, even prosperity will not earn him the friendship of the Union League Club. The big campaign contributors know him as the man who promised to scourge the money changers from the temple, who signed the Wagner Act, who pushed through laws establishing the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Wages and Hours Division of the Labor Department, the man who ran up the national debt beyond $40,000,000,000, and imposed "punitive and deterrent" taxes, the man who set up the TVA, interfered with holding companies, and otherwise discouraged private initiative. In 1938 these critics with these arguments won back part of the middle class that had supported Roosevelt in 1932 and again in 1936. The reaction is still running at the start of 1940.

Moreover, rumblings of thunder are beginning to be heard on the left. John L. Lewis and his United Mine Workers have revolted against the economy program. Even the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, meeting in Miami, asked for another $800,000,000 for slum clearance, an item conspicuously missing from the budget, and for a public-health program going beyond the $10,000,000 experimental hospital-construction plan proposed by the President.

It now seems plain that the Democratic nominee, whether Roosevelt himself, seeking to break through the third-term superstition, or someone else, will have to stand or fall on the New Deal record and a New Deal platform. No candidate like Vice-President Garner, whom the President would not support, could carry a convention of Democratic politicians looking for a winner. Neither, perhaps, could such all-wool New Dealers as Attorney General Jackson and Supreme Court Justice Douglas. As a compromise between Garnerite and New Dealer, Senator Burton K. Wheeler of Montana is enjoying a substantial boom, although it is a question whether the President would accept him. The Corcoran branch of the Administration is whooping it up for a third term with two obvious purposes: to keep the President available in the event European developments clearly require that he be drafted for continued service; and, failing that, to give him enough convention delegates to exercise veto power over the ticket. Several large state delegations already have been lined up for Roosevelt despite the opposition of James A. Farley.



If Peace—

Among the Republicans, Senator Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan seems to be the most probable nominee. He is an almost perfect Republican candidate. His record in the Senate is so confused that he could take up almost any position without appearing inconsistent. His personal pomposity is in the Harding tradition. He will fit nicely into the indicated Republican strategy of denouncing New Deal extravagance and promising to solve the country's domestic problems merely by giving business its head. Reasoning Republicans like Floor Leader Martin of the House realize that their candidate will have to adopt something very like the New Deal if he succeeds in reaching the White House. Vandenberg could probably make the necessary transition from economy speech-maker to spending Executive as well as any of his rivals, who, incidentally, are not doing so well on the road as was anticipated. Young Tom Dewey's performance as a delegate getter has been particularly disappointing to Republicans looking for a sure thing.

So far as domestic issues are concerned, neither the Republican nor the Democratic nominee will have much latitude for maneuvers. Both will try to take credit for prosperity, if it holds out, and here the Democrat will have the call. The Roosevelt candidate will try to capitalize the real achievements of the New Deal and the aura of the President's indorsement. The Republican, since he will have no chance of annexing the left-wing dissidents, probably will address himself to the middle brackets in public while reassuring the money bags in private.

It is in the field of foreign policy that the decisive battle will be fought. The President's policy of helping the Allies to the extent of his ability by measures short of war—more audacious measures than he has yet taken if public opinion seems willing to accept them—will be continued. The Hull reciprocal-trade policy will be stressed as a means of promoting world peace through freer trade intercourse. It is a policy which has the practical advantage of putting an ideological base under the war trade. While the Roosevelt candidate will scarcely be able to wage a he-kept-us-out-of-war campaign in view of the restraints Republican isolationists have placed upon the President, neither will he be vulnerable to the charge that he leads a war party. The President's cautious handling of the Finnish loan problem makes this apparent. The Republican nominee, particularly if he is Vandenberg, who opposed the Neutrality Act, will have to take up his position on the isolationist side of the Democrat. It is a side which is in the lee of the war trade winds, and its logical defender requires a domestic substitute for foreign orders—in other words, heavy government spending and economic planning. The Republican, therefore, will not bother to be logical.

The Left: End and Beginning

BY MAX LERNER

THERE can be little doubt that the left in America has come to the end of a long phase of its history. There are clamant voices all about us telling us so—confessions, repudiations, accusations. But even more convincing is the deep inner voice that tells us we must write finis to a chapter. But if there is an end, are there also beginnings for us? To answer that question other than wishfully, we must look backward to the past and with that perspective confront what may lie ahead.

There has always been an American left, under whatever name. It is an honorable record—that of the vanguard movements in the history of the democratic experience. There were the Committees of Correspondence during the Revolution, then the Jeffersonians, the Jacksonians, the early workingmen's parties, the Abolitionists before the Civil War and the Knights of Labor after it, the liberals and Mugwumps of the dreary decades, the Populists, the single-taxers, the muckrakers, the socialist and syndicalist labor forces of the turn of the century, the trust-busters, the Wilsonians and Progressives, the Marxists of the post-war decades, the technocrats, the New Dealers, the C. I. O.

It is a curious processional, so varied in the character of its individual elements that there is no one way to sum it up. The now familiar classification into reformist and revolutionary movements, which entered American thought with Marxism and especially after 1917 with Lenin's influence, no longer seems fruitful. On analysis there are very few of the movements I have cited that do not yield both revolutionary and reformist elements. My own impulse is toward a different division. Since left movements are always concerned with power and its transformation, why not separate the principal strains on the left in terms of their location of the sources of power and their analysis of how to grapple with the problems of power in a capitalist democracy?

The first strain that emerges is the agrarian. Its great leaders were Jefferson and Bryan, its theorists John Taylor and perhaps Henry Demarest Lloyd. Even before the Civil War it had already a slightly anachronistic flavor. It cut athwart the laws of technological change and ultimately fell a victim to the march of the machines. Jefferson's states' rights doctrine, his fear and hatred of cities, his distrust of mechanics and bankers alike have remained the heritage of populist and agrarian movements since. In its own day it was a rousing creed, and carried much of the burden of democratic advance. But it proved a poor weapon with which to confront the developed capitalism of the turn of the century. It was militant enough, and even revolutionary at times, with a sporadic sort of twenty-four-hour violence. But with its eyes turned nostalgically to an agrarian past it had more meaning as a way of life than as an anatomy of power. It could not produce an analysis of American corporate capitalism, of its laws of growth, its strength and weakness, and its persistent tenacity.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

A second strain has been what, for want of a better name, I shall call a humanist liberalism. Its genesis was the post-Civil War period, although it had forerunners in the Concord school. Its prophet was Mill; its leaders were Godkin and Schurz. Its anatomy has been well dissected in I. F. Stone's article in this issue. Its outlook was urban rather than agrarian, and international rather than isolationist. Yet it too set its face against the march of industrialism—against the crude energies of both capitalists and workers. It expressed the point of view of the cultured, middle-class left. It accepted the capitalist economy but was indignant against capitalists. It accepted democracy but feared and distrusted the popular energies and was never able to stomach the imperative of a mass base in a democracy.

There has been a third strain much harder to isolate. It drew much of its strength from the agrarians, shared the libertarian views of the liberals, was affected by Marxism. Basically, however, it was the strain of democratic socialization. Among its leaders are some of the great names in American thought. In economics it had Veblen, in law Brandeis, in journalism Steffens and the muckrakers, in politics La Follette, in its humanist phase J. Allen Smith, Beard, Parrington, Bourne. What distinguished these men was that they accepted the sweep of industrialism but sought to tame it to the purposes of mass welfare and cultural freedom and richness. On the whole they were tough-minded and experimental even when they were wrong. They confronted squarely, with the best knowledge at their disposal, the dual problem of power involved in capitalism and democracy. They influenced and were influenced by the course of the trade-union movement, the cooperatives, the left phases of the T. R. and Wilson administrations. The analysis of corporate capitalism in Berle and Means derives from them; the basic governmental investigations of capitalist power from the Pujo committee to the La Follette committee are linked with them; the TNEC is the product of their attitude; the techniques of economic control and planning owe much to them; the left New Dealers work in their spirit. They are, for all their weaknesses and lack of precise outlines, more squarely in the main line of the American left than is any other tradition.

It remains to speak of the Marxist tradition. With the exception of Debs and Reed, and perhaps De Leon and Upton Sinclair, this has produced no one in America even approximating first-rate stature. Yet it would be an error to underestimate its effect on American life and thought since the World War. It gave us a new emphasis on labor organization and new insight into labor's social role. It deepened our awareness of the democratic mass. It gave a more disciplined militancy to social action and taught us to think in terms of economic and political power. It taught us to see American life in the context of movements and forces world-wide in scope. Above all, it made us aware of society and social thought not in their fragments but as an individual whole—linking analysis and action, our perception of the past and our projection of the future.

It is important for us, particularly in the current revulsion against Marxism, to grasp these affirmative achievements. Nothing could be more dangerous than to equate the communist parties or Soviet international politics with the whole of the Marxian outlook. And nothing could be more foolish than the present tendency to view the recent influence of Marxism as merely a vast conspiracy, whether Stalinist, Trotskyist, or Leninist. A whole American generation cannot be summed up as the dupes of a clique in Moscow. The fact is that the Marxian influence was genuinely evocative. The revolutionary image and the image of men's control over their social destinies released energies in literature and art as in social action. Many were touched by it who never became Marxist in their thinking and never joined any of the Marxian parties or splinter groups.

But this phase of the American left had the defects of its qualities. Its intellectual rigor easily became rigidity. It produced a peculiar type of provincialism in thought which sought to measure the torrential flow of American life by the yardsticks of the Marxian books. It brought with it a concentration on the Soviet Union, whether by its apologists or its attackers, which allowed the reactionaries wide scope to stake out an exclusive claim to "Americanism." It gave the middle class a fear symbol and the fascist groups a hate symbol. It produced a bitter factionalism, always inherent in out-of-power left groups of absolutist tendencies in thought, but in this case intensified by the cross-fire of Russian and American sects and problems. And it led to an accent on faith which ultimately, in the context of the Soviet state structure and such maneuvers of international politics as the Nazi pact and the invasion of Finland, could result only in a drastic disillusionment.

We are now reaping the harvest of our sowing of provincialism, factionalism, hatred. And since what we sowed was the wind of doctrine, the harvest is the whirlwind of confusion and hysteria. If it has turned some to the sadism of a comprehensive red-baiting, it has turned others to the masochism of public confession. But the long-run importance of either of these trends is slight compared with a more characteristic trend—the sense of aloneness that has come to hundreds of thousands of progressives scattered over the country, young and old, in every walk of life, the terrifying sense of being left intellectually rootless, emotionally homeless.

And why should they not feel it? We have come to the end of a stage in our development, just as often happens in the growth of any creative person. It is futile to imagine that a culture or a movement does not have its biography, like an individual. The psychic crises, dead ends, transformations are as real in the one as in the other. The spate of repudiations and confessions are part of that crisis: they are heightened symbols of the inner revaluations that each of us must exact from himself because of what has happened in the world. It is no longer possible to go on as if nothing had happened.

Yet it is all too easy to take a catastrophic view. Individuals survive their psychic crises and grow because of them. Why should not groups and movements? One thing may be said: the air has been cleared of a good deal of cant and dream stuff. We can build more honestly and more realistically than ever before in our generation. If we cannot forget our rancors and find a common basis for comparing ideas and joining in action, then the suicide urge is stronger in us than I think it is.

There are definite things we can learn from the whole course of our experience. Have we learned them? And can we adopt them as first principles in a reorientation of the American forces of the left? Item: that the obsession with Moscow, for or against, had better be abandoned. There can be no commitments that reach outside the boundaries of American life and obscure the impact of issues on our culture. Item: that the only possible focus for an American left is America. This does not mean seceding from the world or abdicating our judgment as observers of world events, but it does mean that we should think and act in the American grain. Item: that with all our disagreements, our continuing quest will be for some structure of industrial control and socialization that will provide full employment, the maximum national income, and economic democracy. Item: that Americans are in a better position than any other nation to achieve this without impairing the civil-liberties tradition and without sacrificing democratic controls. Item: that the meaning of economics and politics alike lies in the extension of the possibilities of human dignity for an ever-widening number of people.

On so much there can be agreement. Beyond that lie personal perspectives. My own preference is to follow the tradition of what I have called democratic socialization. The main lines of analysis as laid down in Veblen and Parrington and Bourne still offer tentatively a good starting-point for our own.

I say "tentatively" because the left must reject absolutes and be ready to reexamine its basic postulates. We must reconsider the values we attach to freedom, democracy, humanism. We must reexamine Marxism in the light not only of what has happened in the world of events but also of what has happened in the world of social thought. There are new insights and perspectives in anthropology, psychology, political theory, law, economics, the logic of language, and scientific method. No movement that seeks to subject the social energies to discipline and plan can afford to remain provincial in the sciences of society any more than it can afford to neglect the possibilities of technology.

But while we must use the utmost resources of rational analysis we must not repeat our past errors in assuming in men a greater rationality than they possess. The concepts and stereotypes on the left have too long clung to the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century belief in an ordered universe where men have only to discover the principles of order and then call upon their fellows to enact them. The course of events has had no tenderness for this fiction, nor can we afford to perpetuate it. Our efforts toward the reconstruction of the societies in which men live will have to take account of the whole person and not just half of him; of the fact that he is governed by passions, fears, and myths as well as by interests and ideals.

This will be a difficult insight for us to assimilate. We shall have to learn again things toward which the left has always adopted a lofty attitude—the imperatives of national cohesion and national survival about which Machiavelli wrote long ago in his "Discourses." We shall have to learn to work within the framework of men's minds as we find them until we can extend their possibilities. But who is there among us that asks for or expects an easy task? Our hurdles will seem insuperable: to understand the mechanisms by which economies run while we are faced at the same time with the job of transforming them; to study the uses and limitations of power at the same time that we are getting ready for its responsibilities; to learn how the necessary power can be focused on our problems at the same time that we are decentralizing its administration; to resolve the paradox that while we must be single-minded in the pursuit of our objectives and enlist behind them belief and energy, every working system must be pluralistic and allow plenty of latitude at the joints.

It may be true, as I have heard again and again, that these paradoxes can never be resolved, and that in the present world a democratic militancy will never succeed. But the American nation has faced in other periods contradictions that loomed just as formidable at the time. We have the resources of a great people and a great heritage. If direction for the energies of the common people does not come from the left, it will mean the crushing of what America has stood for in world history.

Beyond the New Deal

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

THE economic system under which the Western world made astonishing material progress during the nineteenth century is today deathly sick. In this country its most dangerous symptom is unemployment, which, despite contractions and expansions, remains year after year a persistent, malign growth on the body politic. Because of this sickness we are haunted by a fear that our economy is beyond the help of medicine and that, sooner or later, we may be compelled to turn to the bloody surgery from which Europe is suffering—a surgery which, if it succeeds in effecting a cure at all, must inevitably lead to the paralysis of liberty. The problem, then, of men of good-will today is to discover a remedy for unemployment without wrecking democracy; to reconstruct our economic system so that it will provide bread and freedom for all.

I happen to be one of those who believe that, had it not been for the measures taken by the New Deal, our present plight would be infinitely worse. But the fact that unemployment is still an intractable problem makes possible the argument that the New Deal has failed. A few people would say that it has done so because it was a misconceived effort from the start; many more, that it followed the right lines but went too far and bungled the job. Both views suggest that the New Deal was a plan that sprang full-fledged from the head of Mr. Roosevelt and his advisers. The truth is, rather, that it began as an ad hoc response to a critical situation. It never was, as some of its enemies insist, a thought-out plot to undermine capitalism. On the contrary, its whole purpose seems to have been to save capitalism from its own excesses and to set it on its feet.

Accepting this as a legitimate objective, it is my own opinion that the measures taken in the last seven years have been generally in the right direction but have not gone nearly far enough. In particular, the New Deal seems to have suffered, not from a superfluity of planning, but from the lack of a well-rounded plan, and so has developed as a series of insufficiently coordinated efforts to remedy specific situations. Nevertheless, the Roosevelt Administration has prepared the ground for "the Next Deal," and some analysis of its achievements is an essential preliminary to any discussion of a broader program. To facilitate a rapid summary of a very large subject, I propose to group the main activities of the New Deal under four heads: rescue work, police work, social work, and economic planning.

Of the first phase, which includes the rescue and rehabilitation of the banking system, the assistance given to railroads and industry by the RFC, the subsidies to shipping and shipbuilding, and part of the farm program, there is not a great deal to be said except this: in no way can these measures be described as hostile to private enterprise. True, they violated the canons of laissez faire, to which business is apt to appeal when the government intervenes to help the other fellow, but had Mr. Roosevelt allowed liquidation to proceed to the bitter end in 1933 it is doubtful whether private enterprise would have survived at all. It was a perfect opportunity to hoist the capitalist system with its own petard, and yet he stamped out the burning fuse.

Nor can the New Deal's police work be regarded as hostile to private enterprise, however bitter private enterprisers, on whose collars a heavy hand has fallen, may feel. Thomas Carlyle once described the competitive economic system as "anarchy plus a constable." Throughout our history the anarchy has been obvious, but the cops have all too often proved themselves everything that guardians of the public interest should not be. They have been weak, corrupt, inefficient, and shortsighted. Instead of arresting looters of the public domain, they unlocked the gates and helped them remove the swag. They crippled the competitive system by granting high tariffs to bar consumers from cheap goods; they gave franchises and created monopolies to exploit the people in return for bribes; they winked at the operations of financial thimble-riggers. Naturally the idea grew that business ethics was what you could get away with. But when the anarchic splendors of the twenties were over, business men awoke with sad hangovers to find the moral climate changed overnight and a different kind of cop on the beat. No wonder that they felt bewildered, misunderstood, and resentful.

Nevertheless, the policing of the security and commodity exchanges by the SEC and the CEA, the regulation of industries particularly affected with a public interest, and the increased zeal of the anti-trust division of the Department of Justice are something more than contributions to social morality. These activities are also designed to increase the efficiency of markets, without which robust private enterprise is impossible. The best theoretical defense of private enterprise is that under it the algebra of prices makes possible an objective equation between production and consumption. Thus the consumer can become the final arbiter of what goods shall be produced and in what quantities. But this price mechanism cannot operate effectively unless goods and services are bought and sold in tolerably free markets. Of course the perfect market has never existed outside the pages of the economic textbooks. Economic machinery, like physical machinery, cannot operate without friction, but when friction increases to the point where the bearings begin to burn, it is time for the repair squad to take a hand. No one who analyzes the business situation in this country can avoid the conclusion that one of its chief weaknesses is a severe decline in the efficiency of markets. Who or what is responsible is a matter of opinion, but there can be no doubt that the constant effort of private enterprise to escape from the open seas of competition to the sheltered waters of monopoly is one of the most important contributing factors.

Walter Lippmann, whose books, unfortunately, appear to receive less attention in Wall Street than his newspaper writings, has set forth in "The Good Society" an "agenda of liberalism" describing the reforms necessary if the freedom of the market is to be preserved. It is an ambitious program, far too long even to summarize here, but it includes such things as the conservation of land and other natural resources, the ending of legal privileges which make possible intrenched monopolies and the creation of industrial empires, the correction of maldistribution of wealth by the drastic taxation of unearned increments, the use of part of the increased wealth produced by technological progress to indemnify its victims, and a program of public investment designed to improve and develop health, education, and natural resources. If a writer devoted to the perpetuation of private enterprise considers that reforms of this character are essential, the efforts of the New Deal to secure free and honest markets can hardly be described as revolutionary. Whether Mr. Lippmann's program is practicable without resorting to other measures which he abhors because of their "collectivist" nature will be discussed later.

Meanwhile, we have to consider the third group of New Deal activities—those coming under the head of social work. Outstanding examples are the social-security acts, the provision of work in place of doles to the able-bodied unemployed through WPA and other agencies, the creation of minimum labor standards through the Wage-Hour Act, and the effort to protect the unionization of workers. Few people care to attack these measures in principle however critical they may be of their details and their administration. They do, of course, constitute an interference by the government in the workings of the labor market, but it may well be argued that such interference makes for efficiency. For they tend to reduce the evil of the necessitous bargaining which is destructive of free markets. As Mr. Lippmann says, "A liberal state cannot be neutral as between those who have too little bargaining power and those who have too much power."

We now come to the fourth phase of the New Deal—its economic planning. Under this head I include not only its schemes to secure conservation of resources but its efforts to utilize such resources, as in the TVA and Bonneville projects, and its attempts to compensate for the lag in private investment by programs of public investment. These are the activities which really excite the fears of those who assert that if collectivism and capitalism go to bed together, the latter will surely be smothered. Only in respect of electric power, however, has there in fact been any serious trespass on the preserves of private industry, and even there the corner staked out for the public is but a small fraction of the whole field.

Actually, there is nothing very new in state economic enterprises, although American experience of them has been slighter than that of many other countries, such as Britain, the Scandinavian states, and Australia, where the vigor of private enterprise is unimpaired. We have, however, one example which people so take for granted that it would never occur to them as an instance of collectivism—our highway system. Early in the history of the United States the building and maintenance of roads was regarded as a proper sphere for private enterprise and was carried on by turnpike companies which sought a profit from tolls. These companies seldom proved very successful and were almost all ruined by the advent of the railroads. Had the automobile instead of the locomotive been invented in the early nineteenth century, they would have been in possession of a valuable monopoly and would certainly have fought bitterly to retain it. Yet it is hardly open to doubt that a general toll-road system would have done much to check the growth of the automobile. Nor, I fancy, are there many hardy individualists today who would claim that public money ought not to be invested in the highways, even though their development has obviously been detrimental to the railroads. Certainly no shareholder in General Motors would argue that this form of public enterprise is destructive of private profit.

The supply of power is as basic to the general welfare and prosperity as the supply of roads, and, like the road industry, the power industry is one to which the competitive system cannot be applied. Hence the prices charged for current are determined by planning rather than by normal market processes, and this is just as true when the supplier is Consolidated Edison as when it is TVA. Of course, private utilities are publicly regulated and their charges limited, but such questions as the wisdom of attempting to enlarge the market by reducing rates remain a matter of managerial policy. There can be no doubt that the advent of the TVA and other government projects, together with the encouragement of municipal and cooperative ventures, has been an influence in persuading private companies to experiment with cheaper rates. In many cases, it would seem, they have been agreeably disappointed by results. On the other hand, it is claimed that government encroachment on the industry has checked new investment and expansion. That is difficult to prove or disprove because certainly many other factors have contributed to stunting the growth of the industry, not least its tangled financial situation due to the mushroom growth and the collapse of the holding-company system.

My own belief is that in its power policy the New Deal needs to go much farther. Until private monopoly in this field is wholly replaced by public ownership, the cost of electric current, which is basic both to the comfort of the modern home and the efficiency of modern industry, will not be brought down to bed rock. This does not mean that we need one gigantic power department at Washington. It means rather a system of state and municipal enterprises linked and coordinated by interstate regional authorities on the lines of TVA. In the production of power a notable fraction of cost is accounted for by interest on capital. The mere fact that public authorities can borrow more cheaply on the average than private corporations would itself make possible appreciable economies to be passed on to the consumers. Power has again and again proved itself a "commodity" sensitive to price changes. Reduced charges invariably lead to greater use, which in turn lowers overhead and brings costs down still farther.

Cheaper and more widely distributed power could not fail to stimulate industry and agriculture alike. It would improve the market for a host of ancillary industries manufacturing electrical equipment. It would probably promote industrial decentralization and would almost certainly assist in the revival of small business. It would make possible the development of electro-technical processes at present held back by the cost of the huge quantities of current required. In short, the end result of the elimination of private enterprise in one field would be a tremendous fillip to it elsewhere.

There are a number of other situations in our economy where competitive efficiency cannot be created or restored even by use of the drastic police powers which Mr. Lippmann advocates. Space forbids more than a brief catalogue. Outstanding are the railroads, organized on a monopoly basis which has been undermined by the development of competing methods of transport. They are a Humpty-Dumpty which all the efforts of the ICC, the RFC, and the bankruptcy courts cannot put together again as private enterprises. The oil industry contrives to combine the worst features of both monopoly and competition, and efforts to prevent, by regulation, its waste of one of our most valuable resources appear doomed to failure. Here again some form of public ownership seems essential to bring about the efficient production of a commodity the costs of which enter into the budgets of almost every family and every business. Other leading minerals, including copper, iron ore, and sulphur, are controlled by monopolies or semi-monopolies which cannot be forced on to a competitive basis—though tariff revision would be helpful—and ought to be deprived by socialization of their power to levy tribute on the rest of the economic system.

Howard Cook

The Nation, May 6, 1936

The plans suggested in this article are based on a belief that the people of America are still fundamentally individualists. They do not want to abolish private enterprise, but they do want to slenderize it. If certain basic services and commodities can be removed from the domain of private monopoly and made available at lower cost, a positive increase in purchasing power will result. This in turn will make possible an increased demand for the products of the immense range of industries which will continue to operate as private enterprises, and thus provide an enlarged scope for the employment of both capital and labor. In this field competition should be encouraged and everything possible done to insure that the consumer's pivotal position in balancing supply and demand is maintained.

The socialization of definite segments of industry should prove an important factor in removing the disparity between savings and investment which nearly all economists regard as a large element in the present depression. The elimination of monopoly profits would cut off one large stream feeding the pool of stagnant capital. Still more important would be the creation of a field for productive government investments. It would be necessary, of course, to institute a separate budget for government business enterprises in which assets and liabilities would balance. Such enterprises should be expected to meet all charges, including interest and payments equivalent to taxation, out of trading profits, but any further profits should be used for reserves and for reducing prices. The existence of a federal investment budget would be an important weapon in controlling cyclical trade movements. When private industry was booming and the demand for capital brisk, the government could restrict its capital program to a minimum; when private investment languished, it could step up its own expansion programs. These tactics would be facilitated by the fact that the enterprises in which it was engaged would, in the main, be those requiring long-range planning.

We now have, in very brief outline, the kind of program which a progressive party, building on the foundations laid by the New Deal, might adopt. It is a program to be carried out by democratic methods and one that would not involve scrapping the Constitution, though no doubt amendments would be necessary. It would not mean confiscation of property, for the owners of all property taken over would be paid. But it would mean that a very small group of men would be deprived of the concentrated economic power which now lies in their hands. Would our democracy function any the worse for that?

The Art of the Good Neighbor

BY ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

THERE are phrases which can be pronounced only in quotation marks. "Cultural relations" is one of them. Cultural relations are not something you have: they are something you read about having. Generally they are something you read about having with considerable reluctance. The average citizen may be willing to put up with the man who writes about United States cultural relations with Latin America meaning United Fruit. He is not likely to put up with the man who writes about United States cultural relations with Latin America meaning precisely what he says. History is against it. History is the context in which language is understood, and history in this case is unobliging: it calls back the bonds of Minas Geraes, the capitalization of Cosach, and the marines at Vera Cruz. It makes the phrase sound awkward.

And nevertheless the awkward phrase is honest. It stands for serious things. It stands for the realization of informed persons that the present struggle of the propagandas in Latin America is a struggle for something more than markets. In that division of the Department of State where Ben Cherrington and Charles Thomson labor ably for the light, it stands for the realization of a particularly perceptive Under Secretary and a particularly imaginative Assistant Secretary that the German press and radio attacks on the United States in Latin America are not attacks for economic ends alone.

There was a time when the professional understanders understood that the great division which splits the world was a division between those who Had on the one side and those who Had Not on the other. Those who Had Not wanted the wealth and the markets and the raw materials and the colonies of those who Had. It was as simple as that. Nothing was at stake in the great unexploited market areas or the great undeveloped raw-material areas but goods and things. Those who interpreted Latin American affairs by this simple light interpreted them in these simple terms. If the Germans disparaged American culture on the short wave or by word of mouth or by special articles in the Valparaiso press, they were doing it for economic reasons only. If inspired publications discovered that the civilization of the North Americans was debased, was materialistic, was Bigbusiness, was vulgar, was artless, was crass, had produced no poets, had bred no painters, had trained no scholars, all this was no more than a diversion, a flank movement in the great war for trade. The Germans, lacking the credits to fight the Americans on the loading quays and in the grain elevators and at the banks, were undermining them at the dinner tables of the haciendas and the estancias and the high shiny apartment houses over the River Plate.

That simplification of history however, like all such simplifications of the ancient record, was less than wholly satisfying to imaginative minds. Events in distant parts of the earth suggested that the great division on the basis of the verb to have was not necessarily the true division of our time. Events in distant parts suggested that the purposes of those who bombed the Spanish towns and shot the Czechoslovak students were not economic purposes alone but purposes of a more ambitious character. What was under attack was not merely the present title to the riches of the world. What was under attack was the entire moral and intellectual and artistic order which, by accident or otherwise, was associated with that title.

Which meant, first, that the flank attack on the culture of the North Atlantic democracies in Latin America was perhaps not a flank attack at all but the principal engagement. And which meant, second, that those who had regarded the struggle with indifference so long as it seemed to be a struggle between the fat and the lean for the cut of the meat, could no longer regard it with indifference. Men in the United States who cared not at all whether Germany rather than Great Britain exploited the people of India, cared a great deal whether the civilization based upon free inquiry and free imagination which had developed in Western Europe and across the Atlantic over several centuries survived or perished. A change which put the Germans in Tanganyika was one thing. A change which burned the books of Thomas Mann in America also, and disciplined the composition of Szostakowicz here as well as in the Moscow theaters, and murdered Garcia Lorca not only in Granada but in New York, and organized the natural sciences on the party line not only in Siberia but in the Western Hemisphere as well, would be another.

It is to this altered understanding of the nature of the struggle that the awkward phrase relates. The movement to promote cultural relations between this country and Latin America is not at all the hypocritical and missionary movement which history would suggest. It is the precise opposite of a missionary movement. It does not aim to bestow upon a backward people below the Rio Grande the rich gifts of our superior culture. It aims instead to defend our culture against attack in the area where our culture is most in danger. To that end it labors to persuade the artists and intellectuals of the Spanish- and Portuguese-speaking nations of the American continents that a North American culture exists, that it is a culture worthy of admiration, and that the substitution of a different cultural influence in the Americas might be the substitution of a worse.

In Chile and Brazil and Argentina and Colombia as in few other parts of the world nations are judged by their cultural achievements. And in Chile and Brazil and Argentina and Colombia judgments of cultural achievement are determined to an unusual degree by the opinions of the competent intellectuals. When we attempt to persuade the Latin American nations that the achievements of our culture are admirable we are not attempting to persuade a million magazine readers or ten million radio listeners or the sampled public of a "scientific" poll. We are not, in other words, attempting to persuade the people as the people are occasionally persuaded at home by magazine publishers or advertising agencies with a love of art. We are attempting to persuade a small and sophisticated and discriminating jury of critics and artists and professional scholars: a specific group of known and distinguishable people—the eminent critic of modern verse in Buenos Aires pacing the long room over the earthen river—the authority on modern music in the garden of enormous trees under the mountains of Santiago—the lady in the chair at Miraflores, the words dissolving in the dissolving light, the fame hanging there.

To attempt to persuade a jury such as this, not by facts but by works, not by propaganda but by the submission of the documents—the books, the poetry, the music, and the painting—is neither hypocritical nor self-righteous. It is, on the contrary, an exceedingly frank and forthright undertaking. It is also an undertaking as difficult as it may be dangerous.

The difficulty is obvious enough. The jury to which, with a sudden gesture of respect, we now prepare to submit the products of our culture is a jury already prejudiced against them. Long before the Nazis began their unflattering descriptions of our writers and painters and architects and actors and scientists and men of learning, the intellectuals of Latin America had concluded that our writers and our men of learning were men of small account. There was every reason why they should. We had ourselves gone to considerable lengths to persuade them that our culture was the culture of the Grace Line, the National City Bank, the Hearst comics, the Hollywood heart-throb, and an occasional best-seller. And there were no ready means by which they could correct that impression for themselves.

In terms of cultural, as distinguished from physical, geography, Latin America is a foreshore of Western Europe and particularly of the city of Paris. A Chilean critic knows North American writers as they are known in Paris—or rather as they are known in those Parisian porches which open upon the Spanish-speaking world. He knows American music not at all. And if he sees American painting, he sees it only in the colored reproductions of the magazines. All he can say of American arts and letters is that his friends in the American colonies in Santiago and Buenos Aires do not speak of them, that the notes in his Paris and Madrid reviews ignore them, and that he has never seen them for himself. A few men of exceptional intellectual curiosity, like Mallea of La Nación, may read widely among North American novelists and poets, but they are the exceptions, as their counterparts would be exceptions here.

It is this quite natural prejudice of the jury to which we have appealed which creates the difficulty of the undertaking. Excellence exists, and if we will offer it with tact and taste we will persuade even a jury prejudiced as this. But mediocrity and vulgarity also exist and in superior quantities with superior influence and more numerous friends. If those who have made themselves responsible for the furtherance of this enterprise permit —and it will be difficult not to permit—our "cultural relations with Latin America" to become the property of trading corporations with advertising programs to put over, or of self-appointed groups of culturists with careers to make, or creeds to propagate, or fads to follow; or if those who have initiated this undertaking lose interest in it and fail to push it through, letting the Latin American audience they have prepared wait with a growing boredom for cultural revelations which fail to come, the prejudice will soon become a final, ineradicable, and articulate conviction.

The difficulty then is plain. And the danger follows. Whether we intended to do so or not, we have now undertaken, and undertaken through official agencies, to present to the people of Latin America convincing proofs of the creativeness and vitality of our culture. To fail would be disastrous. And yet no one, I think, considering the facts, can fail to conclude that these commitments have been given without adequate assurances beforehand of the cooperation of those whose cooperation is essential—the handful of true artists and true scholars who alone can enable us to perform these promises; without proper guaranties against the interference of the mediocrities and vulgarians—the fashionable favorites, the smart names, the false bosoms—whose interference would make our promises ridiculous; and without a realistic count of the cost of failure.

Briefly and specifically, the initiators and promoters of this program have put not only themselves, and not only the artists of this country, but the country itself in a position of considerable danger from which the only possible retreat is forward. If the cultural relations of peoples were what our uncles and grandfathers thought them—diversions, decorations, and irrelevancies—failure in this present undertaking would be mildly shameful and no more. But in a divided world in which the real issue of division is the cultural issue, cultural relations are not irrelevancies. They are everything. And in such a world a cultural defeat is a defeat on the one front on which defeat cannot be accepted.

Simplifications are suspect in our time, but there is one simplification which may surely be advanced. Unless the civilization which rests upon free institutions and personal liberty can justify itself by its works in those areas in which it is pressed by a competing order, it will not justify itself by other means. We shall do well to recognize that fact, to realize that we have committed ourselves to a hazardous and costly venture, and to attempt now, before it is too late, to make good on our commitments.

Memory

BY CARL SANDBURG

Memory is when you look back
And the answers float in to who? what? when? where?

The members who were there then are repeated on a screen are recalled on a scroll are moved in a miniature drama, are collected and recollected for actions, speeches, silences, set forth by images of the mind and made in a mingling mist to do again and to do over precisely what they did do once—this is memory—
sometimes slurred and blurred—this is remembering—sometimes wrecking the images and proceeding again to reconstruct what happened and how,
the many little involved answers
to who? what? when? where?
and more involved than any How? how?

Fear Is the Enemy

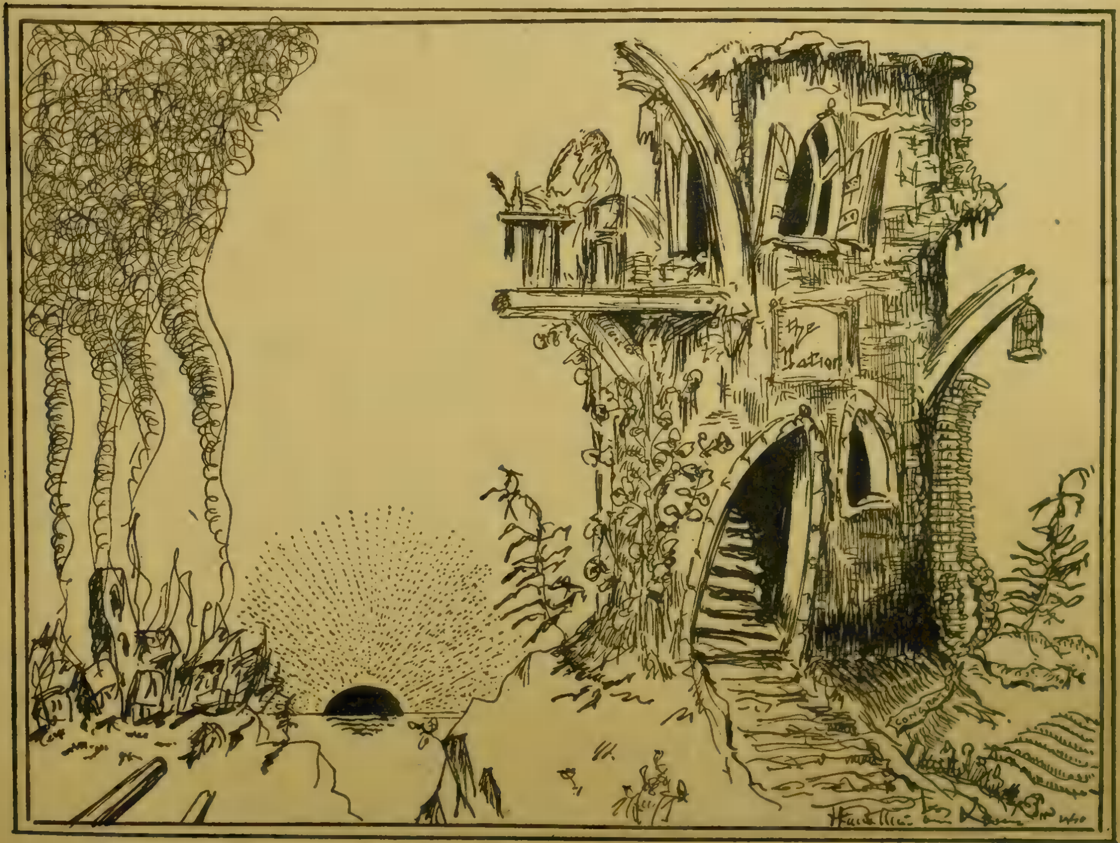
BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

BY ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

WHEN fear enters into the hearts of people they are apt to be moved to hasty action. Here in this country today we find people who have never sufficiently cherished their democracy to understand fully their obligation as citizens; yet now they are taking fright because ideas which have obtained a hold in other countries have crossed the water and are appearing in certain groups in the United States. These ideas can only appeal to those who do not really understand what democracy means, or who for one reason or another have had their faith shaken in the efficiency of democracy.

We who believe in democracy should not be so much concerned with stamping out the activities of these few groups or individuals as with developing among the people in this country a greater sense of personal responsibility toward a democratic way of life. It is our job to know what democracy means, and to try to attain real democracy. We do not move forward by curtailing people's liberty because we are afraid of what they may do or say. We move forward by assuring to all people protection in the basic liberties under a democratic form of government, and then making sure that our government serves the real needs of the people.

In a recent article by Dr. Eduard Lindeman I read his definition of democracy and it ran something like this—democracy is the acceptance by the people of the belief that the greatest possible benefits shall be shared by all the people. In other words, our government, our basic liberties, our way of life must be constantly looking toward an ideal whereby the mass of the people shall be benefited. Let us beware of unreasoning fear which will make us curtail these liberties and prevent a free expression of new ideas. Where the majority rules, there is little danger of moving too fast. When the power becomes concentrated in the hands of a few, there is great danger that the majority will not be able to move at all.



Integer Vitae

Two Visions of Peace

BY THOMAS MANN

IT IS generally agreed, consentio omnium, that in Europe the old order cannot persist unaltered. The statesmen of the democracies, especially British statesmen, have evinced a complete realization of the necessity and inevitability of profound changes in the political and economic structure of our world. It is not only the dictators who are "dynamic." But when it comes to considering what form this future world is to take, aims and concepts are separated by a gap so wide and deep that clearly war alone could arbitrate between them. The two ideas of change at issue in this war are a European Confederation or supreme domination by a gigantic absolute state.

It should be pointed out that in announcing their decision not to make peace with the present German government the great democracies have taken a more important step than might appear at first glance. Actually it entails the epoch-making renunciation of a principle to which Europe with fateful conservatism has long held fast, although it has been obvious that it was outworn and doomed to perish—the principle of non-intervention, whose underlying concept is the absolute sovereignty of nations. The principle of non-intervention is based on an idea of democracy and freedom which no longer meets the social demands of our time. Democracy is a legal relationship between liberty and equality, between the claims of the individual and of society, a relationship which is labile and must be constantly reconstituted; and today everyone free to think for himself feels that in the union of liberty and equality the weight has shifted toward the side of equality and economic justice—from the individual, therefore, toward the social. Today social democracy is on the agenda; only as liberty which has matured to include social values, while preserving individual values by voluntary concessions to equality, only in this spiritual form, can democracy survive—within countries and between them.

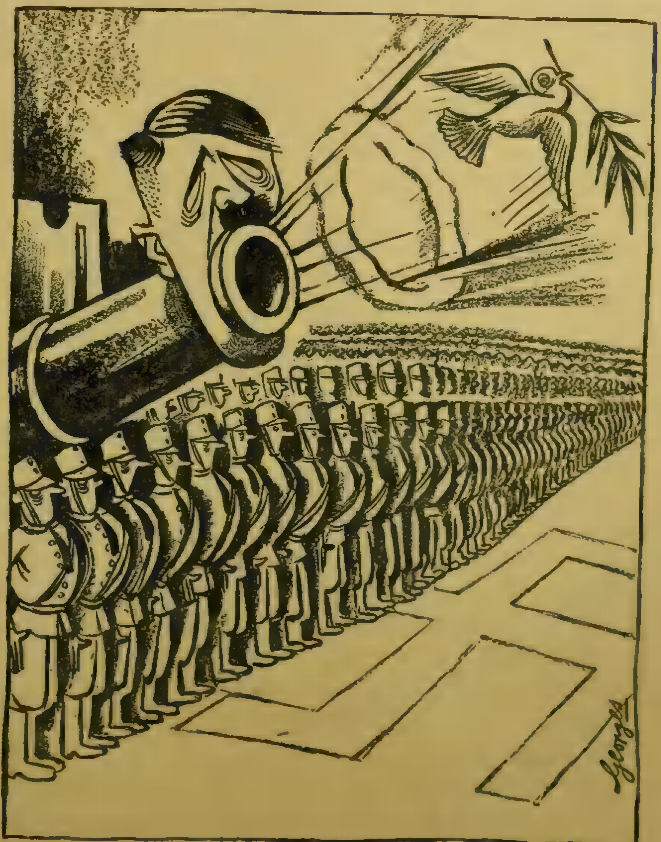
For the inner life of a people is in exact, though often unrecognized, accordance with its behavior within the community of nations, and it is an error to believe that what goes on in any one country—for example, all that has happened in Germany since the year 1933—need concern nobody but its own people. In the future, relations between peoples must be controlled by a new concept of liberty as individualism subject to social bonds and limitations. Only through the victory of this idea, the idea of a democracy which transcends the national, can Europe win happiness, peace, and order in place of anarchy, which leads, again and again, to bloody wars and is the death of civilization. Anarchy is individualism without social limitations, and insistence on the limitless sovereignty of nations is anarchy which imperils the very existence of Europe. It must disappear. The egotism of nations must make sacrifices which imply the break-up of the idea of national sovereignty, yes, of the national idea itself. The goal of this war, and its fruits, must be a peace which is at last worthy of the name; a peace which no longer serves as a shield for atavistic "history-making" mummery but is the firm foundation of a community of free peoples who are yet responsible to one another under a commonly binding moral law.

One side in the struggle takes these thoughts as the basis of its conception of the future. Brief hints of them, expressed without utopian extravagance but not to be misunderstood, are found in the assertions of British statesmen before and since the outbreak of the war. "We shall use all our influence when the time comes," said Lord Halifax in his radio address at the beginning of November, 1939, "in the building of a new world . . . on a basis of human equality, self-respect, and mutual tolerance. We shall have to think out again many things that lie at the root of international contacts—social, political, economic—and find means of reconciling the necessity of change in a constantly changing world with security against the disturbance of the general peace through resort to violence. To this order that we shall create all nations will have their contribution to make, and a great responsibility both in thought and action will rest upon our people. We, not less than others, have our lesson to learn from past failures and disappointments."

Here I have stressed not only what is significant but also what is appealing. It is both appealing and significant when the British Foreign Secretary explains that England not less than others has its lesson to learn. This does not indicate self-righteousness or any intention of seeking the role of schoolmaster, even in a moral sense, in Europe, but rather the realization that "in a constantly changing world" the democracies too must change, must be ready to embrace the new necessities of the time. When one considers the directions in which, according to the speaker, this readiness to change extends—"social, political, economic"—one may well call it a dynamic program of progress. If the new world is to be built, the world to which "all nations will have their contribution to make," everything depends not only on Germany's emerging from this war a different country, but on its opponents, too, being no longer what they were; and here unquestionably there is a certain danger, and a doubt about what we are to hope for. For if the war is short, as from a human viewpoint one must hope, then it is to be feared that the general changes effected by it will not be sweeping enough to form the groundwork for a really new world. But if it is long and bloody, then the feelings of hate and revenge it will leave behind might become a deadly danger to all good resolutions. At least one has a right to hold the second to be the graver danger. Before the war these realizations and resolutions were just developing; its outbreak has sharply intensified them. They are almost identical with the decision to fight it out, and they have a better prospect of surviving at the end of a war of moderate duration than in the moral and physical desolation that a long and cruel war would bring with it.

HIERARCHY OF HELOTS

I have attempted above to characterize one of the two views of the future at issue in this war. The second view is not wanting in boldness and magnificence either; in fact, in these respects it is superior to the first, granted that gloomy enmity and contempt for mankind may come under the head of magnificence. This conception of the future has unfortunately nothing to do with a human desire for an equilibrium of liberty and equality, of individual and social values; it is on the contrary allied to an unqualified and rancorous belief in the necessity of mastery and servitude. It conceives the world as in the process of division into a few great "living spaces," Gross-Lebensraüme, which must be self-sufficient, or "autarchic." These realms are to be established by force—which the master-peoples who create them are by natural prerogative entitled to use—through the subjugation and annexation of surrounding small nations which, lacking military strength and a large population, are denied this claim to freedom; and which, if they resist absorption by the great realm, become guilty of a criminal assault against the majesty of numbers. Here the idea of race plays an important part. The "great," in other words the numerous, people is endowed at the same time with the quality of superior race, while the small ones are of lesser manhood and born to slavery. Their subjugation and annexation admit them to the great community of the master-race only in so far as the latter adds them to its numbers, which thus become still more majestic; pillaged and deprived of their rights, they enter the estate of helots, constrained to pay homage to the ruling race and kiss the boots that tread upon them. That this master-race is itself composed of disfranchised slaves whose masters, the inventors of the whole regime, inspired by the deepest contempt for humanity, rule them by terror and stultifying propaganda is small consolation for the slaves of the slaves.



Georges Schreiber

The Nation, May 31, 1933

Altogether there is no denying that the system is pretty desperate. It admits no hope whatever—indeed, one is ashamed to pronounce this weak and insipid word in connection with it. Dark threats, inexorable cruelty intensified by lust, hard and bloody oppression, uninterrupted warlike tension are its very essence, essentials without which it could not be maintained. Every faintest stirring of a wish for the precious blessings of peace, and so for freedom, for the benefits of civilization and the serene enjoyment of life, for pure uplifting thought beyond the spheres of power or politics—these must count for it as high treason. How could it be otherwise? The subjugated smaller peoples, in whom a tendency to shake off the yoke will always be present, must be kept in bowed submission by every means of terror; so too must the master-race, which is almost as little to be trusted. In relation to other countries war remains the constant watchword: the very condition of autarchy requires the command, independent of any foreign supply, of all raw materials, which further requires the possession of all strategic points necessary to the "security" of the great sovereign realm, necessary, that is, to its capacity for aggression—all of which would be beside the point if peace were the question. Peace cannot, it dare not, ever be the question; this heroic snarling philosophy of life does not permit it. After all, there are still several of these great realms. The world is divided up—but, it goes without saying, not for good. Among the master-peoples there must be a super-lordly people, singled out by its racial superiority to abuse the others, and the eschatological consummation will be the abuse of all the world by this one: probably, God willing—it must be His will, we shall know how to hold Him to it—it will be the German people.

VICTORY WITHOUT PEACE

Poor German people, how do you feel in the messianic role for which not God, not fate, but a handful of maniacal scoundrels has singled you out? The goal they sat will be fearful wretchedness to pursue, would be utter horror to attain. All that innately you most love and prize, all your need to love and be loved, you will have to deaden and deny; all that is harsh, bitterly cruel, and unnatural is to be your lot: isolation, the enmity of the world, disfranchisement, loss of intellectual freedom, the extinction of culture, and every possible deprivation. To these, thoroughly tried out in the years of National Socialist rule, you are doomed forever, for only under these conditions can you be "in form" for your horrible mission, and to win the world as your scoundrels intend, you must put from you all that the world has ever won for a people.

You are committed to this not only for the duration of the march toward the goal but forever, even after the victory. For such a victory gives no one peace; the eschatology of your scoundrels is utterly impossible and untenable, and a world which has only been abused without being won over will be in eternal revolt against the wretches who overcome it. Its state of mind will be that of those "hot-headed" Czech students ("hot-headed" is what, with a nauseating pretense of reasonableness, your scoundrels chose to call them) who in a quite hopelessly evil hour threw themselves barefisted against the iron machines of tyranny and were shot with the air of idiotic implacability on which German rule prides itself. "Rather die than endure it"—what is to become of you, German people, when the whole world takes the desperate watchword of these hot-heads for its own?

And has it not already done so? The war, which your seducers, firmly relying on the desire of others for peace, promised to spare you, has no other watchword, and in no other way can "Il faut en finir" be translated. You would believe no one who proclaimed to you the hopelessness of your struggle, for you still feel yourself strong. If only you could be made to realize that when victory can bring no hope the battle must be hopeless!

THE OTHER "NEW EUROPE"

Of the two concepts of the future, the two projects for a new order in Europe, one has been tried out; as yet the other has not. Temporarily and in limited measure the ultra-powerful empire of mastery and servitude, the empire of the self-enslaved superior race which sets its heel upon the subjugated helot races, has been tried out: the whole world knows approximately what it will be like. The picture of this peace stands before our eyes in the shape of a "Greater Germany" and its protectorates, set up by villainous madmen. In the unspeakable atrocities which are taking place in Poland and the Bohemian Protectorate those "subjects of the German people" who are still at liberty—the Danes, the Dutch, the Swiss, and whoever else may be regarded as occupying the German "living space"—can envisage their own fate.

The other "new world" has not been tried out; it is only a promise, and a precarious promise, of a peace to which each country would have to make equal sacrifices of national sovereignty and national self-determination, of a world of international cooperation, political and economic, where liberty is subject to social bonds and limitations, the Commonwealth, the Confederation of Europe. It is an optimistically humanitarian prospect of welfare, freedom, regard for law, individual happiness, the blossoming of culture; and consequently—for one must realize with what harshness and self-contempt man is apt to look upon himself—it is at a certain moral and intellectual disadvantage as against the tragically pessimistic and realistic idea of a black, bloody, and violent future.

An optimistic view of the world is easily associated with shallowness, thinness, and weak varnishing of the truth, while the pessimistic view which denies "happiness" appears to be deeper, more knowing, braver, and manlier. The German mind and temperament in particular are disposed to see optimism and pessimism in this light. But there are two ways of "denying" happiness, and there is a great moral difference between the pessimism which grows out of life's sufferings, out of painful sympathy for man's dark lot, and that which is malevolence and recalcitrance toward better things as such. There is a difference—and more than a difference—between the pessimism that says, Things will never be any better, and that which says, May they never be any better. The former leaves moral room for a readiness to oppose the will of man to the fatality of nature and to save for him as much of happiness and honor as possible. But a pessimism which says in bitter anger: What, is this earth to be a better and brighter place? I'll know how to handle that! So far as I can, I shall see to it that it will be still darker, crueler, and bloodier—a pessimism such as that has nothing to do with profundity, morality, or manliness; it is sheer opposition, base deviltry. And when, contrary to its longing for a world where better, saner, and happier circumstances prevail, a people advocates this pessimism, then that people is not heroic but base, and deserves the name of an enemy of mankind.

Does the German people propose to charge itself with this name, which is not so much a name as a curse? It is understood and agreed that those now in power in Germany are the sole obstacle to peace. If the Germans could see that they are fighting not for the happiness and greatness of their country, but for the advancement of a dozen upstarts, adventurers chained together by their crimes! If this clique is disregarded just for an instant, where is the reason for the life-or-death struggle which Germany now believes it must undergo, and because of which it is sinking from misery to misery? But unfortunately it is not enough that these men be disregarded; they must be discarded, and shaken off, so that a phantom is all that remains of what was never anything but a phantom.

Incitement to Treason

BY RAYMOND GRAM SWING

POLITICALLY, both the English and the French were poorly prepared for the present war. This is not said as a reproach but as a fact. Probably democracies are incapable of looking ahead, and so they can never be well prepared. But the consequences of unpreparedness are just as real as if the unpreparedness had been planned.

When the war began there had been no authoritative, responsible statement about a different Europe to which the German nation might hope to belong. Mr. Chamberlain had expressed vague assurances that Germany could have its rights if it changed its methods. But there was little in his words that a German could take hold of. Faced with the choice between following Hitler and following Chamberlain, Germans had no convincing reason for preferring Chamberlain. Mr. Chamberlain himself had brushed aside the League of Nations the year before by announcing that small nations should not expect it to protect them. Nothing conciliatory that either he or M. Daladier felt able to say publicly to Germans had concreteness. Even a German who did not trust Hitler, who knew Hitler was a promise-breaker, who deplored the blackmail and threats of the Hitler foreign policy, had no alternative. Not till after the war had been under way for many weeks did one hear the first suggestions of federalism, of a new European structure, of economic cooperation. These were necessarily tentative; the men in the British and French governments still have no specific plan for a new Europe and are only now beginning to pry their own minds loose from the conceptions of the old order.

Because Europe was organized on a basically wrong system and because it was impossible to reorganize it by common consent, the war could not be prevented. The only sound war aim, then, is the establishment of Europe on a peaceful basis. But this is not what Britain and France have announced as their objective. Their first aim is the overthrow of the Hitler regime, the "end of Hitlerism." This is understandable. Europe before the rise of Hitler was unhealthy, but a Europe in which Hitlerism functioned was still worse. So the removal of Hitlerism is a natural objective. A still more natural objective would be to remake the Europe that preceded Hitler and in a sense produced him. Putting an end to Hitlerism is only a half-measure, and a dangerous half-measure.

As things now stand peace is impossible till Hitler and Hitlerism are removed. The Allies frankly hope the removal will be the act of elements within the German nation. They are not fighting Hitler's armies; they are bringing pressure on Hitler's followers, deliberately making life difficult for them, so that they will be driven to find release and ease by acquiescing in the overthrow of the Hitler regime. In other words, the British and French policy is incitement to treason. It is an open invitation to some group to seize power in Germany. The promise to that group of a better Europe is still unformulated. It consists only of the suggestion of federalism. Federalism is a "good" word, but it is not a thoughtful or responsible word, not yet.

Let us assume that the pressure of the blockade succeeds, and some group in Germany does resort to treason and overthrows the Hitler government. Obviously it will do so in the name of the word which has been used. It will promise to bring Germany into the new European federation. That is what it must and will say. But the word can mean no more, when used by Germans, than it means now, when it is used by Mr. Chamberlain and M. Daladier. And it may mean much less. Another German group will be running the country, a regime using a "good" word, in place of Hitler's "bad" words. The objective of the Allies will have been achieved. But will it be peace? Will it mean federalism?

The answer to this question may or may not be known when the time comes. It depends not on the character and quality of the men who take over Hitler's power, but on the understanding and desires of the German people who support them. Peace and federalism are only possible in a world of diffused power. What made the European war was not only that Hitler's words were bad, or that his objectives were bad, but that he had too much power. Unless Hitler's successors have less power, there will be no guaranty of peace. The trouble with the Allied peace objective is that it is superficial. Not only must Hitlerism go. Power must be diffused. And if the Germans are not ready to adopt a social structure in which power is diffused, it does not matter what words are used—there can be no certainty of peace.

The danger of the situation is that a premium has been put on treason and the use of "good" words. Anyone who can whip up an intrigue within totalitarian Germany, whisk the crown off Hitler's brow and put it on some other brow, is promised his reward. He gets the power in place of Hitler. If he can rally enough followers inside Germany he is sure of accomplices in the British and French governments. And if he can bring the war to an end he is sure of the grateful approval of all the folks at home. This is incitement to treason for ambitious ruffians. The more ruffianly they are the more quickly they will respond, the more glibly they will use all the "good" words, the more of a mockery the peace is likely to be.

THE BASIS OF A GOOD PEACE

The only kind of uprising in Germany that would be worth anything would be one of the people of Germany, undertaken to destroy the concentrated power of the Nazi regime. It would have to have strong leaders, but these leaders would need to be dedicated to more than taking over Hitler's power. They would have to be devoted to its diffusion. They would, no doubt, have to hold the power temporarily before diffusing it. But such an uprising is not being courted by the Allies in stating their peace objectives. They are not talking to the people of Germany about the diffusion of power. On the contrary, they are repeating that it is none of the Allies' business what kind of internal regime the Germans set up—which is a piece of widely accepted nonsense. No durable peace is possible unless the dictators are brought down. Power has to be diffused. And since peace is the business of everybody, the social structure of Germany is the business of everybody. Germany cannot be taken into an organized peace until its social structure is adapted to the existence and perpetuation of peace. It may not be for the Allies to dictate to Germany what kind of domestic structure it should have, but they should not profess that peace is something to be given any German dictator who manages to displace Hitler and vows to be a "good" dictator.

The argument here is not that the Allies should pledge themselves to continue the war till the German people of their own free will accept a regime of diffused power. But the Allies should know what kind of peace organization they intend to establish, and they should announce that no nation can become part of it until it meets certain standards of diffused political power. Then the test of the fitness of Germany to collaborate with a peaceful federation will not be the protestations it puts forward but its actual type of government.

At present a good many people appear ready to accept Marshal Göring as a suitable man to make peace. I have no way of knowing whether Göring is a party to the conspiracies to which he is nominated by the Allied press and, almost certainly, by important elements in the British government. Göring, however, is a Nazi; the regime he would head would be a Nazi regime; the power he would wield would be concentrated tyrannical power. He would have no more place in an organized peace than Hitler.

If Göring is not to commit high treason against Hitler, some other prominently placed German is being bribed by the Allied peace terms to do so. To succeed he will have to control part of the army or the police; he will need weapons and ruthlessness. If he wins, a counter-revolution against him is almost certain to be made, for he will not control all the power or hold all the weapons. If he comes to power it will be by a putsch. And putsch after putsch is possible, until in the end one tyrant succeeds in taking away all the weapons of his opponents.

Doubtless each of these uprisings would be proclaimed as being in the service of the "good" words. But the meaning of the "good" words has been almost destroyed in Europe. They have been degraded to many dastardly uses, and when the season of putsches begins, the "good" words will be cheapened to a cent a dozen. That is what happens when words take the place of ideas, when governments say that Hitlerism must go but do not say that diffusion of power is a condition of Germany's membership in an organized peace.

Perhaps Europe is already condemned to a succession of putsches. Wherever there have been tyrannies, and the tyrants have become unpopular, new tyrants have risen to replace them. It is hard to believe, for instance, that Carol will keep his throne in Rumania, that Stalin will be long in command in the Soviet Union, that Franco can retain his hold on Spain, or even that Mussolini—or Ciano—can continue to rule the weary Italian nation.

AMERICA'S CHOICE

The role of the United States in a drama of successive stormy uprisings in Europe will not be enviable. The people of this country will be torn between their innate sense that they must have a part in the peace and their confusion about the validity of the upstart regimes which will be established. There will be little incitement to think honestly about the peace. Pacifists will be ready to rush in with a blessing for any arrangement that stops actual warfare, whether it is peace or not. That is the condition to which most of the professional pacifists in this country have degenerated. Many of our pacifists blessed Munich only because it was not a declaration of military war. They will bless a super-Munich if it brings the military war to an end this winter, even if it gives Germany a five-year truce to reorganize the Soviet Union so that the two nations become so strong that they can later impose their will on most of the world. That would suit many American pacifists, who are not at all apostles of peace but kindly persons horrified by actual warfare.

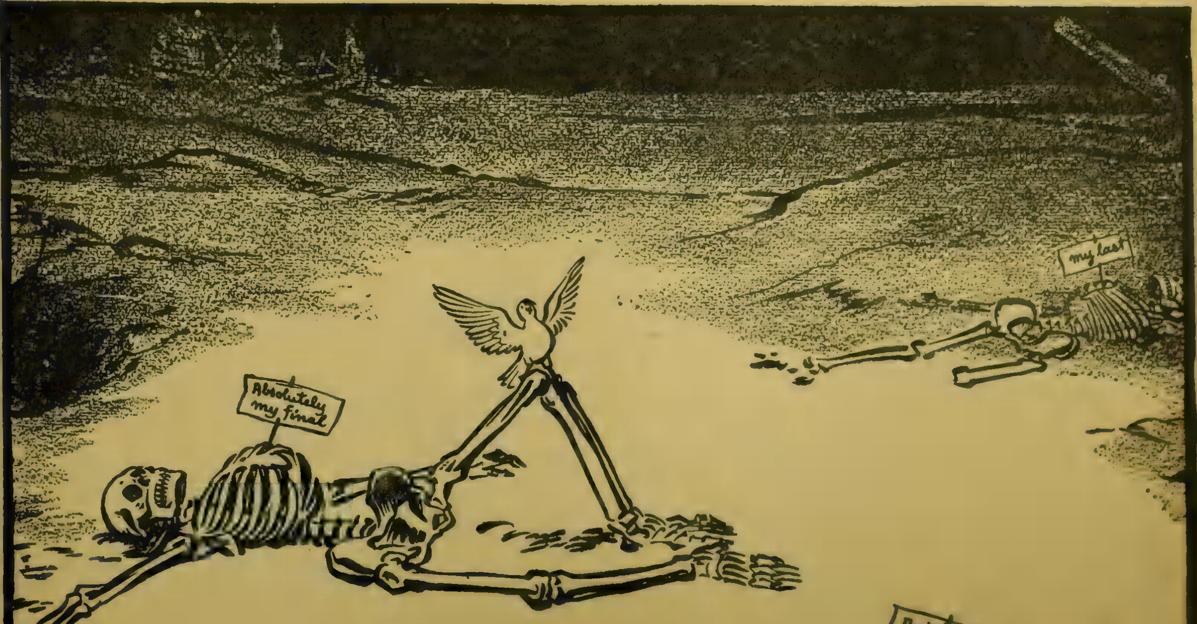
As long as American opinion is dominated by our so-called pacifists and their allies, the isolationists, the Administration will find it a challenge to its wisdom and character to keep before the world the conception of a true peace, and before the American people the acute sense of their obligation to take a responsible share in it. The British and the French cannot promise to establish a true peace by themselves, because it is beyond their scope to build it without the cooperation of the United States. That is their one acceptable apology for not having made a true peace their objective in the war, instead of the fall of Hitlerism.

The Allied case in Europe has been somewhat strengthened by the President's peace message to the Pope and his message at the opening of Congress. It needs much more reinforcement, which also must come from the United States. But first a period of frank talking and deep thinking is needed here. We must decide whether we really want peace or only want the war in Europe to be interrupted by a truce. I am not at all sure that most Americans want peace if the price of peace is federalism, supported by the United States and inevitably limiting the sovereignty of the United States. I am sure most Americans want to keep out of the present war in Europe, and want that even more than they want peace.

If the choice is not to be for a peace in which the United States bears its full responsibility, the consequences of that choice must also be frankly faced. In that case we are not for peace, and we shall not have it. That is, we must prepare for war. We must build a two-ocean navy. We must fortify our position in the Western Hemisphere. We must revise our sentimental good neighborliness in Central America, for the Panama Canal becomes more important to us than are Suez and Gibraltar to Great Britain. We must conduct as temperate an imperialism as we can in Central America and in the northern part of South America, but an imperialism it must be.

President Roosevelt and most thinking Americans do not want such a future for this country, and they do want peace. But I am not sure they can have peace, or can lead the United States into it. They do not talk frankly about it, and for most Americans the issues are utterly unfamiliar. Few Americans know that if a true peace is not established, we shall have to become a Western Hemisphere imperialism, founded on military and naval power. They do not appreciate that the isolationists are not pacifists but simply anti-foreign, and that the pacifists are not peace lovers but simply war haters.

There can be no true peace in Europe till we know what we want for ourselves, and, if it is peace, go to work making peace. Until we do, there will be putsches and truces and more wars. In this country we may not like Mr. Chamberlain's persistent incitement to treason in Germany. But if we do not like it we can give him something less superficial to talk about.



THE COOING OF THE DOVE

War in the East: New Phase

BY NATHANIEL PEFFER

TWO and a half years of warfare have brought China and Japan not nearer decision but only to a new phase, a phase of greater complexity in some respects, of greater simplicity in others. For there are now two different aspects to the Far Eastern war—one wholly internal and having to do with a test of strength between China and Japan alone; the other wholly external, having to do with the effects of the world conflict on the Far East.

The internal aspect is clearer and easier to deal with. It has been clarified by the apparent resolve of the Japanese to go through with the puppet regime in China and the apparent consent of Wang Ching-wei to assume the leadership of the regime. Whether Wang can win the adherence of enough Chinese of any stature still remains to be seen, but from all the indications he cannot. In that case the regime will stand as the mere shadow of a pretense, with one Chinese figure for coloration, to be used for bargaining purposes with the rest of the world and as a sop to the Japanese people to allay their growing discouragement. For it carries the appearance of victory, even if it bears none of the fruits with which to recompense the Japanese people for their deprivations.

When the Japanese army had reconciled itself to the necessity of fighting a long war—which was six months after the war began and six months after everybody except the Japanese army had recognized it—it adopted the strategy of eventual rule through Chinese as the easiest and cheapest way of administering a country of vast dimensions. Thus, too, the Chinese would be kept divided. One faction, to which the Japanese could lend military support when necessary, would always have a vested interest in the continuation of Japanese hegemony. A regional puppet regime was set up in Peiping as soon as North China was occupied; it did not work. Another was set up in Nanking as soon as the lower Yangtze basin was occupied; it did not work. Both remained little enclaves protected by Japanese bayonets in a hostile China. To have any chance of effectiveness a puppet regime had to have at least the appearance of being national. But a national government of any seeming genuineness had to have at least a few men of national reputation. Now there is one such—Wang Ching-wei himself—though the reputation is a tarnished one.

With the establishment of the new "central" government the Japanese are giving concrete form to the pretense, hitherto expressed only in official statements, that the war is over, that "the period of construction" has begun, and that Chiang Kai-shek is merely a rebel leader. In so doing they are also accepting a challenge. They are putting to the test whether they can ever rule China. If they do not succeed in the next two years they can never succeed.

The Japanese will undoubtedly make a speedy peace with the Wang Ching-wei government, one which has the outward appearance of liberal concessions but embodies all their desires. The appeal to the Chinese people on which the Wang government will rely is that of peace, cessation of suffering, restoration of opportunity to earn a livelihood. On the success of that appeal the Wang government and therefore Japan's aspirations to a continental empire stand or fall.

Unless there is latent in the Chinese people much that has not been detectable up to the present, the appeal will not succeed. There is war weariness no doubt. No nation in modern times, not even Spain, has been more ravaged by war than China since mid-summer, 1937. The European war, with the consequent loss of a certain degree of support from Great Britain, and the lukewarmness of America have added to the discouragement. If the Japanese were to be magnanimous and offer a truly generous settlement, withdrawing practically all their troops, lifting onerous restrictions, and mitigating their brutality, the Chinese might be reconciled. But if the Japanese army were capable of magnanimity or psychological insight, the war would not have gone to this point or there would not have been a war at all. Instead, it can be confidently predicted that the Japanese will withdraw few or none of their troops, that they will be even more harsh and grasping in their rule, and that the Chinese will be reduced to the status of the inhabitants of Manchoukuo —helotry on the soil or in the workshop.

I do not believe, therefore, that the Chinese will acquiesce. A certain number will doubtless be tempted by the prospect of returning to normal existence, but the larger proportion of those now fighting will continue to fight. In that case nothing will have been changed by the setting up of the puppet government except that Japan will have put the struggle to the final test. The outcome will still be determined by which is the stouter—Japanese economic endurance or Chinese spiritual endurance. And on the evidence of these two and a half years I should say that now, early in 1940, Chinese spiritual endurance is the less shaken of the two.

There has been from the beginning a tremendous exaggeration of Japan's economic weakness and an unwarranted expectation of a "breakdown." Disappointment because a delusory hope has failed to mature now manifests itself in a leap to the other extreme—the conviction that Japan can go on indefinitely. That, too, is delusory. The basic forces of Japanese society still run against Japanese military conquest of China if the Chinese are sufficiently resolved to hold out, and the Japanese army can be counted on to be brutal enough to stiffen Chinese resolve. The fact is that economically Japan is worse off than a year ago, and a year ago it was worse off than the year before. And the European war will accelerate the rate of decline. Japan can now export less, since much of the European market is closed, and at the same time it must pay more for its imports, since war demand has raised the price of those materials which it must buy to continue the war. There is thus a double drain on Japan's supply of free exchange. Of gold there can hardly be much left. The shortage of essentials is already serious; it will become more serious with the passing of every month. It can still be said that if China keeps time on its side it will escape subjugation.

One caveat must be entered to this argument by reason of recent events both in China and in the Western world, for the argument rests on the preservation of unity within China. On this subject there have been some disquieting reports in the last few months, turning mainly on the relations between the Chaing Kai-shek government and the Chinese Communists. With reference to those reports it must first be said that they should be taken with caution. A large proportion of them emanate from Japanese sources. They are designed to persuade Americans that as China's cause is hopeless anyway there is no use in America's trying to obstruct Japan. They are designed also to turn America's sympathies from China by raising the old bogy of Red penetration in China. But the danger of a break between the Chinese Communists and the Chungking government cannot be dismissed entirely.

The deciding factor lies not within China but without; it is Soviet Russia's now incalculable foreign policy. If Soviet Russia contracts an alliance with Japan or even makes an agreement of the same order as the one with Germany, it may bring pressure on the Chinese Communists to cease opposition to Japan. That the Chinese Communists will obey by no means follows; there is some reason to believe that many of their leaders would refuse and the Chinese Communist Party would split. But if they did obey, then of course China's capacity for resistance would be so seriously reduced that capitulation might result. Or if, at Russia's instance, the Chinese Communists set as the price of their continued cooperation in the war the right to exercise the balance of power in China and if the Chiang Kai-shek government should refuse, as doubtless it would, then the whole country would be split, and through the division Japan would walk in to mastery. But such a result can follow only on the fulfilment of two conditions—that the Chinese Communists will subordinate all else to their loyalty to Moscow, and that Moscow will deem it expedient either to sacrifice China for a deal with Japan or to use the threat of a deal with Japan as a means of forcing its way into China. And these conditions depend on the role that Soviet Russia elects to play in the world political scene.

This brings me to the second aspect of the Far Eastern war—the external. That the repercussions of Western world politics should be less pronounced now than they have traditionally been is hardly to be expected. They would have been felt in any case. They will be felt the more by virtue of England's enforced self-extrication from the Far East at this critical juncture and Soviet Russia's alignment with Germany and presumptive reversion to orthodox, pre-1914 czarist imperialism.

So far as the war itself is concerned, one cannot see how it can have any decisive bearing on the result as between China and Japan. It imposes handicaps on China in some respects and on Japan in others. China, it is true, can now count on little or nothing from Europe in the way of supplies or credits. But because of Japanese occupation of the ports it could not have got much in the way of supplies anyway. The loss of British credits will hurt. It will hurt still more if the British seek to put pressure on China in order to placate Japan and thus hold Japan in line against either Germany or Russia or both. The latter contingency I believe remote, partly because I doubt whether China would yield to the pressure to the extent of making an unfavorable peace with Japan, and partly because I believe the British have lost all illusions that the Japanese will abide by any agreement that does not profit themselves alone. I should add that I think it unlikely that the British would take the chance of alienating America by a Far Eastern arrangement at China's expense.

William Gropper The Nation, September 26, 1936

Chinese Communist Soldiers

The disadvantages that accrue to Japan by reason of the European war are no less than those China suffers. Politically Japan is dangerously isolated. There is no European counter-balance to British hostility, no German counter-balance to Russian hostility. Japan must therefore tread softly around British interests until Great Britain's defeat is sure, and it must either allay Russian hostility by Far Eastern concessions to Russia or be prepared to meet a Russian force freed of any threat from Germany. The last consideration may be eliminated, however, if Russia entangles itself any deeper in Europe or reveals conclusively that its military strength is hollow. The main disadvantages to Japan have already been touched on. They are economic. To carry on, Japan must increase its foreign trade. Obviously it cannot do so if Europe is eliminated from the world economy. Widely ramifying dislocations within Japan are thus inevitable. Other outlets must be found for goods hitherto sold to Europe, and they will be hard to find. Other sources will have to be found for goods hitherto bought in Europe, and they can be found only in one country—the United States. And it is hardly to the advantage of Japan to become increasingly, if not wholly, dependent upon the United States. In almost no other way could Japan become more vulnerable.

This brings me to the relations of the United States to the Far Eastern war. These are closer now than before last August, and their bearing is more direct since the American government denounced the treaty of commerce with Japan. The treaty expired on January 26. As has been said, Japan is now economically dependent on the United States as never before, and its vulnerability to American pressure is in direct proportion to its dependence. Refusal to sell supplies to Japan would for all practical purposes deprive Japan of those supplies. Penalizing duties on goods sold by Japan would lessen its sales here and by so much deprive Japan of the exchange with which to buy supplies anywhere. Unless the treaty is renewed, therefore, we are in a position to interpose a veto on any act by Japan, in China or elsewhere.

The treaty should not be renewed. My own position on that question was made clear in an article in The Nation last July under the title, Warn Japan Now. Even before the European war began, it was imperative that America exercise its power to check Japan so long as Europe was isolated within its own conflicts. It is more imperative now, and it is also more practicable. For Japan is more dependent on America, and the way has been cleared by the expiration of the trade treaty.

Russia—Twenty-two Years After

BY LOUIS FISCHER

STALIN is a lesser person than Lenin was. He is also different from Lenin. Lenin was a Bolshevik and a European. Stalin is a Bolshevik. Bolshevism is socialism refracted through a backward nation—Russia. Lenin tempered it with the ideas of the French eighteenth century and Western liberal thought of the nineteenth. But Stalin, the Georgian from the hill village near the geographic dividing line between Asia and Europe, is a superimposition of Karl Marx on Peter the Great. He is a mixture of the old and the new, of Russia and socialism. They are in conflict in him as they are in conflict within the country. Socialism is the thesis, Russia the antithesis, Stalin the synthesis. That is his strength. That is also the secret of the zigzags and stagnation or retrogression of the revolution. Sometimes the pull of Russia is stronger than the pull of socialism.

Lenin was in revolt against Russia. The primary purpose of the Bolshevik Revolution was to overcome Russia, to destroy the ugly material, psychological, and cultural heritage of czarism. That was the line of greatest resistance. Stalin has often departed from it to his enhanced temporary comfort but to the discomfiture of the revolution. He has violently attacked the physical vestiges of the past but adopted and perfected some of its political weapons, and he frequently acts in its spirit.

Lenin was truly great because he wanted big things. He aspired to conquer the mind of the world. During my later years in Moscow I would again and again take down a volume of Lenin to read, and would immediately feel removed from the reality of the day. Lenin was honest, big, and kind. He wanted to lift up. Now he lies embalmed and shrinking in the beautiful mausoleum on the Red Square. He was put there as a concession to the Russian love of the dead and to old Russia's retarded cultural development. The Oriental adulation of Stalin throughout the Soviet Union is another and labored official attempt—unsuccessful, I believe—to give the nation the "Little Father" it supposedly needs and craves.

Stalin seeks to remake the country he rules; Lenin aimed to remake the people first, then the country. Stalin gives the nation the regime he thinks it deserves. Forced upbuilding by the wise patron of masses too stupid to hear an idealistic call is Stalin's substitute formula for the humanitarian goals Lenin hoped to attain through real, not illusory, popular political activity in a country organized cooperatively.

Lenin was dictator for five years. His subordinates and millions of workers and peasants loved him and followed him. He did not shrink from harsh measures. But he governed with logic as well as iron. His weapons were the secret police of the Cheka, his brain, his personal warmth, and the social action of the masses. Lenin died in January, 1924. During the preceding year illness kept him inactive. Upon his death a period of struggle among Stalin and Trotsky and others commenced. Stalin gradually established his power, until it was supreme in 1929. Then came the first Five-Year Plan and collectivization—the effort to make Russia socialist.

Lenin, of course, never came to grips with the practical problems of building socialism. His life as a statesman consisted of three years of civil war followed by the New Economic Policy (NEP), which was a capitalistic concession to necessity and ruin. We do not know, therefore, whether the rigors of Soviet dictatorship are socialist inevitabilities or Stalinisms. The history of the Soviet revolution is no final or satisfactory criterion of the possibility of erecting a socialist society. Nor are Soviet conditions a guide to the nature of the future socialist state. Soviet practice is insufficient to explode one theory or create another.

The world's first socialist revolution took place in Russia because it was a bourgeois revolution too. It was two revolutions in one. Its initial function was to introduce bourgeois reforms: to smash the feudal village, crush the aristocracy, free women and national minorities, disestablish the church, improve the status of labor, and enrich the country. (Kerensky was an interlude in Russian history which could never have accomplished what it did—the overthrow of czarism—but for the rising ferment of the working classes that quickly engulfed it.) Russia needed these changes and eagerly accepted them. Bolshevism therefore found more support and provoked less resistance than might have been encountered by a purely socialist revolution in an advanced country where bourgeois reforms had strengthened capitalism and weakened anti-capitalist opposition.

Lenin made Russia's French Revolution, the bourgeois-democratic revolution. It was left to Stalin to make the Leninist-socialist revolution. But the democratic revolution in Russia was incomplete because Lenin, as a Bolshevik, founded a class dictatorship which circumscribed freedom. And the socialist revolution in Russia is incomplete because the democratic revolution was incomplete, because the country was socially, economically, and culturally unprepared for such an advanced system. The obstacles which socialism encountered in backward Russia have changed its course.

It is idle to debate whether Stalin has reverted to Leon Trotsky, or to Nicholas Romanov, or gone fascist. Bolshevism is unique. To identify Bolshevism with Nazism, for instance, is unscientific. They are marching together in international affairs. The Gestapo and the Ogpu are worthy of each other. But the economic molds of Soviet society have not been altered by the Stalin regime. Soviet economy is not capitalistic. Despite purges, pacts with Nazis, Russification, and aggression, agriculture in the U. S. S. R. remains collectivized; industry is state-owned and operated; and trade is a government monopoly. No fascist state is like that. The composition of Soviet society is also different from society in fascist countries. It can be proved inversely in this wise: if Mussolini fell, he could be succeeded by court elements, the army, industrialists, middle-class politicians, or a combination of all or some of these. In Germany there are the conservative army officers, various religious groups, remnants of trade unions and anti-Nazi political parties, as well as capitalists and Junkers, who might supplant the Nazis. A similar situation exists in Japan. But in Russia Stalin could only be overthrown or succeeded by Soviet forces. There are no other in the country. Equally important—deep in millions of hearts the revolution still lives.

Twenty-two years of Bolshevik education and experience have changed the Soviet citizen in many fundamental aspects. Compared with life in the capitalist world, personal life in the Soviet Union is less hampered by traditions and taboos. The respect for work and the contempt for idle women are greater. Poverty is a much smaller handicap. Opportunities for advancement and education are more ample. Parents worry less about the future of the rising generation. Races, professions, and social strata mix more. The mind made conformist, orthodox, timorous, and uncritical by the pressure of Soviet authority is nevertheless, in some indefinable way, more inconoclastic about life and its institutions. The consciousness of the right to equality is more widespread because castes are not closed and lack the sanction acquired through time, public acceptance, and security. Finally, personal dignity, despite the indignities of the terror, is higher. The revolution, in other words, has not destroyed itself.

The Soviet Union is a workers' and peasants' state if only because the capitalist class has been annihilated and cannot in present circumstances be restored. Collectivization and state-owned industry are very likely an improvement on capitalist methods of production. But the political superstructure required by these economic devices extorts a costly social overhead. The ideological question which the Soviet revolution poses to the world is: Can socialist economy be maintained without repressive dictatorship? Is social democracy possible?

The Soviet regime is a proletarian regime misguided by leaders who have betrayed the purposes of the revolution. They have yielded too much and too readily to Russia. They have also suffered too much from Europe.

In their relations with the Soviet government foreign states have been moved by considerations of national power politics only when they needed Russia badly. When Germany was weak or when the Western democracies thought they could "appease" Germany, they indulged their ideological antagonism to the U. S. S. R. because they did not have to play power politics with it. The hostility directed against it exceeded the opposition which a national state occupying the present Soviet territory might normally have expected. The Soviet Union was never permitted to become part of Europe. And it failed to make Europe a part of it. It failed partly because it did not always try very hard, but chiefly the failure was due to conditions. After November 11, 1918, the world revolution never had a chance. Europe's rejection of Russia threw Russia back on itself. It was not Stalin's fault that he had to attempt to build socialism in one country. But he cannot be absolved, either, from the blame of building it as he has. Statesmen are the tools of history, but at the same time their stupidity, genius, and mistakes make history.

Lenin knew how to work with people. He kept Trotsky and Stalin, rivals from early days, under one roof. He called Zinoviev and Kamenev "strike-breakers" but cooperated with them harmoniously. He chastised Bukharin in polemics and yet had a warm, inner personal relationship to him. Stalin, on the other hand, drives his enemies into the desert and then shoots to kill. He also lacks the faculty of modulation. Lenin took Ludendorff's help in order to get from Switzerland to Russia and lead the revolution, but he was never sullied by the contact. The railway car that carried him through war-time Germany was "sealed" in all respects. When the Germans drafted the preamble of the Brest-Litovsk treaty with the Bolsheviks, they used the usual diplomatic formula—"To establish peace and friendship." Trotsky objected to "friendship" and had it deleted. But Stalin proclaims that the relations between Bolshevik Russia and Nazi Germany are "cemented in blood."

I do not subscribe to the personal theory of history accepted today in Russia, where all victories and achievements—but no setbacks or blunders—are attributed to Stalin. But leadership does count, especially in a country whose rulers are not directly responsible to or removable by the people. That is the root of the evil in Soviet Russia. Experience has demonstrated that dictatorship gives neither security at home nor peace abroad. In Russia, with no unemployment, there is no economic security because purges and police and political measures make for a tremendous labor turnover, innumerable dismissals, and fear. Nor could the Soviet government refrain from unnecessary aggression.

The three central problems—foreign policy, economy, and democracy—are thus intimately intertwined, and the last is the key to the other two. There was never any doubt that a state could produce goods. An army can. A prison can. Peter built cities. The crucial question posed by the Bolshevik Revolution was that of the role of the individual. Lenin and the Marxists held dictatorship or the omnipotent, omnipresent government to be an evil, for they envisaged as their ultimate goal the withering away of the state. In the early stages at least, this meant not anarchy but democracy, not the absence of authority but the curbing of authority and its control by the people. That is why the announcement of the Soviet constitution of 1936 was a world event. It heralded an unprecedented phenomenon—the abdication of a dictatorship. Numerous democracies had become dictatorships. Now a dictatorship promised to change into a democracy. Unfortunately it did not. The accentuated terror which commenced in 1936 has mocked the constitution. The chief cause of the purges and trials I believe was the discovery of anti-Stalin sentiment in the country and especially in the army and the G. P. U. It is significant that on May 11, 1937, the very day on which Marshal Tukhachevsky was demoted and a month before he and his generals were executed, political commissars were introduced in the Red Army. These commissars, Pravda said, are "the eyes and ears of the Communist Party in the ranks of the army." Apparently, Tukhachevsky had so many followers among the officers that Stalin introduced commissars to watch them. With Tukhachevsky's execution the purge grew especially intense. Everybody who had been connected with any opposition group or anybody whose popularity and authority might have made him dangerous if he joined the opposition became subject to the purge. In these circumstances democracy could only have facilitated the work of the anti-Stalinist elements and handicapped their suppressors. Whether, given different conditions, the Soviet dictatorship might have died remains the great riddle.

At its birth the Soviet revolution evoked the sympathetic tolerance of liberals, progressives, and optimistic believers in a better world. They hoped that the internationalism written on the Soviet banner might end wars. The class conflict in nations would supersede the imperialist conflict between nations; socialism would resolve the class conflict; then there would be peace. They hoped economic advance would prove possible without capitalist exploitation, misery, and the ups and downs of boom and depression. They hoped that a new socialist democracy would be purer than bourgeois democracy.

The favorable reaction of many people toward Soviet Russia was part of their reaction against the first World War. The world economic collapse in 1929 and succeeding years increased the number of Soviet friends; fascism still further swelled their ranks, especially when it appeared that Russia was moving toward democracy.

Today the Soviet government is engaged in war on caribbean calling....

The wonders of the West Indies . . . the rare beauty of the tropics . . . call you to cruise NOW with the Great White Fleet. Gaily, informally, you'll live in delightful comfort on your "all-first-class" ship under the American Flag. Your outside stateroom faces the sea. The outdoor pool lies open to the sky. Excellent orchestra, movies, deck sports and of course delicious food.

CRUISES FROM NEW YORK

Every Saturday. To Havana (2 calls) Panama Canal Zone and Costa Rica.

Every Wednesday. To Kingston, Jamaica, B. W. I. (2 calls), Barranquilla and Cartagena, Colombia, S. A. and Panama Canal Zone.

Alternate Saturdays. Includes 2 weeks in Guatemala's highlands; calls at Santiago, Cuba and Puerto Cortes, Honduras.

Every Wednesday. To Jamaica, B. W. I.; Colombia, S. A. (2 ports), Panama Canal Zone, Costa Rica and Havana. Fare includes two-day maintenance and shore trips in Panama.

Every Saturday. Two full days ashore including hotel and shore trips.

Ask about other cruises from New York and New Orleans.

For colorful descriptive cruise folder, ask or write any authorized Travel Agent or UNITED FRUIT COMPANY, Pier 3, N. R. WH 4-1700, or 632 Fifth Avenue, CI 7-1034, N. Y. Also Offices in Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, New Orleans, Washington, D. C.

great white fleet

Finland. Moreover, after having done much for peace, it declined at the crucial moment to throw its weight against the fascist war-makers. This and the emergence of nationalism in the Soviet Union disappoint the faith in its internationalism. Capitalism's ability to maintain an equilibrium despite continued heavy unemployment, widespread physical distress, and political insecurity restored some of the confidence of those whom the stock-market panic and subsequent business depression drove leftward, while Russia's economic difficulties dashed the hopes of many who had seen the millennium in terms of socialist industry and trade. Finally, the attempt to democratize Soviet dictatorship was a failure.

As a result, pro-Soviet sympathies in the capitalist world are now certainly at their lowest ebb since 1917. This makes for reaction and is used by reaction. Retreats by Soviet Russia have always been defeats for the left-of-center forces in bourgeois countries. These political groups and individuals are now impressed by the need of dissociating themselves from this often unwanted link with Soviet affairs. Some try to achieve that end through red-hunts. But in the present period of mental confusion the only hope of the left is a bold, appealing ideological improvement on the Bolshevism that has been transplanted into Western political conditions by foreign Communist parties, and also an organization as dynamic as those parties have been. Everything depends on whether socialism and democracy are compatible.

Glossary for 1940

BY ROBERT BENDINER

BEDFELLOW THEORY. Figuratively at any rate, bed plays a big part in modern politics. Tories look under their beds for Bolsheviks, and left-wingers look into other left-wingers' beds for tories. The first of these reactions is elementary and relatively harmless; the second is a more complex and rather neurotic phenomenon which in recent years has flowered into the Bedfellow Theory. Briefly, this doctrine is that whether you are right or wrong is not so important as who is on your side. To take the ultimate example, let us consider the application of the Bedfellow Theory to certain Russian activities in Finland. There are those of us who never liked and do not like now the technique of liberation by assault and battery; there are others who did not especially mind this vigorous approach in Ethiopia and Czechoslovakia but who are hotly vocal about it now that it has been adopted by their favorite villain. Unfortunately in the general chorus of condemnation the voices blend, and before we know what has happened the champions of the Newest Russia convict us of getting into bed with Herbert Hoover, Westbrook Pegler, and the National Association of Manufacturers. Few of us would want to be found in a coffin with any of these worthies, much less a bed, but what can we do? Granting, even insisting, that we have to sleep somewhere, the Soviet sympathizers would have us split a mattress with them, ignoring the Swastikas embroidered on the pillow. And that's where the weakness of the Bedfellow Theory emerges. You can always see the rascal in your neighbor's bedroom and never the knave in your own—though certainly the presence of a Göring should make itself felt in any bed. All that an honest man can do is to pick his bed on its merits and lie in it. It is better to let politics afflict you with strange bedfellows than to let a choice of bedfellows afflict you with strange politics.

Imperialism. The moralism of men and states has its finest expression in national robbery. Nothing that statesmen do lifts them to quite the same evangelical pitch as the well-planned plundering of some lesser state. The legions of the Caesars came, saw, and conquered in the name of the Pax Romana. Britain and France manfully took up the white man's burden of filching half the world's wealth from helpless natives. We "civilized 'em with a Krag" in the Philippines and "bumped 'em off" in the name of good roads and hygiene in Haiti and Santo Domingo. Mussolini set Ethiopia on fire and hanged its leaders so that it could share in the grandeur that is Rome's. The Mikado's troops massacred several million Chinese strictly out of "friendship." And the Red Army has been dropping thermite bombs from Helsinki to Petsamo by way of what Pravda calls "fraternal assistance to the Finnish people." Until recently the Germans presented a refreshing contrast. With no moral reputation to defend, they were artlessly predatory. Deutschland über Alles, Aryan supremacy, "divine right to rule," even Lebensraum, were all the honest language of the jungle; the Nazis never stooped to do anything "for the other fellow's good." Now all that is changed. Germany too has gone moralist, and its imperialism has a higher cause. Hitler explained it all in his New Year's address. Like Trotsky, he doesn't believe in socialism-in-one-country. Henceforth when Göring's aces bomb open cities, when S. S. men shoot Czech students and flog Polish Jews, they will have only one thought in mind: the building of a Socialist Europe.

Intellectuals. In the epithetic art there is nothing to equal the scorn with which an intellectual calls an intellectual an intellectual. It appears to be part of the growing tradition among the men of brains that they are a degenerate lot as compared with stevedores, farm hands, and bull fighters. But the phenomenon is not new. Intellectual-baiting is the oldest occupational disease of intellectuals. Usually the process starts mildly enough when some of the more effete members of the caste put on a show of being anti-intellectual just for the novelty. Some flaunt an addiction to burlesque, others go about truculently matching chest hair with their contemporaries, many develop a preoccupation with gore, and all affect a passion for anything in overalls. Beyond these relatively harmless exhibits come the Judas intellectuals who stand ready to lead the flock to the abattoir. Once Germany was a land where every burgher who could afford a pair of thick rimless spectacles was a Herr Doktor, revered by the simple folk of town and country and held up to the young for a noble, if pot-bellied, model. Then came the cult of the Übermensch and a fierce anti-intellectualism, nurtured not by green-eyed farmers or inferiority-ridden mechanics, but by neurotic Nietzschean intellectuals. The idea took slowly at first, but surely, aided by all the forces that were finally to raise Adolf the Artist to his Berchtesgaden eyrie. Today the German intellectual, however Aryan, rates socially well below the garbage man and only a notch or two above the Jew. It is time that intellectuals got over their sneaking suspicion that a typewriter is less noble than a meat ax, and a briefcase downright degenerate.

International Banker. Back in the days when radio's chief menace was Amos 'n Andy, when Royal Oak was just the name of a British ship of the line, and the only Little Flower that made newspaper copy was LaGuardia, "bankers' hours" connoted a life of ease. Now, thanks to the air waves, we know that at least one class of bankers has been maligned: the international banker, far from being a sluggard, is a man of many facets and diversified activities. An average day in his life, if he covers all the ground the good priest says he does, must run something like this: Up at six for a triumphant look at the day's market quotations, followed by the customary hurried recitation of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. Then breakfast, with a careful reading of the Wall Street Journal and the Daily Worker. At nine the first emissaries from Washington arrive and the day's plotting begins. Plans are made for spending more and more government money, for concentrating more and more power in Washington, and above all for pushing this country into the war. The afternoon is given over to the creation of fictitious credits to be sold to middle-class suckers (Christians only need apply) in exchange for gold, which the i. b. buries in his back yard or sends to Russia by way of Trotsky disguised as William C. Bullitt. Dinner is served for six—two governors, a senator, a mayor, and a brace of Supreme Court justices. The i. b. communicates his wishes—no buses for parochial school-children, more indecency in the films, a sitdown strike here, a youth-control law there—and the butler tucks a bag of gold into the pocket of each departing guest. After dinner checks must be made out to a long list of alien, subversive, un-American, atheistic, communistic, capitalistic organizations. Then a quick change into proletarian disguise and a dash by cab to Fourteenth Street to report to Earl Browder on the day's activities. Home by midnight for ten minutes of quiet international banking, and so to bed.

Peace. Probably the reason the world has fallen upon evil days is that every big nation has a peace policy. France's peace policy threw Spain to the dogs and shoved Czechoslovakia under the shadow of the Führer's mustache, England's erased Czechoslovakia altogether, and Japan's skinned China to the bone. The Soviet Union's, most vaunted of them all, has already cost the freedom of the Estonians, Latvians, and Lithuanians, and is now flaming through Finland, while all Southeastern Europe cringes before the Russian olive branch. "Peace," as the poet understates it, "hath her victories no less renowned than war." No less, indeed! In times like these men of good-will cannot afford to stand idly by muttering, "A pax on both your houses." They must work for the day when the hand of the peacemaker shall no longer be lifted against his brother and a tranquil Mars vobiscum shall fall from the lips of men.

Semi-fascism. Few enlightened persons imagined a year or so ago that there could be anything worse than fascism. Now, thanks to the men of the extreme left, we know that there is. It is semi-fascism. This is what the red troops of the Soviet Union fought against in Poland, as soon as they discovered it had been there all the time, and it is what they are fighting now in Finland. Your full-fledged fascist is a reasonable creature. He may systematically rob a million people, torture hundreds to death because their grandmothers were descended from their great-grandmothers, and forbid milk to non-Aryan babies, but as Pravda good-naturedly puts it, chacun à son goût. The understanding Soviets admit that the Nazis do have droll customs, but it would be the grossest folly—something like unprogressive child-training perhaps—to deal with them forcefully. It is better to give them sympathy and help them in their little problems. But these Finns with their cooperatives and their elected governments! Semi-fascists, that's what they are, and fire and sword aren't good enough for them. There ought to be a League Against War and Semi-Fascism. Probably there will be.

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

To read SANDBURG'S LINCOLN

is to experience the deep thrill of a masterpiece, "four volumes in which you seem to become almost a part of Lincoln" (Lewis Gannett, New York Herald Tribune), "worthy of a place next to the Beethoven Ninth and the Brahms Fourth" (Hendrik Willem Van Loon), "even the reading of which adds inches to one's height" (Sterling North, Chicago Daily News).

To own SANDBURG'S LINCOLN is to have in your library "the truest biography of the greatest American" (Charles Poore, N. Y. Times), "one of the tallest sycamores in the forest of American literature" (Lloyd Lewis, N. Y. Herald Tribune).

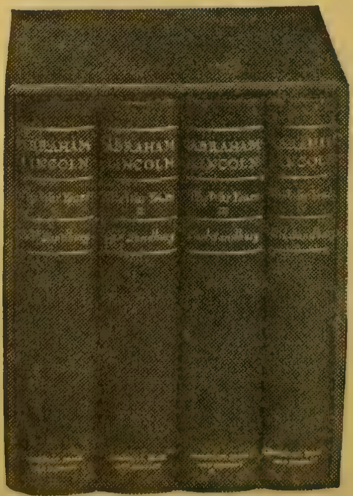
Carl Sandburg's
ABRAHAM LINCOLN
THE WAR YEARS

There has never, in our time, been such acclaim for a book—the immediate, unqualified, unanimous verdict of "great." And there has never been a better time for the great book on Lincoln to be given to the world.

As The Nation reviews seventy-five years of an illustrious history, it is entirely fitting that Sandburg's Lincoln be urged upon Nation readers. Sandburg has written the biography, for us and our children and our children's children, that lets us live with the man who has come to be the greatest symbol of American democracy. Before Sandburg, no one has ever understood Lincoln so well. Now that Sandburg's Lincoln belongs to us, we may understand more about Lincoln, democracy, and America than we have ever understood before.

Four volumes, 2503 pages, 414 photographs and many linecuts. Boxed, $20.00



383 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

LIC LIBRARY

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

Leading books in every field

Louis Filler's

CRUSADERS FOR AMERICAN LIBERALISM

It brings to life, in exciting story panorama, the great reform movement in pre-War years. It portrays to the thousands of readers of Lincoln Steffens' Autobiography the story of all the fighters against reaction. For a true perspective on the past, this is truly a book for today. "A brilliant history."—R. L. Duffus, N. Y. Times. "A first-hand contribution to an understanding of the times."—Charles A. Beard. $3.50

Hutchins Hapgood's

A VICTORIAN IN THE MODERN WORLD

John Dewey says: "It is one of the great biographies of literature. It gives among other things a vivid picture of one aspect of the social and intellectual changes which have taken place in the United States in the last forty years. But that is not its claim to unique distinction. More than any book I have read, it records the reactions of a highly sensitive person to the esthetic quality of all the various phases of human experience."

Illustrated, $5.00

T. S. Eliot's

THE IDEA OF A CHRISTIAN SOCIETY

An examination of the spiritual state of society today, in a book as small and as large and integral as Pascal's Pensées. $1.50

Louis Untermeyer's

FROM ANOTHER WORLD

The leading figures of modern verse—Robinson, Lindsay, Wylie, Benet, Frost, Millay, Amy Lowell, Cabell, and many others—as this brilliant critic of modern poetry has known them both as friends and through their work. "A patrician work, thoughtfully entertaining, fragrant with associations."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. $3.00

Leonard Woolf's

BARBARIANS: WITHIN AND WITHOUT

An inquiry into the state of western civilization, a basic discussion that is not at all topical, but uses the present state of the world as a springboard for a fundamental book. $1.50

Felix Frankfurter's

LAW AND POLITICS

Edited by Archibald MacLeish and Walter C. Prichard. A selection from the papers of the Supreme Court Justice, from 1913 to 1938, "who writes better than one of his two masters, Justice Brandeis, and thinks more sharply than the other, Justice Holmes."—Lewis Gannett, N. Y. Herald Tribune. $3.00

Oswald Garrison Villard's

FIGHTING YEARS

This great journalist's autobiography is modern history in America viewed from the inside. "At long last, an autobiography by a reporter in the top flight of his profession. This is not the usual volume of reminiscences. It is a chapter in American history, for Villard is a sort of 'seeing eye' and it may well be said that the things that happened to him also happened to the United States."—Harry Hansen, N. Y. World-Telegram.

3rd printing, $3.00

Constancia de la Mora's

IN PLACE OF SPLENDOR

The autobiography of this Spanish aristocrat is one of the most moving personal histories of our era and one of the highest praised, as well as an essential background book for Europe's present struggle. 4th big printing, $3.00

Lewis Jacobs'

THE RISE OF THE AMERICAN FILM

"It is not possible in a short review to do this book justice.... The important fact is that we have here a comprehensive, up-to-date history of the movies which sets a very high standard. Comments on more than a thousand film plots, an index of films, and forty-eight pages of characteristic stills make it especially valuable."—The Nation. $4.50

Walter Shepherd's

SCIENCE MARCHES ON

A fascinating account of science whole—all branches, their history, their present development—summing up man's knowledge of the universe he lives in. Illustrated, $3.00

383 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Comments on "The Nation"

[In preparing this anniversary issue the editors invited a number of outstanding Americans to comment on The Nation and its role—past and present. We asked for criticism and not merely for birthday greetings. A few of the letters we received appear on these pages. Some have already been printed and the others will be used in later issues.]

GOVERNOR HERBERT H. LEHMAN

I have for a long time read The Nation as frequently as my crowded schedule will permit. May I say that regardless of whether or not one agrees with the editorial views of The Nation—and I have not done so by any means in all instances—there is no doubt that the articles are usually interesting and provocative. They frequently offer a point of view which might otherwise not be readily available to the public and, if accurate, thus become informative and educational.

May I congratulate you and your associates on the long career of The Nation and express the hope that it will continue for many years to render useful service to the public.

SECRETARY HENRY A. WALLACE

You ask what I honestly think of The Nation. I think it has richly justified its seventy-five years of existence by its championship of the under-dog, by its defense of civil liberties, and in general by its liveliness and cantankerousness. But I do hope, before another seventy-five years have passed, that The Nation will become (1) less city-minded and more accurately informed on the agricultural problem, and (2) as critical of the doctrines and doctrinaires of the left as it has always been, and properly, of the doctrines and doctrinaires of the right.

NORMAN THOMAS

My very hearty congratulations to The Nation on its Seventy-fifth Anniversary and my sincere wishes for many more happy returns of the day. To live so vigorous and useful a life as The Nation for seventy-five years in American journalism is no mean achievement. Naturally in that time the magazine has passed through many phases and has served with vigor and zeal many different and sometimes conflicting causes. But in general, at least in the period when I have known it best—and that goes back to the Godkin days—what has given a kind of unity to The Nation has been its function as a critical journal in the best sense of the word. It has honestly sought information and has tried to base its opinions upon fact.

In recent years I have feared that The Nation was departing from this standard in favor of the "democratic frontism" so popular among intellectuals, to which it contributed little by way of sound criticism or real illumination. Since August 23 I have thought I was witnessing something of a return of the magazine to its old critical integrity.

American life and American letters need something more than critical integrity, but we who seek a program for our times owe much to any who will contribute zeal and capacity to the search for truth. In this cause may The Nation serve with ever-renewed strength.

ATTORNEY GENERAL ROBERT H. JACKSON

Congratulations on a life that defies the mortality table of journalism and spans half our nation's existence. What really matters now is your next seventy-five years.

The task of the conservative journal is relatively an easy one. It may and usually does use the immediate interest of its group as the touchstone of its policy. By this simple formula it may please and prosper.

To achieve a leadership of liberal thought is a different matter. Its interest takes a wider scope and a longer range and considers more diversified welfares. It may more easily misread the signs. There have been times when I thought you did misread them. But who is to judge? And what of it anyway? To stimulate, to arouse us from a fatal complacency, is enough. In this you have never failed.

May you live and prosper.

SHERWOOD ANDERSON

Now that anyone having a tendency to liberalism in government or any human feeling for the under-dog is being marked as a Communist, the value of a publication like The Nation becomes increasingly more important. It has always seemed one of the really important publications of the country to me.

More strength to The Nation!

THURMAN ARNOLD

The Seventy-fifth Anniversary of The Nation is an event to be celebrated by all liberals, by all lovers of free speech, and by all those who want to see the under-dog given an occasional break. No publication in America does better service to these three causes. No publication in America has a better or longer record of courageous utterances. It has constantly defended unpopular causes with intelligence and sincerity. It has always attracted writers with style and wit. We could lose hundreds of our stereotyped journals without serious consequences. We cannot and must not lose the inspirational prejudice-dispelling Nation.

The Nation is often wrong but never wrong and on the wrong side at the same time. What, never? Well, hardly ever!

HAROLD J. LASKI

I have read The Nation for twenty-five years, since, that is, I landed on the shores of the American continent as a student just out of Oxford; and research has led me to read much of its previous content. I have always appreciated it greatly—its vigor, its freedom of comment, its anxiety to see that just things do come just. I have not seldom disagreed violently with it; but I have never failed to feel that it should have my sincere respect.

Your next years are going to be hard and to call for all your courage and energy. May you have the power to carry on the fight with undiminished strength. You have never been so necessary as now when the liberalism for which The Nation was founded has to fight hard to maintain the democratic idea in America.

OSCAR AMERINGER

There are a great many formidable, six-syllabled words in The Nation which get me and my people down. And we are so busy rustling shirts for our own backs that we can't afford to do much tearing of them over the woes of the Croats, Slovenes, Finns, Letts, and Laps, concerning which The Nation is so constantly het up. It isn't that we are callous about the fate of our European brethren. It's just that we can't take on so much territory and that we are in touch with these affairs anyway through the capitalist press, whose editors are tickled to keep us looking toward the Atlantic Ocean while they pick our pockets on the home front and millions of Americans go hungry.

God forbid, however, that I should attempt to tell the competent editors of a paper five years older than myself how to run their business. I have had more liberal and labor papers shot from under me than Stonewall Jackson had horses, and I know what a thankless task it is to run an under-dog periodical. I'm naturally delighted to find each week that the The Nation which has fought so gallantly for so many years for the causes which I hold dear is so bouncingly alive today. Stick to the job for seventy-five more years and maybe we can inch up a bit on that genuine democracy of which The Nation is the authentic mouthpiece.

SENATOR GEORGE W. NORRIS

For a great many years I have been a reader of The Nation and one of its humble admirers. Its courageous and unselfish attitude in defending the rights and liberties of the common man has won for it the admiration of all people who believe in justice and liberty. I should be happy indeed if I knew that its appealing voice could be heard at every fireside in America. To me it has always been a source of encouragement and inspiration in every progressive cause I have ever tried to help.

It should be an inspiration to you who have made this able fight to know that your words and efforts have given joy and satisfaction to the thousands of readers who have tried to follow your leadership in the battle for human progress and human happiness.

JOHN L. LEWIS

I read The Nation because it is an outspoken vehicle for liberal and progressive thought. With so many organs of opinion dedicated to the presentation of a single viewpoint, The Nation upholds the essentially American tradition of the free press. The conflict of ideas among its contributors and editors is always thoughtful and invigorating.

FANNIE HURST

My admiration for The Nation is based on factual evidence and not primarily upon the pleasant circumstance that we happen to think alike. I like the informed and vigorous standards of editing; I like the kinds of minds chosen to contribute; I like the awareness, indignation, impatience, and tolerance that characterize your magazine. Sometimes, it is true, I could wish for more of the attitude that "there is much to be said on both sides." But nevertheless, since I am on your side so much of the time, I find your magazine vigorous and invigorating.

More power to you!

BENJAMIN V. COHEN

The Nation has now been in existence seventy-five years. I have been a reader of it for only twenty-five of these years. I am struck by the fact that it shows no sign of age and indeed exhibits more of the spirit of youth than many of its younger rivals. In a critical period of our national life The Nation reveals a peculiar receptiveness to new ideas without yielding its attachment to the values that have made us take pride in our national heritage.

The Great Caviar Riots

BY GEORGE S. KAUFMAN

Owing to the Russian situation, the shortage of unsalted caviar in this country threatens to become acute.—News item.

IT WAS in the spring of 1940 that a shocked public was first brought to face with the facts regarding the unsalted caviar shortage. True, there had been mutterings on Long Island for some time, but few were prepared for the sensational figures disclosed by the Gallup caviar poll, which showed that 81.6 per cent of the population of Southampton had been without unsalted caviar for almost a month. A private survey disclosed a serious lack of unsalted corpuscles in children between eight and sixteen, and an outbreak of rickets was feared.

Naturally a wave of indignation swept the country. The New York Herald Tribune laid the blame squarely at the feet of Mr. Roosevelt. "While the National Labor Relations Board is giving its biased decisions," said the Tribune editorially, "people are riding the streets without a spoonful of caviar to their names. Laws are passed to prevent the grinding down of the lower classes, but the grinding up of the upper classes continues unabated. Communism has reached us at last."

Matters thereupon went from bad to worse. In Tuxedo Park an elderly woman, unable to obtain unsalted caviar, actually ate salted caviar, and of course became violently ill. When the government still failed to act, a huge parade and protest meeting were planned for New York City. Five hundred limousines, manned by chauffeur and footman, and each containing a genuine First Family, drove up Park Avenue, followed by a thousand butlers and personal maids on foot. A delegation from the Racquet and Tennis Club rode as a unit, bearing aloft a huge placard: BELUGA OR BUST. The parade was followed by a mass-meeting at Madison Square Garden, held in conjunction with the Horse Show.

As the situation became more desperate, Town and Country opened caviar lines in Cartier's. Butlers and footmen who stood in line received a single tablespoonful of unsalted caviar, which was then rushed to Long Island in iced containers. In this way much suffering was alleviated, but it soon became evident that no real relief could be granted unless the government took steps. Even at this point, however, few could have predicted the outcome: that the Republicans would sweep into power as the result of the stubborn refusal of the Roosevelt Administration to act.

The climax came with lightning rapidity. As always, decisive action was brought about by the rise of a real leader—in this case Mrs. Bellington Belcher, of New York and Newport. From her villa at Newport, that summer, Mrs. Belcher quietly mailed engraved invitations to about a hundred of her friends. They read as follows:

Mrs. Bellington Belcher
Requests the Pleasure of
Mr. and Mrs. ——————'s Company on Thursday Night, August 22d, 1940 at Ten o'Clock to Consider Rioting

White Tie

A date was secretly set for the uprising—Tuesday, October 29, shrewdly chosen because of its proximity to Election Day. It was a day that was to go down in history as Unsalted Tuesday.

On that fated evening an unusual number of Rolls-Royces and Isotta-Fraschinis could have been seen quietly converging at Madison Avenue and Sixty-first Street. Well-groomed men and women in evening clothes walked quietly into the Colony Restaurant. The casual observer would have noted nothing unusual, but a careful eye would have detected suspicious bulges in the rear pockets of the gentlemen, an unusual fatness in the ladies' evening bags. Later these bulges were to turn out to be tightly rolled copies of Spur and Tatler, deadly weapons when wielded by desperate men. In the ladies' bags, accounting for the fatness, were old copies of the "Social Register," which they were later to hurl with disastrous effect.

From her seat at the head of the table Mrs. Bellington Belcher gave the signal. Spreading a bit of caviar on her toast, Mrs. Belcher lifted it to her mouth, tasted it, and then uttered just one word:

"Salted!"

It was the agreed signal. In five minutes the room was a wreck. Not a glass, not a plate, remained unbroken. Handfuls of salted caviar were hurled against the walls; the noses of the headwaiters were rubbed in it. When the police arrived ten minutes later, the place was a shambles.

Greetings
to
THE Nation
on its 75th ANNIVERSARY

International LADIES' GARMENT
WORKERS' UNION

Arrests were made, of course, but the weight of public sympathy was such that the prisoners were immediately released. The following morning Mrs. Belcher executed her master-stroke. The country was flooded by campaign brooches on which the words "Vote Republican" were spelled out in black pearls, in imitation of caviar. Tiffany's had made a special rate for ten million of them.

With the election going Republican, of course, there was an abundance of unsalted caviar from that time on. This was accomplished through a new government bureau, the UCC (Unsalted Caviar Commission), of which Mrs. Belcher herself was made the head.

War or Peace in American Labor?

BY HERBERT HARRIS

IN RECENT White House conversations John L. Lewis has again injected the issue of "one big union" into the struggle to bring about peace and unity between the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. Back in March of 1939, when peace committees from both camps were meeting with President Roosevelt, Lewis set off the same fireworks, with flare-headline effects. He urged that the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. dissolve forthwith, that the "Big Four" Railroad Brotherhoods also disband, and that all three groups be merged into a new Congress of American Labor, the presidency of which was to go to an "executive type," such as A. F. Whitney of the Trainmen or D. B. Robertson of the Firemen and Enginemen.

In some quarters it was believed that Lewis offered this solution in an earnest desire to reconcile differences. But now that he has reiterated the proposal, many labor men—both A. F. of L. and C. I. O.—look upon it at best as a bit of comedy, and at worst as an attempt to stall in a most critical situation. In the first place, they point out, the Federation will reject this solution, just as it did a year ago, as "not designed for serious consideration." On paper, and in the future, some such grand combination of all union forces might become not only desirable but mandatory. But at the moment it is plain nonsense. The Big Four, as a group, they point out, are older than the A. F. of L. They operate within the framework of an industry that since 1888 has been directly regulated by the government. They have their own traditions, loyalties, vested interests. Their collective-bargaining status is the result of a long step-by-step evolution and experiment. To scrap this set-up by a stroke of the pen would in itself create vast new problems—administrative, legislative, and jurisdictional—and would needlessly complicate a situation which has so far been made more complex and more difficult by almost every move toward peace.

Despite the feints and withdrawals, the trial balloons, and the efforts of the President's various ambassadors to devise terms acceptable to the belligerents, just two official peace conferences have been held during the four years of A. F. of L.–C. I. O. warfare, and they served only to intensify hostilities. The first began on October 25, 1937, at the Hotel Willard in Washington, in response to a C. I. O. suggestion that meetings be held looking toward a "unified labor movement." On the chess board of this tourney, the C. I. O., represented by a committee of ten, of which Philip Murray was head, opened with a gambit devised by Father Haas of Catholic University. The Haas plan called for the creation, within the A. F. of L., of a separate autonomous division to be known as the C. I. O. Department and to embrace all C. I. O. affiliates. Moreover, the C. I. O. wanted the A. F. of L. to guarantee that the industrial form of organization would be accepted as "normal and necessary" in the mass-production, public-utility, marine, and basic fabricating industries. The C. I. O. also asked the A. F. of L. to amend its constitution to prevent the Executive Council from suspending any national or international union except by authority of a majority vote in an annual convention. The A. F. of L. committee of three—Matthew Woll, George Harrison, and G. M. Bugniazet—at once discarded the Haas idea as impossible. They claimed that the proposed new C. I. O. Department, with its craft, trade, semi-industrial, and industrial unions, would come into conflict with A. F. of L. unions in the same fields and would thus simply aggravate jurisdictional squabbles.

After the conferees finally got down to business, the discussion seemed interminable. At last the A. F. of L. committee made several important concessions which, embodied in its final offer, led many of those present to believe that a basis for agreement had been reached. It must be kept in mind that the C. I. O. at this time was composed of thirty-two unions. Seven of them had been ejected from the A. F. of L., five had withdrawn, and twenty either had been created by the C. I. O. or had affiliated with it after having enjoyed a previous independent status.

"Now, here's what we'll do," said the A. F. of L. committee, in effect. "The twelve original unions don't need to come back into the Federation until all questions relating to the twenty new C. I. O. affiliates have been

Oxford University Press, 1468-1940

THE Oxford University Press, in something of an anniversary mood, would like to indulge in a little pointing-with-pride to its achievements. After all, we've been publishing books for four-hundred-and-seventy-two years, beginning with the Commentary on the Apostles' Creed attributed to St. Jerome and bearing the date 1468. That seems a long way indeed from our recent W. P. A. Guidebook, FLORIDA, A GUIDE TO THE SOUTHERNMOST STATE, 600 pages, many illustrations and a great big folding map, all for $2.50, and timely as anything. Among the many series we have launched and to which new titles are added from time to time are: THE OXFORD BOOKS OF VERSE, each $3.00, beginning with THE OXFORD BOOK OF ENGLISH VERSE (1900) which has sold nearly half a million copies. An entirely new edition of this famous anthology, edited, as was the original, by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, will be published on March 7th. Many new poets are added, and the collection ranges from the years 1250 to 1918. Other recent titles in this series are THE OXFORD BOOK OF LIGHT VERSE, edited by W. H. Auden, and THE OXFORD BOOK OF GREEK VERSE IN TRANSLATION. Lord David Cecil has edited THE OXFORD BOOK OF CHRISTIAN VERSE, which will also be published soon.

* * *

Then there are the famous "Oxford Companions," which include Sir Paul Harvey's two indispensable compilations—THE OXFORD COMPANION TO ENGLISH LITERATURE, 920 pages, $5.00, and THE OXFORD COMPANION TO CLASSICAL LITERATURE, 480 pages, $3.00. In this series is Dr. Percy A. Scholes', THE OXFORD COMPANION TO MUSIC, 1095 pages, lavishly illustrated, $6.50, surely the number-one value among musical encyclopaedias. Incidentally, in the field of books about music, the Nation's own B. H. Haggin has brought his MUSIC ON RECORDS, $2.00, up to date (to September, 1939.) If you bought the first volume, a 75c pamphlet will bring your knowledge of what's been done on discs right up to the minute.

* * *

Another great Oxford series is the World's Classics. There are nearly 500 of these little reprints now, many of the newer ones designed by Bruce Rogers. Somerset Maugham, writing in The Saturday Evening Post of January 6, discusses the Classic Books of America; among the twelve of which he writes, six are published by us in The World's Classics Series. Catalogue on request.

* * *

Sir Donald Tovey's series of six volumes, ESSAYS IN MUSICAL ANALYSIS, will be complete with the publication this Spring of Volume VI, which contains Miscellaneous Notes, Index, and Glossary covering the complete series. Volumes I and II, Symphonies; Volume III, Concertos; Volume IV, Illustrative Music; Volume V, Vocal Music. The price for the complete set will be $21.00. Individually each volume is $4.00

* * *

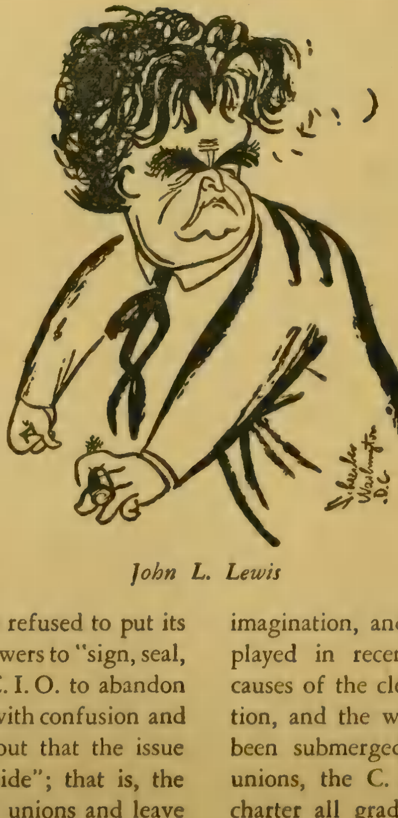
We have prepared a little booklet of selections from our vast list of books.
We will gladly send it to you on request.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue, New York City

ironed out by committees equally representing both sides. When such adjustments have been made, the new membership of the C. I. O. will be taken back into the A. F. of L. concurrently with the twelve former A. F. of L. unions, and the C. I. O. as such will cease to exist.

"When all such matters have been settled," continued the A. F. of L., "we will recommend that our constitution be changed, as the C. I. O. officials suggest. We will also specify trade areas where the industrial form of organization shall prevail entirely."

Although they were minimized by C. I. O. partisans and exaggerated by A. F. of L. spokesmen, the importance of these concessions is obvious. In this connection it is pertinent to recall that the twelve unions which had previously belonged to the A. F. of L. comprised more than 70 per cent of the C. I. O.'s numerical and financial strength. There was little trouble about the tentative readmission of this block into the A. F. of L., although jurisdictional rights in steel were fiercely debated. More genuine elements of conflict existed between the C. I. O. Woodworkers and the A. F. of L. Carpenters. The former was the outgrowth of a dissident group within the Carpenters' Union, and both claimed jurisdiction over lumberjacks, as well as sawmill, furniture, and other workers, especially in the Northwest. By the same token the C. I. O. Transport Workers' Union and the A. F. of L. Street and Electric Railway Employees, the C. I. O. Radio, Machine, and Electrical Workers and the A. F. of L. Electrical Workers offered some very tough problems of synthesis. Still other unions, however, like the Newspaper Guild, had virtually no hurdles of jurisdiction to get over.



John L. Lewis

Early in December, 1937, the peace conference blew up, and special subcommittees personally headed by Lewis and Green were unable to save it. The A. F. of L. version is that the first C. I. O. committee had definitely accepted the Federation's formula but that Lewis "vetoed" the entire agreement at the last minute. The C. I. O. contends that the A. F. of L. committee refused to put its terms in writing, that it lacked final powers to "sign, seal, and deliver," and that it wanted the C. I. O. to abandon its newer affiliates. In any event, what with confusion and counter-charges, the story was given out that the issue was "ten inside, and twenty-two outside"; that is, the Federation would take back ten of the unions and leave twenty-two others out in the cold, to perish of neglect or fall prey to the jurisdictional wolves. In the first place, it was twelve and twenty; and in the second place this wasn't the issue, a fact verified by Philip Murray in a speech in New York City on January 5, 1938, when he declared: "Mr. Green has suggested, 'Well, you C. I. O. men and your thirty-two unions stay out of the Federation for a while. Appoint your committees and we won't ask you to come in until everybody comes in.' "

Actually, the C. I. O. had three basic demands: adoption of industrial-union practices, the lifting of suspensions by the Executive Council, and the curtailing of its power to revoke charters. All these were substantially granted by the A. F. of L., which in turn clung to its own single basic demand, the abolition of the C. I. O. as a separate, "dual" entity.

In labor circles the consensus of informed opinion, even among certain C. I. O. leaders, is that Lewis himself was primarily responsible for breaking off the 1937 negotiations, and that in doing so he missed the opportunity of a lifetime. After all, these persons point out, in the November, 1935, convention which resulted in labor's great split, the C. I. O. faction with its allies was able to count on about a million out of three million workers. At its 1937 convention in Denver the A. F. of L. administration was supported by 25,000 votes representing about 2,500,000 unionists, while the C. I. O. had enrolled at least 3,300,000. Even granting it the short end of the trades and compromises needed for a merger, the C. I. O. stood a better than even chance of going back to the Federation, where it still had many friends, and of becoming within a year the dominant voice in shaping the policy of the reunited body.

Meantime, during the past twenty-six months, the A. F. of L. has grown stronger than ever before. The C. I. O. lost ground, and has recouped it so far only in part. Yet its permanent character and its ability to survive employer attacks and A. F. of L. hostility are by now unquestionable. It is here to stay because it has adopted the successful strategy of the A. F. of L. and supplemented it with more energy, imagination, and boldness than the Federation has displayed in recent years. Meantime, too, the original causes of the cleavage—craft versus industrial organization, and the whole debate over union structure—have been submerged; the A. F. of L. charters industrial unions, the C. I. O. charters craft unions, and both charter all gradations in between.

When President Roosevelt in March, 1939, urged the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. to make another effort to get together, everybody understood that the chief item on the

The American Investors Union, Inc.

A Non-Profit Organization for the Protection of the Investing Public

THE PUBLIC WELCOMES THE AMERICAN INVESTORS UNION. Since its formation less than two months ago, the AIU has grown amazingly. Now we know that investors want and need the AIU. . . . Their enthusiastic response from all parts of the country proves it!

A GREAT NEWSPAPER TELLS WHY. Let the respected St. Louis Post-Dispatch be spokesman for the many newspapers which have warmly greeted the AIU:

"NEW PROTECTION FOR THE INVESTOR

"Such an organization should fill a long-felt need in our financial economy. . . . It proposes to engage in healthful investigations and analyses of corporations and their stocks and to wield the weapon of publicity in the investor's interest. . . . The American Investors Union should perform a constructive service in protecting the investing public and in making the management of corporations responsive to the interests of the mass of shareholders."

THE NATION WELCOMES THE AIU: "Small investors are the cannon fodder of corporate finance . . . the man with a few thousand dollars to invest still finds the scales weighted against him. . . . For this reason we welcome the formation of the American Investors Union."

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

DR. JOHN BAUER
Public Utilities Consultant for Municipalities

ROBERT A. BRADY
Professor of Economics, University of California

JOHN T. FLYNN
Contributing Editor, New Republic;
Financial Writer, New York World-Telegram

PAUL J. KERN
President, Civil Service Commission New York City;
Former Chairman, New York City Lawyers Guild

DR. ROBERT LYND
Professor of Sociology, Columbia University;
Co-author, "Middletown" and "Middletown in Transition"

BERNARD J. REIS
Treasurer, Consumers Union
Certified Public Accountant;
Author, "False Security; The Betrayal of the American Investor"

GEORGE SELDES
Journalist; Author, "Lords of the Press," etc.

ROBERT K. STRAUS
Member, City Council, New York City

COLSTON E. WARNE
Professor of Economics, Amherst College;
President, Consumers Union

SPONSORS

PAUL BLANSHARD
Former Commissioner of Accounts
New York City

EVANS CLARK
Director, Twentieth Century Fund

HARTLEY W. CROSS
Professor of Economics
Springfield College

HORACE DAVIS
Professor of Economics
Simmons College

NED H. DEARBORN
Dean, Division of General Education
New York University

PAUL H. DOUGLAS
Professor of Economics
University of Chicago

HERBERT W. ELLISTON
Financial Editor,
Christian Science Monitor

ABRAHAM EPSTEIN
American Association for Social Security

MILTON HANDLER
Professor of Law, Columbia University

JUDGE ROBERT W. KENNY
Superior Court, Los Angeles

FREDA KIRCHWEY
Editor, The Nation

MAX LERNER
Professor of Political Science, Williams College

EDUARD C. LINDEMAN
New York School of Social Work

HERLUF V. OLSEN
Dean, Amos Tuck School,
Dartmouth College

HARRY SCHERMAN
President, Book-of-the-Month Club

I. F. STONE
Associate Editor, The Nation

GOODWIN WATSON
Teachers College, Columbia University

AMERICAN INVESTORS
UNION, Inc.
10 E. 40 St., New York, N. Y.

Objectives of the American Investors Union

At the rate justified by our income and resources, the AMERICAN INVESTORS UNION is undertaking the following program of action:

1. VIGILANCE IN THE INVESTMENT, SAVINGS AND LIFE-INSURANCE FIELDS: We plan to examine the financial reports of the companies whose securities you hold; demand explanations of doubtful items; examine and report the trends of corporate devices, propositions of merger, recapitalization, reorganization, dissolution or any other step which might adversely affect your interests.

2. INVESTIGATION OF NEW SECURITIES AND SAVINGS PLANS: Though new issues of securities must be registered with the SEC the registration statements are too technical to be of much use to you. As soon as possible, experts will be engaged to analyze them.

8. REPRESENTATION FOR SECURITY HOLDERS: Where desirable, efforts will be made to secure representation on corporate boards of directors to safeguard your rights. When you authorize it, and where it is possible, the American Investors Union will act as your proxy, so that the privilege of voting rights may become a weapon in your defense.

4. VIGILANCE IN THE FIELD OF LEGISLATION: The Federal Securities Act, and the "blue-sky" laws of the various states, need strengthening. Model bills must be drafted; harmful legislation must be opposed.

The 62-page first issue of our monthly magazine Your Investments contains:

INSTALLMENT INVESTMENT PLANS—
How Not to Save $10 a Month. The first thorough, popular treatment of the kind of savings plans sponsored by Lexington Foundation, Income Estates of America, F-I-F Plan Corporation, American Trusteed Funds, and dozens of other companies.

THE THREAT TO PREFERRED STOCKHOLDERS—
The "Recap" formula—and how its application in a number of corporations threatens to wipe out the preferred stock. Required reading for preferred stockholders.

INVESTORS SYNDICATE—
How the American Investors Union, by prompt and vigorous action, has already begun to protect the interests of the small saver.

AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY—
A management had contrived to pay itself $10,000,000 in bonuses—when a stockholder sued. The management returned none of the money, continued to pay itself bonuses—and paid the suing stockholder half a million dollars to "settle" the suit. How such misuse of investors' money can be stopped.

The second issue of Your Investments has just come off the press.

Two articles of outstanding importance highlight its contents:

WHERE CAN YOU PUT YOUR SAVINGS?
In this period of almost unparalleled uncertainty, a large part of every investor's resources should be kept liquid. The AIU, in the most realistic article ever written on savings, analyzes SAVINGS & LOAN ASSOCIATIONS and MUTUAL SAVINGS BANKS from the standpoints of safety, liquidity, and interest-return.

WHICH STOCKS DO THE EXPERTS BUY?
The latest stock holdings of three relatively successful management investment trusts, showing how they diversify in common stocks, which stocks they considered good buys, and which stocks they have recently acquired or dropped.

TO PROTECT YOUR INTERESTS AS AN INVESTOR AND SAVER, JOIN THE AMERICAN INVESTORS UNION NOW. USE THIS COUPON

MEMBERSHIP APPLICATION

AMERICAN INVESTORS UNION, 10 East 40th Street, New York, N. Y.

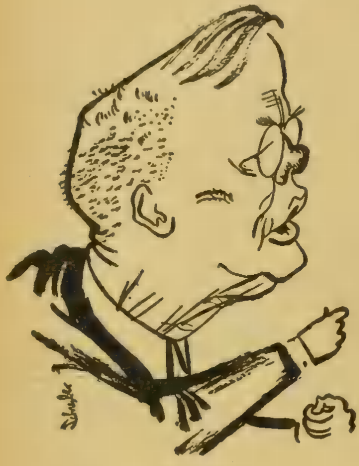
☐ Enroll me as a subscribing member of the AMERICAN INVESTORS UNION. I enclose $3.00, which entitles me to a year's subscription to the monthly magazine YOUR INVESTMENTS to start with the first............ second............ issue.

(Single copies may be purchased for 50c each.)

Name..

Address.. NA 2-10-40 agenda was no longer the craft-versus-industrial issue but the discovery of a satisfactory method for redistributing powers, prerogatives, and prestige among the organizations and individuals concerned.

When Lewis put forth his one-big-union idea at the first meeting of this second A. F. of L.–C. I. O. conference held at the White House, A. F. of L. ardor for peace was considerably dampened. Negotiations were continued, however, and the A. F. of L. gave ground on another point. In building their national organization several C. I. O. unions had extended their jurisdictions. The miners, for example, were drawing in chemical workers, and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers had invaded the laundry field. In an earlier day the A. F. of L. would have objected to this sort of thing as violating at least the paper claims of its affiliates. But now it told such C. I. O. unions to return "as you are, not as you were."



William Green

On April 4, 1939, Lewis was in New York conferring on a renewal of the United Mine Workers' contract. He asked the A. F. of L. committee to postpone further unity talks until he had finished his discussion with the operators. The A. F. of L. committee said, "Of course." It has not heard from Lewis since except indirectly. He did say later that it was impossible to reach an accord because the Federation was in the hands of a "small group of leaders, firmly intrenched and reactionary in their attitude on public questions, who are tolerant of many evil conditions existing in the A. F. of L." He also said that, as far as he was concerned, it was a "fight to the finish." Naturally all this enraged the Executive Council. As a whole, council members are not as vicious or as reactionary as Westbrook Pegler and certain radicals make them out to be, in spite of the performances of certain sub-chieftains like Petrillo and Bioff.

The council's behavior on the question of labor peace has been curious. Its members oscillate constantly between cooperative and combative attitudes toward the C. I. O. When the first view is dominant, they informally get the word to C. I. O. principals that it's "about time that John saw the light," and hope for the best. But when the combative attitude is in the ascendant, as it is now, they indulge in the suicidal and majestic stupidity of sponsoring the Walsh amendments to the Wagner Act, which would turn unions into employer appendages and invite the most contemptible sorts of collusion, plain and fancy, between management and labor leaders.

Yet most of the council members genuinely desire A. F. of L.–C. I. O. harmony, out of a sense of self-preservation if not of social idealism. They are in a panic about the anti-union legislation on the statute books of twenty-two states, sweeping eastward from Oregon to Pennsylvania and southward to Alabama. They are convinced that the A. F. of L.–C. I. O. scrap has gone too far. They blame Lewis, but their minds are troubled. Several of them protest almost too much. When they talk about clear consciences do they remember the ejection of the seven original C. I. O. unions in flagrant violation of the A. F. of L.'s constitutional fiat?

Daniel Tobin, needled incessantly by Roosevelt to "do something about it," has been releasing unity statements almost as fast as he can get them in print. His Teamsters control more votes than any other union in the A. F. of L., and would be immensely strengthened by unity, since they often depend upon the aid of other unions in a strike situation. Moreover, he is naturally not averse to becoming head of the united movement—a distinct possibility. William Green, Matthew Woll, George Harrison of the Railway Clerks, Harry C. Bates of the Bricklayers, Edward Flore of the Hotel and Restaurant Workers, Edward J. Gainor of the Letter Carriers, are all more or less alarmed over current anti-union trends, and feel that only a united A. F. of L. and C. I. O. can save the labor movement from a serious setback. John Coefield of the Plumbers does not care one way or another very much, but George Meany, new secretary-treasurer, cares a great deal. A hard-headed business unionist on the make, he perceives that A. F. of L.–C. I. O. competition, which for a time was the life of trade, may soon become the death of trade unionism. T. A. Rickert of the United Garment Workers, Joseph Weber of the Musicians, and George E. Brown of the Stage Hands feel the same way. W. D. Mahon of the Street Railwaymen isn't too pleased over the existence of Michael Quill's Transport Workers, but he'll talk across the table once a fusion of forces really impends. G. E. Bugniazet of the Electricians, who feels that his union is entitled to hegemony over the C. I. O. workers, will have to be cajoled into compromise. Yet neither he nor Dan Tracy is going to be adamant in this respect, largely because Harry Van Arsdale, business manager of Local No. 3, with its 16,500 members, has been calling loudly for peace. Only William Hutcheson, head of the Carpenters, is adamant against the C. I. O., but even he knows that he will have to string along with any pro-peace majority.

Of the C. I. O.'s eight top-ranking officers, Sidney Hillman in recent months has stepped out in front as an advocate of peace, which, he says, is as imperative for 1940 as was the formation of the first C. I. O. in 1935.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

"Comprehensive, penetrating. A bully book."—CHARLES A. BEARD

THE STORY OF THE POLITICAL PHILOSOPHERS

By GEORGE CATLIN

"The best guide to the . . . European gladiatorial combat I have ever read . . . a swell job."
—HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

READABLE as nothing else since Will Durant's Story of Philosophy, it offers a fascinating intelligent layman's guide to the past and a philosophy for the present.

N. Y. Times: "Learned . . . fascinating." Time: "Catlin's history is commendably addressed to laymen, gives in critical outline the best political thinking from Plato to Bertrand Russell." "An able book, an honest book, a personal, indeed a passionate book."—New York Herald Tribune Books.

THE STORY OF THE POLITICAL PHILOSOPHERS

$5.00 2nd PRINTING

Important Books To Read in 1940

NEW ADVENTURES IN DEMOCRACY

By Ordway Tead. Discusses how important American institutions can operate more democratically in education, public service, industry. $2.00

NEWSPAPER CRUSADERS

By Silas Bent. NATION: "Will contribute to a realistic appraisal of both the potentialities and the limitations of our 'free press.'" $3.00

THE RULING CLASS

By Gaetano Mosca, translated by Hannah D. Kahn. Introduction by Arthur Livingston. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER calls this one of the four outstanding contributions to the philosophy of history published in recent years. $4.50

ECONOMIC BASES OF PEACE

By Ernest Minor Patterson. "A challenge to recognize the fact that the economic world has changed in recent years and to adjust our thinking accordingly."—The Commonweal. $2.50

INSIDE THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

By Bertram D. Hulen. Shows the inner workings of the department that handles our foreign relations. ". . . An informed and highly informative book."—N. Y. Times. Illustrated. $3.00

EDUCATION FOR DEMOCRACY IN OUR TIME

By Jesse H. Newlon. GEORGE S. COUNTS: "One of those books that simply must be read . . . by all citizens interested in education. Professor Newlon has made the social analysis and outlined the strategy essential to bringing the public schools into the service of American democracy." $2.50

MODERN ART IN AMERICA

By Martha Candler Cheney. "Excellent . . . an ideal guide to art in contemporary America."—N. Y. Times. 96 pages of illustrations. Size 7" x 9". $4.00

"One of the most important works in the field of general economic theory that have appeared since Marx's 'Capital' . . . it has direct practical significance." —N. Y. TIMES.

BUSINESS CYCLES

A THEORETICAL, HISTORICAL AND STATISTICAL ANALYSIS OF THE CAPITALIST PROCESS

by Joseph A. Schumpeter

2 VOLS. • 1095 pages • $10.00

THESE two brilliantly written volumes, present an analysis of the capitalistic system which is already recognized as the greatest contemporary work in its field. The author is exceptionally qualified for his monumental task. As noted professor of economics in Europe and America (now at Harvard); formerly lawyer, banker and Finance Minister of the Austrian Republic, he knows the capitalistic processes in practice as well as theory. Again and again he challenges capitalistic and economic traditions—offering a new approach to the subject that is of vital importance to every student, educator and business man today. An indispensable work.

WHITTLESEY HOUSE • McGraw-Hill Building • New York

Four of his fellow vice-presidents—Emil Rieve of the Textile Workers, R. J. Thomas of the Automobile Workers, S. J. Dalrymple of the Rubber Workers, and Reid Robinson of the Miners and Smelters—lean toward the Hillman view. Philip Murray occupies a middle ground. He is not as anxious for comity as Hillman, but he wants it far more intensely than does Lewis, who finds little pleasure in any such prospect. James Carey, C. I. O. secretary, whose relationship to Lewis is that of an adoring adjutant to his general, will do anything his chief commands. And the order of the day is still "no truce." Until some social inventor can devise a chairman-of-the-board post that in an A. F. of L.–C. I. O. merger would endow Lewis with an importance at least equal to that of the presidency of the organization, he isn't likely to sacrifice the fame, the power, and the glory he currently enjoys. He is an able, gifted, intelligent man; and he likes being top dog. So does William Green, of course, even if his own authority is of a more titular kind. Yet Green is not young, he is no longer a fighter, and if he were convinced that his resignation would insure labor unity he would step down. The next move is up to Lewis.

Winter Miscellany—Four Poems

SELECTED BY JOHN BERRYMAN

A Vision of Labor

BY WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

In my head the juxtapositions impossible otherwise to accomplish:
two young rubber-booted ditchdiggers beside the bed of the dying bishop—cracking obscene jokes at the expense of the flabby woman in the white bathing suit, the weak breaths of the old man masquerading under the double suck of the mule-pump

—by the edge of the sea! the shore exploded away—but in this case
a bomb of construction,
the sewer going down six feet inside the seawall along the front of the cottages—not through them unfortunately—a cloaca maxima like the one under the Roman Forum which alone made that possible in that place.

That's it! There, there!
That's the answer.
Alone made that possible there in that place.

The girl lying there supine in an old rowboat reading an adventure magazine and the two guys
—six foot three each of them if they were an inch—washing their hip-boots off in the stream jerking from the pump at the finished manhole, washing their hands, their heads and faces, cupping their hands to drink the stuff. Geezus! what the hell kind of water is that to drink? But they probably know what they're doing —and looking down the bank at her lying flat out there in the heat with her five-and-ten dark glasses on to protect her eyes from the sun's glare —looking down and smiling over her like insane men.

When you've been broke and damned near starving for five years you get to look that way, said my cousin who had had a taste of it. You can't help it. That's poverty. Both your mind and your body are affected. But they're just mechanics damn good ones most of them, like anybody else.

—the white suit pulled up tight into her crotch the way she was lying there facing them —till they threw the switch and the pump stopped and the bishop died
and they turned their backs on it, threw their boots over their shoulders and went home.

My Country

BY EMMA SWAN

My home is among mountains my race is one of pioneers who fought and lost who fought and found what did they find? say a land where

THE AMERICAN NOVEL

by Carl Van Doren

A revised and enlarged edition of his work in the same field, issued in 1921 and widely acclaimed by popular and scholarly groups. Bringing it down to date, Mr. Van Doren now has made it a discriminating appreciation of our past and a significant interpretation of the present. probably $3.00

◆

HOW GREEN WAS MY VALLEY

by Richard Llewellyn

A rich, full novel, as solid as bread, as heady as young wine. The story—dealing with a family in Wales during the past half-century—is in prose of a style that is impossible to read without being deeply moved. A crisp, salty humor seasons the tale and its social implications adds depth. $2.75

◆

JONATHAN EDWARDS, 1703-1758

by Ola Elizabeth Winslow

This biography of one of the greatest of American thinkers is a major contribution to the religious and intellectual history of New England in its portrayal of the part played by the churches in 19th Century development. The revolt of the Northampton Congregation, as an instance, is here shown in a new and significant light. probably $3.50

◆

TESTAMENT OF FRIENDSHIP

by Vera Brittain

The author of "Testament of Youth" writes the life story of her intimate friend, Winifred Holtby. It is, says the New York Times, "interesting not only as biography, but more broadly as the chronicle of an exceptional friendship, and as the reflection of a time and place." $2.50

at all bookstores

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 Fifth Avenue New York City

they laughed and multiplied and I the last seed of their strength fret into silence by the storming sea natural inheritance lost and by chance alone it is late now the clouds foam into night with sharp stars piercing them that would explode

the red sun sinking beneath the steel waves I have hungered traveled to dismiss dismay the starving craving of that elliptical game called life and found it full of strife fighting widowed into thought and all discovery worn by the wind to a round zero an empty sum while thunder falls across the ocean plain and the world true to its axis turns again.

I Remember the Block Party

BY OSCAR WILLIAMS

I

The eyes like gimlet holes upon the dark are widening inward, large as velvet moons.
remembering the dancing on the block,
the gaiety, the lanterns, the balloons. . . .

how feet against the lights turned the huge spokes of that slow wheel of darkness sparking stars as the accelerated rim loosed flocks of birds in walls of music past the doors. . . .

How the boys romped and all the dear girls sang,
and flowers drowsed upon the hair and wind:
ah, musical were jargon and harangue and mandolins and candy of the mind!

And all the songs of nations gathered there,
merry-go-round around the captive birds:
no aeroplanes to gorge on flesh of air!
no radios to crop the stems of words!

O street roped off against all evil feet, against the rumbling of the cobbled day,
here in your orange twilight, it was sweet,
here at the perfumed stairway, it was gay!

Young were the dewy lips of circumstance, deep in that bower, that carillon of tongues:
so many hearts so happy all at once shook the millennium through a sieve of wrongs!

II

The moons condense to pinholes at the stroke of memory's gong on gates with death's-heads wrought:
and thirty years, a feather's height of smoke
bloom for a moment at the focused thought.

The bombing surf of all our hidden tears tilted the sunless combers on our hair, and when we dared lift hearts again, the years were clinker-teeth, in armed formations there.

Alas, the aggregate heroic limbs,
a slimy mass of eyes, turned sky to stone:
now in that terminal the foreign hymns warm their chilled fingers at the kindling bone.

There's fighting on the block, eastwest, northsouth,
it's shambles in the precincts of the dead:
the spongy clouds curl from the upturned mouth toward seas of harpies pulsing overhead. . . .

When Does the Play Begin?

BY JAMES LAUGHLIN

Mother when does the show begin when does something happen hush

dear be quiet in just a minute now but you said that a long time ago I want the curtain to go up hush dear be quiet it isn't good manners to talk when the music is playing but mother I'm tired of the music and they keep playing the same piece hush darling in just a minute now here

eat a piece of candy no I don't want any more candy mother I want them to begin the play I want to see the lights go on and have the people walk around

& talk & laugh & sing!

A LETTER TO THE AMERICAN PUBLIC

The following extracts are taken from an Open Letter addressed to the American Public. Despite their great importance, the parts dealing with emergency relief in France and with the persecution in Spain have had to be omitted for lack of space. The full letter is available to any interested person.

Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Chairman
Spanish Refugee Relief Campaign

ONE of the most important migrations in the history of the Americas is about to begin. We believe that this event will have a profound effect upon the future relations of the countries of this continent and their populations.

IN THE early part of this year the first large-scale movement of Spanish Loyalist refugees to Latin America in which American organizations have had direct part, will take place. At that time 2,000 Spanish refugees will leave France for the Dominican Republic. These refugees, only the advance guard of a far greater number who, it is hoped, will be able to settle in many Latin American countries throughout the coming year, can well be compared to the first immigrants who in their search for peace and freedom founded our own country. The democratic traditions for which the Spanish people have fought so well, and which they still carry with them, cannot but help enrich the economic, cultural and political life of the republics to the south of us. . . .

THE Spanish Refugee Relief Campaign is launching the American Rescue Ship Campaign for Spain's Refugees in order to secure immediately some of the funds necessary for this project. The whole task beginning with the migration to the Dominican Republic must be carried through successfully if thousands of persons are not to suffer unbearable hardships in French concentration camps or face the alternative of return to a fascist Spain. . . .

FORTUNATELY, countries in Central and South America have agreed, under certain conditions, to accept as many as 100,000 Spanish refugees as colonists. . . .

ARRANGEMENTS for three-quarters of the financing necessary to send 2,000 persons to the Dominican Republic have already been completed. The American public has been asked to contribute the remaining one-quarter of the funds necessary, namely, $50,000.

ONE hundred and fifty dollars will make it possible for a Spanish refugee to leave France and settle in the Dominican Republic as a free man with a hopeful future.

WE, the undersigned, urge all sections of the American public—the press, churches, schools, fraternal organizations, peace societies, women's groups, trade unions and men and women of various professions—to support this American Rescue Ship Campaign for Spain's Refugees, and to further in every way the entire program of the Spanish Refugee Relief Campaign.

LET us not forget a brave people who for nearly three years fought back an overwhelming tide of reaction and in so doing raised high the standard of democracy as a rallying point for all those who love freedom.

NO greater tribute to democracy could be paid than your aid in this task.

SIGNED:

Josephine Truslow Adams
Thomas A. Addis
Ernst P. Boas
W. Russell Bowie
Benjamin Brewster
Van Wyck Brooks
Walter B. Cannon
Twila McCrea Cavert
George S. Counts
Malcolm Cowley
Joseph Curran
Haven Emerson
Dorothy Canfield Fisher
Helen Hall
Leon Henderson
Stanley M. Isaacs
Edward L. Israel
Paul Kellogg
Freda Kirchwey
Francis J. McConnell
Thomas Mann
Paul Muni
Philip Merivale
William Allen Neilson
Culbert L. Olson
William Pickens
Cornelia Bryce Pinchot
A. Philip Randolph
Paul Robeson
Upton Sinclair
Harold C. Urey
Mary E. Woolley
and others

SPANISH REFUGEE RELIEF CAMPAIGN
381 Fourth Avenue, New York City

Harold L. Ickes, Hon. Chairman
Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Chairman
The Rev. Guy Emery Shipler, Treasurer

I enclose $................ as my contribution to the AMERICAN RESCUE SHIP CAMPAIGN FOR SPAIN'S REFUGEES.

I agree to contribute $................ at the rate of $................ per (week, month) for the emigration and resettlement of .... Spanish refugees, beginning .... 1940.
(Please make pledges on the basis of $150.00 per refugee.)

Name..
Address...
City......................................State.....................................

THE Nation · 1865-1940

The University of North Carolina Press · 1923-1940

A SHORT LIFE BUT ONE OF INCREASING INTEREST AND SCOPE

BOOKS FROM CHAPEL HILL

1923:

The Saprolegniaceae, With Notes on Other Water Molds. By W. C. COKER.	$10.00
An Analytical Index to the Ballad-Entries in the Register of the Company of Stationers in London. By H. E. ROLLINS.	$3.00

1939:

THE SOUTH

Child Labor Legislation in the Southern Textile States, by ELIZABETH H. DAVIDSON ▪ ". . . An impressive record of a period of social transition, exhaustively documented."—Tarleton Collier in The Survey. $4.00

These Are Our Lives, by Federal Writers' Project ▪ ". . . stranger than fiction—and a great deal more to the point."—W. F. Shelton in The San Francisco Chronicle. $2.00

North Carolina: A Guide to the Old North State, by Federal Writers' Project ▪ ". . . a good guide to a good State."—Jonathan Daniels in The Saturday Review of Literature. $2.50

Trees of the South, by CHARLOTTE HILTON GREEN ▪ ". . . worth many times its price for its pictures alone."—Mayne Longnecker in The Dallas Morning News. $2.50

Mothers of the South, by MARGARET J. HAGOOD ▪ ". . . a sort of case book which without technical language, sentimentality or too many cut and dried statistics, will move the most hard-boiled scoffer."—The Augusta Chronicle. $2.00

Purslane, (A Novel) by BERNICE KELLY HARRIS ▪ "This really lovely book . . . will become . . . an American classic."—Dorothy Canfield in Book-of-the-Month Club News. $2.50

Business Education in the Changing South, by WALTER J. MATHERLY ▪ ". . . has national, as well as regional, significance."—Business Education World. $3.00

Carolina Gardens, by E. T. H. SHAFFER ▪ ". . . as lovely as some of them are, the illustrations are purely incidental to Mr. Shaffer's fine text."—Malcolm Bell, Jr., in The Savannah News. $3.50

Seven Lean Years, by T. J. WOOFTER, JR. and ELLEN WINSTON ▪ "No person vitally interested in the welfare of America, particularly of rural America, should fail to read this book."—The Raleigh News and Observer. $1.50

Old Homes and Gardens of North Carolina, illustrations by BAYARD WOOTTEN, text by ARCHIBALD HENDERSON ▪ Descriptions and photographs of one hundred old homes and gardens in all sections of North Carolina. $10.00

BIOGRAPHY

Tar Heel Editor, by JOSEPHUS DANIELS ▪ ". . . as genuine as a thumbprint."—Time. $3.50

Joseph E. Brown and the Confederacy, by LOUISE BILES HILL ▪ ". . . as scholarly and valuable as any special study that has yet appeared in the field of Georgia history."—E. Merton Coulter in The Savannah Morning News. $3.50

The Life and Times of Edmund Pendleton, by ROBERT L. HILLDRUP ▪ ". . . a complete and satisfying account."—Harry Wild Hickey in The Chattanooga Times. $3.50

LITERARY STUDIES

Modern Poetry and the Tradition, by CLEANTH BROOKS ▪ ". . . a masterly synthesis."—William Empson in Poetry. $3.00

The Party of Humanity, by EDWIN M. EVERETT ▪ ". . . one of the most important books having to do with the literature of the 19th century which have recently appeared."—Howard Mumford Jones in The Boston Transcript. $3.50

Studies in Beaumont, Fletcher and Massinger, by BALDWIN MAXWELL ▪ Scholarly essays on moot problems of the "Beaumont and Fletcher" canon. $3.00

Milton and His Age: Studies in His Literary Milieu, by GEORGE W. WHITING · The relationship of Milton's poetry and prose to certain contemporary writing. $3.50

THE NEGRO

Black Workers and the New Unions, by HORACE R. CAYTON and GEORGE S. MITCHELL ▪ ". . . a book which I cannot too highly recommend."—G. S. Schuyler in The Pittsburgh Courier. $4.00

Haiti Singing, by HAROLD COURLANDER ▪ "Mr. Courlander writes in a vibrant style which is as interesting as his research work in gathering the vast amount of song material and factual data must have been exhausting."—H. Clay Ferree in The Winston-Salem Journal-Sentinel. $3.50

Five North Carolina Negro Educators, edited by N. C. NEWBOLD ▪ ". . . more than a gesture toward interracial understanding."—Lawrence Hasbrouck in The N. Y. Herald Tribune. $1.00

To Make a Poet Black, by J. SAUNDERS REDDING ▪ ". . . marked by a very high degree of sympathetic understanding combined with intellectual honesty and fairness in criticism."—American Sociological Review. $1.50

Tobe, by STELLA GENTRY SHARPE and CHARLES FARRELL ▪ "A child's book, but a delight to those who enjoy either children or photography."—The Baltimore Morning Sun. $1.00

HISTORY AND GOVERNMENT

Independent Commissions in the Federal Government, by WILSON K. DOYLE ▪ ". . . compact and effectively writen."—Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. $1.50

The Slavery Controversy, by ARTHUR YOUNG LLOYD ▪ ". . . one of the most comprehensive and factually accurate of all treatments of the subject."—The Nashville Banner. $3.00

Caldwell and Company, by JOHN B. MCFERRIN ▪ ". . . gives the best picture of the unsound, and in many instances outright illegal, operations of the Caldwell house."—The Chattanooga Times. $3.50

The Early Empires of Central Asia, by WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN ▪ "An excellent combination of careful scholarship with lucid and interesting exposition."—E. H. Pritchard in American Political Science Review. $4.00

A Bibliography of Early North Carolina Imprints, by DOUGLAS C. MCMURTRIE ▪ ". . . the most valuable book of the year for students of North Carolina history."—Archibald Henderson in The Winston-Salem Journal. $4.00

A Short History of Political Thinking, by PAUL W. WARD ▪ ". . . for the general reader who wishes to get a broad understanding . . . and for advanced students."—Charlotte Observer. $1.50

A History of Brazil, translated and edited by PERCY ALVIN MARTIN ▪ ". . . a volume replete with color, substance and vividness of narrative."—The New York Times Book Review. $5.00

The International Law of John Marshall, by BENJAMIN M. ZIEGLER ▪ "For the student of contemporary affairs . . . the study is as invaluable as it is revealing."—H. Clay Ferree in The Winston-Salem Journal. $3.50

GENERAL

Adventuring in Adoption, by LEE M. BROOKS and EVELYN C. BROOKS ▪ ". . . alive with human interest and packed with practical information."—Sophie van S. Theis in The Survey. $2.00

Spirit and Its Freedom, by GEORGE F. THOMAS ▪ "The excellence of this little book is such that it might well be put into a small library of twentieth-century American classics of philosophy."—Journal of Bible and Religion. $1.00

Biography of a River Town: Memphis, Its Heroic Age, by GERALD M. CAPERS ▪ ". . . One of the most satisfying pieces of historical writing that has appeared for a long time . . . lively, human and dramatic."—The Cincinnati Enquirer. $3.50

THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS, CHAPEL HILL, N. C.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

A Day's Work

BY KATHERINE ANNE PORTER

THE dull scrambling like a giant rat in the wall meant the dumb-waiter was on its way up, the janitress below hauling on the cable. Mrs. Halloran paused, thumped her iron on the board, and said, "There it is. Late. You could have put on your shoes and gone around the corner and brought the things an hour ago. I can't do everything."

Mr. Halloran pulled himself out of the chair, clutching the arms and heaving to his feet slowly, looking around as if he hoped to find crutches standing near. "Wearing out your socks, too," added Mrs. Halloran. "You ought either go barefoot outright or wear your shoes over your socks as God intended," she said. "Sock feet. What's the good of it, I'd like to know? Neither one thing nor the other."

She unrolled a salmon-colored chiffon nightgown with cream-colored lace and broad ribbons on it, gave it a light flirt in the air, and spread it on the board. "God's mercy, look at that indecent thing," she said. She thumped the iron again and pushed it back and forth over the rumpled cloth. "You might just set the things in the cupboard," she said, "and not leave them around on the floor. You might just."

Mr. Halloran took a sack of potatoes from the dumb-waiter and started for the cupboard in the corner next the icebox. "You might as well take a load," said Mrs. Halloran. "There's no need on earth making a half-dozen trips back and forth. I'd think the poorest sort of man could well carry more than five pounds of potatoes at one time. But maybe not."

Her voice tapped on Mr. Halloran's ears like wood on wood. "Mind your business, will you?" he asked, not speaking to her directly. He carried on the argument with himself. "Oh, I couldn't do that, Mister Honey," he answered in a dull falsetto. "Don't ever ask me to think of such a thing, even. It wouldn't be right," he said, standing still with his knees bent, glaring bitterly over the potato sack at the scrawny strange woman he had never liked, that one standing there ironing clothes with a dirty look on her whole face like a suffering saint. "I may not be much good any more," he told her in his own voice, "but I still have got wits enough to take groceries off a dumb-waiter, mind you."

"That's a miracle," said Mrs. Halloran. "I'm thankful for that much."

"There's the telephone," said Mr. Halloran, sitting in the armchair again and taking his pipe out of his shirt pocket.

"I heard it as well," said Mrs. Halloran, sliding the iron up and down over the salmon-colored chiffon.

"It's for you, I've no further business in this world," said Mr. Halloran. His little greenish eyes glittered; he exposed his two sharp dogteeth in a grin.

"You could answer it. It could be the wrong number again or for somebody downstairs," said Mrs. Halloran, her flat voice going flatter, even.

"Let it go in any case," decided Mr. Halloran, "for my own part, that is." He struck a match on the arm of his chair, touched off his pipe, and drew in his first puff while the telephone went on with its nagging.

"It might be Maggie again," said Mrs. Halloran.

"Let her ring, then," said Mr. Halloran, settling back and crossing his legs.

"God help a man who won't answer the telephone when his own daughter calls up for a word," commented Mrs. Halloran to the ceiling. "And she in deep trouble, too, with her husband treating her like a dog about the money, and sitting out late nights in saloons with that crowd from the Little Tammany Association. He's getting into politics now with the McCorkery gang. No good will come of it, and I told her as much."

"She's no troubles at all, her man's a sharp fellow who will get ahead if she'll let him alone," said Mr. Halloran. "She's nothing to complain of, I could tell her. But what's a father?" Mr. Halloran cocked his head toward the window that opened on the brick-paved areaway and crowed like a rooster, "What's a father these days and who would heed his advice?"

"You needn't tell the neighbors, there's disgrace enough already," said Mrs. Halloran. She set the iron back on the gas ring and stepped out to the telephone on the first stair landing. Mr. Halloran leaned forward, his thin, red-haired hands hanging loosely between his knees, his warm pipe sending up its good decent smell right into his nose. The woman hated the pipe and the smell; she was a woman born to make any man miserable. Before the depression, while he still had a good job and prospects of a raise, before he went on relief, before she took in fancy washing and ironing, in the Good Days Before, God's pity, she didn't exactly keep her mouth shut, there wasn't a word known to man she couldn't find an answer for, but she knew which side her bread was buttered on, and put up with it. Now she was, you might say, buttering her own bread and she never forgot it for a minute. And it's her own fault we're not riding round today in a limousine with ash trays and a speaking tube and a cut-glass vase for flowers in it. It's what a man gets for marrying one of these holy women. Gerald McCorkery had told him as much, in the beginning.

"There's a girl will spend her time holding you down," Gerald had told him. "You're putting your head in a noose will strangle the life out of you. Heed the advice of one who wishes you well," said Gerald McCorkery. This was after he had barely set eyes on Lacey Mahaffy one Sunday morning in Coney Island. It was like McCorkery to see that in a flash, born judge of human nature that he was. He could look a man over, size him up, and there was an end to it. And if the man didn't pass muster, McCorkery could ease him out in a way that man would never know how it happened. It was the secret of McCorkery's success in the world.

"This is Rosie, herself," said Gerald that Sunday in Coney Island. "Meet the future Mrs. Gerald J. McCorkery." Lacey Mahaffy's narrow face had gone sour as whey under her big straw hat. She barely nodded to Rosie, who gave Mr. Halloran a look that fairly undressed him right there. Mr. Halloran had thought, too, that McCorkery was picking a strange one; she was good-looking all right, but she had the smell of a regular little Fourteenth Street hustler if Halloran knew anything about women. "Come on," said McCorkery, his arm around Rosie's waist, "let's all go on the roller coaster." But Lacey would not. She said, "No thank you. We didn't plan to stay, and we must go now." On the way home Mr. Halloran said, "Lacey, you judge too harshly. Maybe that's a nice girl at heart; hasn't had your opportunities." Lacey had turned upon him a face ugly as an angry cat's, and said, "She's a loose, low woman, and 'twas an insult to introduce her to me." It was a good while before the pretty fresh face that Mr. Halloran had fallen in love with returned to her.

Next day in Billy's Place, after three drinks each, McCorkery said, "Watch your step, Halloran; think of your future. There's a straight good girl I don't doubt, but she's no sort of mixer. A man getting into politics needs a wife who can meet all kinds. A man needs a woman knows how to loosen her corsets and sit easy."

Mrs. Halloran's voice was going on in the hall, a steady dry rattle like old newspapers blowing on a park bench. "I told you before it's no good coming to me with your troubles now. I warned you in time but you wouldn't listen. . . . I told you just how it would be, I tried my best. . . . No, you couldn't listen, you always knew better than your mother. . . . So now all you've got to do is stand by your married vows and make the best of it. . . . Now listen to me, if you want himself to do right you have to do right first. The woman has to do right first, and then if the man won't do right in turn it's no fault of hers. You do right whether he does wrong or no, just because he does wrong is no excuse for you."

"Ah, will you hear that?" Mr. Halloran asked the areaway in an awed voice. "There's a holy terror of a saint for you."

". . . the woman has to do right first, I'm telling you," said Mrs. Halloran into the telephone, "and then if he's a devil in spite of it, why she has to do right without any help from him." Her voice rose so the neighbors could get an earful if they wanted. "I know you from old, you're just like your father. You must be doing something wrong yourself or you wouldn't be in this fix. You're doing wrong this minute, calling over the telephone when you ought to be getting your work done. I've got an iron on, working over the dirty nightgowns of a kind of woman I wouldn't soil my foot on if I'd had a man to take care of me. So now you do up your housework and dress yourself and take a walk in the fresh air. . . ."

"A little fresh air never hurt anybody," commented Mr. Halloran loudly through the open window. "It's the gas gets a man down."

"Now listen to me, Maggie, that's not the way to talk over the public wires. Now you stop that crying and go and do your duty and don't be worrying me any more. And stop saying you're going to leave your husband, because where will you go, for one thing? Do you want to walk the streets or set up a laundry in your kitchen? You can't come back here, you'll stay with your husband where you belong. Don't be a fool, Maggie. You've got your living, and that's more than many a woman better than you has got. Yes, your father's all right. No, he's just sitting here, the same. God knows what's to become of us. But you know how he is, little he cares. . . . Now remember this, Maggie, if anything goes wrong with your married life it's your own fault and you needn't come here for sympathy. . . . I can't waste any more time on it. Goodby."

Mr. Halloran, his ears standing up for fear of missing a word, thought how Gerald J. McCorkery had gone straight on up the ladder with Rosie; and for every step the McCorkerys took upward, he, Michael Halloran, had taken a step downward with Lacey Mahaffy. They had started as greenhorns with the same chances at the same time and the same friends, but McCorkery had seized all his opportunities as they came, getting in steadily with the Big Shots in ward politics, one good thing leading to another. Rosie had known how to back him up and push him onward. The McCorkerys for years had invited him and Lacey to come over to the house and be sociable with the crowd, but Lacey would not.

"You can't run with that fast set and drink and stay out nights and hold your job," said Lacey, "and you should know better than to ask your wife to associate with that woman." Mr. Halloran had got into the habit of dropping around by himself, now and again, for McCorkery still liked him, was still willing to give him a foothold in the right places, still asked him for favors at election time. There was always a good lively crowd at the McCorkerys, wherever they were; for they moved ever so often to a better place, with more furniture. Rosie helped hand around the drinks, taking a few herself with a gay word for everybody. The player piano or the victrola would be going full blast, with everybody dancing, all looking like ready money and a bright future. He would get home late these evenings, back to the same little cold-water walk-up flat, because Lacey would not spend a dollar for show. It must all go into savings against old age, she said. He would be full of good food and drink, and find Lacey, in a bungalow apron, warming up the fried potatoes once more, cross and bitterly silent, hanging her head and frowning at the smell of liquor on his breath. "You might at least eat the potatoes when I've fried them and waited all this time," she would say. "Ah, eat them yourself, they're none of mine," he would snarl in his disappointment with her, and with the life she was leading him.

He had believed with all his heart for years that he would one day be manager of one of the G. and I. chain grocery stores he worked for, and when that hope gave out there was still his pension when they retired him. But two years before it was due they fired him, on account of the depression, they said. Overnight he was on the sidewalk, with no place to go with the news but home. "Jesus," said Mr. Halloran, still remembering that day after nearly seven years of idleness.

The depression hadn't touched McCorkery. He went on and on up the ladder, giving beefsteaks and beanfests and beer parties for the boys in Billy's Place, standing in with the right men and never missing a trick. At last the Gerald J. McCorkery Club chartered a whole boat for a big excursion up the river. It was a great day, with Lacey sitting at home sulking. After election Rosie had her picture in the papers, smiling at McCorkery; not fat exactly, just a fine figure of a woman with flowers pinned on her spotted fur coat, her teeth as good as ever. Oh God, there was a girl for any man's money. Mr. Halloran saw out of his eye-corner the bony stooped back of Lacey Mahaffy, standing on one foot to rest the other like a tired old horse, leaning on her hands waiting for the iron to heat.

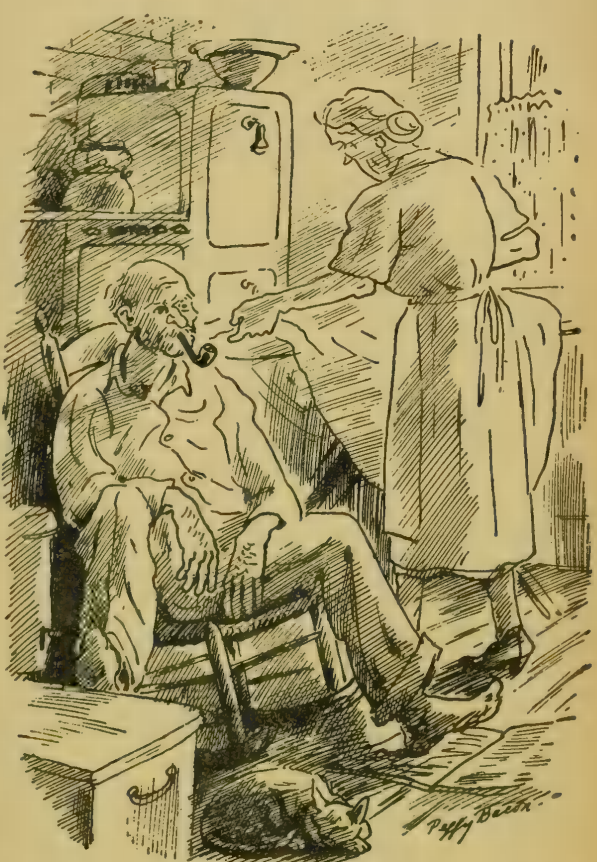
"That was Maggie, with her woes," she said.

"I hope you gave her some good advice," said Mr. Halloran. "I hope you told her to take up her hat and walk out on him."

Mrs. Halloran suspended the iron over a pair of pink satin panties. "I told her to do right and leave wrongdoing to the men," she said, in her voice like a phonograph record running down. "I told her to bear with the trouble God sends as her mother did before her."

Mr. Halloran gave a loud groan and knocked out his pipe on the chair arm. "You would ruin the world, woman, if you could, with your wicked soul, treating a new-married girl as if she had no home and no parents to come to. But she's no daughter of mine if she sits there peeling potatoes, letting a man run over her. No daughter of mine and I'll tell her so if she—"

"You know well she's your daughter, so hold your tongue," said Mrs. Halloran, "and if she heeded you she'd be walking the streets this minute. I brought her up an honest girl, and an honest woman she's going to be or I'll take her over my knee as I did when she was little. So there you are, Halloran."



Mr. Halloran leaned far back in his chair and felt along the shelf above his head until his fingers touched a half-dollar he had noticed there. His hand closed over it, he got up instantly and looked about for his hat.

"Keep your daughter, Lacey Mahaffy," he said, "she's none of mine but the fruits of your long sinning with the Holy Ghost. And now I'm off for a little round and a couple of beers to keep my mind from dissolving entirely."

"You can't have that dollar you just now sneaked off the shelf," said Mrs. Halloran. "So you think I'm blind besides? Put it back where you found it. That's for our daily bread."

"I'm sick of bread daily," said Mr. Halloran, "I need beer. It was not a dollar, but a half-dollar as you know well."

[Continued on page 226]

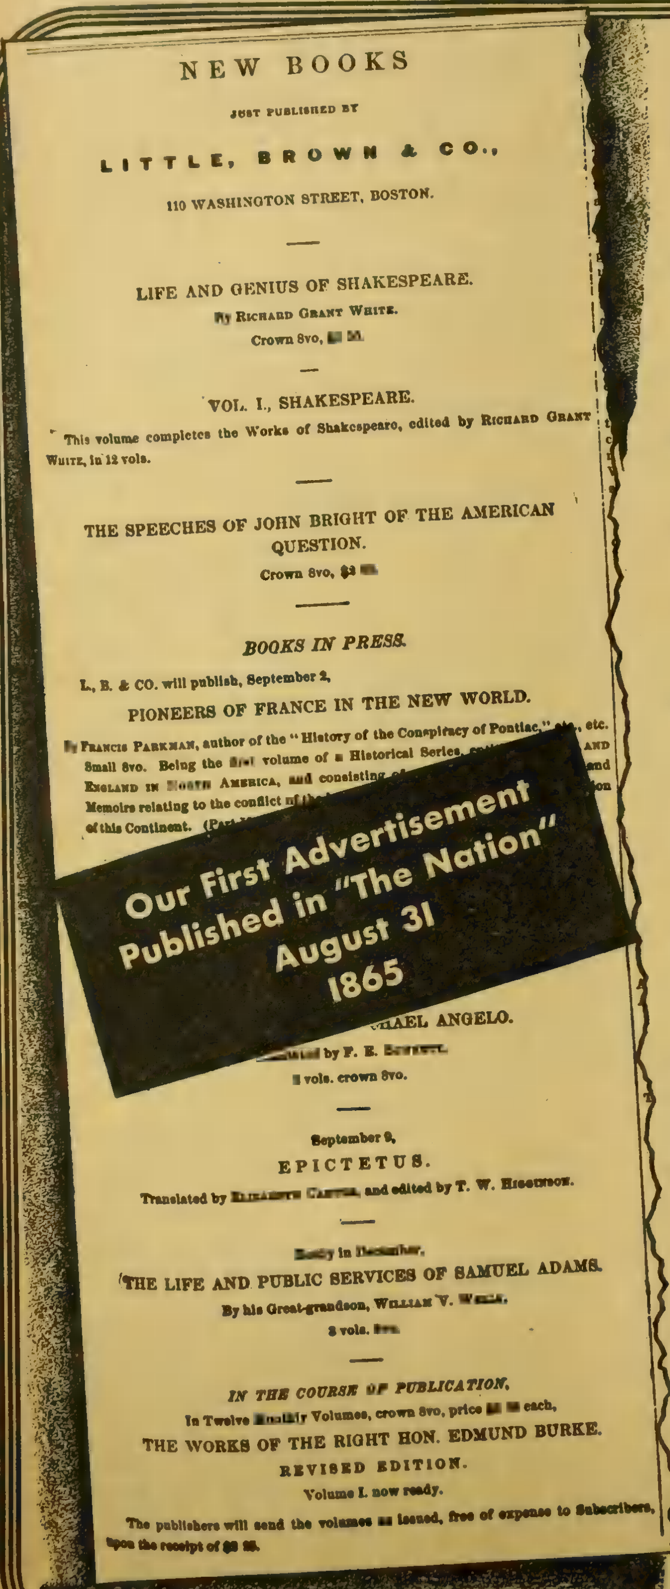
Happy Birthday!



NEW BOOKS

JUST PUBLISHED BY

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

LIFE AND GENIUS OF SHAKESPEARE.

By RICHARD GRANT WHITE.

Crown 8vo, [illegible]

VOL. I., SHAKESPEARE.

This volume completes the Works of Shakespeare, edited by RICHARD GRANT WHITE, in 12 vols.

THE SPEECHES OF JOHN BRIGHT OF THE AMERICAN QUESTION.

Crown 8vo, $2 [illegible]

BOOKS IN PRESS.

L., B. & CO. will publish, September 2,

PIONEERS OF FRANCE IN THE NEW WORLD.

By FRANCIS PARKMAN, author of the "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac," etc., etc. Small 8vo. Being the first volume of a Historical Series, [illegible] AND ENGLAND IN NORTH AMERICA, and consisting [illegible] and Memoirs relating to the conflict of the [illegible] on of this Continent. (Part [illegible]

Our First Advertisement Published in "The Nation" August 31 1865

[illegible] HAEL ANGELO.

[illegible] by F. E. [illegible]

[illegible] vols. crown 8vo.

September 9,

EPICTETUS.

Translated by [illegible] and edited by T. W. HIGGINSON.

[illegible] in [illegible]

THE LIFE AND PUBLIC SERVICES OF SAMUEL ADAMS.

By his Great-grandson, WILLIAM V. [illegible]

3 vols. [illegible]

IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION.

In Twelve [illegible] Volumes, crown 8vo, price [illegible] each,

THE WORKS OF THE RIGHT HON. EDMUND BURKE.

REVISED EDITION.

Volume I. now ready.

The publishers will send the volumes as issued, free of expense to Subscribers, upon the receipt of [illegible]

These Are LITTLE, BROWN Books that Span the Years Since 1865

1872 A DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH SYNONYMS
by Richard Soule (Revised Edition, 1938)

1881 THE COMMON LAW
by Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.
(New Edition, 1938)

1890 THE INFLUENCE OF SEA POWER UPON HISTORY
by Alfred Thayer Mahan

1896 "QUO VADIS"
by Henryk Sienkiewicz

THE BOSTON COOKING-SCHOOL COOK BOOK
by Fannie Merritt Farmer
(New Edition, 1938)

1904 LAW OF EVIDENCE
by John H. Wigmore

1922 THE SUPREME COURT IN UNITED STATES HISTORY
by Charles Warren

1929 ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT
by Erich Maria Remarque

1931 THE EPIC OF AMERICA
by James Truslow Adams

1932 MUTINY ON THE BOUNTY
by Charles Nordhoff and James Norman Hall

1936 DRUMS ALONG THE MOHAWK
by Walter D. Edmonds

1937 BARTLETT'S FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS
(Eleventh Edition)

Three Pulitzer Prize Winners in one year:

THE ROAD TO REUNION
by Paul H. Buck

PEDLAR'S PROGRESS
by Odell Shepard

THE LATE GEORGE APLEY
by J. P. Marquand

1939 CAPTAIN HORATIO HORNBLOWER
by C. S. Forester

REACHING FOR THE STARS
by Nora Waln

1940 Coming April 5th
CHAD HANNA by Walter D. Edmonds

*Atlantic Books

1837 L B 1940

LITTLE, BROWN & CO. PUBLISHERS, BOSTON

SOME NOTES ON VOLUME I

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

"ONE principal object of The Nation is to promote and develop a higher standard of criticism." I quote the first sentence of an article on Critics and Criticism which appeared in the first issue of The Nation, July 6, 1865. It is a sprightly and provocative piece, in which the author, Charles Astor Bristed, examines the question of critics versus authors, outlines the functions of critics, and says a word about publishers:

> . . . From one point of view the publisher is the public's natural enemy, and the critic their natural protector. . . . Publishers, like most men, usually pursue their calling from a desire to make money by it, nor is this fact more discreditable to them than to any other class. But like all dealers, the publisher is sometimes mistaken in the quality of his wares; he sometimes buys or agrees to print a work which would not find favor on its merits. This want of merit he is too often tempted to supply by systematic and unblushing puffery.

Mr. Bristed pays his respects to "venal 'notice writers'" and "sham reviewers," but goes on to say that any review inspired by personal animosity "is worth exactly its weight in Confederate paper."

> The critic . . . should be ignorant . . . whether [the author] is rich or poor, handsome or ugly, married or single, whether his grandmother was a President's sister, or his second cousin is a New York alderman.

His final sentence is directed at authors:

> . . . we believe our authors themselves would not be sorry for a little less butter and a little more pepper; we are certain it would do them good, whether they liked it or not.

The literary section of that first issue was compounded of authority, plain speaking, and excellent writing. Or perhaps I should say is, for though the advertisements in it look quaint today, the reviews are mainly dated by the titles of books and such contemporary allusions as the reference to Confederate money. The contributors, aside from Mr. Bristed, were Henry James, Sr., who wrote a masterly and annihilating criticism of Thomas Carlyle's history of Frederick the Great; Henry James, Jr., who reviewed Henry Kingsley's "The Hillyars and the Burtons"; Charles Eliot Norton, who wrote on Richard Grant White's "Works of William Shakespeare"; and E. K. Gurney, professor of history at Harvard, who reviewed Matthew Arnold's "Essays in Criticism." The name of the writer of the Literary Notes is not set down, but one may assume that it was Wendell Phillips Garrison, who was the literary editor.

Ensuing issues maintained the high standard set by the first. The names of reviewers for the most part did not appear; sometimes it is impossible to identify them; but in the bound volumes of The Nation's office file names are noted in pencil beside the title often enough to show that they included many of the distinguished writers and scholars of the time. Most reviews were long —two, three columns of small, closely packed print. Foreign books were often reviewed. There was no attempt at comprehensive coverage of books, though a vast range of literary subjects was touched upon in the weekly notes. William Dean Howells, recently returned from a consulship in Italy, wrote several articles on Italian subjects; in 1867 George Perkins Marsh, philologist and diplomat, wrote at least nine long articles—I lost count after that—on the new edition of Webster's Dictionary, a project present reviewers will marvel at.

To me the most interesting reviews in the first volume are those of Henry James, Jr., who was twenty-two in 1865 (he had published his first review the year before in the North American) and was not considered important enough to be listed with his father among The Nation's contributors. His early reviews of Henry Kingsley, Dickens, Walt Whitman, Anthony Trollope, and others are like arrows, beautifully weighted, wonderfully sharp, well-seasoned, going straight and swiftly to their mark.*

James wrote of Kingsley:

> The author leaps astride of a half-broken fancy, starts off at a brisk trot . . . and trusts to Providence for the rest. His main dependence is his command of that expedient which is known in street parlance as "collecting a crowd." He overawes the reader by the force of numbers; and in this way he is never caught solus upon the stage; for to be left alone with the audience or even to be forced into a prolonged tête-à-tête with one of his characters is the giant terror of the second-rate novelist.

He called Dickens "the greatest of superficial novelists." His intense dislike of Whitman's work made the sparks fly in his review of "Drum-Taps," which bore the simple title Mr. Walt Whitman:

---

* They form part of a collection published in 1921 of James's critical writings during 1864, 1865, and 1866.

> What the human heart desires above all is sincerity [he said, addressing Whitman], and you do not appear to be sincere. For a lover you talk entirely too much about yourself. In one place you threaten to absorb Kanada. In another you call upon the city of New York to incarnate you, as you have incarnated it. . . . To become adopted as a national poet, it is not enough to discard everything in particular and to accept everything in general. . . . This democratic, liberty-loving, American populace, this stern and war-tried people, is a great civilizer. It is devoted to refinement. If it has sustained a monstrous war, and practiced human nature's best in so many ways for the last five years, it is not to put up with spurious poetry afterwards.

Mr. Walt Whitman's opinion of Henry James was also in character. "James," he once said, "is just feathers to me."

In 1915, in the special issue commemorating The Nation's fiftieth year, Henry Holt, himself looking back fifty years, wrote as follows:

> The publishers didn't know what to make of The Nation's strange ways. . . . [They] had been used to having everything that was not glaringly ignorant or immoral gently treated, if not praised . . . the early Nation unquestionably did more than all other influences to raise the standard of our literary criticism, and . . . to educate the publishing trade.

Mr. Bristed and his colleagues would have been pleased at this testimonial of a publisher half a century after.

Contemplation of the first volume of The Nation arouses mixed emotions in me. Having come from Utah and being, in addition, a member of the female sex, I can almost feel the skeptical to scornful glances of the illustrious males whose names adorn those early pages. Especially of the great Godkin, who allowed women to contribute to his paper but opposed giving them the vote, and who later came to feel that the frontier and the vulgar West, which for him began somewhere beyond the Hudson, had distorted the democracy of his early faith, failing to understand, like many a modern counterpart, that his basic aristocratic longings had finally overcome his youthful radicalism. "No scenery or climate I had to share with Western people," he wrote to a friend in his late years, "would charm me." What Godkin could not see, partly because he was too close, was that the "Western people," hailing from the Eastern seaboard and from every quarter of the globe, were learning to practice, in their own way and with an exuberance that could not but strike him as crude, that very independence and freedom of expression on which he justly prided himself and his journal. And though he might not care to recognize it, this "vulgar" democratic force flowing in from every part of the country has served to maintain and renew the spirit of liberalism which he in 1865 represented. The letter of liberalism has changed, yet the underlying spirit of the early Nation is amazingly similar to that of The Nation of 1940. And since literary standards and critical principles are more durable than political programs, many of the reviews in the first issues would not be out of place in the present Nation, which still believes in dispensing less butter and more pepper, always, of course, for the good of the author, the public, and the publisher!

Americana, 1865: In the issue of July 27, 1865, Russell Sturgis, in an article called A Word About Museums, rejoiced at the disappearance of P. T. Barnum's American Museum, which had just been destroyed by fire. He went on to demand a genuine "American museum." "Perhaps," he wrote, "in the neighborhood of the Central Park . . . would be the best place for it." Two weeks later the correspondence column contained a letter from the irrepressible Barnum which opened by saying that The Nation was "just the journal 'our nation' needed," and went on in part as follows:

> I am not thick-skinned, and I know my museum was not so refined or classic or scientifically arranged as the foreign governmental institutions, for mine had to support my family . . . But it is a great error to state that I ever permitted "vulgar sensation dramas." No vulgar word or gesture, and not a profane expression, was ever allowed on my stage! Even in Shakespeare's plays I unflinchingly and invariably cut out vulgarity and profanity.

Song: To Exiled Art

BY GEORGE MARION O'DONNELL

Rimbaud, Gauguin, and Gaudier,
Derive such solace as you may
From knowing that you were pursued
By Furies only, not by rude
Dictator, Proletariat,
Congress, Parliament, or Diet.
Ruling or oppressed class
Did not sneer at you en masse;
And rationalization can
Show you more blest than Thomas Mann.

But summer heat and winter rain
Ignore alike the ruins of Spain,
Gaudier's hunger-bought stones,
The fever ache in Rimbaud's bones,
Gauguin's sun like a yellow gong,
Beethoven's Heiliger Dankgesang.
Converted from its life of crime,
The skull grows paper thin in time;
And thunder from the crawling fly
Rolls in its apostolic sky.

Literary Fellowships

For promising authors who need financial assistance to complete a literary project.

After five successful years, the publishers are now able to increase both the initial payment and royalty terms. In 1940 they offer two Fellowships of $1500.00 each. Closing date: September 15. Details from Houghton Mifflin Co., 2 Park St., Boston

THOREAU

By HENRY SEIDEL CANBY

"SIMPLY enchanting, as delightful reading as ever you found between covers . . . Thoreau comes alive, boy and man, oddity and genius, narrowly and straitly a New Englander, broadly and universally a man." — Dorothy Canfield Fisher. Illus. $3.75. The Works of Thoreau, edited by Mr. Canby, $5.00. The two volumes, boxed, $8.75

PERIOD PIECE

Ella Wheeler Wilcox and Her Times

By JENNY BALLOU

THIS unorthodox biography does for the early 1900's what "The Mauve Decade" did for the 1890's. It is built around a rococo personality whose verses were notoriously passionate, palpably low-brow and phenomenally successful. Yet in its essence, it is a deep-cutting study of a period and a way of life that today seems more remote than the Middle Ages.

Illustrated, $3.00

MY LIFE

The Autobiography of HAVELOCK ELLIS

"THIS naked self-revelation is one of the most tragically beautiful stories ever told, one rich in understanding and misunderstanding, in frankness and honesty." — Yale Review.

Illustrated, $3.75

THROUGH CHINA'S WALL

By GRAHAM PECK

THREE years ago a young American artist set out to explore the remote parts of China. Before he was through he had been caught up in the hurricane of war and had met with many adventures. Here is the best travel book that has come out of the Orient in years — and the pictures are just as vivid as the writing.

$3.50

INCREDIBLE ERA

By SAMUEL HOPKINS ADAMS

THE Life and Times of Warren Gamaliel Harding. "Sagacious, illuminating, completely engrossing." — Alexander Woollcott. "The author has a gift for entertaining narrative." — Claude M. Fuess.

Illustrated, $3.00

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY - Publishers

"THE NATION" AND THE AMERICAN NOVEL

BY CARL VAN DOREN

THE cause of the American novel during the past twenty-five years has often been indebted to The Nation's criticism. In The Nation's first year its staff included the young William Dean Howells, who there began his long career as the principal exponent of realism in American fiction. Henry James, who did most to make the novel in America and England a conscious form of art, wrote his earliest critical articles for The Nation. Though Howells soon moved on to another journal, and James left America for Europe, their doctrines persisted in The Nation, which to the end of the century regularly demanded that fiction be truthful and reasonable, without vulgar nonsense or silly romance.

Between 1900 and 1918 The Nation, more conservative than formerly, objected to the naturalism which was succeeding the somewhat official realism of Howells and James. Stuart Sherman led the attack on Theodore Dreiser and long kept up a critical feud with Dreiser's defender, H. L. Mencken. But after 1918 The Nation had a new critical policy which made Dreiser a contributor and Mencken a contributing editor. Ludwig Lewisohn and Joseph Wood Krutch were brilliantly hospitable to the rising novelists of the post-war years. I wrote the first history of the American novel, parts of which appeared in The Nation, and then in 1921 monthly studies of contemporary American writers which were the first systematic survey of the new fiction. Since then The Nation has been a sturdy friend of the American novel in its most vigorous undertakings.

Going over my history of the American novel lately for a new edition,* I found there had been more changes in twenty years than year by year I had quite realized. In 1920, when I wrote the original book, Howells died, Henry James's letters—so far his chief biography—appeared, and Mark Twain was made, by Van Wyck Brooks, the center of a critical argument that touched all of American literature. Howells's death seemed to mark the end of a period, and as in "The American Novel" I had closed the account with 1900, so in "Contemporary American Novelists" I confined myself to the two decades 1900-20. But 1920 marked the beginning of a new period, for it was the year of "Main Street."

This was followed by the most varied decade in American fiction: "Main Street," "Babbitt," "Arrowsmith," "Dodsworth"; Dreiser's "An American Tragedy"; Willa Cather's "A Lost Lady" and "Death Comes for the Archbishop"; James Branch Cabell's "Jurgen" (1919) and "The Silver Stallion"; Edith Wharton's "The Age of Innocence," Zona Gale's "Miss Lulu Bett," Ellen Glasgow's "Barren Ground" and "The Romantic Comedians"; the four novels of Elinor Wylie. The decade saw the emergence of John Dos Passos in "Three Soldiers" and "Manhattan Transfer," and the triumph of Ernest Hemingway in "The Sun Also Rises" and "A Farewell to Arms." It saw F. Scott Fitzgerald's "This Side of Paradise" and "The Great Gatsby," Carl Van Vechten's "Peter Whiffle," Thornton Wilder's "The Bridge of San Luis Rey," Elizabeth Madox Roberts's "The Time of Man," the ironic pastorals of Robert Nathan, and Thomas Wolfe's magnificent "Look Homeward, Angel."

Now that the screen has discovered the Roaring Twenties, I suppose that decade will settle into history as a kind of rival to the Gay Nineties, and strict justice will be done to neither. But the decade 1919-29 is in 1940 remote enough to be seen in critical perspective. The essential difference—so far as novels are concerned—between it and the decade following is that the twenties made Main Street a proverbial term, and the thirties did this with Tobacco Road. That is, dulness was the established villain of the twenties, poverty of the thirties. In the prosperous years it seemed ridiculous that men should give all their thoughts to getting enough to eat and wear and a place to sleep. But by 1937, when John Steinbeck published "Of Mice and Men," these desires had come to seem romantic, almost heroic. George and Lennie longed for a little farm of their own as Carol Kennicott longed for wit and beauty in the village.

The most characteristic novels of the thirties have had a proletarian cast: Dos Passos's trilogy "U. S. A.," Erskine Caldwell's "Tobacco Road," James T. Farrell's "Studs Lonigan," Steinbeck's "The Grapes of Wrath." Though Pearl Buck went to China for the setting of "The Good Earth," and Margaret Mitchell turned back to the Civil War for the time of "Gone with the Wind," they too dealt with the problems of poverty and desperate survival. In this they have of course only done what realistic fiction normally does: they have worked with their eyes upon the most actual life they knew. But they have also, though this is usually overlooked, done what American fiction has been doing from the first. They have gone on discovering layer under layer of American life and bringing it to the light. There has been no break in the process. It has merely turned up materials that are still so new as to seem strange. I expect that in ten years "Tobacco Road" will seem no more startling than "Main Street."

---

* "The American Novel, 1789-1939." Revised and Enlarged Edition. The Macmillan Company.

TWENTY GRAND

THE POPULARITY CIGARETTE AT 10¢

A PACKAGE

PLUS LOCAL TAX IN TAX STATES

TWENTY GRAND
A WINNER
TURKISH AND DOMESTIC BLEND
CIGARETTES
TWENTY GRAND

MADE IN AN AIR CONDITIONED PLANT BY SKILLED AND EXPERIENCED UNION WORKMEN

THE AXTON-FISHER TOBACCO COMPANY, INC.
LOUISVILLE, KY.

In 1920 there had been two outstanding periods in the history of the American novel: the one dominated by Fenimore Cooper, Hawthorne, and Melville, and the one dominated by Howells, Mark Twain, and Henry James. By 1940 a third outstanding period has been added, that of Dreiser, Sinclair Lewis, Willa Cather, and Thomas Wolfe. Nobody can now know how this third period will look in another twenty years, what names may have fallen out or what names been added. But I think it will still stand up beside the first two.

The Danger of Being Mr. Laski

THE DANGER OF BEING A GENTLEMAN: AND OTHER ESSAYS. By Harold J. Laski. The Viking Press. $2.75.

THIS collection of random essays offers an excellent introduction to the subject of Harold Laski. It is like his conversation in that it ranges adventurously in space, and scale. Here we have a tribute to the late Justice Holmes presented cheek by jowl with a study of the committee system in English local government and an essay on law and justice in Soviet Russia. Laski is equally adept in letting the tail wag the dog or the dog wag the tail; he mixes impudence and gravity, presumption and deference, a yearning for sweeping, monistic solutions and a passionate insistence on the right to disagree. In animal terms he is both dog and cat, one-half cocker-spaniel friendliness and one-half plain feline suspicion and curiosity. Laski never does things by halves; he always does things by doubles.

Taken by themselves, the essays in this ideal introduction to Laski aren't exactly world-shaking in their importance. The title piece, on The Dangers of Being a Gentleman: Reflections on the Ruling Class in England, was written in 1932; subsequent English history has reduced it to a series of amusingly phrased platitudes. The paper called On the Study of Politics is a noble statement of Laski's credo as a teacher: it should be required reading in every graduate school of political science. Law and Justice in Soviet Russia recalls the fact that Soviet criminal law is as enlightened as Kremlin political justice is crude, immoral, and loathsome; it should be a valuable reminder to anti-Stalinists who are in danger of tossing out a few worth-while Russian babies along with the feculent bath water of Holy Joe. The essay on The Judicial Function elaborates the obvious point that judges can't be revolutionists, inasmuch as it ain't legal to make up a new constitution and proclaim it from the bench on the spur of the moment. In writing on The English Constitution and French Public Opinion, 1789-1794 and The Committee System in English Local Government, Laski is the precise artist in research; in Nationalism and the Future of Civilization (a lecture dating back to 1932) there is a pathetic wishful-thinking tribute to the League of Nations and the coming world community. Finally, the delightful gift horse, Mr. Justice Holmes: For His Eighty-ninth Birthday, can be looked at in the mouth by anybody.

Obviously, there is no way of reviewing the matter presented by such a diverse Laski in the little space at my disposal: one can't equate Justice Holmes with the Durham County Council for neat synoptic treatment. The student of Laski's manner, however, can note the sources of the man's strength and weakness as a philosopher using the King's English. Like all courteous men Laski gets away with murder. At heart he is a dogmatist and a monist, part of the tyrannical Hegelian tradition that has taken the Western radical movement to Moscow and Berlin. Yet the dogmatist interlards his pages with a hundred tentative, deferential I-hazard-the-judgments and if-I-may-so-phrase-its. Laski is never "unmindful" of the "gallant attempts" of lesser mortals to arrive at certainty. When he means "often," he says "not seldom." When he wants to call a man or a movement great, he remarks that he or it is "not the least noble." The result is insidious: you are lulled, soothed—and bound and delivered before you can wake to the danger.

"The Danger of Being a Gentleman: And Other Essays" contains only one real fallacy. But that is the supreme fallacy of thinking that men can stand "pure" systems. I may be no great shakes as a prophet, but four thousand years of recorded history prove to me the opposite: men don't like consistent social systems and will never put up with "purity" for long. They like a cross-play of competition and mutualism, of private ownership and public, and that is what they are going to have. Laski, of course, believes in the "laws" of Marx, even unto the "law of motion" of capitalism. But Laski is, like all monists, a creature of assumptions. It is true that he states his assumptions in casual, deferential language. But understatement does not necessarily make a scientist. One can understate fallacies, too. JOHN CHAMBERLAIN

Good Morning

ART YOUNG: HIS LIFE AND TIMES. By Art Young. New York: Sheridan House. $3.50.

THERE is no one like Art Young as an individual or as an artist. In drawing, his style is as unadorned as was that of Tom Paine in pamphleteering, with the same effect of the spoken word. There should be "no whispering in art," he says. "Whatever the artist has to say he ought to say out loud," and his own voice has been clear. A kind of abstract literalism belongs to his cartoons, with the Good Morning touch, an unbuttoned merriment or gaiety that comes out in some of the most savage of them. The quality is in the style: witness the light mechanics of Fixing up the World War Soldiers.

Some years ago he gave us a partial record called "On My Way," with its alternative and equally characteristic title, "All Right So Far." Now we have a copious autobiography from his early years in Monroe, Wisconsin, where he cleaned lamp chimneys in his father's store and listened to old-timers telling highly variegated stories round the drum stove. He had a pony, was inclined to shun work on the farm, and began to draw. His budding talent was well regarded in the village. At a lecture on Doré at the opera house one of the girls leaned over and said, "This ought to interest you, Artie." Later, when he came home from Paris to recover from a severe illness they gave him a strawberry festival.

"As a long-time disciple of Jefferson, I hold that if I had to choose between a free press and any other agency, I would choose a free press; for where the press is free, no bad cause can long exist. And by freedom of the press I mean that no influence, whether of money or power or any other thing, either directs its policy or inclines it to suppression, or advocacy, for any consideration except the common good. The independence, fearlessness, and ability of The Nation make it an influential agency in an era when leadership without strings is the hope of a drifting world."

JOSEPHUS DANIELS, Ambassador to Mexico

YOU—NATION READERS—MAKE POSSIBLE

THE Nation

UNSUBSIDIZED—SELF-SUPPORTING—FREE

His youthful stay in Paris wasn't very long, and it seems not to have left much of a print on his mind or his work. For a time he joined a little group of traveling entertainers of a homespun variety, sketching famous people in charcoal while Signor Tommaso played the mandolin. There is more of this than of Julien's in his work still. Young was such a hit that large posters were printed showing him at work surrounded by his sketches, with the caption, "Good Morning, have you seen Art Young?" The impresario argued—and how quaintly the words ring out—"We've got to do it that way, Art. Everybody does it."

Before this Young had made drawings for a trade paper in Chicago, the Nimble Nickel, but it was inevitable, perhaps because of talk around the drum stove, that he should have found a place as a political cartoonist. Even the newspaper might have been prophesied from Monroe, Wisconsin. It was the old Chicago Inter-Ocean, known throughout the Middle West as the farmers' Bible. This was long before Art Young became an adventurer in radicalism. These were years, in the middle eighties, when Jay Gould was frequently quoted as saying, "I could hire half the working class to kill the other half"; when the Knights of Labor were putting up a bold fight; when the Haymarket trials came to their tragic end.

It is an engaging aspect of this narrative that Art Young makes no pretense at wisdom after the fact. "When I came from the country I had a strong belief that the newspapers in the cities were oracles, beacon lights." His disillusionments, his concern with the struggles of labor came for the most part after he moved to New York. There he began to draw for a good many papers, radical and otherwise, perpetrating jokes and propounding social criticism with an even hand. From time to time he was occupied with what he called his Hell books, which perhaps derived less from Doré than from Bob Ingersoll. He insists that in drawing he was influenced by Doré, and mentions his study of Cruikshank, Leech, and other English cartoonists, modestly disregarding the fact that the style which he evolved was of a different order from that of any of these artists, though they may have strengthened his drive toward satire. He knew Thomas Nast, greatly admired his work, and studied it, yet there is hardly a trace of Nast in Art Young's cartoons; nor is he at all like his American contemporaries, Robert Minor or Walt McDougall, for example, whose themes were often in later years related to his.

Soon after the war and his acquittal in the Masses trial he created a well-remembered paper of his own, Good Morning, "a weekly burst of humor, satire, and fun—with now and then a fleeting beam of wisdom." "There was never any business management," he said, but the editors put on a festival or two. Probably Art Young could not have continued to draw so freely without such improbable ventures. He has the Good Morning temperament with an inability to accept shackles, whether in personal relations or the solid base of a good publishing connection, or even among like-minded workers in the causes to which he was pledged. He began to draw for The Nation in 1922, trenchantly. His output in these years was diversified and prolific.

Art Young The Nation, June 18, 1924

The Nation's Representatives at the Republican Convention in Cleveland

THE SPORT OF JUDGES
'SHOT AT SUNRISE'

Art Young The Nation, July 4, 1923

Some day we must have a full harvest of these drawings which so lightly gave a sharp edge to much of the radical thought of a quickly changing period. But this generous autobiography makes a compelling chronicle with its many reproductions, its shrewd humor, its dry understatement, its straightforward account of a myriad events and of Art Young's life.

CONSTANCE ROURKE

Force and Reason in Politics

PROLOGUE TO POLITICS. By Charles E. Merriam. University of Chicago Press. $1.50.

THE theme of Professor Merriam's sane and thoughtful little book is the relation of force to reason in politics. This is, in a sense, the basic theme of political science; for it is the business of politics so to organize the vitalities of human existence that a "commonwealth" will be created out of the conflicting forces and interests of human life, a task which has never been achieved in history without setting force, as the instrument of order, against force as the instrument of anarchy. The basic problem of politics is how to prevent the force which is an instrument of order on one level of social organization from becoming the instrument of either anarchy or tyranny on the next level of social integration. "Quis custodiet custodes ipsos?"

For this problem Professor Merriam rightly has no simple answer: "Somewhere between the doctrine that force has no place in human association and the doctrine that force is the god of human relations lies the truth. In the ideal state physical violence would be unnecessary and out of date, but in the practical state a way must be found for the organization and canalization of such violence as may be inevitable at a given time." (Professor Merriam means by "violence" what Bertrand Russell means by "naked power," the application of physical coercion to secure unwilling obedience.)

LIBRARY
Cal.

The "somewhere between" is essentially a form of social organization which subordinates the use of force to the creation and preservation of universal standards dictated by reason, but which does not dispense with force when these standards are imperiled by civilization or by conditions of decay within itself. "We wish to defend our way of life," Professor Merriam declares, "and we will defend it; but we must be prepared to examine the implications of the organization of violence in subordination to the organization of consent."

These implications are examined with great shrewdness and discernment; and the examination ranges from the relation of military to civil authorities to the possibility of creating a world state and the task of achieving a culture in which political authority will stand under inner moral, as well as outer social, checks.

In analyzing the various possibilities of subordinating the organization of violence to the organization of consent, Professor Merriam tends to forget that the very necessity of force, even in a subordinate form, is evidence of the persistence of non-rational forces in human society side by side with the rational. He becomes quite lyrical in expressing an essentially nineteenth-century faith in the possibility of extending rational consent indefinitely in human society to the point where non-rational factors are practically eliminated. He is prepared to stand by his "brave words" about a new temple of common justice which he sees in the future, even if his critic should meet him "in a concentration camp or army hospital." In that case he would merely answer the critics' jibes with the word "Patience." This is all very well, but one would like to ask what happened to the world which began to dream in the eighteenth century of just such a gradual achievement of perfect justice? And why is Europe today at the mercy of crude political religions in which force is worshiped as a self-justifying political reality?

Is it possible that our culture thought too simply of the non-rational elements in politics as "animal" factors which would be ultimately transcended? Or was it, perhaps, too blind to the elements of "chaos" which persist in even the highest political cosmos, and which had better be beguiled rather than neglected lest they erupt and inundate the cosmos? Surely our present crisis is something more than a mere momentary backsliding into "animal" nature in the general line of advance toward a completely rational society.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Katherine Mansfield

THE SCRAPBOOK OF KATHERINE MANSFIELD. Edited by J. Middleton Murry. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

WITH the publication of the present volume J. Middleton Murry has conceivably reached the bottom of the Katherine Mansfield trunk. There can hardly be much more to come in that long labor of self-love which Mr. Murry has practiced during the many years since Katherine Mansfield's death. Yet, though this is indeed a book of scraps—unposted letters, unfinished stories, quotations from books, marginalia, jottings—it is a book much worth having. It is something

The first Hearn Store on Canal Street, 1827

SENTIMENT

They Say . . . Should Never Rule Business

But here is one business which has permitted sentiment to influence its policies.

The greater and more modern Hearns which we have built on the foundation of a famous, century-old institution is HUMAN! That is because it deals with Human Beings, measuring success in terms of People as well as Profits.

Our pre-occupation with People, we have found, has not been inimical to Profits. In fact, it has proved to be very good business to have Hearns so closely watching the hopes and the aspirations of millions . . . striving with courage and foresight to fulfill them.

HEARNS

14th St. at 5th Ave. Manhattan
150th St. at 3rd Ave. Bronx
Broad & Cedar Streets Newark

Six of Today's Most Significant Books

•

THE LIVING TRADITION

by Simeon Strunsky A re-affirmation of faith in the American way of life—a brilliant "account" of the American people as they were and as they are and as they may be in the generation now opening. Everything is touched on—life, women, children, the press, the various regions of the land, the political parties, our business methods, our social habits, and our commercial customs. "Well written and well conceived—a brilliant book."—William Allen White. $3.50

NOT PEACE BUT A SWORD

by Vincent Sheean One of the most discussed books of the hour. The ONE book that most clearly reveals the rhythm of history which enables us to envision the dark, dangerous future. $2.75

ACROSS THE DARK RIVER

by Peter Mendelssohn "One of the best German refugee novels I have read. . . . Scion of the family that produced Moses and Felix, Mr. Mendelssohn is a good writer . . . and he has managed to incorporate into the odyssey of his little tribe that peculiar sense of helplessness and genuine tragedy that rules the European mind today."—Alfred Kazin, Herald Tribune. $2.50

THE ALL-AMERICAN FRONT by Duncan Aikman

"His book about Latin America is the most illuminating and, in places, the most amusing statement of the so-called incompatibilities that this reviewer has ever seen."—Ralph Thompson, N. Y. Times. $3.00

SONS AND FATHERS

by Maurice Hindus This distinguished historian develops a tremendously important theme against the background of an exploding world—Russia in 1916. The love story of Kolya, young intellectual son of a revolutionary leader, and Irena, whose notorious father "pacified" Siberia. $2.50

THE CENSOR MARCHES ON by Morris L. Ernst and Alex Lindey

A review and indictment of censorship as applied in the United States to books, movies, the theatre, radio and allied arts. Pictures the recent struggles between liberals and that minority which seeks to superimpose its will upon the majority. Appendices of famous court decisions and complete bibliography. $2.50 richly and curiously personal, and it reveals someone who was specially concerned with being a woman and specially dedicated to being a writer. Nor is the book's scrappiness much of a drawback, since Katherine Mansfield was a creature of flashes and swift perceptions, and this volume is largely one of both.

•

· DOUBLEDAY, DORAN ·

I have not read any of Katherine Mansfield's stories in a long time, and I remember very few of them well. In the heyday of her celebrity they seemed to me overrated. She became a cult and a touchstone, and had better have been neither. A failing memory takes refuge in a phrase, and I should be disposed to think back on Katherine Mansfield as a gifted water-colorist, were I not aware that she was far too intense a person to be merely an exquisite one. Yet the delicacy, the poignancy, the subtle observation in her work have become, for me, a kind of aura rather than a sharp impression. It is something in her that provides the interest of the sketches and stories brought together in this Scrapbook. One, so to speak, watches her searching for a phrase, or nailing an emotion, or capturing a gesture; the phrase, the emotion, the gesture themselves mean less. And it is odd that this should be so, seeing that Katherine Mansfield was so determinedly "objective" a writer.

Of most interest in the book are the literary comments and autobiographical jottings. Katherine Mansfield copied out many passages from books she read—notably from Dostoevski and Chekhov, who had so much to give her, but also from people like Coleridge and Dr. Johnson. Reading the letters of Chekhov and Keats, both of them tuberculous, she "read between the lines," found a dozen affinities of thought and feeling. There is some comment on her contemporaries. Lawrence's "The Lost Girl" aroused her anger; she was keen at spotting his phony side and protested violently over such rubbish as the heroine's feeling "a trill in her bowels" when she found herself with child. She thought the voices of the singers in Barrie's "Mary Rose" were "like celestial gargling." She wrote of "Ulysses": "I'm dead against it. I suppose it was worth doing if everything is worth doing . . . but that is certainly not what I want from literature."

Here, as in the Letters and the Journal, one feels the woman's tense aliveness. She had what Bagehot said Macaulay did not have—an "experiencing nature." She lived intensely —and yet very observantly—not least because she so much thirsted to live. She had a capacity for joy, but life, as time went on, became a struggle against so many joyless things—against a horrible illness, against loneliness, against disillusionment in love. Since Mr. Murry himself has released this material, I see no reason why one should not comment on the additional evidence it offers of Katherine Mansfield's relations with him. He could make her very happy; he could also make her extraordinarily unhappy. The situation was plainly a difficult one. She was ill, overobservant, overwrought. He was not very much gifted with selflessness, or perhaps even with sympathy.

> I cough and cough. . . . And J. is silent. "This is what she is doing to me! Every fresh sound makes my nerves wince." . . . If he could only for a minute, serve me, help me, give himself up. I can so imagine an account by him of a "calamity." "I could do nothing all day, my hands trembled, I had a sensation of utter cold . . ." and so on,

> At such times I feel I could never get well with him. It's like having a cannon-ball tied to one's feet when one is trying not to drown.

Or again:

> A day passed in the usual violent agitation, such as J. only can fling me into. Now, he will come. There's no stopping him. But it's put down to my wanting him. . . . His very frankness is a falsity. In fact, it seems falser than his insincerity.

In spite of all the troubles that beset the woman, disturbed her, uprooted her, the artist in Katherine Mansfield persisted, unalloyed, to the end. She was what one might once have spoken of, without seeming to use a silly phrase, as a pure flame. Her work as writer was an endless stalking of feelings, perceptions, language; it revealed—whatever its limitations, either in impulse or achievement—that amoral integrity which is the peculiar mark of the artist. "The moment of direct feeling when we are most ourselves and least personal"—it was this she understood as a reward in life, and sought, and gladly suffered for.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

The English Book of Oxford Verse

THE OXFORD BOOK OF ENGLISH VERSE. 1250—1918. Second Edition. Chosen and Edited by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch. Oxford University Press. $3.

"THE Oxford Book of English Verse" has passed too many birthdays with unruffled dignity to make its arrival at a fortieth an occasion for reckless public festivity. Indeed, the publishers' refusal to modify the contents of this standard-setting and official Oxford model of verse anthologies has apparently been a token of the solemnly canonical spirit in which it was first given to the world in 1900. It would be pleasant to use the second edition of the second most famous and influential English book of its kind as an opportunity to discuss the changes in the fortunes and intelligence of poetry, its swiftly altering attitudes and conceptions, during one of the most eventful and mercurial periods of its history. But no such review is possible. Less even than Palgrave is Quiller-Couch an editor in whose taste or acumen are focused the essential values and proportions of poetic history and quality. His tastes are romantic, domestic, and Victorian; his touch has the limp and tactful caution of an academic hand; he disturbed no courtesies or reverences forty years ago and he doesn't do so now. No unsympathetic opinion of his original work is likely to be changed by this revision or by the two pages of rickety charm and donnish sidestepping which he supplies as a Foreword. "The Oxford Book of English Verse" was never a distinguished anthology, and its editor's discreet refusal to profit by the critical discoveries of the past half-century and to correct his "insecure judgment amid post-war poetry" by a little outside help or reading has reduced it to a nondescript one.

A page-by-page collation of the 1,100-page book reveals that the new edition has profited in a number of ways by the work of recent scholarship. Its sections of Middle English lyrics and popular ballads have been greatly extended; its treatment of the seventeenth-century mystical and meta-

THE MARCH OF FASCISM

By Stephen Raushenbush

"He takes apart the motor which makes society move at breath-taking speed on dangerous roads. THE MARCH OF FASCISM is outstanding in contemporary political literature for its mastery of the material and, not less important, for its simplicity and unpretentiousness."—The Nation.

THE MARCH OF FASCISM seems to me to be the shrewdest, most factual analysis of the cause of totalitarian government that has yet been written. . . . The chapter on the impact of war could scarcely be more timely. . . The book is a richly documented history of how fascism triumphs over the democratic state."—Marquis W. Childs in the New Republic. $3.00

THE CRUISE OF RAIDER "WOLF"

By Roy Alexander

"This is a unique history, and now, when armed ships are again running without lights it comes with exceptional power. The maritime shelf can scarcely show a more unusual book."—Christopher Morley, Book-of-the-Month Club News.

"An amazing and gallant, deadly voyage. . . . Roy Alexander has written the exciting saga."—Lewis Gannett, N. Y. Herald Tribune.
5th Large Printing. $2.75

AMERICA AT THE MOVIES

By Margaret Thorp

"A startling answer to the question: To what extent do the movies affect the nation."—N. Y. Times. Illustrated. $2.75

WORKERS ON RELIEF

By Grace Adams

"Essential for an understanding of the most extensive project of relief work [W. P. A.] in the history of modern industrial nations."—E. Wight Bakke, Yale Review. Illustrated. $3.00

AN ECONOMIC CONSTITUTION FOR DEMOCRACY

By George Soule

"Mr. Soule bludgeons the idea that America can save democracy by building great armaments and taking an intimate part in European conflicts."—Buffalo Evening News. $1.50

On Sale At All Booksellers

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
New Haven, Connecticut

HARPERS

ALDOUS HUXLEY

HIS FIRST NOVEL WITH AN AMERICAN SETTING

AFTER MANY A SUMMER DIES THE SWAN

Here is one of literature's most fascinating themes—perpetual youth—presented with an ironic touch that only Aldous Huxley could supply, and spiced with the wit and satire for which he is famous. $2.50

SINCE YESTERDAY

By Frederick Lewis Allen

Successor to the author's Only Yesterday, the book about The Twenties which was read by hundreds of thousands, this is a moving and dramatic chronicle of our own country in The Thirties—the Depression, Huey Long, Midget golf, the Blue Eagle, technocracy and many others. Illustrated. $3.00

NEW 1940-WAR EDITION

INSIDE EUROPE

By John Gunther

Again brought completely up-to-date and entirely reset. In addition to thousands of changes in the text, more than 90,000 words have been added since the book was first published, bringing the total to 265,000. New description of events from Munich to the outbreak of the war and from the outbreak of the war to the present. New pen portraits of Daladier, Churchill, the new Pope and many others. If you own a previous edition ask your bookseller about the liberal trade-in plan. New map. $3.50

INSIDE ASIA

By John Gunther

Chosen for Current History as one of the ten best non-fiction books of the year by John Dewey, Henry Seidel Canby, Carl Van Doren, Amy Loveman, Burton Rascoe, Dorothy Thompson, John W. Withers. On all lists of the "best books" of the year, including those of The Nation and New Republic. Tells you everything you want to know about the Orient—events, personalities, background. $3.50

THE LAST FLOWER

A PARABLE IN PICTURES

By James Thurber

How love was reborn in a dark world. "Thurber's best."—Lewis Gannett, N. Y. Herald Tribune. "No one can make me laugh so completely as Mr. Thurber. I am carried away by it."—Anne Parrish. $2.00

UNION NOW

By Clarence K. Streit

A national best seller—the practical plan for a union of the democracies. "The most important book published since the war."—Sir Hugh Walpole. "The most important and most logical plea for international democracy written in this generation."—Dorothy Thompson. $3.00 physical poets has been shaped up to greater justice and distinction; two poems formerly credited to Donne are removed and two authentic works substituted; several beautiful lyrics have been dropped ("Come, Sleep, with thy sweet deceiving," formerly credited to Fletcher, is one), but some excerpts from the Towneley plays, the Anglo-French love letters, and several exquisite medieval relics have been included (one being "Icham of Irlaunde"); the entries of Skelton, Spenser, Jonson, Marvell, Vaughan, Dryden, Prior, and Landor have been enlarged; and altogether about 60 poems and 15 poets have been omitted and about 200 poems have been added or substituted for those omitted. The most notable change comes, of course, in the inclusion of poems through Armistice Day, 1918 (these not being restricted, however, to poets who died before that date, the usual British prejudice against living poets having been lifted even in the 1900 edition), and there are even "a few numbers by later poets who, whether consciously or not, had indicated before that date the trend of their genius." In 1900 Quiller-Couch did not find it necessary to stop short at the year 1878, but today his insecure judgment "amid post-war poetry" has urged him to play safe by keeping modern verse at the polite distance of a quarter-century.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 49 E. 33rd St., N.Y.C.

This caution, combined with the above-noted improvements of earlier pages, might have stood in his favor as a sign of judicial modesty had it saved him from choking the authentic values of English poetry by the bogus ones or from allowing the historical proportions of his earlier sections to fall to pieces. For what is one to make of an anthology that allows Chaucer space for only three slight lyrics, Pope for three short poems, Thomson for eight lines, Goldsmith for sixteen, Cowper for two lyrics, Crabbe for three brief items, and Whitman for two short poems covering about one page, when it finds space for ten pages of Scott, two of Ebenezer Elliott, seven of George Darley, eleven of Tom Hood, five of William Bell Scott's "Witch's Ballad," twelve of James Hogg's interminable "Kilmeny," and ten of Robert Bridges (against six of Hardy, three of Hopkins, and two—all of immature youthful work—of Yeats)? Mrs. Browning is allowed seven pages, the Honorable Emily Lawless and Mme Duclaux one each, Mary E. Coleridge three, and Laurence Binyon four, while Emily Dickinson gets eight lines for one lyric.

The contemporary section might again have ended with the year 1900 for all Quiller-Couch has learned in the past forty years. He keeps his Victorian section littered with the remains of Ebenezer Jones, William Brightly Rands, William Philpot, Sydney Dobell, Walter C. Smith, Henry Clarence Kendall, and Bliss Carmen, and his twentieth-century pages, which show no trace of Synge, Robinson, Lawrence, Pound, Ford, Frost, Eliot, Lindsay, Sandburg, Masters, Stevens, or the imagists—all of whom had emerged by 1918—are crowded with the pathetic relics of Henry Newbolt, Norman Gale, J. S. Phillimore, John Alexander Chapman, Herbert Edward Palmer, Lascelles Abercrombie, and Wilfrid Grenfell. There is no need to refine these scores and statistics further.

Nor is there much point in bringing up the issue of personal preferences or popular favoritism in connection with such intransigence. Its defects are rudimentary beyond even these crude defenses. Such editing is the work of an incurably provincial, insensitively academic, and wholly unoriginal and uncritical cast of mind. Some anthologies—Verlaine's "Poètes Maudits," Moore's "Pure Poetry," Pound's "Profile," and Yeats's autobiographical "Modern Verse"—have the virtues of a distinctly and defensibly personal "criticism by selection." They defend their bias or eccentricity on grounds of a special insight or prejudice, and sometimes they fix a date in literary history. Obviously the "Oxford Book" never pretended to this kind of value, but even on the basis of classic or historical proportions, its ineptitude and callousness are so extreme as to make it miss every opportunity for value except that indicated by standard acceptance—and even here its treatment of Marlowe, Pope, Thomson, Crabbe, and Yeats wrenches that criterion beyond recognition at crucial points of poetic history. Moreover, the whole volume, good sections with bad, is somehow stricken by a blight of aesthetic timidity, nationalist emphasis, and academic condescension which would make it an embarrassing article for exportation from any country but England. To readers who move beyond these confines and are even moderately aware of what has been thought and said to any intelligent purpose in the world of literature or ideas during the past half-century, the day of the "Oxford Book" may be considered done. Its 1900 edition was a landmark in Victorian taste, and except as a headstone or monument of Victorian taste it is difficult to promise its successor another forty years of life.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

The Hills of Home

HOW GREEN WAS MY VALLEY. By Richard Llewellyn. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

HERE is the story of Huw Morgan, high-spirited son of a Welsh coal miner; the story, too, of his family, of the valley in which they lived, of the coming of hard times and industrial strife to mangle the peace of hard-working, Chapel-going folk whose consciences had for centuries done all the policing the community needed. Most of the action belongs to the years around the turn of the century, but it is told in nostalgic reminiscence as of the present time, when Huw, his old loves all dead or scattered to the ends of the world, is preparing to leave the valley forever.

Mr. Llewellyn (his full name is Richard D. V. Llewellyn Lloyd) is of course a native of Wales, who, though he has lived much more nomadically than his hero and has restlessly turned his hand to a dozen widely different arts and trades, is probably working a rich vein of personal recollection for many of his full-bodied people, with their intense national pride, in whom a fervent devotion to Queen Victoria as a symbol of the British Empire mingles strangely with a stubborn attachment to the spirit of old Owen Glendower: Wales for the Welsh, and to hell with the English and their heartless money-grubbing, and with all renegade Welshmen who shame their ancestors by aping English manners and trying to import the English tongue. Like all Celtic peoples, they love singing and a good fight, either physical or moral; and their quickness to avenge their honor with their fists is

Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America

"That's my Union!"

250,000 organized clothing workers are proud of the union that has banished the sweatshop from the men's clothing industry.

The nation's clothing workers deserve your support in their fight to keep the sweatshop out of America. You can do your part by demanding that every article of men's clothing you purchase bears the union label of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America—your guarantee of clothing manufactured under fair labor standards, by skilled union craftsmen.

DEMAND THE AMALGAMATED LABEL ON ALL MEN'S CLOTHING

Outstanding Books for THE NATION's Readers:

LOOK AT THE LAW

By Percival E. Jackson. This book makes fascinating reading—but more important than that, it will be read by intelligent people for their own protection. It clearly shows the layman where he stands in relation to lawyers, the law and the courts, and examines the law in relation to democracy. ($2.75)

INSIDE GERMANY

By Albert C. Grzesinski. Hundreds of questions bearing on today's happenings . . . what led up to them and what the outcome may be . . . answered (not by a reporter, or commentator, but—) by a man who was there, when it happened, as CHIEF OF THE GERMAN SECRET POLICE—who tells the whole story from the inside. ($3)

$1.49 EDITION OF VAN WYCK BROOKS'

The Flowering of New England

"One of the most exciting and notable literary achievements of our time." Available in this limited edition for a short time only; will then return to its original price of $4.00.

I CONFESS

By Benjamin Gitlow. "Personal and political history of American Communism—indispensable to the student of politics—a fascinating story for anyone."—N. Y. Tribune. ($3.75)

FINLAND—Land of Heroes

By Toivio Rosvall The epic saga of the most miraculous rise of the Finns. Out of century-long struggles they built a free state, combining the best of modern civilization with tradition. (Illustrated, $2.50)

Twentieth Century WARFARE

By Lowell M. Limpus. The only book of its kind—authoritative, easy to understand. Intended primarily for "arm chair strategists"—valuable to all students of military science. Explains the rules, tactics, strategies, the most advanced theories, methods and weapons, of modern armies in action. An invaluable reference book. ($1.75)

MARY WEBB ANTHOLOGY

Selected and Edited by H. B. L. Webb. Illustrated by Rowland Hilder and Norman Hepple. A truly important literary event is the publication of this beautiful anthology compiled from this beloved genius' published and unpublished works by her husband. ($3)

COMING—Our Big Novels of the Spring:

TITANIC by Robert Precht! . . . and TREES OF HEAVEN by Jesse Stuart. The coming non-fiction sensation: THE PEOPLE TALK by Benjamin Appel (—"One of the most powerful and brilliant writers of today."—N. Y. Tribune.)

★ Complete descriptions of all our Spring Books will be found in the new Spring Catalogue—now ready. A copy will be sent to you upon request.

E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY
300 Fourth Ave. New York, N. Y.

Nearly a Century in Publishing counterpoised by the purely aesthetic rivalry that culminates in the Eisteddfod.

Portrayal of national qualities and social changes, however, is only incidental to the extremely personal, subjective study of Huw Morgan's impassioned youth. A two-year period of invalid helplessness follows the fearful night in which his mother outfaced a mob of irate miners and he rescued her from a blizzard. A strong constitution and the adamant spirit of the Reverend Mr. Grufydd finally put him back on his feet; he attends the National School, runs afoul of his Welsh-English teacher, goes to work in the mines, sees his father killed by a cave-in. It is not an exciting life, not even a particularly happy one, except when measured in terms of what Huw remembers. How green the valley, indeed, when even in his childhood the slag heap beside the mine disfigured the hillside, and by the time he was a man this ugly mountain of refuse threatened to engulf the very cottages of the miners. But through the inverted telescope of thirty years those blots look like flyspecks on a windowpane, and all that matters is the "lost lane-end into heaven, a stone, a leaf, an unfound door."

Without sugar-coating any part of the life it depicts, "How Green Was My Valley" leaves a good taste in the mouth. It is a poetic novel from beginning to end.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

DRAMA

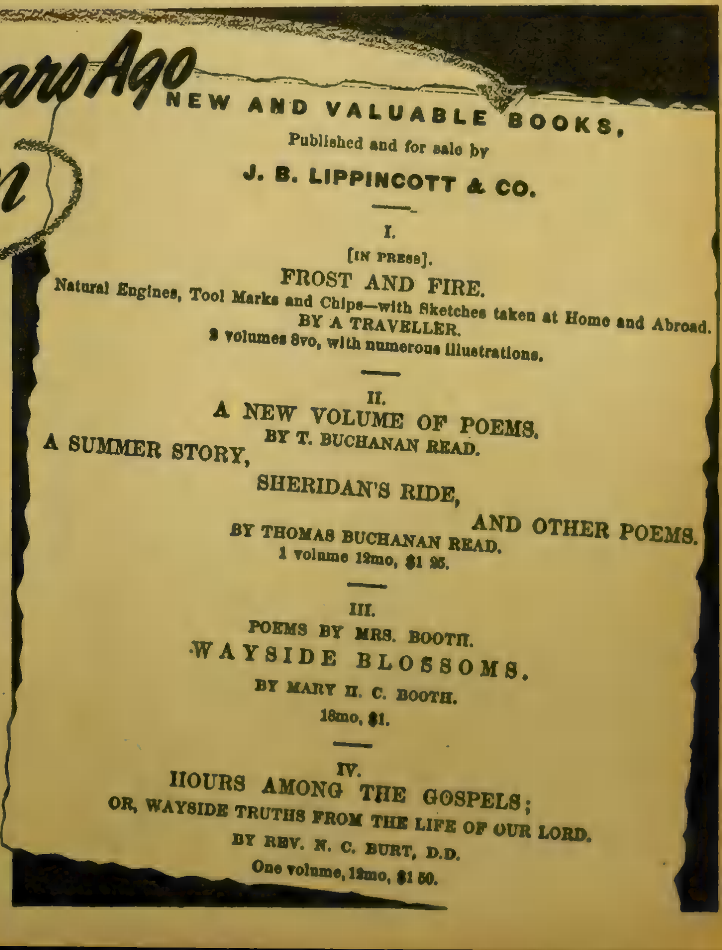
How I Stand It

I HAVE been reviewing plays for The Nation since 1924. My friends and acquaintances are, I find, divided into two classes, those who envy me the steady stream of free tickets and those who exclaim frankly, "How on earth do you stand it?" The latter are very frequently reviewers of books, and they plainly imply a certain condescension. For once I am going to assume that the question is not purely rhetorical and answer it. The first play I reviewed for The Nation was "What Price Glory?" by the Messrs. Anderson and Stallings; the most recent was "Two on an Island," by Elmer Rice. Neither of these seemed to me particularly hard to stand, and I am, as I might as well confess, not one of those who take it for granted that the drama of the last fifteen years has plainly operated on an artistic level lower than that of contemporary literature as a whole.

I saw my first play, a rural melodrama entitled "Si Plunket," at the age of five, and I have been going to the theater pretty continuously and pretty frequently ever since. That does not mean, however, that I am in the slightest degree what is called "stage-struck." I am not, that is to say, susceptible to what is referred to as the "glamour" of the theater. The profession of playwright or of actor does not seem to me any more romantic than the other artistic professions. In fact, temperament, grease paint, and dressing-rooms tend to bore me, and I find the actor or actress who trades on his aura tiresome rather than thrilling on the stage. Only recently I was rebuked in print for not sufficiently sharing the excitement which many find in bad plays when they create considerable public enthusiasm, but I am no more ashamed of not liking a bad play than I am of not liking a bad best-seller. I admire plays for their literary quality, and productions for their success in creating an artistic effect not obtainable in any other way. This does not mean that I like only the grave or the portentous. Comedy seems to me one of the most admirable of all the inventions of the human spirit, and in general I enjoy what Charles Lamb calls "the cheerful uses of the playhouse," which certainly include the provision of farces and musical extravaganzas. It does mean, however, that I see no reason why some special kind of allowance must be made for some sort of tawdriness or flimsiness assumed to be almost inseparable from the theater. What is more important, it means also that I am not aware that the failure to make such an allowance has made fifteen years of professional playgoing hard to bear.

That the American drama, considered as a literary form, hardly existed before the twentieth century is no doubt in part due to the fact that until comparatively recently convention required on the stage both a moral and an intellectual timidity from which the novel had escaped. But many of those who are willing to admit that this condition no longer exists and even that the contemporary drama has indubitably become an important part of contemporary literature, nevertheless, continue to feel that the dramatic form involves limitations which, on the whole, work against the dramatist and encourage flimsiness or triviality. Now it so happens that I have during the last three years had occasion to make for myself a sort of survey of the thirty or forty most recommended novels of the season, and with all due respect to those to whom the opinion will seem monstrous, I have found them artistically less impressive than the plays of the same season. There are always, to be sure, a certain number of works of fiction, so called, which are discursively topical in a way that plays seldom are or can be. But whatever value this kind of writing may have, it is not an artistic one, and a large number of the "novels" are actually historical, biographical, or sociological discourses put into pseudo-fictional form, not because that form renders them intrinsically more effective, but only because a lazy reading public likes to take its history or its sociology childishly disguised by the formula "once upon a time."

It is a vulgar error to suppose that the more nearly formless a literary form is and the fewer restraints it puts upon a writer the more favorable it is to important literary expression. The novel as currently written is so often nearly without form as to permit its author a casualness in dealing with his material fatal to any genuinely artistic effect, and it is apparently possible for a publishable novel to be written by a person who gives no sign of recognizable literary gifts of any kind. No play is, on the other hand, even producible unless the author is master at least of a certain minimum skill in the more mechanical aspects of craftsmanship, and for that reason it is very rare to see a play which is, in this elementary sense, as badly written as a good half of published novels, many of which might just as effectively begin somewhere else, end somewhere else, and be developed



Seventy-Five Years Ago in THE Nation

WHEN the very first issue of The Nation was published away back in July, 1865, the J. B. Lippincott Company advertisement at the right was in its columns. Since that distant day the J. B. Lippincott Company has frequently brought its new books to the attention of The Nation readers.

Now, as in years gone by, Lippincott books are prized in thousands of American homes. Among those recently published which are of particular interest and importance to readers of The Nation are KITTY FOYLE by Christopher Morley; GRANDFATHER WAS QUEER by Richardson Wright; AMERICAN EARTH by Carleton Beals; BODY, BOOTS AND BRITCHES by Harold W. Thompson; and the great Belgian war novel, JEAN CLARAMBAUX by Jean Tousseul. Ask to see them at any bookstore.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY
Founded 1792
Washington Square, Philadelphia

NEW AND VALUABLE BOOKS,
Published and for sale by
J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

I.
[IN PRESS].
FROST AND FIRE.
Natural Engines, Tool Marks and Chips—with Sketches taken at Home and Abroad.
BY A TRAVELLER.
2 volumes 8vo, with numerous illustrations.

II.
A NEW VOLUME OF POEMS.
BY T. BUCHANAN READ.
A SUMMER STORY,
SHERIDAN'S RIDE,
AND OTHER POEMS.
BY THOMAS BUCHANAN READ.
1 volume 12mo, $1 25.

III.
POEMS BY MRS. BOOTH.
WAYSIDE BLOSSOMS.
BY MARY H. C. BOOTH.
18mo, $1.

IV.
HOURS AMONG THE GOSPELS;
OR, WAYSIDE TRUTHS FROM THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.
BY REV. N. C. BURT, D.D.
One volume, 12mo, $1 50.

through a totally different course of incidents. Nor do I see any evidence that the author who can rise above the merely mechanical elements of craftsmanship usually finds in the relatively rigid requirements of the dramatic form any difficulties the mastering of which does not contribute to, rather than detract from, the final artistic effectiveness of his work. The limitation of length necessitates careful selection and condensations; the necessity for climaxes necessitates the bringing of his conceptions to a focus; and there comes a moment when the intended effect must be produced without the fumbling of which the majority of novelists, obviously themselves often uncertain in what scene, if any, their prime intention is fully revealed, are very commonly guilty.

I am not trying to argue that all novels would be better as plays. I am not raising the question whether the greatest play is better than the best novel. In the really supreme works of fiction the author handles an enormously complex and relatively free form with a mastery of which the elements are less easy to analyze than are those of the drama. But in the hands of the casual practitioner the form of the novel is not a form at all, and the "importance" found in a large number of current novels is an importance inherent only in a subject matter which, in many cases, could be more effectively presented as treatise or discussion. I stand current plays very well; I stand them better than I could stand an equal number of current novels, for the simple reason that I find in them more art. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

A COMMENTATOR on the musical scene—on the music, and on the ideas, the activities, the institutions which music brings into existence—is, I pointed out a while ago, bound to concern himself with other men's comment, since this is itself a part of the scene and a part that in considerable degree determines the rest. Criticism is one of the things that have interested me as a critic; it is the thing I am interested in as I look back on the eighteen years in which, at intervals, I have written for The Nation.

The critic has important functions: as a mere reporter, an appraiser of the particular musical event, he has the duty to give his reader not only an honest judgment but the basis of this judgment, the ideas about music and performance which will add up in the reader's mind to musical understanding, to a basis for his own judgment; the particular event gives the critic the occasion to consider the actual working of this organization or that institution in the light of what would be desirable; and events that determine the working of an institution, its structure, its very existence, are occasions for the critic to speak not only to his readers but for them. How, in those eighteen years, were these functions performed by the critics of important New York newspapers? Badly, I would say, recalling Olin Downes on the Times, Deems Taylor and Samuel Chotzinoff on the World; and this placed an even greater responsibility on men with the equipment, the position of W. J. Henderson of the Sun and Lawrence Gilman of the Tribune.

Henderson's competence, honesty, and vigor made him the only first-line critic one could read with respect. Yet Walter Damrosch's career led him to conclude that "a sound musician, who is also a man of energy, generous impulses, and broad outlook, can get well up toward the mountain tops without blowing his alp-horn every moment"—an appraisal which lent force to Shaw's contention that a critic should know no man, that "his hand should be against every man, and every man's hand against his." It is an appraisal, moreover, which I draw attention to because it was this sort of treatment, most of it less honest than Henderson's, that enabled Damrosch to do the damage he did.

Henderson not only was uncritical of a friend; he was, in his last years, a little crotchety. Irritated by the commotion over virtuoso conductors he insisted that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the music of Beethoven and Brahms would remain even without Toscanini and even with a conductor of lesser magnitude, though he must have known that orchestra and music would sound different under such a conductor; he cited the excellence which the Boston Symphony had achieved under a single permanent conductor as a reason for the New York Philharmonic to do likewise, though he must have known that the Boston orchestra owed its excellence at least as much to the competence as to the permanence of its conductors. Writing in this way Henderson not only gave his readers incorrect ideas on conductors and orchestral performance but placed powerful arguments in the hands of the people who finally brought about the engagement of Barbirolli as single permanent conductor of the New York Philharmonic, which considerably reduced the orchestra's usefulness to the community.

More reprehensible, however, was Gilman's contribution to the same result. Henderson lived to hear the orchestra and Beethoven and Brahms as they sounded when conducted by Barbirolli, and disapproved. But Gilman, after Barbirolli's first appearance, wrote of a performance of Brahms's Fourth which had torn passion to tatters that it had "set the seal of musical piety and eloquence upon Mr. Barbirolli's gifts as an interpreter"; the modest virtues of some other performances elicited the statement that "the whole magnificent orchestra, strings and wind alike, sang with a clarity and depth and lusciousness of tone, an imaginative choiceness of phrasing and of style"; and Barbirolli himself was elevated into "something better and rarer and finer than a conductor of power and sensibility. He permits us to think that he is akin to those uncommon interpreters who give us a measure of 'that inner standard of distinction, selection, refusal' which an incorruptible artist once defined: who have sifted from experience 'all that seemed beautiful and significant, and have treasured above all things those savings of fine gold.' " With this review Gilman was a great help to the influential people of the Philharmonic Symphony Society who were out to put Barbirolli over—the help, perhaps, that an orchestra's program annotator should be; but he failed in his obligations to his position as critic, to his readers, to the community whose orchestra the Philharmonic was.

He failed in these obligations, though he helped the people on the Metropolitan board, when in 1932 he wrote of the low quality of the Metropolitan's repertory as something imposed on an unsubsidized company by the low taste of the opera-going public to which it had to cater, and saluted Gatti-Casazza for his "dauntless action" in giving "Elektra," his "truly heroic idealism" with "Pelléas." For the truth, which Gilman knew, was that after the courageous Hammerstein had given these two works in 1907, the timid Gatti had waited until 1925 for "Pelléas" and 1932 for "Elektra," and that only his low taste and complacency had been responsible for the low level of repertory and performances even in the prosperous years when the opera-going public had eaten out of the Metropolitan's hand. And there were other such failures.

But it was not only when he spoke that Gilman failed; as often the failure was in his silence. The ideas with which Taylor, Chotzinoff, and Downes filled the heads of their readers demanded critical consideration no less than the sounds made by conductors and violinists; but Gilman observed the code of music critics that I described recently: he never mentioned a fellow-critic except to pay him a compliment. In all the years that Chotzinoff blew his penny trumpet on the World his performances did not draw a word of comment from Gilman; only when Chotzinoff published "Eroica" did Gilman break his silence, and then only to describe Chotzinoff as a critic with a "quick and warm responsiveness," a "guarding sense of measure and restraint," a style that was "spare, expressive, precise." Nor did Gilman find it necessary to comment on Downes until Downes published the talks he had given in the intermissions of the New York Philharmonic broadcasts. Then, referring to "the largely pretentious and semi-literate gush, rich in ignorance and error," with which Downes's predecessor had disfigured the broadcasts, Gilman quoted a passage by Downes: "In his scores he [Tschaikovsky] cries out, shakes his fist at the skies, remembers the agony of thwarted love, and the end of every man's desire. Admire such a man, such a neurotic, such a pessimist? I adore him, and rate him a thousand times higher than aesthetes who have never known Tschaikovsky's weakness and terror, who shudder at such emotional indecencies, and pull their skirts together at the sound of them." And of this Gilman wrote: "This is the right note, admirably skilful in its manner of insinuating information, yet never relapsing . . . from the plane of thought and feeling appropriate to a great subject."

Moreover, it was, as Gilman said, important that radio listeners who were hearing symphonic music for the first time be assisted with correct information and discriminating comment; yet this was the first time that he referred to the gush and ignorance with which Downes's predecessor had misled them for several years. The obligation of the music critic to concern himself with the broadcasting and recording of music, Gilman observed correctly on another occasion, was inescapable; yet he evaded it: he did not write a word about the program policies of the broadcasting stations, the rubbish that was spoken with the music, and he did not review records; nor, as a result, did anyone else review them in the Herald Tribune until quite recently.

Evidently, in the criticism of the past eighteen years there is little to recall with pleasure or respect.

B. H. HAGGIN

NEW BOOKS that Point the Way to America's Economic Rehabilitation

ECONOMIC BALANCE and A BALANCED BUDGET

The Public Papers of MARRINER S. ECCLES

Publication of this rounded, systematic statement of the fiscal views of the Governor of The Federal Reserve System is a public event of first importance. Here for the first time this key policy-maker in the field of national finance brings together his considered and timely views on budget balancing, "pump priming," inflation, etc. Edited by Rudolph L. Weissman, this work gives every citizen a close-up and total view of Mr. Eccles' financial philosophy. $3.00

TRAILS TO THE NEW AMERICA

By JOHN W. HERRING

Among all the contradictory proposals on "trails" to a prosperous America, which one offers the greatest help and hope? A leader in the adult education field addresses himself simply and readably to a discussion of new "trails"—which everyone can understand and be guided by—in the universal search for ways toward distributive justice. $2.00

WHO GETS THE MONEY?

By WALTER RAUTENSTRAUCH, LL.D.

A distinguished industrial engineer here treats the nation's economic life as a National Factory directed to carrying on the National Housekeeping. And he answers in a novel way the question—where does the money go which is supposed to run the Factory and pay for the maintenance of the nation's families? A drastic analysis recommended to those who dare to examine a bold thesis amply supported by revealing facts. $1.50

Get these books at your nearest bookstore. Or order them for five days' free examination direct from the publisher.

ORGANIZED LABOR AND PRODUCTION

By MORRIS L. COOKE and PHILIP MURRAY

At last a book that strikes the constructive note which everyone, including employers and labor union leaders, is anxious to hear sounded—a book to answer the question: How can we get cooperation between managers and workers to increase production and lower costs?

Here a management expert of national standing and a Vice President of the United Mine Workers collaborate on a volume that is essentially a call to action, a reasoned plea to subordinate conflicting interests to common objectives in the conduct of industry. Blows the fresh air of sanity and practical sense into the world of industrial conflict. $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS 49 East 33rd St., New York

These are Important!

Battle Against Time

by HEINRICH HAUSER

How long will Hitler last?

This book is an answer to the question which now engrosses the world. It is a survey of the Germany of 1939, made from inside Germany by a German who prefers the democratic philosophy of life to that of Nazi Germany. It is a full and honest exposition of the potential strength of Germany—spiritual, economic, military. $3.00

★

Men in Battle

by ALVAH BESSIE

"Out of his own experience as a soldier of the line Bessie has written a powerful story of the International Brigades in Spain. It is an honest picture of men in battle." The Nation. $2.50

★

The Second World War:

FIRST PHASE

by ALFRED DUFF COOPER

The events of the "war of nerves," from Munich to September 1, 1939, considered as they occurred by the former First Lord of the British Admiralty. $2.50

★

Under the British Umbrella

by HELEN P. KIRKPATRICK

Who the British are, and why they went to war. A penetrating, first-hand, informed study of the baffling British temperament and of British diplomatic leaders. $2.75

at all bookstores

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

A Day's Work

[Continued from page 207]

"Whatever it was," said Mrs. Halloran, "it stands instead of a dollar to me. So just drop it."

"You've got tomorrow's potatoes sewed up in your pocket this minute, and God knows what sums in that black box wherever you hide it, besides the life savings," said Mr. Halloran. "I earned this half-dollar on relief, and it's going to be spent properly. And I'll not be back for supper, so you'll save on that, too. So long, Lacey Mahaffy, I'm off."

"If you never come back, it will be all the same," said Mrs. Halloran, not looking up.

"If I came back with a pocket full of money, you'd be glad to see me," said Mr. Halloran.

"It would want to be a great sum," said Mrs. Halloran.

Mr. Halloran shut the door behind him with a fine slam.

He strolled out into the clear fall weather, a late afternoon sun warming his neck and brightening the old red-brick, high-stooped houses of Perry Street. He would go after all these years to Billy's Place, he might find some luck there. He took his time, though, speaking to the neighbors as he went. "Good afternoon, Mr. Halloran." "Good afternoon to you, Missis Caffery." . . . "It's fine weather for the time of year, Mr. Gogarty." "It is indeed, Mr. Halloran." Mr. Halloran thrived on these civilities, he loved to flourish his hat and give a hearty good day like a man who has nothing on his mind. Ah, there was the young man from the G. and I. store around the corner. He knew what kind of job Mr. Halloran once held there. "Good day, Mr. Halloran." "Good day to you, Mr. McInerny, how's business holding up with you?" "Good for the times, Mr. Halloran, that's the best I can say." "Things are not getting any better, Mr. McInerny." "It's the truth we are all hanging on by the teeth now, Mr. Halloran."

Soothed by this acknowledgment of man's common misfortune Mr. Halloran greeted the young cop at the corner. The cop, with his quick eyesight, was snatching a read from a newspaper on the stand across the sidewalk. "How do you do, Young O'Fallon," asked Mr. Halloran, "is your business lively these days?"

"Quiet as the tomb itself on this block," said Young O'Fallon. "But that's a sad thing about Connolly, now." His eyes motioned toward the newspaper.

"Is he dead?" asked Mr. Halloran; "I haven't been out until now, I didn't see the papers."

"Ah, not yet," said Young O'Fallon, "but the G-men are after him, it looks they'll get him surely this time."

"Connolly in bad with the G-men? Holy Jesus," said Mr. Halloran, "who will they go after next? The meddlers."

"It's that numbers racket," said the cop. "What's the harm, I'd like to know? A man must get his money from somewhere when he's in politics. They oughta give him a chance."

"Connolly's a great fellow, God bless him, I hope he gives them the slip," said Mr. Halloran, "I hope he goes right through their hands like a greased pig."

"He's smart," said the cop, "That Connolly's a smooth one. He'll come out of it."

Ah, will he though? Mr. Halloran asked himself. Who is safe if Connolly goes under? Wait till I give Lacey Mahaffy the news about Connolly, I'll like seeing her face the first time in twenty years. Lacey kept saying, "A man is a downright fool must be a crook to get rich. Plenty of the best people get rich and do no harm by it. Look at the Connollys now, good practical Catholics with nine children and more to come if God sends them, and Mass every day, and they're rolling in wealth richer than your McCorkery's with all their wickedness." So there you are, Lacey Mahaffy, wrong again, and welcome to your pious Connollys. Still and all it was Connolly who had given Gerald McCorkery his start in the world; McCorkery had been publicity man and then campaign manager for Connolly, in the days when Connolly had Tammany in the palm of his hand and the sky was the limit. And McCorkery had begun at the beginning, God knows. He was running a little basement place first, rent almost nothing, where the boys of the Connolly Club and the Little Tammany Association, just the mere fringe of the district, you might say, could drop in for quiet evenings for a game and a drink along with the talk. Nothing low, nothing but what was customary, with the house taking a cut on the winnings and a fine profit on the liquor, and holding the crowd together. Many was the big plan hatched there came out well for everybody. For everybody but myself, and why was that? And when McCorkery says to me, "You can take over now and run the place for the McCorkery Club," ah, there was my chance and Lacey Mahaffy wouldn't hear of it, and with Maggie coming on just then it wouldn't do to excite her.

Mr. Halloran went on, following his feet that knew the way to Billy's Place, head down, not speaking to passersby any more, but talking it out with himself again, again. What a track to go over seeing clearly one by one the crossroads where he might have taken a different turn that would have changed all his fortunes; but no, he had gone the other way and now it was too late. She wouldn't say a thing but "It's not right and you know it, Halloran," so what could a man do in all? Ah, you could have gone on with your rightful affairs like any other man, Halloran, it's not the woman's place to decide such things; she'd have come round once she saw the money, or a good whack on the backsides would have put her in her place. Never had mortal woman needed a good thrashing worse than Lacey Mahaffy, but he could never find it in his heart to give it to her for her own good. That was just another of your many mistakes, Halloran. But there was always the life-long job with the G. and I. and peace in the house more or less. Many a man envied me in those days I remember, and I was resting easy on the savings and knowing with that and the pension I could finish out my life with some little business of my own. "What came of that?" Mr. Halloran inquired in a low voice, looking around him. Nobody answered. You know well what came of it, Halloran. You were fired out like a delivery boy, two years before your time was out. Why did you sit there watching the trick being played on others before you, knowing well it could happen to you and never quite believing what you saw with your own eyes? G. and I. gave me my start, when I was green in this country, and they were my own kind or I thought so. Well, it's done now. Yes, it's done now, but there was all the years you could have cashed in on the numbers game with the best of them, helping collect the

4 NEW BOOKS

. . . that consider pressing social problems

Why has collective security failed, 1920-1939?

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY

By Eduard Benes, Rushton Coulborn, Arthur Feiler

Czechoslovakia's last President, now on the University of Chicago faculty; a noted British history professor, now at Atlanta University; and the former leading economic writer of the Frankfurter Zeitung, now at the new School for Social Research, here discuss the diplomatic maneuvers of contemporary history. Invaluable, authoritative information for students of world affairs. $2.00

How has world economics been affected by the Trade Agreements Acts of 1934?

THE PROTECTION OF AMERICAN EXPORT TRADE

By Francis B. Sayre

With the Trade Agreements of 1934 now before Congress for renewal, this book offers important factual data on international trade since 1934, against a historical background of protectionism. Before his recent appointment as Commissioner of the Philippines, the author was in charge of Secretary Hull's trade-agreement program. $1.50

What is the relationship between current ideas and the community, the legislatures and the courts?

SOCIAL CHANGE AND LABOR LAW

By Malcolm Sharp and Charles O. Gregory

Here is an illustration of those objectives with which President Hutchins reorganized the University of Chicago Law School to train lawyers in economics, philosophy, psychology and other social forces as well as in the law. Chicago Daily Law Bulletin says: . . . "these lectures constitute as clear and sound a presentation of the law and the facts in this highly controversial field as is to be found." $2.00

Romance—Adventure—Anecdote—The Horror of Crime—The Spell of Confession . . .

NEWS AND THE HUMAN INTEREST STORY

By Helen MacGill Hughes

Drawing on a rich store of human interest stories by such men as Lincoln Steffens and Theodore Dreiser, and sprinkling her narrative with the yarns that haunt all city desks, Mrs. Hughes analyzes this popular "art" and its appeal to the masses. She traces the evolution of the newspaper under such men as Dana, Bennett and Pulitzer, Hearst and Macfadden. $3.00

The UNIVERSITY of CHICAGO PRESS

protection money and taking your cut. You could have had a fortune by now in Lacey's name, safe in the bank. It was good quiet profit and none the wiser. But they're wiser now, Halloran, don't forget; still it's a lump of grief and disappointment to swallow all the same. The game's up with Connolly, maybe; Lacey Mahaffy had said, "Numbers is just another way of stealing from the poor, and you weren't born to be a thief like that McCorkery." Ah God no, Halloran, you were born to rot on relief and maybe that's honest enough for her. That Lacey— A fortune in her name would have been no good to me whatever. She's got all the savings tied up, such as they are, she'll pinch and she'll starve, she'll wash dirty clothes first, she won't give up a penny to live on. She has stood in my way, McCorkery, like a skeleton rattling its bones, and you were right about her, she has been my ruin. "Ah, it's not too late yet, Halloran," said McCorkery, appearing plain as day inside Mr. Halloran's head with the same old face and way with him, "Never say die, Halloran. Elections are coming on again, it's a busy time for all, there's work to be done and you're the very man I'm looking for. Why didn't you come to me sooner, you know I never forget an old friend. You don't deserve your ill fortune, Halloran," McCorkery told him; "I said so to others and I say it now to your face, never did man deserve more of the world than you, Halloran, but the truth is, there's not always enough good luck to go round; but it's your turn now, and I've got a job for you up to your abilities at last. For a man like you, there's nothing to it at all, you can toss it off with one hand tied, Halloran, and good money in it. Organization work, just among your own neighbors, where you're known and respected for a man of your word and an old friend of Gerald McCorkery. Now look, Halloran," said Gerald McCorkery, tipping him the wink, "do I need to say more? It's voters in large numbers we're after, Halloran, and you're to bring them in, alive or dead. Keep your eye on the situation at all times and get in touch with me when necessary. And name your figure in the way of money. And come up to the house sometimes, Halloran, why don't you? Rosie has asked me a hundred times, 'Whatever went with Halloran, the life of the party?' That's the way you stand with Rosie, Halloran. We're in a two-story flat now with green velvet curtains and carpets you can sink to your shoetops in, and there's no reason at all why you shouldn't have the same kind of place if you want it. With your gifts, you were never meant to be a poor man."

Ah, but Lacey Mahaffy wouldn't have it, maybe. "Then get yourself another sort of woman, Halloran, you're a good man still, find yourself a woman like Rosie to snuggle down with at night." Yes, but McCorkery, you forget that Lacey Mahaffy had legs and hair and eyes and a complexion fit for a chorus girl. But would she do anything with them? Never. Would you believe there was a woman wouldn't take off all her clothes at once even to bathe herself? What a hateful thing she was with her evil mind thinking everything was a sin, and never giving a man a chance to show himself a man in any way. But she's faded away now, her mean soul shows out all over her, she's ugly as sin itself now, McCorkery. "It's what I told you would happen," said McCorkery, "but now with the job and the money you can go your ways and let Lacey Mahaffy go hers." I'll do it, McCorkery.

BORZOI BOOKS

Recent Borzoi Books
Selected for NATION Readers from the 25th Anniversary List of Alfred A. Knopf

Verdun

By JULES ROMAINS

"A masterpiece in its own right."—New York Times Book Review. A true and enthralling picture of the French nation during one of the great moments of history, Verdun is one of the very few novels of this year, or any year, which you cannot afford to miss. 522 pages. $2.50

HAPPY DAYS

By H. L. MENCKEN Mencken tells the story of his boyhood in Baltimore, and "the words of joy pour out of him with a walloping exuberance which no American since Mark Twain has matched."—LEWIS GANNETT, New York Herald Tribune. $2.75

PORTRAIT OF JENNIE

By ROBERT NATHAN This heart-warming and delicate love-story of a gifted artist and the girl he met in the misty twilight of Central Park "lingers in the memory like an afterglow."—WILLIAM LYON PHELPS. $2.00

SUFFERANCE IS THE BADGE

By ABRAM LEON SACHAR The history of the Jews since Versailles—not only in Europe, but in all countries of the world. Complete, authoritative, readable; "tremendous in its concentrated strength."—New York Times Book Review. 585 pages, with bibliography and index. $3.50

THE SCRAPBOOK OF KATHERINE MANSFIELD

Edited by J. MIDDLETON MURRY Unpublished stories, poems, journal entries, sketches, and critical comments. Most of the stories and poems are complete. $2.50

THE ECONOMIC LIFE OF PRIMITIVE PEOPLES

By MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS This trail-blazing study of the way primitive men make a living opens up surprising new vistas in both anthropology and economics. 480 pages, with bibliography and index. $4.50

OUR MILITARY CHAOS

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD Tells why we are pouring billions into armaments that will never be used for defense purposes. An important, timely book. $1.75

ALFRED · A · KNOPF · NEW YORK

"And forget about Connolly. Just remember I'm my own man and always was. Connolly's finished, but I'm not. Stronger than ever, Halloran, with Connolly out of the way. I saw this coming long ever ago, Halloran, I got clear of it. They don't catch McCorkery with his pants down, Halloran. And I almost forgot . . . Here's something for the running expenses to start. Take this for the present, and there's more to come. . . ."

Mr. Halloran stopped short, a familiar smell floated under his nose; the warm beer-and-beefsteak smell of Billy's Place, sawdust and onions, like any other bar maybe, but with something of its own besides. The talk within him stopped also as if a hand had been laid on his mind. He drew his fist out of his pocket almost expecting to find green money in it. The half dollar was in his palm. "I'll stay while it lasts and hope McCorkery will come in."

The moment he stepped inside his eye lighted on McCorkery standing at the bar pouring his own drink from the bottle before him. Billy was mopping the bar before him idly, and his eye, swimming toward Halloran, looked like an oyster in its own juice. McCorkery saw him too. "Well blow me down," he said, in a voice that had almost lost its old County Mayo ring, "if it ain't my old sidekick from the G. and I. Step right up, Halloran," he said, his poker-face as good as ever, no man ever saw Gerald McCorkery surprised at anything. "Step up and name your choice."

Mr. Halloran glowed suddenly with the warmth around the heart he always had at the sight of McCorkery, he couldn't put a name on it, but there was something about the man. Ah, it was Gerald all right, the same, who never forgot a friend and never seemed to care whether a man was rich or poor, with his face of granite and his eyes like blue agates in his head, a rock of a man surely. There he was, saying "Step right up," as if they had parted only yesterday; portly and solid in his expensive-looking clothes, as always; his hat a darker gray than his suit, with a devil-may-care roll to the brim, but nothing sporting, mind you. All first-rate, well made, and the right thing for him, more power to him. Mr. Halloran said, "Ah, McCorkery, you're the one man on this round earth I hoped to see today, but I says to myself, maybe he doesn't come round to Billy's Place so much nowadays."

"And why not?" asked McCorkery, "I've been coming around to Billy's Place for twenty-five years now, it's still headquarters for the old guard of the McCorkery Club, Halloran." He took in Mr. Halloran from head to foot in a flash of a glance and turned toward the bottle.

"I was going to have a beer," said Mr. Halloran, "but the smell of that whiskey changes my mind for me." McCorkery poured a second glass, they lifted the drinks with an identical crook of the elbow, a flick of the wrist at each other.

"Here's to crime," said McCorkery, and "Here's looking at you," said Mr. Halloran, merrily. Ah, to hell with it, he was back where he belonged, in good company. He put his foot on the rail and snapped down his whiskey, and no sooner was his glass on the bar than McCorkery was filling it again. "Just time for a few quick ones," he said, "before the boys get here." Mr. Halloran downed that one, too, before he noticed that McCorkery hadn't filled his own glass. "I'm ahead of you," said McCorkery, "I'll skip this one."

DEMOCRACY'S
FIRST LINE OF DEFENSE Against Economic Illiteracy, Social
Nostrums, and Propagandas

PUBLIC AFFAIRS PAMPHLETS

Edited by Maxwell S. Stewart

10c Each

EACH PAMPHLET contains a clear, brief, dependable presentation of the WHYS and WHEREFORES of a current social or economic problem from Taxes to Loan Sharks. This authoritative line-up of FACTS cuts through the fog of self-interested propaganda—supplies a firm base for opinion and constructive action. Write now for complete list of pamphlets and subscription rates.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, INC.
Dept. N, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York

ETERNAL VIGILANCE IS THE PRICE OF LIBERTY

In the present
"National Emergency"

The American Civil Liberties Union must enlist increased forces to maintain and extend freedom of speech and the press

Urgent among the tasks are these
CAMPAIGNS IN CONGRESS

- Defeat of a series of anti-alien and sedition bills, some of which have already passed one or the other House.
- Fight against the abuse of its powers by the Dies Committee.
- Support of legislation to outlaw industrial espionage . . . to provide for greater freedom on the air . . . to curb the use of militia in strikes . . . to prohibit private armies . . . to curb the Post Office censorship.

"The Civil Liberties Union is always on the job."—N. Y. Times.

INVEST NOW IN THE A. C. L. U.

AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION
31 Union Square West, New York City

☐ My contribution, $............ is enclosed.
☐ Send me literature on the alien and sedition bills.
☐ I would like to become a member of the Union.

Name..
Address...
City..

LINGUAPHONE TEACHES YOU A NEW LANGUAGE FASTER

This amazing new conversational method enables you, in your own home, to speak and read French, Spanish, Russian—or any of 27 languages—quickly, easily, correctly.

Linguaphone gives you not a mere smattering but a compact 3,000-word vocabulary of the living language, with correct sentence structure and perfect native accent. No previous knowledge of the language is necessary.

The Linguaphone Method was originated by 150 of the world's famous linguists of The Sorbonne, Oxford, Columbia, Madrid, Heidelberg and other universities who made it the modern, natural method for learning a language.

Thousands of men and women in all walks of life are today being helped by Linguaphone Sets to achieve their desire for the great advantages of another language.

Send for FREE Book

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 R. C. A. Building New York City

THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA PRESS

on the 200th Anniversary of the founding of the University

1740 1940

LEGES SINE MORIBUS VANAE

Salutes

THE NATION

on its 75th Birthday

There was a short pause, a silence fell around them that seemed to ooze like a fog from somewhere deep in McCorkery, it was suddenly as if he had not really been there at all, or hadn't uttered a word. Then he said outright: "Well, Halloran, let's have it. What's on your mind?" And he poured two more drinks. That was McCorkery all over, reading your thoughts and coming straight to the point.

Mr. Halloran closed his hand round his glass and peered into the little pool of whiskey. "Maybe we could sit down," he said, feeling weak-kneed all at once. McCorkery took the bottle and moved over to the nearest table. He sat facing the door, his look straying there now and then, but he had a set, listening face as if he was ready to hear anything.

"You know what I've had at home all these years," began Mr. Halloran, solemnly, and paused.

"Oh God yes," said McCorkery with simple good-fellowship, "How is herself these days?"

"Worse than ever," said Mr. Halloran, "but that's not it."

"What is it, then, Halloran?" asked McCorkery, pouring drinks. "You know well you can speak out your mind to me. Is it a loan?"

"No," said Mr. Halloran, "It's a job."

"Now that's a different matter," said McCorkery, "What kind of a job?"

Mr. Halloran, his head sunk between his shoulders, saw McCorkery wave a hand and nod at half a dozen men who came in and ranged themselves along the bar. "Some of the boys," said McCorkery, "Go on. " His face was tougher, and quieter, as if the drink gave him a firm hold on himself. Mr. Halloran said what he had planned to say, had said already on the way down, and it still sounded reasonable and right to him. McCorkery waited until he had finished, and got up, putting a hand on Mr. Halloran's shoulder. "Stay where you are, and help yourself," he said, giving the bottle a little push, "and anything else you want, Halloran, order it on me. I'll be back in a few minutes, and you know I'll help you out if I can."

Halloran understood everything but it was through a soft warm fog, and he hardly noticed when McCorkery passed him again with the men, all in that creepy quiet way like footpads on a dark street. They went into the back room, the door opened on a bright light and closed again, and Mr. Halloran reached for the bottle to help himself wait until McCorkery should come again bringing the good word. He felt comfortable and good as if he hadn't a bone or muscle in him, but his elbow slipped off the table once or twice and he upset his drink on his sleeve. Ah, God, McCorkery, is it the whole family you're taking on with the jobs? For my Maggie's husband is in now with the Little Tammany Association. "There's a bright lad will go far and I've got my eye on him, Halloran," said the friendly voice of McCorkery in his mind, and the brown face, softer than he remembered it, came up clearly behind his closed eyes.

"Ah, well, it's like myself beginning all over again in him," said Mr. Halloran, aloud, "besides my own job that I might have had all this time if I'd just come to see you sooner."

"True for you," said McCorkery in a merry County Mayo voice, inside Mr. Halloran's head, "and now let's drink to the gay future for old times' sake and be damned to Lacey

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Mahaffy." Mr. Halloran reached for the bottle but it skipped sideways, rolled out of reach like a creature, and exploded at his feet. When he stood up the chair fell backward from under him. He leaned on the table and it folded up under his hands like cardboard.

"Wait now, take it easy," said McCorkery, and there he was, real enough, holding Mr. Halloran braced on the one side, motioning with his hand to the boys in the back room, who came out quietly and took hold of Mr. Halloran, some of them, on the other side. Their faces were all Irish, but not an Irishman Mr. Halloran knew in the lot, and he did not like any face he saw. "Let me be," he said with dignity, "I came here to see Gerald J. McCorkery, a friend of mine from old times, and let not a thug among you lay a finger upon me."

"Come on, Big Shot," said one of the younger men, in a voice like a file grating, "come on now, it's time to go."

"That's a fine low lot you've picked to run with, McCorkery," said Mr. Halloran, bracing his heels against the slow weight they put upon him toward the door, "I wouldn't trust one of them far as I could throw him by the tail."

"All right, all right, Halloran," said McCorkery. "Come on with me. Lay off him, Finnegan." He was leaning over Mr. Halloran and pressing something into his right hand. It was money, a neat little roll of it, good smooth thick money, no other feel like it in the world, you couldn't mistake it. Ah, he'd have an argument to show Lacey Mahaffy would knock her off her feet. Honest money with a job to back it up. "You'll stand by your given word, McCorkery, as ever?" he asked, peering into the rock-colored face above him, his feet weaving a dance under him, his heart ready to break with gratitude.

"Ah, sure, sure," said McCorkery in a loud hearty voice with a kind of curse in it, "Crisakes, get on with him, do." Mr. Halloran found himself eased into a taxicab at the curb, with McCorkery speaking to the driver and giving him money. "So long, Big Shot," said one of the thug faces, and the taxicab door thumped to. Mr. Halloran bobbed about on the seat for a while, trying to think. He leaned forward and spoke to the driver. "Take me to my friend Gerald J. McCorkery's house," he said, "I've got important business. Don't pay any attention to what he said. Take me to his house."

"Yeah?" said the driver, without turning his head, "Well, here's where you get out, see? Right here." He reached back and opened the door. And sure enough, Mr. Halloran was standing on the sidewalk in front of the flat in Perry Street, alone except for the rows of garbage cans, the taxicab hooting its way around the corner, and a cop coming toward him, plainly to be seen under the street light.

"You should cast your vote for McCorkery, the poor man's friend," Mr. Halloran told the cop, "McCorkery's the man who will get us all off the spot. Stands by his old friends like a maniac. Got a wife named Rosie. Vote for McCorkery," said Mr. Halloran, working hard at his job, "and you'll be Chief of the Force when Halloran says the word."

"To hell with McCorkery, that stooge," said the cop, his mouth square and sour with the things he said and the things he saw and did every night on that beat. "There you are drunk again, Halloran, shame to you, with Lacey

HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.H

You will enjoy

Mark Van Doren's

SHAKESPEARE

An interpretation of all the plays and poems, by one of America's great men of letters—a former literary editor of THE NATION

"Putting behind him all the apparatus of scholarship which dominates so many books about the man of Avon; he succeeds miraculously in discovering Shakespeare."
—Lewis Gannett, N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE.

3rd EDITION $3.00, Henry Holt and Company

HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT.HOLT

WITHIN GERMANY

By Oswald Garrison Villard

Upon the attitude of the German people toward the war the future of the world depends. Mr. Villard writes as the only American journalist to have been in both Germany and England since the opening of hostilities, and in this rewarding book he gives his authoritative findings on the feeling of the Germans toward the war, their attitude on the Russo-German alliance, on the treatment of the Jews, on the threatened Spring offensive, and on other momentous questions of the day. 2nd Large Printing. $1.00

NOTE: The first Appleton advertisement in The Nation was in the first issue seventy-five years ago.

D. APPLETON-CENTURY COMPANY, 35 W. 32nd St., N. Y.

Free Pamphlet for You

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

The Most Precious Economic Force in Civilization—A New Approach to Georgism, Dealing with Marxist Objections

By LOUIS WALLIS

Georgism, approached from the practical standpoint, relates to the liberation of private business enterprise from feudalistic restraints embedded in the legal structure which we inherit from the middle ages. Georgism plants itself squarely athwart the socialist-communist assumption that, by the very nature of the case, private capital is oppressive and exploitive. Get this free pamphlet and learn the best way to fight all forms of Marxism and other movements aiming to obstruct free individual initiative. One copy free; extra copies, five cents. Print your name and address clearly on postal card, and mail to—Dept. A,

THE HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
30 East 29th Street New York City

WHITHER MANKIND?

Back to the dark ages? Or forward to the Socialist Commonwealth of Labor?

The Socialist Labor Party, which this year celebrates its Golden Jubilee, presents the answers to these questions. Events have proved the Socialist Labor Party correct on every major contention made in the fifty-year history of the Party. The answers are embodied in the literature of the Party, of which these titles are representative:

SOCIALIST RECONSTRUCTION OF SOCIETY by Daniel De Leon (64 pp.) 10c
REFORM OR REVOLUTION by Daniel De Leon (32 pp.) 10c
SOVIET RUSSIA: PROMISE OR MENACE? by Arnold Petersen (64 pp.) 10c
STALINIST CORRUPTION OF MARXISM by Arnold Petersen (128 pp.) 15c
COMMUNIST JESUITISM by Arnold Petersen (112 pp.) 15c
SOCIALISM: THE WORLD OF TOMORROW by Arnold Petersen (48 pp.) 5c
DOWN WITH WAR! Socialist Labor Party Manifesto (32 pp.) 5c
CRISES IN EUROPEAN HISTORY by Dr. Gustav Bang (56 pp.) 15c
JOHN L. LEWIS EXPOSED by Eric Hass (72 pp.) 10c
(paper covers)

Send for catalogue and free samples of our publications

NEW YORK LABOR NEWS COMPANY
Dept. J, 61 Cliff Street, New York, N. Y.
Publishers of Marxian Literature for fifty years

Mahaffy working her heart out over the washboard to buy your beer."

"It wasn't beer and she didn't buy it, mind you," said Mr. Halloran, "and what do you know about Lacey Mahaffy?"

"I knew her from old when I used to run errands for St. Veronica's Altar Society," said the cop, "and she was a great one, even then. Nothing good enough."

"It's the same now," said Mr. Halloran, almost sober for a moment.

"Well, go on up now and stay up till you're fit to be seen," said the cop, censoriously.

"You're Johnny Maginnis," said Mr. Halloran, "I know you now."

"You should know me by now," said the cop.

Mr. Halloran worked his way upstairs partly on his hands and knees, but once at his own door he stood up, gave a great blow on the panel with his fist, turned the knob and surged in like a wave after the door itself, holding out the money toward Mrs. Halloran, who had finished ironing and was at her mending.

She got up very slowly, her bony hand over her mouth, her eyes starting out at what she saw. "Ah, did you steal it?" she asked. "Did you kill somebody for that?" the words grated up from her throat in a dark whisper. Mr. Halloran glared back at her in fear.

"Suffering Saints, Lacey Mahaffy," he shouted until the whole houseful could hear him, "haven't ye any mind at all that you can't see your husband has had a turn of fortune and a job and times are changed from tonight? Stealing, is it? That's for your great friends the Connollys with their religion. Connolly steals, but Halloran is an honest man with a job in the McCorkery Club, and money in pocket."

"McCorkery, is it?" said Mrs. Halloran, loudly too. "Ah, so there's the whole family, young and old, wicked and innocent, taking their bread from McCorkery, at last. Well, it's no bread of mine, I'll earn my own as I have, you can keep your dirty money to yourself, Halloran, mind you I mean it."

"Great God, woman," moaned Mr. Halloran, and he tottered from the door to the table, to the ironing board, and stood there, ready to weep with rage, "Haven't you a soul even that you won't come along with your husband when he's riding to riches and glory on the Tiger's back itself, with everything for the taking and no questions asked?"

"Yes, I have a soul," cried Mrs. Halloran, clenching her fists, her hair flying, "Surely I have a soul and I'll save it yet in spite of you. . . ."

She was standing there before him in a kind of faded gingham winding sheet, with her dead hands upraised, her dead eyes blind but fixed upon him, her voice coming up hollow from the deep tomb, her throat thick with grave damp. The ghost of Lacey Mahaffy was threatening him, it came nearer, growing taller as it came, the face changing to a demon's face with a fixed glassy grin. "It's all that drink on an empty stomach," said the ghost, in a hoarse growl. Mr. Halloran fetched a yell of horror right out of his very boots, and seized the flatiron from the board. "Ah, God damn you, Lacey Mahaffy, you devil, keep away, keep away," he howled, but she advanced on air, grinning and growling. He raised the flatiron and hurled it without aiming, and the specter, whoever it was, whatever it was, sank and was gone. He did not look, but broke out of the room and was back on the sidewalk before he knew he had meant to go there. Maginnis came up at once. "Hey there now, Halloran," he said, "I mean business this time. You get back upstairs or I'll run you in. Come along now, I'll help you get there this time, and that's the last of it. On relief the way you are, and drinking your head off."

Mr. Halloran suddenly felt calm, collected; he would take Maginnis up and show him just what had happened. "I'm not on relief any more, and if you want any trouble, just call on my friend, McCorkery. He'll tell you who I am."

"McCorkery can't tell me anything about you I don't know already," said Maginnis. "Stand up there now." For Halloran wanted to go up again on his hands and knees.

"Let a man be," said Mr. Halloran, trying to sit on the cop's feet. "I killed Lacey Mahaffy at last, you'll be pleased to hear," he said, looking up into the cop's face, "It was high time and past. But I did not steal the money."

"Well, ain't that just too bad," said the cop, hauling him up under the arms. "Chees, why'n't you make a good job while you had the chance? Stand up now. Ah, hell with it, stand up or I'll sock you one."

Mr. Halloran said, "Well, you don't believe it so wait and see."

At that moment they both glanced upward and saw Mrs. Halloran coming downstairs. She was holding to the rail, and even in the speckled hall-light they could see a great lumpy clout of flesh standing out on her forehead, all colors. She stopped, and seemed not at all surprised.

"So there you are, Officer Maginnis," she said, "Bring him up."

"That's a fine welt you've got over your eye this time, Mrs. Halloran," commented Officer Maginnis, politely.

"I fell and hit my head on the ironing board," said Mrs. Halloran. "It comes of overwork and worry, day and night. A dead faint, Officer Maginnis. Watch your big feet there, you thriving, natural fool," she added to Mr. Halloran. "He's got a job now, you mightn't believe it, Officer Maginnis, but it's true. Bring him on up, and thank you."

She went ahead of them, opened the door, and led the way to the bedroom through the kitchen, turned back the covers, and Officer Maginnis dumped Mr. Halloran among the quilts and pillows. Mr. Halloran rolled over with a deep groan and shut his eyes.

"Many thanks to you, Officer Maginnis," said Mrs. Halloran.

"Don't mention it, Mrs. Halloran," said Officer Maginnis.

When the door was shut and locked, Mrs. Halloran went and dipped a large bath towel under the kitchen tap. She wrung it out and tied several good hard knots in one end and tried it out with a whack on the edge of the table. She walked in and stood over the bed and brought the knotted towel down in Mr. Halloran's face with all her might. He stirred and muttered, ill at ease. "That's for the flatiron Halloran," she told him, in a cautious voice as if she were talking to herself, and whack, down came the towel again. "That's for the half-dollar," she said, and whack, "that's for your drunkenness—" her arm swung around regularly,

There are
64 VALUES
in LAFAYETTE'S
Radio Line

Whatever the radio you have in mind—portable, table model, automatic radio-phonograph combination . . . whatever the price you choose to pay, Lafayette has the set for you, and offers more for your money. More wanted features, more realism of reproduction, more cabinet beauty, more fine quality throughout. There are sixty-four distinguished models in the Lafayette line for 1940 — every one a value! Send today for Catalog No. 78S describing the complete line.

LAFAYETTE RADIO
100 SIXTH AVENUE ▪ NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
24 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

COOPERATION

Buy your personal and household needs at Cooperative SAVINGS, averaging 20 percent.

Best Buys & Recommendations
OF
Consumer Testing Agencies
State Experimental Stations
Bureau of Standards Reports
Medical & Dental Assns., etc.

POPULAR ITEMS include cosmetics, hosiery, underwear, shirts, mattresses, leather goods, pens, photographic, sporting goods, typewriters, refrigerators, appliances, etc., &c.

Please write for free leaflet, or, better, send 10c for illustrated booklet, "Consumer's Aid." Also 64-page reference catalog (20c) illustrating hundreds of nationally advertised products that can be purchased at cooperative benefits (both bulletins together, 25c, refundable). Patrons purchasing privileges $2 a year; or shareholder life membership, $10.

Make Cooperative purchasing your lifetime habit.

CONSUMERS MAIL-ORDER COOPERATIVE, Inc.
125N West 33rd Street New York, N. Y.

TIME Magazine calls

TWICE A YEAR

a distinguished, rich and original publication "conveying a sense of seriousness of writing few United States journals attempt to match."

The New and Extraordinary Semi-Annual Publication in Book Form that EVERY ONE is discussing.

The ONLY Journal in America combining material by internationally famous writers in permanent form. Featuring the best in LITERATURE, the ARTS and the Field of CIVIL LIBERTIES.

RILKE • KAFKA • STIEGLITZ • SAROYAN
Roger BALDWIN • Thomas MANN • ENTERS
E. E. CUMMINGS • BORGESE • SALVEMINI ETC.

Within one year Issues 1 and 2 have become collectors' items.

ORDER Special Double Number 3-4 NOW (2 Issues in ONE) 425 pages.
2 Color Reproductions $2.00
Clothbound $2.75
Dorothy NORMAN, Editor Mary LESCAZE, Asst. Editor

TWICE A YEAR, 509 Madison Avenue, New York City or at any Bookstore

THEATRE GUILD TWIN HITS!

THE THEATRE GUILD presents PHILIP BARRY'S COMEDY

THE PHILADELPHIA STORY

with KATHARINE HEPBURN

VAN HEFLIN ● JOSEPH COTTEN NICHOLAS JOY ■ SHIRLEY BOOTH
SHUBERT Thea. W. 44th St. Circle 6-5990. Evs. 8:40 Mats. THURS. & SAT. 2:40

THE THEATRE GUILD in association with EDDIE DOWLING presents
SAROYAN'S GAY-MAD COMEDY

The TIME of YOUR LIFE

with EDDIE DOWLING and JULIE HAYDON

GUILD Thea. 52nd St., W. of B'way. Evs. 8:40. Mats. THURS. & SAT. 2:40

"A PERFECT COMEDY. Sooner or later everyone will have to see LIFE WITH FATHER"

Says BROOKS ATKINSON
in N. Y. Times

EMPIRE THEATRE, Broadway and 40th St. Eves. 8:40; Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. Extra Matinees Feb. 12 & 22.

You may buy

BOOKS

through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

Propaganda Analysis

SUBSCRIBER-MEMBERS of the Institute for Propaganda Analysis, for $2 a year receive 12 Monthly Bulletins and special studies analyzing today's propagandas; also they get discounts on Institute Publications.

INSTITUTE FOR PROPAGANDA ANALYSIS
Dept. N, 40 East 49 Street, New York, N. Y.

Send me your next 12 Bulletins and Special Studies........$2

I enclose .... Check .... money order

Name..

Address...

City.. State.................................

ending with a heavy thud on the face that was beginning to squirm, gasp, lift itself from the pillow and fall back again, in a puzzled kind of torment. "For your sock feet," Mrs. Halloran told him, whack, "and your laziness, and this is for missing Mass and"—here she swung half a dozen times—"that is for your daughter and your part in her. . . ."

She stood back breathless, the lump on her forehead burning in its furious colors. When Mr. Halloran attempted to rise, shielding his head with his arms, she gave him a push and he fell back again. "Stay there and don't give me a word," said Mrs. Halloran. He pulled the pillow over his face and subsided again, this time for good.

Mrs. Halloran moved about very deliberately. She tied the wet towel around her head, the knotted end hanging over her shoulder. Her hand ran into her apron pocket and came out again with the money. There was a five-dollar bill with three one-dollar bills rolled in it, and the half-dollar she had thought spent long since. "A poor start, but something," she said, and opened the cupboard door with a long key. Reaching in, she pulled a loosely fitted board out of the wall, and removed a black-painted metal box. She unlocked this, took out one five-cent piece from a welter of notes and coins. She then placed the new money in the box, locked it, put it away, replaced the board, shut the cupboard door and locked that. She went out to the telephone, dropped the nickel in the slot, asked for a number, and waited.

"Is that you Maggie? Well, are things any better with you now? I'm glad to hear it. It's late to be calling, but there's news about your father. No, no, nothing of that kind, he's got a job. I said a job. Yes, at last, after all my urging him onward. . . . I've got him bedded down to sleep it off so he'll be ready for work tomorrow. . . . Yes, it's political work, toward the election time, with Gerald McCorkery. But that's no harm, getting votes and all, he'll be in the open air and it doesn't mean I'll have to associate with low people, now or ever. It's clean enough work, with good pay; if it's not just what I prayed for, still it beats nothing, Maggie. After all my trying . . . it's like a miracle. You see what can be done with patience and doing your duty, Maggie. Now mind you do as well by your own husband."

JOIN

American LABOR EDUCATION SERVICE, Inc.
(formerly, the Affiliated Schools for Workers)
437 West 59 Street New York, N. Y.

Identify yourself with this national workers' education organization which helps unions and other groups organize new workers' education programs; conducts an advisory service for existing groups; prepares study material; conducts conferences; maintains a teacher's registry; establishes contacts with workers' education movements abroad.

Membership: Individuals, $5.00; Workers' Education Groups, $10.00

The Child Study Association of America and the Family Guidance and Consultation Service salute The Nation
on this important anniversary

PSYCHIATRY and CRIME
14 Lectures Starting
Tues., FEB 8—8:30
RAND SCHOOL 7. E. 15 St. AL 4-3094

V. C. BRANHAM
I. T. BROADWIN
WALTER BROMBERG
BERNARD GLUECK
SAMUEL LIEBOWITZ
SANDOR LORAND
PAUL SCHILDER
FRITZ WITTELS

THE Nation

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 17, 1940 NUMBER 7

The Shape of Things

THE "CITIZENSHIP INSTITUTE" CONDUCTED by the American Youth Congress provided the setting for several momentous pronouncements by adults. The President utilized the occasion for an almost unprecedented blast at a foreign government; Mrs. Roosevelt gave another remarkable display of courage and insight; and John L. Lewis fired another bombardment at the White House. The President, in his attack on the invasion of Finland in particular and the Russian regime in general, used uniquely plain language. By and large he articulated what most Americans have felt and thought since September. But if his remarks were disturbing to Moscow, they were not altogether fortunate even in Washington, less because of their substance than because of their tone. We have argued, as did the President, that loans to Finland do not mean war with Russia; but it is not persuasive to dismiss as "twaddle" the fears of those who dissent, or to tell the generation which must fight a war that it has no right to judgment on issues so deeply related to the war. Mrs. Roosevelt argued Finland's case a good deal more effectively, and she was similarly forthright in facing again the anti-red avalanche which descended on the congress. On this score the President's affirmation of "the right to be a Communist" was welcome; we hope J. Edgar Hoover overheard it.

*

TO THE FUTURE OF THE YOUTH CONGRESS the address of John L. Lewis is likely to mean more than the remarks of the Roosevelts. Urging the congress to identify itself with Labor's Non-Partisan League, Lewis made it plain that he is thinking of himself increasingly as a political as well as a labor leader. Before the Youth Congress decides to follow him, we hope it will have a clearer view of his plans and perspectives than he has yet vouchsafed to the rest of the country. Certainly his address to the congress had demagogic overtones which should make caution a watchword. "You listened to the President today," he said. "When you came away you didn't know where to get a job if you needed one." Did Lewis tell them where to get jobs? Condemning the President's advice to the congress, on the ground of its insufficient knowledge, against adopting a resolution opposing loans to Finland, Lewis told his audience that his United Mine Workers, with its maturity and its impressive membership, had adopted a similar resolution. He failed to mention that the miners, unlike the Youth Congress, coupled their denunciation of the loan with an equally vigorous denunciation of the Russian invasion. Finally there was the new "solution" for peace in the labor movement. There is no measuring-rod for sincerity, but the timing, the manner of the offer, and its inherent implausibility add little, in our opinion, to the stature of John L. Lewis.

*

ALLIED FORCES IN THE NEAR EAST HAVE been augmented by Australian and New Zealand contingents, believed to number some 30,000, whose arrival in Egypt was greeted with a fanfare of publicity. Almost simultaneously French concentrations in Syria have been copiously reported, and new emphasis has been laid on the growing intimacy of the Allies with the Turks. This last fact has been underlined by the seizure of the Krupp shipyard at Istanbul, the expulsion from Turkey of a number of German specialists, and the increasing coolness toward Russia shown by the Turkish press. It is not surprising, therefore, that there should be talk of an early military move in the Near East. Nevertheless, the immediate significance of the activities there is probably political and diplomatic. They serve as a warning to Balkan powers to resist German pressure, and they also constitute a threat to Russia should it draw still closer to Germany. The Allies seem to be finding it increasingly difficult to regard the U. S. S. R. as strictly neutral but have yet to decide whether they would gain by treating it as an open enemy. Should they take this step and carry Turkey with them, the Caucasus would be the obvious point at which to strike. The seizure of this region would deprive Russia of its chief oil resources and would put an end to all German hopes of obtaining supplies. At the same time it would check any Soviet attempt to move against the Iranian and Iraqui oil fields or in the direction of India.

*

BRITAIN'S RELEASE OF NINE OF THE TWENTY-one Germans taken from the Asamu Maru on January 21 was part of a face-saving compromise that revealed

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

Japanese quite as much as British weakness. For while London backed down from the strong legal position which it took in its notes to Japan, Tokyo yielded on the substance of its case when it agreed to keep Germans off its ships in the future. Japan's capitulation is the more significant when it is recalled that only a fortnight ago Tokyo was talking of such reprisals as stopping British shipping in Far Eastern waters. The agreement is striking evidence of the desire of the Yonai government to patch up some kind of understanding with the Western powers as an offset to the deterioration of its relations with the Soviet Union. The United States, unfortunately, has not taken advantage of its opportunity. Action on the embargo has been deferred, and nothing more has been heard of the possible imposition of countervailing duties on silk and other imports. The Japanese, for their part, have fluctuated rather violently between pious gestures of friendship for the United States and threats to abrogate the Nine-Power Treaty and drive all Americans out of China. In interpreting these threats, it might be well for people to remember the equally violent recriminatory measures which the Japanese were contemplating against the British only a few weeks ago.

*

SOME OF THE STATEMENTS WHICH MARKED the midwinter session of the A. F. of L. Executive Council in Miami are not easy to distinguish from utterances of the National Association of Manufacturers. The council opened by asking Mr. Roosevelt to give business "a breathing spell." Ten of the most prominent superannuated statesmen in the council, including Messrs. Woll and Hutcheson, issued an attack on the New Deal in which there was little that John W. Davis or Alfred E. Smith would not approve. The New Deal was accused of discouraging new investments, imposing too heavy taxation, weakening the authority of the states, and impairing business confidence by maladministration of the Wagner Act. After those statements it mattered little whether John L. Lewis was correct or not in charging that corporation lawyers helped draft the A. F. of L.'s proposed amendments to the Wagner Act. Green called the attack "dastardly," but can hardly deny that the amendments have the approval of corporate interests out to hamstring the labor law. The Executive Council ordered city labor bodies and state federations to suspend all printers' locals because the I. T. U. refused to pay a special assessment to fight the C. I. O. It is worth noting that when the Executive Council and Green are asked to take action of this kind against racketeers in the ranks of labor, they always plead that state and city labor bodies are "autonomous" and beyond their control. The recent meeting of the Executive Council should be truly encouraging—to business, not to labor.

MR. ROOSEVELT HAS DECLARED IT LEGAL FOR Americans to enlist in the Finnish army, but federal agents have arrested eleven men and one woman in Detroit and Milwaukee on a charge of recruiting for the Spanish Loyalists and raided the headquarters of the Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade in New York. Brigade officials were subpoenaed. The President points out the distinction between volunteering for service in Finland and recruiting volunteers, and the distinction is a real one. But the fact is that the State Department did its best to prevent American volunteers from reaching the Loyalists, while the White House is now inviting Americans to join the Finnish army. The action of the FBI will hardly recommend itself to liberals; here as in the Browder case it seems to be looking for technical excuses to implement an anti-red drive. The sweeping way in which the FBI refers to "Communists and reputed fellow-travelers" in announcing the arrests should be a warning, for "reputed fellow-travelers" is an expansive category reminiscent of an old-fashioned Department of Justice pink-hunt.

*

PRESIDENTIAL PARDONS ARE IN ORDER FOR the fourteen men sentenced in Minneapolis on a charge of "conspiracy" in connection with the WPA strike last July. Dwight Macdonald, in an article in our issue of February 3, explained the background of these extraordinary cases. A section of the Woodrum Relief Act of 1939 designed to protect WPA workers from political pressure was twisted into an excuse to indict 157 men and women in Minneapolis who took part in the nationwide WPA strike last July. In response to widespread protest the federal government dismissed charges against 125 of those indicted, but not before 32 others had been tried and convicted. Fourteen of the thirty-two are men, and these have now been sentenced. Three of them, including the chairman of the federal workers' section of the militant General Drivers' Union, Local 544, were given eighteen months each in a federal workhouse. Fourteen women remain to be sentenced. Despite the Administration's laudable intervention in freeing the 125 defendants, it is difficult to absolve it from responsibility for the prosecutions in the first place. Only a Presidential pardon can clear the slate.

*

NEW YORK'S UNEMPLOYED ARE TO RECEIVE no immediate advantage from the $211,000,000 reserve fund accumulated during the first three years of the state unemployment-insurance law if the recommendations of the state Advisory Council are carried out. The majority of the council felt, with some reason, that the two years in which benefits have been paid have not provided a sufficient test of the scheme. Yet the fact that collections were nearly double the payments in 1939, and considerably larger than benefits even in a bad year like 1938, suggests that minor changes reducing the present three-week waiting period and increasing the duration of benefits beyond thirteen weeks might safely have been undertaken. Some increase in benefits is also called for, either this year or in the near future. While it would be dangerous to undermine the reserves that have been accumulated, reserves should not be allowed to continue to grow at the present rate. Money that is subtracted from purchasing power to provide for the unemployed should be used to serve that purpose and not to build up a surplus which may never be required. Employer groups with their eyes on this surplus have introduced bills in both branches of the legislature to set up a system of merit rating. These bills would cut the pay-roll tax from its present flat 3 per cent to a rate varying between one-half of 1 per cent and 3 per cent—the lower rate being granted concerns with a relatively stable employment record. The pressure behind the campaign for merit rating appears to come from a small group of firms with which stable operation is in part the result of monopolistic control. It is being energetically opposed by employers in the seasonal trades, small business men, and a large number of labor organizations.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

*

NATIONAL SHARE-CROPPERS WEEK, WHICH IS held annually, will take place this year from March 4 to 10. Its immediate objective is to raise money for the annual budget of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, but it is also designed to arouse interest in the problem of the Southern farm workers and to exert pressure for its solution. One of the events scheduled for the week is an essay contest for college students. The subject is "A Proposed Solution to the Share-Cropper Problem," and the winning essay will be printed in The Nation. Details may be obtained from the Educators' Committee for National Share-Croppers' Week at 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York. Dr. Mary E. Woolley and Dr. Abram Harris are co-chairmen of this committee.

*

"IT IS JUST LIKE ONE AVALANCHE AFTER another, each burying the earlier victims deeper and with them some of their rescuers. Many of our most pitiable cases are those of Czechs, formerly, with the French, the most generous of all peoples toward refugees." We quote from a letter from England asking American help for the victims of fascism—Germans, Austrians, Spaniards, Czechs, and Poles—who are now caught in the toils of a European war. Both the governments and the people of Britain and France, now that the war is straining their economic resources, are unable to give as much aid to refugees as formerly. In France thousands of anti-fascist Germans have been consigned to concentration camps. Some have been released, but thousands are still interned, and the conditions under which they live are worse than ever for the ironic reason that many refugee camps have now been taken over for the use of evacués. Money and more money is needed to feed and clothe these people and to obtain their resettlement in other countries, particularly in America.

Police Neutrality

LAST April we printed an article by George Britt which was, we believe, the first comprehensive account of the anti-Semitic campaign waged in the streets of New York by followers of Father Coughlin. Three months later, when the raucousness of the drive was being matched by the reticence of the metropolitan dailies, we published another article, by James Wechsler, which provided an even fuller picture. Mr. Wechsler's story showed the central role of the Christian Front in the street campaign and brought out the seriousness of police partiality toward members of that organization. We said then: "The Christian Front is engaged in daily battles with the unorganized foes of Coughlin; the police are sworn to the impartial enforcement of the law; simultaneous membership in the Front and on the force is therefore incongruous and intolerable. The Front is not a benevolent or religious fraternity. It is a faction of political violence, whose police members constitute an armed fascist nucleus. As such its members should be purged out of the Police Department to the last man." Mayor LaGuardia denied that there had been any partiality, belittled the whole issue, and spoke derisively of "the trend . . . on the part of some people shouting their loudest for freedom of speech to obtain suppression at this time."

Then came the lightning bolt. Seventeen Coughlin men, most of them members of the Christian Front, were arrested and indicted for conspiracy to overthrow the United States government and for stealing arms and munitions from National Guard armories. The question of police membership in the Front was raised again and brought a series of bewildering comments from Police Commissioner Valentine. On January 16 he denied reports that forty members of the force had been identified with the Front. On January 17, confronted with an anonymous letter on Christian Front stationery to the effect that the number was not 40 but 3,423, he told reporters that the real number was unknown and added, "But I doubt if it is as high as the figure stated." On February 8 came the announcement that questionnaires were being distributed to all policemen to determine whether any were members of the Christian Front or of any "subversive, Communist, Bund, or Fascist club or organization." "There is nothing to prevent any man from joining any organization," said Valentine, "but the police officer must be neutral. By joining any one of these organizations he ceases to be neutral." That is precisely the point we made last July. We are glad to have it upheld, even at this late date, by the Police Commissioner. Members of both Front and force should be asked to make a choice.

Washington Jitters

IN THE stormy controversy aroused by Congressman Frank Hook's attack on Martin Dies, most of the relevant facts have been obscured. In part the confusion was deliberately created by apologists for Mr. Dies; it has been heightened by the reluctance of liberal Congressmen to defend themselves. For the first time in a two-year career of irresponsible slander Dies had been under serious fire in the Capitol. The exposure of the Christian Front's terrorist plot had posed the embarrassing query: where was Martin Dies when the Front was charting its plans? The answer was devastating. Not merely had the Dies committee "overlooked" the Front; but while ostensibly probing un-American activities, Dies himself had been leading an active public life with the upper-class sympathizers of the Front. He had been speaking at luncheons and conferences and meetings enthusiastically promoted and well attended by the Front and its friends. That disclosure, made in Washington by Congressman Hook and documented in The Nation on January 27, put Dies closer to the ropes than he had been in two years. But by shrewdly exploiting the Pelley forgeries Dies's handlers have restored him to an upright position.

The incident is not closed; the most sensational details may be still ahead if liberals will press the point. For one thing, the forged letters purporting to show a compact between Dies and Pelley have no bearing on the relations of Dies with Merwin K. Hart and other figureheads in the fascist network. Moreover, disclosure of the forgeries has created more mystery than it has dispelled. It was subsequently revealed that the man who sold the fake letters was in the employ of the Dies committee. It is reported that a member of the Dies committee knew the letters were forged when Hook introduced them—but did not protest. The resignation of the committee's counsel is announced. A conservative newspaper relates that committee agents attempted to plant a similar set of forgeries on New York foes of Dies; this time it failed. And as a fitting climax, William Dudley Pelley, for whom the committee had allegedly been searching for six months, turns up in Washington, pounds the Dies committee on the back, "absolves" Mr. Dies of any contact with the Silver Shirts, and amiably submits to examination. A number of delicate questions are suggested by this sequence of events. The alarming and significant fact is the reluctance of most people in Washington to ask them. And unless a grand-jury hearing or some other airing of the whole affair can be held, it is possible that the questions will never be asked. Because the Pelley letters were forged, the whole indictment against Dies is in danger of being pigeonholed. Dies and his cohorts have resumed the offensive. The Herald Tribune congratulates him on his escape and assures him that he is "happily stronger than ever." Mr. Hook, fighting the battle almost single-handed, is compelled to withdraw not only the Pelley letters but the Front evidence as well—although it is totally independent and has in no way been impugned. Except for a handful of men, liberal Washington shows a passionate anxiety to drop the subject. Why?

It is not because Dies has been vindicated or because of any sudden doubts as to the authenticity of most of the evidence. The data merely dramatized what everybody knew: that while Dies had whitewashed the right, he was persecuting the left. For left read New Deal. The real reason for the deadly silence was voiced by Congressman Casey at the now celebrated Jackson dinner: "no matter what evidence you have, you can't stop Martin Dies." If the comment was cynical it nevertheless expressed the mood of contemporary Washington. That mood is now Dies's greatest ally.

The truth is that Martin Dies is a ham actor impersonating a statesman. He lacks Huey Long's rhetorical thunder, Coughlin's hypnotic power; he is cordially detested by conservative Congressmen; his chief talent is the elementary shrewdness of a John Garner. The simple secret of his success is that he is a symbol unifying the right—and splitting the left. He has achieved incredible power because in one way or another he crudely expresses the basic drives of every right-wing group; and he has escaped reprisal by dividing and demoralizing his enemies. The last fortnight has revealed these twin tactics more clearly then ever.

The men who should be fighting him have been mute. Prominent labor leaders have remained silent in the hope that he will reciprocate by leaving them alone; liberals in Congress and elsewhere have tried to "work with" him by sacrificing the Communists, in the hope that liberals will thereby be pardoned; prominent Jewish groups have helped his attack on the left in the hope that he will not become anti-Semitic; a host of his potential foes have thus refrained from criticism in the hope that he will gratefully ignore their existence. We do not question the motives or minimize the anxieties of these groups. The drift is to the right. Liberal Congressmen must run for reelection, too. But all of them have misunderstood the nature of the Dies campaign. They have seen it as a seasonal deluge or as a one-man promotion drive. Basically it is neither. It is the agency of a formidable reactionary coalition, working overtime in every area. If "public opinion" today supports Dies, that is evidence of liberal failure; will opinion be less favorable to Dies next year—after twelve more months of timidity and silence?

The Nation makes no apologies to Martin Dies. We willingly strike the Pelley letters from our records; but we reiterate that these were only one aspect of a much larger case—and the bulk of that case still stands. We are convinced that further investigation of the Dies-Hart axis will strengthen an already substantial record; we believe that the Pelley affair is full of significant question marks. Martin Dies is still the defendant, not the prosecutor.

Housing Is Wealth

HOUSING is not the most dramatic of the public questions facing American democracy in an election year, but it is certainly among the most important. Moreover, it is closely entwined with a host of other problems for which solutions must be found if our social and political institutions are to be buttressed by higher standards of general well-being. We know the toll levied by sickness in the form of misery and economic waste; we know the high cost of crime; we know the financial straits in which most of our cities are involved. These are only some of the ills that can be directly traced to the growth of slums, to lack of civic planning, and to the aftermath of a century of land speculation. Housing is also directly connected with the major problem of recovery and the conquest of unemployment. There is general agreement about the necessity for providing investment outlets able to absorb the total volume of savings if our economy is to be kept on an even keel. But today residential building accounts for far less capital expenditure than it did in the twenties. Yet the need is greater, for the new homes built in the past ten years have been hardly sufficient to make up for wastage, let alone furnish accommodation for the eight millions which have been added to the population since 1930.

According to evidence presented by the Bureau of Labor Statistics to the TNEC, the minimum number of houses required annually to keep facilities from falling below present standards is 525,000. Last year's output was the best in a decade, but the total of dwelling units completed is estimated by the Federal Housing Administration at only 450,000. This was more than 100,000 better than in 1938 but it compares with 509,000 in 1929, which was itself a poor year for residential building compared with the middle twenties. On the basis of FHA mortgage-insurance applications the current year is expected to show some improvement over 1939, but it will be surprising if total construction reaches the minimum cited above.

Unsatisfactory as this record is, it would be still worse if the housing field had been left solely to the mercy of private enterprise. Some 40 per cent of current residential building is being financed with the aid of the FHA, which has now insured mortgages aggregating over two billion dollars. By abolishing second mortgages, reducing the cost of home financing—though not enough—insisting on regular amortization, and enforcing minimum quality standards, the FHA has done much to reduce the gamble of home ownership. It must always be recognized, however, that its activities have no direct bearing on the problem of providing more and better shelter for the ill-housed "one third of a nation." Its services are of value mainly to the middle classes, and even the large-scale rental housing projects for which it is now giving mortgage insurance will be far beyond the reach of really low-income families. Private enterprise has long abandoned all pretense of being able to supply new housing for the millions now forced to live under sub-standard conditions. Whatever is being done in this field is the work of federal, state, and city agencies, and in relation to the need it is still precious little. According to the February Bulletin of the Federal Reserve only 10 per cent of the residential construction begun in 1939 was publicly financed. The United States Housing Authority, which lends local public bodies up to 90 per cent of the cost of low-rent housing and slum-clearance schemes, and in addition provides 80 per cent of the annual subsidy required to bring rents within the means of the families rehoused, has fully allotted the $800,000,000 it had at its disposal, although not all of this sum is yet spent. It has an unfilled demand for an additional billion dollars, but Congress has not yet seen fit to authorize the doubling of its loan funds as requested by the President last year.

If the job that is being done by USHA is to be extended—and unless it is, vast areas of our cities will remain blighted areas—public opinion must be roused to impress upon all candidates for public office the real economy of public investment in housing. The Survey Graphic in the third of its "Calling America" series, just issued, furnishes a rich storehouse of ammunition for housing reformers. Here are the records written by experts of what has been done in the past few years and a chart of the much vaster area of ground which has still to be covered. As Albert Mayer, editor of this special issue, says, housing and planning, urban and rural, offer a generation of activity for our job-starved economy. "They can supply reemployment steadily over a long period of years to come, carrying forward a task that is both a national economic measure and a national crusade. With ample room for private and public enterprise, they will create real wealth and values that are lasting."

Politics and Peace

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

YOU can't blame the belligerents for feeling concerned and suspicious about Sumner Welles's coming visit to Europe and the announcement that talks between the United States and certain neutrals have been under way for some time. Rumor cannot be stilled by Presidential fiat.

The reception of the news was itself illuminating. It shows that at this stage of the war no suggestion of mediation or any sort of diplomatic intervention will be welcome. The position of the Allied goverments has, in their opinion, been made sufficiently clear: they have said that they intend to end Hitlerism and prevent a recurrence of the Nazi threat to Europe's peace. Any proposal of a negotiated settlement before this aim has been achieved would weaken their hand and strengthen the pro-appeasement forces in each country—fascists, Communists, pacifists, and hold-over Municheers.

Their suspicion is inevitable, but I believe it is not justified by the facts. Looked at from the angle of American political realities and not from that of European diplomacy, Mr. Roosevelt's reassurance and Mr. Hull's explanation seem wholly believable. This does not mean that the peace talks and Mr. Welles's junket lack intrinsic importance. On the contrary they prove beyond argument the determination of the United States to play a leading role in the negotiation and planning of Europe's peace, whether the belligerents like it or not. And this is a fact of transcendent significance. But they do not prove any intention to try to bring about an immediate settlement in disregard of the interests of the Allies.

Europeans would save themselves a lot of useless speculation if they would repeat to themselves every morning. "This is a Presidential year in the United States. Everything that happens there must be judged in the context of the campaign." In the light of this dictum recent Administration moves fall into their proper place. No serious peace offensive would be launched even if the President favored it; it would harbor too many political dangers. On the other hand, a modest gesture in the direction of peace may rally support to an Administration faced with the charge of "war-mongering."

This dictum should be memorized in Finland in particular. Otherwise that beleaguered country may be misled by the vociferous sympathy of Americans and their protestations of love for democracy. Those emotions exist in full measure, along with a growing antipathy for Russia, as Mr. Roosevelt proclaimed last Saturday. But they are not going to be translated directly into anti-aircraft guns or pursuit planes, because they are only part of a much more complex emotional compound made up of such other ingredients as isolationist sentiment, timidity, pacifism, and suspicion of the British. The President has gone as far as he dared by proposing that Congress expand the resources of the Export-Import Bank to cover a $20,000,000 loan to Finland for non-military purchases in the United States. The bill embodying this measure has been reported favorably in the Senate and may have been passed by the time these lines are read. The Administration is simultaneously exploring the possibility of selling off surplus war materials to such non-belligerents as Norway and Sweden. Presumably the Finns can take their loan and buy goods that will be acceptable in Norway and Sweden and then make a swap on foreign soil where no American isolationist will be outraged by what is going on. This maneuver might puzzle a literal-minded Finn unless he repeated to himself the dictum set down in the last paragraph. Then all would come clear.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 237

EDITORIALS:

POLICE NEUTRALITY 239
WASHINGTON JITTERS 240
HOUSING IS WEALTH 241
POLITICS AND PEACE by Freda Kirchwey 242
TIME AGAINST FINLAND by Leland Stowe 243
MARXISM RECONSIDERED—I by Lewis Corey 245
LEWIS, ROOSEVELT, AND THE U. M. W. by Rose M. Stein 248
TURKEY IS NOT NEUTRAL by Nermin Muvaffak 250
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 252
IN THE WIND 253
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 254

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 255
A SYNTHESIS OF HISTORY by Hans Kohn 256
THE GERMAN ENIGMA by Toni Christen 257
HUXLEY IN HOLLYWOOD by Louis B. Salomon 258
COLORFUL CHINA by Maxwell S. Stewart 259
HUMAN BEING INTO SAINT by Eileen Holding 260
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 260
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 261

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Time Against Finland

BY LELAND STOWE

Helsinki, January 14

I AM starting to write during an air-raid alarm. The bellboy and chambermaids have been trying to shoo us all downstairs. They always try, though they should realize by now that the newspapermen have little use for the so-called shelters. We like to have a chance of seeing the Russian planes, which rarely come near Helsinki's center—once a week perhaps—and are very seldom within eyesight. Sitting in a cellar waiting for a "recall" is moreover a terrible waste of time. And time here is precious. Before the end of March everything may be over.

Considering the magnificent victories that the Finnish troops have won during six weeks of war, that may sound queer. It is neither queer nor false. This war can be lost before the snows begin to thin. But it won't be lost by the Finns alone, any more than the Spanish war was just a defeat for Spaniards. If it is lost it will be lost by Swedes, Norwegians, Frenchmen, Englishmen—yes, and by Americans; in short, by all democracies that want Finland to be saved yet fail to ship airplanes, anti-aircraft guns, and munitions here quickly enough to prevent disaster. Relief for evacués is one of the last things Finland needs. As one Finnish woman expressed it, "We can't throw cabbages at the Bolshevists, and if we did they would only pick them up and eat them." If you want to help a man who is being beaten senseless with a club, you don't hand him a roll of bandages and a bottle of iodine.

I am reminded of a scene somewhere in Lapland. A boy is sitting at a table in the kitchen of a tiny farmhouse. His eyes look tired, his cheekbones protrude, but his slender figure is wiry. They say he is only sixteen. He looks older. For weeks he has skiied twenty or thirty miles a day through wild forests, carrying army dispatches between isolated front-line companies near the border. Because he is doing this work, one more adult is carrying a gun, but this kind of skiing takes a heavy toll. He is writing a letter home with a fierce intensity. "I don't count on any outside help," writes the boy, "but if it comes in spite of everything, then I will know that all decency hasn't gone out of this world of barbarism."

There are many boys like him, holding the pass while others weigh and ponder what kind of help carries the fewest risks.

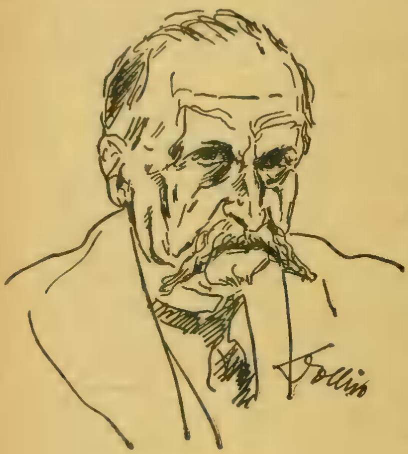
The Finns have done wonders taking care of themselves and fighting their own war. They have stopped the Red Army dead in its tracks on the Karelian Isthmus. They have destroyed three divisions—it may soon be four—and thrown the Russians back with enormous losses at every vital point on the 750-mile eastern front. But Stalin knows—and so do the Finns—that the day of reckoning lies ahead, when the snows melt.

What has been the secret of the Finns' successes up to now? Three things chiefly: an élite of skilled officers, exceptionally intelligent and very clever in their use of military strategy; a splendidly organized and disciplined little army; and snow and ice. Without this near-Arctic winter the Finnish victories could not have been so great. When the snow is gone, Finland's defense will be infinitely more difficult. Stalin's hour of vengeance will then come. It will not be long delayed—till April at the latest. Then Soviet Russia's terrific superiority in both man power and material will render more of these amazing fox-terrier triumphs almost impossible, unless the Finns get many airplanes and many cannon very soon.

The Spanish Republicans had no army, and made one while fighting. The Finns have an army—officers, a limited number of men, organization. With pitifully meager supplies the Loyalists fought on for more than two years, always drawing on their great reservoir of man power. With a population of 3,800,000 the Finns can call on only a few hundred thousand men, but they can still wage war, with science and masterly strategy, if only they can get arms, guns, and planes in abundance. That might even up matters for a few weeks or months. Eventually, nothing less than large bodies of international volunteers can make possible a complete repulse of the Soviet invaders. The Russo-Finnish war must either come to a comparatively early end or become the responsibility in increasing measure of others than the Finns.

Field Marshal Mannerheim is a tactician of remarkable ability. His generals and superior officers are all veterans of Finland's war of independence (1918) against the Reds. Many of them also received expert Prussian training for two years or more in the Kaiser's Germany during the World War. They are hard-headed, severely efficient officers. There is little that is democratic in their bearing or psychology, yet by some irony they are fighting with great tenacity for a democracy which is theirs by blood and circumstance if not as a spiritual heritage. This officers' corps is an inner autocracy, but it is shaped by the uncompromising individualism and fierce love of liberty of the Finns. The courage and patriotic devotion of the common soldiers know no superior anywhere in the world.

These characteristics go far to explain the Finns' great achievements in the early weeks of the war. But they do not explain it entirely. Even without the barriers of winter the Russians would probably have been stopped by the excellent Finnish fortifications on the Karelian Isthmus. Had the invasion come in the spring the story would have been very different along the extended eastern frontier. Motorized Russian troops would have advanced there with far greater swiftness and would have been backed up by much larger forces of reserves. For example, the two Red divisions which the Finns destroyed near Suomussalmi owed their annihilation chiefly to the fact that the deep snow enabled small detachments of Finnish ski troops to encircle them and attack them in isolated sectors.



President Kallio

In the spring this greater mobility of the Finnish troops, which are numerically much inferior, will not exist in anything like the same degree, A Finnish soldier will no longer be able to do the work of two or three men, as he is now doing. No friend of the Finns can afford to conceal this fact from friendly opinion in the neutral countries. In a few months the point will be reached where the Finns will have fulfilled their responsibilities to the full extent of their powers. Time will not wait for others to fulfil theirs. In this respect the Russo-Finnish conflict is not at all like the war in Spain.

The air-raid alarm was not a dud this time; Helsinki's port was bombarded and people were killed and wounded. The Red bombers are becoming more and more effective. It is said that political commissars are now flying in the planes to make sure that their crews make a serious effort to do their jobs thoroughly. That may partly explain the increasing damage that is being done from the air. In any case, Soviet raiders are confidently expected to come in unprecedented numbers with the fair skies of March. Then the rear guard will be harassed and tortured from one end of southern and central Finland to the other.

This is not being defeatist, for if the Finns received 100 first-class fighting planes, they would be able to counter-attack the Red bombers at vital points. Confronted by 200 Finnish planes, the Soviet pilots would suddenly have the novel experience of risking their lives when they soared over the interior of Finland, especially since fighting planes cannot accompany the Red bombers much farther than across the Gulf of Finland. Now the Russians bomb with impunity—it is not war, merely destruction—for the Finns have only enough planes to use in the war zones where they are most urgently needed. Military observers here say that the Soviet machines have a "blind spot"—Finnish pilots have already brought down scores as a result—and that good modern fighters or chasers would make mince pie of the bombers. They speculate on what might happen to the morale of the Russian air force if it were to lose several planes per squadron on almost every flight.

Foreigners here cannot but be struck by the devotion, courage, and national unity of the Finns. They are a people of sober virtues. They stand on their own feet and they know how to die. We have learned that the Finns can be incredibly stubborn, that they have an almost Prussian love of order, and that they revere regulations to a degree almost incomprehensible to an American. Sometimes one wishes that they were not quite so solemn, so deadly in earnest about everything they do, that they had that gift for laughter and gaiety with which the Spaniard makes even his most tragic moments bearable. The Finns are the children of the frozen North, and they do things in their own way and at their own pace. They believe in their own way of life, their own kind of democracy, and have the deepest respect for the liberty of the individual.

This Finnish democracy is economic as well as political. Many socialistic threads are woven into its fabric. Within its framework hundreds of cooperatives are firmly established. The Finnish state owns more than a third of the land's gigantic forests, and has actively participated in the creation of its electric power stations. There is much here which any foe of the New Deal would describe as "red," or certainly "pink," but to the level-headed Finns these things are simply sane and rational democratic policies. The Finns are being championed now, in America and elsewhere, by hundreds of organizations and thousands of persons who would denounce many established Finnish practices as "socialistic menaces" if they were to encounter them at home. The Finns have found countless friends who have little or no faith in what the Finns believe in and no conception of what Finnish democracy really is. This is one of the neatest ironies of our crazy, contradictory times.

Of course, it doesn't matter. What matters is that Finland, in twenty short years, has built an exceptionally genuine democracy. The preservation of this democracy is of immeasurable importance for the world. Between now and April we shall see whether those who profess to be its friends are going to abandon it to its impending fate.

Marxism Reconsidered—I

BY LEWIS COREY

THE MARXIST FAILURE

HISTORY has played one of her stupefying tricks: for it is now clear that democracy is on the defensive as much against the totalitarianism of Russian communism as against that of fascism. And since socialism without democracy is a monstrosity, socialism too is on the defensive. Nor can the Communist parties escape being enemies of socialism and democracy, for as carriers of Communist totalitarianism and as "transmission belts" of the Kremlin's foreign policy they must act in disregard of the democratic and socialist interests of the countries in which they operate. What has happened is the collapse of a whole movement and ideology, the exposure of a whole conception of social change.

Out of the resulting disillusionment and the breaking of old allegiances comes the cry for a regrouping of radical forces. But on what basis shall such a regrouping take place? Certainly not on the basis of what communism was before the Stalin-Hitler pact. Stalinism was the enemy of socialism and democracy in its earlier years—the red years of the consolidation of totalitarian power and the black years of "confessional" trials and purges. Regrouping on the basis of Lenin's communism? But Stalinism, being neither mere Bonapartist reaction nor an immaculate conception, must have been at least potential in the communism of Lenin. And as long as independent communists cling to that older communism which unloosed "socialist" totalitarianism, they cannot serve to regroup the radical forces.

Nor can social democracy. For years the Social Democratic parties, by and large, have been fighting rear-guard actions in a long retreat. The retreat was most disastrous in post-war Germany, where a social democracy which had made no effort to move toward socialism when it was in power was unable effectively to resist fascism and was destroyed. The tragedy of the Russian Revolution is matched by the failure of European social democracy, especially the German, to bring into being the democratic socialism which it urged against bolshevism and which would have saved Europe from the totalitarian danger. Yet social democracy admits to no crucial error in principles or tactics. It blames its disasters on history or on communism or fascism but never on itself, and warms over the stale theoretical tidbits of yesterday. In comparison with communism, the failure of social democracy is decent and clean because it has not become the totalitarian destroyer of its own aims and ideals, but it is a failure none the less

The bitter admission must be made that all variants of Marxism, "revolutionary" and "reformist," meeting the pragmatic test of history, have revealed fatal shortcomings. Diehard sectarians will argue that Marxism never had a chance because it was always distorted or betrayed, just as diehard liberals argue that capitalism never had a chance; but the sectarian argument is self-answering since it means that all Marxists are distorters or betrayers except the newest crop of simon pures, and that is exegetical madness. Yes, all variants of Marxism are a failure. If non-Marxist radicals gloat over this admission, let me remind them that they too have got nowhere, and they too are on the defensive against totalitarianism.

But if the admission of failure is made, then a tremendous job of revaluation is necessary. The job should be done in all humility—we have been wrong and may be wrong again—but it must be done fearlessly and vigorously, and quickly too, for our time is not unlimited.

We must accept and reject, unlearn, relearn, and learn anew regardless of vested interests in old activity and ideas. A new language and a new approach are necessary: the abandonment of ideas, phrases, procedures which are now meaningless or have come to mean the opposite of what we thought they meant. All this means a cooperative job of charting new departures and directions in the struggle for a desirable social order.

The job cannot be done by going "back to Marx." It cannot be done by "revision" or "restoration" of his ideas. The older revisionism led nowhere, while Lenin's restoration led to totalitarianism. We must square our accounts with Marx. The Darwin of the social sciences, Marx met the same misfortune as the natural scientist, that of having a system built on his ideas. Systematic Darwinism had a "Darwinian" explanation for everything, including society, much as systematic Marxism "explains" nature; not until scientists broke the systematic fetters were they able to accept or reject Darwin's ideas, fit the accepted ideas into the sciences, and go beyond Darwin.

So with Marx. All his creative originality was congealed into a system which had a "Marxist" explanation for everything, which strengthened the Hegelian hangovers in Marx instead of destroying them in favor of his critical realism, and which was unjust to Marx himself because the system denied his emphasis on the historical relativity of ideas. The more the system stifled creative growth and fed upon exegetical husks, the more arrogantly authoritarian it became. One logical outcome is the use of Marxism as an opiate for the masses in Russia, where Marx and Lenin—and Stalin too—are godheads of a political religion in which the dialectic plays the mystic part of Holy Ghost and interpretations are decided by the brute force of those in power. We cannot blame the degeneration of systematic Marxism upon Marx, who once said, "Thank God, I am no Marxist!" But the degeneration is there, and it is one more reason for discarding the system.

Yet it is the system that "gets" newcomers to Marxism. They forget that systematic Marxism was always largely an ideology, and that it is now nothing but ideology for the authoritarian masters of Marxism, who use it to justify whatever they want to do. Newcomers are apt to emphasize those ideas of Marx which should be discarded or modified on the basis of historical relativity and experience, and which prevent independent, creative use of the sound ideas. We must make an approach to Marx that freely accepts or rejects his ideas, regardless of the systematic strait-jacket, fit the accepted ideas into today's climate of opinion and needs, and go beyond Marx to new explorations and syntheses.

It should be remembered, however, that most criticisms of Marx have been capitalist apologetics. Marx has more often proved to be right than his critics, largely because of his emphasis on the driving force of change in capitalism which the critics considered eternal; his predictive economic analyses are now verified by capitalist transformation and decline. Break the systematic fetters and apply the principle of the historical relativity of ideas, and Marx again becomes a stimulus to all minds intent on radical social change.

SOCIALISM INTO TOTALITARIANISM

With systematic Marxism must go many of the specific ideas of Marx. Among them are his revolutionary tactics in relation to democracy, which were worked out in the backward Europe of the 1840's and 50's. The tactics were Jacobinism with a proletarian twist: Communists must use the bourgeois democratic revolution to seize power and set up a dictatorship of the proletariat. Those tactics were later rejected by European socialism because their historical basis, the democratic revolution, was gone by. Revolutionary Marxism was suspended in the air. It was condemned to sectarian futility, to interpretation of democracy as dictatorship of the bourgeoisie (which makes Jacksonian democracy and fascism the same and justifies proletarian dictatorship), and to the invention of plans to circumvent democracy. The Marxist tactics came to life only in Russia, where the bourgeois democratic revolution gave Lenin the chance to apply them, with the result that "left" Marxists flocked to bolshevism in 1917-20, unaware of its historical limitations.

Much of what Lenin did might have astonished Marx, but many of the results of his Marxist tactics caught Lenin unaware. Both of them believed that the tactics of proletarian dictatorship meant "completion" of the democratic revolution in a socialist democracy. But in practice the tactics led to totalitarianism. This result cannot be attributed simply to the backwardness of Russia. There was in Russia, to be sure, hardly any class-economic basis for socialism and not enough experience of democracy to make socialism democratic, but the revolution itself unloosed mighty democratic forces. These were destroyed by proletarian dictatorship, whose "temporary" suppression of democracy, it is now clear, becomes institutional and creates vested interests opposed to democracy. Lenin saw some of the dangers, but his administrative measures to encourage democracy without allowing real democracy were a failure. And those who called for "workers' democracy" while accepting dictatorship were playing with words, because limiting democracy to "the workers" means, in the end, democracy for nobody. Proletarian dictatorship brought results the opposite of what Marx and Lenin had dreamed.

Suppression of democracy forced the Bolshevik dictatorship to depend increasingly upon the political, cultural, and moral heritage of Russian backwardness—feudal-Asiatic despotism, terrorism, servility, fear—in addition to new reactionary forces created by the dictatorship itself. Lenin, in the final years of his life, waged a titan's fight on what he called the "czaristic" nature of the Soviet state—and left an essentially totalitarian regime. The end-product is Stalinist totalitarianism, whose Byzantine spirit is expressed in the typical ravings of a Stalinist poet: "I live, I love, I beget children, all thanks to thee, great educator Stalin!" Communist and fascist dictatorships start from opposite premises to arrive at the same totalitarianism because of their suppression of democracy. The original class-economic differences are blurred if not destroyed by the self-interest and power politics of totalitarian dictatorship, which becomes independent of democratic pressures and ideas.

But that is by no means the whole story. Another significant fact must be considered. There is in totalitarian Russia, by and large, a socialist economic set-up—collective ownership, no capitalist property or profit. Yet traditional socialism always identified that set-up with democracy. This has led to all sorts of theoretical hocus-pocus. If the economic basis is socialist, some say, the resultant must be socialism; and Stalinist totalitarianism, they conclude, is a "higher form" of democracy. If the resultant is not democratic socialism, say others, the economic basis cannot be socialist; and traditional socialism washes its hands of the whole business.

Actually the situation is this: the socialist system of collective ownership is compatible with totalitarianism. It is, in fact, the basis of a new, all-devouring totalitarianism because of the new element of political centralization of all economic power.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC

But if the system of collective ownership may be the basis of totalitarianism, then the system in itself is not socialism. Collective ownership is socialist only if it promotes greater democracy and freedom. To argue the contrary is vulgar economic determinism, which distorts history—and our understanding of ends and means—by overemphasis on the economic factor, for any particular economic organization of society is capable of many superstructural variations. While collective ownership may result in socialism, the evidence now is overwhelming that it may also result in totalitarianism. And overemphasis on the economic factor in socialism leads to the most fantastic conclusions. Thus the Socialist Appeal, the American Trotskyist organ, argues that since "the Soviet Union remains, despite the Kremlin gang, upon the economic foundations laid down by the October Revolution," the invasion of Finland is justified, and "it is the duty of the Finnish workers to be Soviet partisans." That is determinist logic gone mad. It shows no awareness of the profound implications for socialist ends and means in the fact that totalitarianism and collective ownership are compatible.

Denunciations of Stalinism are not enough. Nor is it enough to say that a socialist economy must operate under democratic conditions. We cannot thus easily dispose of the disturbing conclusion that collective ownership is compatible with totalitarianism. The situation becomes still more disturbing if we draw, as I now think we must, another conclusion: there is a totalitarian potential in the socialist economic system. Russian communism exploits the potential but did not create it.

Here is a problem of which traditional socialism and Marxism were never fully aware, if they were aware of it at all. They took it for granted that socialism meant a higher democracy, and impatiently dismissed all arguments to the contrary—including the suggestive ideas of syndicalism and guild socialism. But taking things for granted in social dynamics spells trouble. We need a clearer understanding of democracy and its relation to socialism.

ACCENT ON DEMOCRACY

Democracy is always specific, never general. And it is always specific historical forces that make for democracy. What are those forces under capitalism? There are the separation of economic and political power—against whose feudal combination the early bourgeoisie fought—expressed in the theory of "that state is best which governs least"; the relatively widespread ownership of productive property, with its many independent sources of livelihood and a middle class of small independent enterprisers whose struggles against big property invigorated democracy; the free market and free competition, the spirit of which spread from the economic to the political and intellectual spheres in the democratic expression of conflicting class interests and ideas; and the independence of organizations in relation to the state (freedom of association), including labor unions whose whole drive was toward democracy. All these forces, many of which worked in an automatic fashion, insured at least a minimum of democracy under progressive capitalism.

These specific democratic forces are suppressed by a socialist system of collective ownership, especially if it is all-inclusive. The system means nationalization and planning, under which there is no automatic working of economic forces. It means the combination of economic and political power in an all-powerful state, under a bureaucracy with a monopoly control of the sources of livelihood. This in turn may mean the end of the independence of organizations, including labor unions, in relation to the state. There clearly is a totalitarian potential in such a set-up, which drives toward suppression of democracy even without dictatorship. Traditional socialism has always insisted that collective ownership of the means of production and distribution is economic democracy. It now appears, however, that the democracy is only potential. If the historical forces of democracy under capitalism are suppressed, new forces must be set in motion to insure democracy under socialism. Collective ownership, far from being enough, even tends in the totalitarian direction. The democratic potential of socialism, which may broaden and deepen democracy by destroying oligarchical economic controls, can be released only if the appropriate institutional arrangements are created to make the new collective controls democratic.

Again I suggest that non-Marxist radicals do not gloat. They may, in an "I told you so" spirit, cite Herbert Spencer's prophecy of "the coming slavery." But that prophecy arose out of a social Darwinism that is now exploded. They may use the admission of a totalitarian potential in socialism to argue, in a "let well enough alone" spirit, the merits of capitalist democracy. But that democracy was always limited, and it is now everywhere endangered by structural changes in capitalism which react against democracy. For the specific historical forces that gave life to capitalist democracy are passing away. They are not bound up with capitalism in general but with the specific competitive capitalism which has been replaced by monopoly capitalism. New democratic forces are not being created as the old ones pass away.

The "immutable" laws of the free market and free competition are wrecked by monopoly capitalism. Monopoly has severely limited the widespread ownership of independent productive property, which was one of the sturdier supports of democracy. Separation of economic and political power is breaking down under pressure of increasing state controls over economic activity; the controls arise partly out of the complexities of monopoly capitalism and partly out of capitalist inability to solve the economic crisis. Bureaucratic dangers multiply as the swollen state bureaucracy combines with the bureaucracy of corporate industry. The independence of organizations, especially labor unions, is constantly threatened. And the harassed middle class of small independent enterprisers tends to abandon its earlier democratic ideals in its increasingly desperate struggle for security and survival.

Capitalism is suppressing its own democratic forces. Fascism may complete the process. And what if fascism moves from ruthless regulation and limitation of capitalist property and profit to expropriation and nationalization? Ideological differences between fascism and communism would then mask the complete identity of a system neither capitalist nor socialist, in which a new bureaucratic ruling class uses economic collectivism as the basis of a new tyranny. And the differences themselves would merge, as they are already merging, in an identical totalitarian ideology.

Totalitarian dictatorships did not create the collectivism which is their economic basis. Collectivism is the product of modern industry. With its need for far-flung organization, bureaucracy, and planning, collectivism has a definite totalitarian potential—which carries over to socialism. From collectivism stem the increasing economic powers of government: the efforts, reactionary or progressive, to fashion new social controls for a collectivism that makes unworkable old institutions and ideas. There are totalitarian dangers in the situation. They lie in an indiscriminate multiplication of state powers, without democratic safeguards, that inflate bureaucracy and provide it with the means of becoming totalitarianism; in halfway measures that discredit democracy because they fail to solve the economic crisis and so provoke the desperation of capitalist reaction, fascism or communism. Collectivism is forcing readjustments that are transforming capitalism. The real radical job, as it now shapes up, is to democratize an economic collectivism that is inescapable and that may become the basis of a new totalitarianism.

The accent is on democracy. Yet if it is true that the economic readjustments of socialism must build upon democratic procedures and values to escape totalitarianism, it is equally true that democracy can escape totalitarianism only if it builds upon those readjustments. In that unity is the re-creation of democracy and socialism. They must join in the struggle for a cooperative commonwealth whose economic arrangement promotes freedom, individual dignity, and tolerance, and at the same time solves the economic problem. We are all doomed, whatever our democratic creed, if we do not grasp the meaning of the new situation.

[In next week's issue Mr. Corey will discuss ways of achieving and maintaining a more democratic economic order without the sacrifice of political democracy.]

Lewis, Roosevelt, and the U. M. W.

BY ROSE M. STEIN

Columbus, Ohio, February 2

THE failure of trade unionism to cope with the problem of unemployment was the undercurrent that ran through the miners' golden jubilee, held here in the birthplace of the United Mine Workers of America. Started fifty years ago with fewer than 20,000 members and only $139 in the treasury, the U. M. W. is now the largest and most powerful labor union in the world. It has 612,000 members. More than 90 per cent of the industry is under contract and check-off. It has a substantial treasury—$2,500,000—notwithstanding the heavy drain upon its funds caused by advances to new unions and the six-week work stoppage during the 1939 contract negotiations. Existing contracts run to 1941, thereby assuring in the normal course of events a continuous flow of income for more than a year. The union has stood the test of time and strain. It has had to surmount every possible obstacle: discrimination, discharge, black list, yellow-dog contracts, strikes, lockouts—long and bitter struggles with their accompanying evictions, hunger, bloody riots, terror of company police. Miners have gone to jail, fought, starved, and died so that the union might live. It has lived through good times and bad, wars, panics, dualism, factionalism, and above all through the vicissitudes incident to an anarchic and very sick industry.

As a trade union the United Mine Workers has reached the pinnacle of success. It has strength, prestige, resources, competent leadership, a loyal and disciplined rank and file. It has improved immeasurably the lot of its members. It has not only increased wage rates and bettered working conditions, but it has wiped out a thousand and one infringements of the miners' liberties. It has forced the recognition that the mining camps are part of the United States, with all the rights and privileges which that inclusion confers.

But with all these gains, the balance sheet shows the miners still in the red. The industry continues to ail. According to figures compiled by the Bituminous Coal Division of the Department of Interior there is a net average loss of eleven cents on every ton of coal mined and marketed. Under these circumstances the union will find it difficult to ask for upward wage adjustments when the contract comes up for renewal. The present base rate for a seven-hour day is $6 in the North and $5.60 in the South. On a tonnage basis it is possible to earn more than the base rate. This is a long way from the $1.50 for a ten-hour day that obtained when the union was first organized. It is likewise a long way from the millennium. As long as the miners cannot expect an average of even two hundred work days a year, their annual earnings remain below the requirement for health and efficiency. Partial unemployment and a low standard of living are their constant problems, and the situation threatens to get worse as other fuels reduce the amount of coal used.

Protection against mine hazards, which miners have been fighting for since the very early days of organization, is not only still inadequate but incommensurate with available safety devices. Every million tons of coal mined exacts a toll of three lives and approximately two hundred injuries. There was a time, as one of the veterans at the convention testified, "when it was cheaper for an employer to lose a worker than a mule." Great strides toward safety have been made, but the situation is still bad when it is possible to have such a disaster as occurred recently in Bartley, West Virginia, in which ninety-one lives were lost. For years the miners have been asking for a federal inspection law, and this is still being fought by the operators, who, according to Mr. Lewis, "seemingly have demanded through the years as one of their inalienable rights the right to kill and butcher coal miners rather than make the mines safe, because it costs money to make them safe."

These problems, particularly unemployment, cannot be settled through collective bargaining alone. They demand effective government action, and the government's persistent failure adequately to cope with them called forth Mr. Lewis's much-discussed political tirade:

> As the current year opens, the Democratic Party is in default to the American people. After seven years of power it finds itself without solution for the major questions of unemployment, low national income, mounting internal debt, increasing direct and consumer taxation, and restricted foreign markets. There still exists the same national unhappiness that it faced seven years ago.

There is nothing equivocal about this statement. Nor does it give a false picture. Can anyone contend that the Democratic Party does have a solution for unemployment, low income, mounting internal debt? The statement tells the truth, but for all that it is unfortunate. It is unfortunate because a responsible leader ought not to make a statement of this sort unless he is prepared to carry its obvious implications to their logical conclusions. It is a statement appropriate for Norman Thomas to make, not for John L. Lewis. Mr. Lewis has not gone Socialist. He has not broken with capitalism. He has not even reached the stage of seeking independent political action. He has merely decided to go on a political shopping tour, and on such a tour one should not break with the merchant who so far has offered the best terms. After divorcing himself, as Mr. Lewis did, from the President and the "third termites," what has he left?

Granting that Senator Wheeler has a better chance for nomination than most political prophets are willing to allow, Mr. Lewis is still left far from his goal. For Mr. Wheeler has made no commitments. In his speech before the miners' convention he emphasized his devotion to workers, to farmers, and to other groups. He pointed to the folly of need in the midst of plenty, but gave not the slightest inkling of how he would remedy the conditions he deplores. All one could gather from the Montana Senator's speech was that "Barkis is willin'."

The most serious feature of Mr. Lewis's political maneuver is his defiance of the will of his miners and of millions of other workers. From the emphasis given by the press one would think that forty-seven U. M. W. locals defied Mr. Lewis in asking indorsement for President Roosevelt for a third term. Exactly the reverse is true. Mr. Lewis defied the forty-seven locals. The resolutions were sent in long before he made his statement, and he most assuredly knew of them. The miners, on the other hand, did not know of the statement until it was read to them. And that goes for top-ranking officials, including the head of Labor's Non-Partisan League, who would be charged with the responsibility of effectuating any political policy adopted by the miners or the C. I. O. It looks as if only the luckiest of circumstances can save Mr. Lewis from finding himself out on a political limb. One of these lucky circumstances, from Lewis's standpoint, would be a decision by Roosevelt not to run. For if he does run, it will be Roosevelt and not Lewis who will control labor's vote.

So far labor has found a way of reconciling conflicting loyalties. A survey made since the convention reveals a series of rationalizations directed toward this end. I personally interviewed workers from many industries—coal, steel, men's clothing, glass, aluminum, railroad and electrical equipment and services—as well as white-collar workers and professionals devoted to labor's cause. All except those of a Communist tinge are for President Roosevelt and determined to vote for him should he run again. There can be no doubt about this attitude. It is clear and emphatic. At the same time the workers who profess it refuse to admit that they are going counter to Lewis's wishes. They believe—or profess to believe—that Mr. Lewis did not mean what he said, that he exploded a bombshell for some strategic reason which he cannot yet divulge. Their varied surmises as to what prompted this sort of strategy may be summarized as follows:

1. Lewis and the President had a secret understanding whereby Lewis was to frighten the Democratic Party into making concessions to labor which the President alone could not have forced.

2. President Roosevelt has done more for labor than any other President in history, and Lewis appreciates the fact. Labor, however, has become apathetic. It has come to take things too much for granted. Lewis intended by his speech to rouse labor out of its indifference and to stir it to more active support of the President.

3. The reactionaries were all set to defeat the President and the New Deal program but, now that Lewis has denounced both, will rally to their support. A bit of fine play-acting on Lewis's part and "smart" strategy.

4. It was an effective way to explode the anti-third-term myth and make possible President Roosevelt's re-election.

5. It was designed to prevent a deal between Roosevelt and the reactionaries of the Democratic Party for the vice-presidency. Lewis served notice that he wants no reactionaries, and so Senator Wheeler is a likely vice-presidential candidate to run with Roosevelt.

6. Lewis is a skilful negotiator. When he deals with the coal operators, they never quite know what he is up to until he swings them around to his way of thinking. He is using the same technique here, and no wonder the politicians don't know whether they are coming or going. He'll let them know when he is good and ready.

These are but a few of the major categories into which the surmises fall. There are many more. Out of them all emerge several general conclusions concerning the political views of the rank and file of labor. Roosevelt has been a great President and is a great friend of labor. Labor is for him and wants him to run for a third term. Lewis is a great labor leader. Therefore, he cannot be against Roosevelt. His statement to the contrary is a strategic move. The direction is not entirely clear, to be sure, but it will be made clear in time. It has already had one good effect. It has made labor think and be on its toes, ready for anyone who tries to put something over.

Does all this sound fantastic? Perhaps. Yet it is an accurate summary of the attitude of a large section of labor. Its significance is hard to weigh at this time. It will save face for Mr. Lewis and it will probably leave the political situation just as it was. In larger terms it may be regarded as a sign of labor's difficult transition from "pure and simple" trade unionism to a broader participation in the nation's political and economic affairs. It is regrettable that the transition is so confused, for these are critical times and the price of confusion may be high.

Turkey Is Not Neutral

BY NERMIN MUVAFFAK

Ankara, Turkey, January 16

ONE is hard put to catch the historical mood of the moment in a world in which the only quiet and unchanging spot is the no man's land between the Maginot and Siegfried lines. Even that may no longer be true when this article is read. Indeed, a great many things may be changed by then. But some things are certain: returning to Turkey after an absence that coincided with the outbreak of the war and the signature of the Anglo-French-Turkish pact, I find that the country has taken a turn in a very definite direction. Turkey today is not neutral. It is, like Italy—and will be perhaps for as long as Italy—non-belligerent. To one who has been following developments in Turkey during the past few years there is nothing startling in this fact, particularly when one remembers that Turkey is pro-Ally but not anti-Soviet.

Before war broke out there was much speculation about the possibly devastating effects of the undue expansion of Turkish and Balkan trade with Germany in recent years. Now once more the mysterious truth becomes apparent that when the wheels of war are set revolving, economic liabilities may well become assets, and assets liabilities. The fact that about 45 per cent of Turkey's export and import trade was with Germany used to worry a great many people. As I write, a delegation in London is negotiating for new outlets for Turkish trade and is exceedingly likely to be successful, while Germany seems ready to offer Turkey the moon in exchange for a little chromium. A new economic relationship has arisen between the Turks and the Nazis.

Interesting revelations of the new mood in Turkey are found in the daily press. In Turkey there is of course no openly partisan press since there is only one legal party. But without flying a banner it is possible to express shades of meaning, and this has been even easier of late. Formerly opinions about Germany had to be expressed with a certain amount of reserve. Now it is the pro-Nazi dailies that must guard against a too free expression of their sympathies. The anti-Nazi papers are having the time of their life, and all of a sudden it has become possible to acquire a great deal of knowledge concerning facts that one has always been curious about. I knew, for instance, in a dim sort of way, that there existed a Nazi propaganda and spying organization in Turkey. I had heard that the Nazis in Ankara kept track of the circulation of radical books through the sales of the Ankara bookstores. (Ankara is a city of only 125,000 souls, and it is a simple matter to discover the likes and dislikes of the people.) Now the press is suddenly full of the details. The Tan, an Istanbul daily of liberal tendencies, has been publishing a series of articles on the organization of German propaganda in Turkey. According to these articles the organization functions under the orders of a member of the staff of the German embassy and has headquarters in Istanbul, Ankara, and Izmir, in which cities there are small German colonies. The propaganda work is carried on not only in the German colony but also among members of Turkish student groups, the intelligentsia, and the commercial and industrial classes. In each of the three cities named above there are district leaders, not a few of whom are functionaries in Turkish institutions receiving Turkish pay. The leader in Ankara, according to the Tan, is a teacher of German in one of the Turkish schools.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

German methods of propaganda in Turkey are not confined to "cultural" pressure. The Tan cites instances of other types of pressure, naming names. At the time of Goebbels's visit to Istanbul it published an item about his interest in the local night clubs, whereupon its offices were visited by a representative of the Bayer Aspirin Company who threatened to withdraw all German advertising from the paper unless it modified its tone in regard to Germany. (German advertising in Turkey is said to be centralized in the hands of this representative.) Again, a German official connected with the Deutsche Orient Bank in Istanbul visited the editor-in-chief and placed before him a detailed statement of the paper's financial obligations, with an offer to meet all such obligations for a consideration. Two weeklies, Karikatür and Ak Baba, have also encountered efforts to exert advertising pressure on their policies.

A more general campaign has been raging in the press against German attempts to bring about a cooling off in Soviet-Turkish relations. Ambassador von Papen himself gave impetus to the campaign when, at an embassy dinner, copies of the German White Book, translated into Turkish, appeared beside the plate of every guest. Translations of an article in Pravda and of a speech by Molotov, both critical of the Turks, were sent to all the newspapers and appeared in the mail of a number of commercial firms and private citizens. This bit of intrigue was commented on copiously and forcefully in the Turkish press. The translations came from the information bureau of the German embassy, but where had they been printed? Anything can be published in Turkey provided it bears the names of the person or persons responsible for publication and of the publishing house. Both were missing. The Tan, always eager for an opportunity to show a link between official and non-official German agencies in Turkey, stated that the translations were hot off the press of the Turkische Post, the German newspaper published in Istanbul. A subsequent police raid of the offices of that paper proved this to be the fact. The police found vast quantities of the offending translations, and the editors of the Turkische Post finally admitted that the printing had been done at their press, but added that they had merely put through an order of the information bureau of the embassy, as they would that of any customer. Why they had not mentioned this commercial transaction earlier, in view of the clamor in the papers, they did not say. From that time on the Turks have been making their own translations from Pravda.

Ambassador von Papen

However, German interest in Soviet-Turkish relations has continued. The official German news agency, the D. N. B., reprinted articles from the German press entreating the Turks to be careful lest they become embroiled with their great neighbor, though this, the Turks understand, is just what Germany wants. A Viennese correspondent circulated a canard to the effect that President Inönü was contemplating a visit to Bagdad. This brought forth a full editorial by the Yeni Sabah's anti-Nazi editor-in-chief, Hüseyin Cahid Yalçin. In this rumor of a visit to Bagdad Mr. Yalçin saw an attempt to interpret the recent tripartite pact as a move against Russia. He quoted from articles in Bulgarian papers, which had eagerly picked up the morsel, to the effect that England and France hoped to make use of Turkey's prestige in Iran, Iraq, and Afghanistan, the countries of the Saadabad pact, to create a new cordon sanitaire stretching from the Black Sea to the Indian Ocean. In this manner Soviet Russia would be blocked in any attempt to combat British imperialism in southwestern Asia, and incidentally Turkey would have taken a position against Soviet Russia and would be open to attack by it. He added that the Bulgarian press was playing Germany's game and concluded as follows: "The Turkish people, who know the meaning of such words as friendship, pledge, and international honor, will never enter any enemy combination against the Russian people, with whom they are friends, and they will remain sincerely faithful to the Ankara tripartite pact." This is the Turkish position in a nutshell.

It need hardly be repeated that the Nazi campaign in Turkey has been conducted with the greatest possible lack of tact and understanding. The presence of von Papen in Ankara has rendered incalculable service to the cause of anti-Hitlerism. Every new move of the German embassy, reinforced by German commercial and financial interests in Turkey and by the D. N. B., justifies a new outburst in the press. Alone the Cumhuriyet occasionally raises its voice in defense of the Nazis. But even that paper has become considerably more moderate in its tone if not in its sympathies.

Yet firm as it is in its likes and dislikes, the press is no less so in its non-belligerency. While the Turks are resolved to live up to their obligations they have absolutely no intention of precipitating a crisis. "We live in extraordinary times," commented Zekerya Sertel in a Tan editorial. "Europe is engaged in a life-and-death struggle. With this struggle Turkey has no concern. The purpose of the young Turkish republic is to remain as far away as possible from this war of great nations, to live in peace and comfort, not to enter the mêlée until the danger reaches our frontiers." Having picked up no territorial tidbits in the last war, and lost only the crumbling remains of an empire that meant nothing but headaches, Turkey is more truly at peace with the world than any nation in Europe. As long as the present situation can be maintained, the Turkish people can make use of it to consolidate and improve their own position.

Today the Turkish republic enjoys a prestige unequaled in its recent history. All over Europe people are tuning in on the Ankara radio. The Anatolian News Agency maintains a radio news service in seven languages, twice a day, and on my way through Europe to Turkey I heard many persons say that they tune in on this in preference to Radio-Paris or the B. B. C. Ankara broadcasts repeat impartially the news of all the agencies, belligerent and non-belligerent, and though the gentlemen from Havas, Reuter's, D. N. B., and Stefani word their news items with an eye to the effect, one has an opportunity to hear them all and draw one's own conclusions.

Apart from this very significant orientation in the press and on the air, life in Turkey has not changed much since the war. A small air-raid flurry in the early days, when no one quite knew who would be dropping bombs from the sky on whom, has completely subsided. There are no blackouts, no gas masks. Prices have gone up a bit, as was inevitable after such fundamental changes in foreign trade, but there is no scarcity. Coffee and gasoline are plentiful and there is meat every day in the week for those who eat meat. It would be useless to pretend that events in the world at large are not being watched with an anxious eye. But the feeling does exist that Turkish statesmen are handling matters in the manner most advantageous to the country, and that the chances are fair for the continuance of the present situation, for a few months at least, perhaps for much longer.

Everybody's Business

Gold and Inflation

TWO weeks ago I pointed out that redistribution of our excessive gold holdings could only come about when we were willing to buy more goods and services from other countries than we sold to them. Until then, or so long as we are prepared to pay a fixed price for the metal, our hoard will continue to grow. It is possible to argue, however, that this process is not doing any serious harm and may in fact be doing some good. For while we have unemployed men and idle machines we might as well utilize some of them to make goods for other countries even if all we get in exchange is a metal of questionable intrinsic value. True, it is a form of pyramid-building, but even that is socially more desirable than allowing men to decay on relief.

The question arises, however, whether too much gold can harm our internal economy. Some people imagine that the larger the gold base of our monetary system the safer it must be. But it is a popular fallacy to believe that inflation can only come about through abuse of the printing-press. No matter what the medium of exchange may be, if the amount available expands while the supply of goods is unchanged, prices will rise. Our chief safeguard against inflation today is not the fact that every dollar bill is covered more than twice by the Treasury's gold holdings but the fact that our productive machinery is running well below capacity. Consequently any serious rise in prices would quickly stimulate output and thus provide its own corrective. Until we return to something like a state of full employment gold inflation will be only a potential danger.

Every new shipment of gold into this country leads to an increase in bank deposits and provides the basis for an increase in credit. But only a basis, for bankers are in a state of mind that makes them ultra-cautious about granting loans, and good borrowers lack confidence in their ability to use money profitably. As a result the banks are building up larger and larger reserves, which now exceed legal necessities by more than five and a half billion dollars. Many bankers and economists feel that this is a very unhealthy state of affairs, for if there were a sudden change in business psychology, and the present exaggerated pessimism gave way to a spell of equally unthinking exuberance, bank credit could be enormously expanded without the Federal Reserve authorities being able to check it.

The latter have two weapons at their disposal. They can sell government securities in the open market, thus reducing the total of bank deposits, and they can raise reserve requirements. If used early enough, the psychological effect of such moves would be very powerful, but there would be a natural hesitation to employ them to check a demand for credit which might well seem to denote merely a very desirable increase in business activity. And by the time boom proportions were reached stronger weapons would be needed.

The Federal Reserve Board itself believes that its brakes are too weak for an emergency. "The potential lending power derived by the banks from the receipt of this gold," a recent bulletin stated, "creates an unprecedented problem of control because the unused reserves of the banks are much greater than can be absorbed by the Federal Reserve authorities under present powers." Winthrop Aldrich, chairman of the Chase National Bank, agrees with this opinion and in a recent speech suggested that gold coins and certificates should be put back into circulation again so as to transfer some part of the Treasury's hoard to the pockets of the public and thus diminish the base of the credit pyramid. No doubt some people would be glad of the opportunity to fill up an old stocking with shining coins, but it is improbable that the Midas complex is sufficiently widespread to reduce seriously the amount of gold in the banking system.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Mr. Aldrich himself recognizes this and proposes further that the Federal Reserve Board should be given powers to increase reserve requirements beyond the present 26 per cent maximum. It is not certain, however, how much support he will get from the financial district for this plan. According to B. H. McCormack, writing in the Wall Street Journal, many bankers object to giving the Federal Reserve further powers to manage credit, and share the opinion expressed by R. C. Leffingwell, Morgan partner, in a memorandum recently presented to the TNEC, that "no man or group of men . . . can be wise enough to manage our money." At the same time its author suggested that one remedy for the gold situation was "to allow commodity prices to rise somewhat." In other words, Mr. Leffingwell is advocating a mild dose of inflation, which might, under present circumstances, be beneficial to our economy. Nevertheless, it is dangerous medicine unless antidotes are available at the point where a state of full employment is attained. For this reason it seems essential not merely to retain but to strengthen monetary management. Not otherwise can we hope to damp the potentially explosive possibilities of our gold hoard.

In the Wind

THE In the Wind editor can't let The Nation's seventy-fifth birthday slide into the past without sharing with readers a few of the many items, amusing or enlightening, encountered in earlier volumes of the magazine:

THE FIRST sentence of the first paragraph of the first page of the first number of the first volume read: "This week has been singularly barren of exciting events."

THIS ADVERTISEMENT appeared in the same issue:

"New Skirt for 1865
The Great Invention of the Age in HOOP SKIRT
J. W. Bradley's New Patent Duplex Elliptic (Or Double) Spring Skirt
This invention consists of Duplex (or two) Elliptic Steel Springs, ingeniously braided tightly and firmly together, edge to edge, making the toughest, most flexible, elastic, and durable spring ever used. They seldom bend or break. . . ."

A BITTER ATTACK on sweatshops was published on June 19, 1890. After painting a desolate picture of "Our Sweating System," the editorial concluded: "The beginning of summer is a bad moment to urge a reform on the attention of the more fortunate classes of the community; but we trust no one will go to the seaside or mountains without remembering the helpless tens of thousands who are left to swelter in the city in these stores and workshops, for a precarious livelihood, without determining that something shall be done next winter to relieve our civilization of this disgrace."

AN EDITORIAL called The Law of Population, published on April 9, 1868, observed: "The sentiment of love is one of the strongest and most valuable of the social bonds; but it is, nevertheless, not necessary that every time a lover kisses his sweetheart he should do so with an eye to the general weal." The author was E. L. Godkin.

A TWO-COLUMN analysis of The Etiquette of Smoking appeared in the issue of December 14, 1865. Its conclusions were: "The old maxim that the effect ceases with the cause does not apply to tobacco, the after odor of which is often more disagreeable to non-smokers than the immediate result of its consumption. Hence a gentleman should purify himself thoroughly after smoking before venturing into ladies' society, and a room where gentlemen are accustomed to smoke should be carefully ventilated and pastilled before it is used by ladies."

DEPLORING "OVER-EMPHASIS" on athletics in American colleges, The Nation of February 20, 1873, warned: "A college is something better than a training-place for athletes; it needs, indeed, a good hearty and healthy physical training to accompany and aid its intellectual work . . . but whether the intercollegiate regatta is a desirable means to the good end is a little doubtful, and the college authorities may be obliged to suppress it out of regard to higher interests. It may prove such an unnatural growth of the manly art of boating as is the prize fight of the equally manly art of self-defense."

ALTHOUGH E. L. GODKIN never heard of Martin Dies, The Nation of March 21, 1867, published a preview of Dies committee methods. Commenting on the report of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction The Nation wrote: "The demagogues are beginning to find the 'stump' a failing instrument; . . . even the Congressional speech . . . is but a feeble mode of expression. . . . Something had therefore to be found which would secure more attention than mere expression, whether oral or written, of individual sentiments, and which would, nevertheless, tend really to individual glorification—and this thing has been found . . . in 'reports' of Congressional committees. The process is a very simple one. A bill—or set of resolutions—is introduced . . . it is not intended that it should ever develop into a law; what is wanted is to make it the text of remarks in the shape of 'a report' by an ambitious committeeman who has an 'ax to grind.' . . . The report rarely contains anything but his own private and individual nonsense. . . . His composition goes forth to the country with the authority of the committee . . . with his name most prominently associated with it."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Eire's Case Against England

WHAT is the actual situation in Ireland that has produced the bombing outrages, for one of which Peter Barnes and James Richards have just been executed? Why is it that from the beginning of the war President de Valera, who has set his face like flint against the violence of the Irish Republican Army, has been gravely concerned lest the old enmity between Ireland and England flare up to such an extent that Ireland would no longer be neutral in the present war? Since most people have only the vaguest idea of the so-called Ulster situation, this would seem to be the moment to present a factual statement of the Irish case against England.

This is the way Eire sees it: By its Government of Ireland Act of 1920, for which not one Irish member voted, the British Parliament set up a separate government for "Northern Ireland," which contains 1,279,753 persons out of a total Irish population of 4,245,607, and comprises 3,351,444 acres of the total acreage of 20,375,925, or roughly one-sixth of the territory and three-tenths of the whole Irish population. This Northern Ireland includes Armagh, the seat of the heads of the Catholic church, as well as Downpatrick, the alleged burial place of St. Patrick. The reason given for this act was the necessity of protecting a minority declared to be of different race and religion. To this Eire replies that the religious difference exists but not the racial, and that there is in Northern Ireland a large Nationalist or Catholic minority which has been deprived by unjust laws and gerrymandering of its proper share of political power. Eire denies that Northern Ireland has ever been a unit socially, economically, traditionally, or administratively. Six of the nine counties comprising it were the old province of Ulster. The Catholic minority is alleged to be one-third of the total population.

The Irish point out that there are actually two administrative systems existing in Northern Ireland: the British government, which controls customs and excise, post office, telephone, navigation, external trade, navy and army and air force, and all questions of citizenship; and a government of Northern Ireland, which has no power over the main sources of its tax revenue and no control over its electoral laws. Its government and parliament are responsible to the people, but under a governor appointed, and mainly paid, by England. They declare that the financial arrangements have broken down from the very beginning and that Northern Ireland has failed to pay its way as prescribed by the Government of Ireland Act. The southern Irish maintain that the government of North Ireland is oppressive and tyrannical not only because the Catholic minority has been deprived of its proper share of electoral power, but because the principal guaranties of the liberty of the individual have been abolished, although Northern Ireland forms part of the United Kingdom and is supposed to be ruled by the British constitution. In addition, they assert, there is systematic discrimination against Catholics as to both employment and education.

What is it that the southern Irish wish England to do? Here I must quote the words of Captain Henry Harrison, who is one of the outstanding protagonists of a united and independent Ireland:

> The answer is clear. She [England] should hold the balance even. Britain should take immediate steps to terminate the unconstitutional oppression of the Nationalist or Catholic minority in Northern Ireland. Britain should also forthwith terminate her financial support of the partition of Ireland by direct and indirect subsidies. Northern Ireland of its own free will would then decide its own fate. It could lapse into the British system for all purposes and become an undifferentiated fragment of the United Kingdom if it so desired. There is little doubt, however, that sooner or later it would rejoin the parent body of Ireland on fair and freely negotiated terms. As soon as it ceases to be a British imperial interest (whether avowedly or covertly pursued) to keep Ireland divided by fomenting religious differences, Irishmen of the north and Irishmen of the south, whether Protestant or Catholic, will come together in cordial fraternization as they did in immense numbers in the Great War on the western front.

Obviously this last point is the all-important one. Would it really be possible for the Ulster Protestants to live happily within the Catholic fold of Eire? Or would it be merely the substitution of one oppressed minority for another? It would seem as if the British might be won over to a united Ireland if there could be agreement on this point, and if adequate guaranties could be given that the Ulster Protestants would be quite free. Meanwhile, the outlawed Irish Republican Army seeks to take advantage of England's involvement in the World War to force a solution favorable to Eire. But every time a bomb goes off, the cause of Eire is injured, in my judgment, because of the bitter anger aroused by these wanton crimes.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS'S "In the American Grain," for some years out of print, has just been reissued as the first title in the New Classics Series (New Directions, $1). The essays which make up the book do not fit into any conventional category. Even the term essay does not describe them unless we think of essay in its primary meaning as a word rather than as a formalized literary form. Using extensively the source materials of history, Mr. Williams is concerned with extracting from incidents and personalities in the American past their essential quality and meaning. His tools are the creative imagination, which is often more accurate than a slide rule, a capacity for direct perception, and a disciplined skill in expression which have made him one of the most original and accomplishing poets now writing.

The clue to his objective is contained in a paragraph in the essay on Père Sebastian Rasles:

> . . . [Americans] do not believe that they have sprung from anything: bone, thought, and action. They will not see that what they are is growing on these roots. They will not look. They float without question. Their history is to them an enigma.

And by history, of course, Mr. Williams does not mean dates and battles. One of the first essays is a reconstruction, extraordinarily moving and vivid with suspense, of the discovery of the Indies by Columbus; another recites the destruction of Tenochtitlan and the conflict between Montezuma and Cortez as leaders and as men. Other subjects are Cotton Mather's Wonders of the Invisible World, the Discovery of Kentucky, George Washington, Poor Richard. The last is Abraham Lincoln.

> It is Lincoln pardoning the fellow who slept on sentry duty. It is the grace of the Bixby letter. The least private could find a woman to caress him, a woman in an old shawl—with a great bearded face and towering black hat above it, to give unearthly reality.

Reading this book I was reminded of the seeds of grain buried in the tombs of the Egyptian kings which sprouted again when they were restored to soil and sun and moisture. That, essentially, is what Dr. Williams does with the facts he has chosen from American history. The result is a collection unique and fresh and very rich.

And now I must protest against the folly of reprinting Dr. Williams's book in type so fine that only the hardiest eyes can read more than a few pages at a time. I hope the rest of the New Classics Series will be spared the physical handicap of what seems to be eight-point type. (You are reading ten-point.)

Frederick Lewis Allen goes in for a very different treatment of history in "Since Yesterday" (Harper and Brothers, $3). His is the journalist's not the poet's-eye view, and where Dr. Williams broods over the sub-surface lineaments of our distant past, Mr. Allen charters a charabanc and whirls us through an exhibit of the nineteen thirties which is already half museum because many displays are designedly ephemeral and there is nothing so dated as last year's hat, unless it is the sweater suit of 1929 pictured in the frontispiece of Mr. Allen's book.

Mr. Allen's first chapter, which is a recapitulation of "what you were doing on September 3, 1929," demonstrates that the recent past can seem more remote than ancient history. On that day the big bull market reached its peak, though no one, alas, suspected it. Automobiles were angular in shape, and there were so many of them that on Labor Day, September 2, the roads leading into New York were choked for miles outside the city limits with returning week-end traffic. Prohibition was with us. Calvin Coolidge was still alive. Hoover had been six months in office. The first Silly Symphony had just appeared. The names in the headlines were those of Jimmy Walker, Senator Heflin, Mabel Walker Willebrandt, and Dolly Gann. And so on.

These are among the ephemeral exhibits. There were others, however, which received less attention at the time but have become more imposing with the years. Even in 1929, 78 per cent of the American population had family incomes of less than $3,000, some 40 per cent had less than $1,500. The farmers weren't getting along so well, and there were several millions of unemployed. There was a mountain of fixed debt.

After 1929, the deluge. Even now, when recovery is recovery only by comparison, the story of the first three years of the Great Depression reads like a tall tale, and Mr. Allen has recorded it with great skill. Banks failing, factories closing, the dams of private relief breaking before the tidal wave of unemployment and hunger, families evicted, schools closing—to the tune of business cheer campaigns and assorted idiotic capers of local Canutes.

The dramatic climax came in March, 1933, when a blight with the gay name of bank holiday descended over the entire country, and in the awful silence the voice of a new President boomed out the phrase about money changers fleeing from the temple.

That seems a long time ago. Since then we have had the experiments and palliatives of the New Deal. The money changers are still operating, but the government holds first, second, and third mortgages on the temples in Akron and Chicago and Cleveland. The Administration has put a cushion on the cold, cold ground: bank deposits, if you have any, are guaranteed up to $5,000; federal relief has taken the edge off starvation and cut down incitement to riot; we have the beginnings of a social-security system. In another sector industrial unionism has improved the lot of the mass-production workers. But the basic domestic problems remain unsolved, while fascism and a new war in Europe cast an ever-blacker shadow.

Inevitably Mr. Allen's narrative is much concerned with economics; but he never slights the human side, both tragic and comic, of a decade during which the American people learned so much, in the hard way, about the facts of life that the twenties seem now like an age of innocence. Mr. Allen points out that the tragic decade left unimpaired our civil rights and our capacity for optimism. We shall have need of both, and of the humor that did not fail, even in 1931. Remember "Oh, Yeah?"

MARGARET MARSHALL

A Synthesis of History

A STUDY OF HISTORY. By Arnold J. Toynbee. Volumes IV, V, VI. Oxford University Press. $23.

THE last 150 years have been years of unparalleled progress in all fields. It may be safely assumed that progress in these 150 years has been greater than during all the preceding centuries. This is also true of our knowledge of history. Work in archives has widened our knowledge as immensely as did archaeology. With this expansion of our historical horizon the task of synthesis becomes at the same time more imperative and more difficult. Of the living generation of historians few if any are as qualified as Dr. Toynbee to undertake this task. He seems as familiar with civilizations long past or far removed in distance as he is firmly rooted in the traditions of Western civilization, and he builds his structure on the secure foundations of the Graeco-Roman heritage and of the Bible. He shows a catholicity of mind and an urbanity of style which are unfortunately growing very rare today. His magnum opus—of which the first three volumes appeared five years ago, the second set of three volumes has just appeared, and further volumes are to come—has dealt so far with the geneses and growth of civilizations, and with their breakdowns and disintegrations. The volumes are, in spite of a certain repetitiousness and some obsolete peculiarities of style, not difficult to read. They should find a circle of appreciative readers outside the ranks of the professional historians. For they abound in fecund suggestions; they blaze new trails through the thicket of five thousand years of history; with a certain boldness in many of the hypotheses there goes a sober and slow-moving caution in the presentation of supporting facts which robs the book of the incisive brilliancy of Spengler's fascinating synthesis of history but provides it with a solid foundation and what will undoubtedly be a duration unknown to Spengler's dazzling, but passing, success. As Spengler's synthesis of history culminated in, and was written for, an analysis of present-day trends and their implications for the immediate future, in the same way one of the great merits of Toynbee's book is the light which it throws on our present situation and on the roads which mankind may travel toward its future destiny.

In a brief space the reviewer cannot do more than single out one or two of the fundamental conclusions of these 1,800 pages. The progress of civilization consists in finding effective responses to ever new challenges; the breakdown of civilization occurs if the creative minority is not any more able to find such responses, but proceeds instead to the idolization of institutions which no longer correspond to the needs of the new situation which has thrown up the new challenge. Our present crisis dates from the eighteenth century, when two new forces arose, democracy and industrialism. These two forces were not given free scope but were, so to speak, caught in the meshes of the existing institution, the parochial or national state. Democracy, however, is not parochial but universal.

> Its essence is the spirit of fraternity which knows no bounds but those of life itself. The natural field of action for democracy is then a field that embraces all mankind; and it is on this range that its spiritual potency is beneficent. But when this potent spiritual driving force is diverted into the mechanism of a parochial state, it not only ceases to be beneficent, but becomes malignantly subversive. Democracy imprisoned in parochial states degenerates into nationalism.

In the same way industrialism is a cooperative system of work which demands the organization of the earth into one single field of economic activity; otherwise it will die of asphyxiation. A perversion of industrialism corresponding to that of democracy has made it instead an instrument fortifying under the guise of economic nationalism the political parochialism of our civilization. Economic nationalism represents "an exploitation of the apparatus of a parochial state for the purpose of promoting the economic interests of its population at the expense of the rest of mankind." Therein lies the chief reason of our economic crisis, because economic nationalism attempts the impossible "in trying to harness the intrinsically ecumenical force of industrialism to a parochial aim." To these new ecumenical forces we have to adjust our institutions of sovereignty and of personal property. In a disintegrating civilization the challenge of a new situation is met, however, not by the response of adaptation to the new circumstances, but by the idolization of the past or of a historical phase, by the worship of the part instead of the whole, or in our case by an isolationism which is as strong in some of the democracies as in some of the totalitarian states, except that in the democracies it is pursued in opposition to the meaning of democracy itself. Without the wealth of the detailed examples brought from all civilizations and from all times for the substantiation of this statement, it seems somewhat barren and apodictic; the reviewer cannot do better than to send the reader to the volumes themselves, which after all is the purpose of all reviews.

This reviewer finds it impossible to agree with the sentimental and romantic longing for the catholicity of the Middle Ages at their height which seems to pervade Dr. Toynbee's discussion. It is in the age of Gregory VII that Dr. Toynbee sees the culmination of Western civilization. "Can Hildebrand [Gregory VII] arise again in his might to heal the wounds inflicted upon the souls of his flock" by later developments? To regard this as the greatest of all the questions that have to be answered in this twentieth century seems to me, at least in the formulation given by Dr. Toynbee, as much of an aberration from the real problem as is this other sentence: "If we have really lost the power or the will to practice the virtues of Gethsemane, then it is certainly better to practice those of Sparta or Walhalla than to practice none at all." Dr. Toynbee puts the question in the form of a tertium non datur of despair. A return to the eleventh century is impossible. If we have to look back, then it is better to raise before our eyes the short interlude of enlightened tolerance and width of horizon of the eighteenth century. But the response to the challenge of the twentieth century cannot be found in any "return." The twentieth century represents something fundamentally new in human history. Western civilization is not any more today a civilization, but the civilization. This civilization, under the impact of the ecumenical forces of democracy and industrialism, which arose only in the eighteenth century, is tending to become universal as no civilization before, and therefore incomparable to any preceding civilization. Dr. Toynbee has diagnosed our contemporary crisis rightly as the result of the anachronistic survival of the national state in radically altered circumstances. But they are altered beyond any possibility of comparison with the days of Augustus or Hildebrand. The Christmas message of the King of England and the Emperor of India to his peoples to fight for the preservation of Christian civilization seemed, at least to this reader, unfortunate and incongruous, not only because it is doubtful how far Great Britain can be identified with Christian civilization, but because the large majority of the people to whom the appeal was addressed were not Christians, but Hindus and Mohammedans, who might be called upon to defend a universal civilization, but who may doubt their mission to defend a specifically Christian civilization as much as probably did the Moors whom General Franco raised to the dignity of defenders of Christianity and the church.

There are some other conclusions which the reviewer is tempted to question, for instance, the underestimation of the fundamental contribution of French civilization to human progress, notably of that contribution which is connected with eighteenth-century France. Throughout the course of Western civilization France, especially again the rejuvenated France of the nineteenth century, has been an inspiration to the intellectual life and to the progressive forces of Europe. But any questions which the reader will interject from time to time in no way detract from the gratitude which he will owe to Dr. Toynbee. Even where he has to disagree he will be indebted to Dr. Toynbee for a provocative inspiration to think again, and to think out of a deeper knowledge, about the most fundamental and at the same time the most pressing problems of our time and all times. HANS KOHN

The German Enigma

THE OTHER GERMANY. By Erika and Klaus Mann. Modern Age Books. $2.75.

THE German exiles living abroad today are curiously free from bitterness and loss of perspective in regard to their native land. On the contrary their sense of responsibility and their political conscience seem to have been stimulated, forcing them to deal honestly and constructively with their own and the world's most burning problems: with Nazism and the roads toward and away from it.

The Manns have studied and analyzed the new Germany for years, but in their new book they build up a case for the defense of the "other Germany," the Germany which must be fitted into the historical perspective yet seems momentarily buried under the vast cruelty and barbarism of the present regime.

"Are the Germans Nazis?" the Manns ask at the beginning of their book. "No," they assert, but find themselves imme-

Thomas Mann's son and daughter speak out

Are all Germans Nazis? The son and daughter of Thomas Mann answer a passionate "No!" They reveal the real heart and mind of the eternal Germany which has survived under the Third Reich and will long outlive Hitler, and they indicate how Hitlerism will meet its doom. By the author of School for Barbarians in collaboration with her brother. $2.75

"Timely and valuable." — N. Y. Post • "It is not only informative and illuminating, it is stimulating."—Worcester Telegram.

THE OTHER GERMANY

By Erika and Klaus Mann

How economics works

Dr. Fairchild, famous educator, lecturer and author, in this stimulating volume, does for economics what Mathematics for the Millions did for mathematics. In words and 38 simple illustrations he shows how economics works and makes his topic absorbing, personal—and exciting. A must book for today's intelligent reader. $2.50

ECONOMICS for the MILLIONS

By Henry Pratt Fairchild

Lin Yutang say:

"Full of compassion and beauty. . . . She generates a human warmth which, as if by magic, makes all national differences disappear." $2.50

"Extraordinary and very moving."—Sat. Rev.

RESTLESS WAVE

By Haru Matsui

MODERN AGE BOOKS, INC.
432 Fourth Avenue New York City

diately confronted by a more fundamental question: "What are the Germans?"

> An enigmatic people, these Germans—the enigma par excellence, we sometimes think: the "bad boy" among the nations, at once melancholy and aggressive. . . . In a mixture of conceit and self-abasement they trumpet forth into the world: "Look at us! We are a singular people . . . we combine the noble melancholy of Hamlet with the rebellious insatiableness, the ever-striving unrest of Faust."

Concrete characterization of the Germans is, however, not easily accomplished. The Manns quote from Goethe, Nietzsche, Heine, and Heinrich Mann and point to characters like Luther, Frederick II, and Bismarck. Character interpretations of paragraph length must at best be sketchy and opportunistic. It is difficult to explain one nation to another nation by means of a hasty pageant of native genius, be it angelic or demoniac. Genius is always removed from the level of consciousness of the masses, and as the Manns themselves assert, "there never was [in Germany] any democratic, free, and easy contact between the creative spirit and the common people." One might, in fact, say that the Germans deny their genius.

Not getting too much enlightenment on Germany's many-faceted soul by examining her great men of the past, the Manns very sensibly turn to truth nearer home and give a rapid description of Germany in the twenties. They do so with tenderness, understanding, and nostalgia. They defend the Weimar Republic, although, they insist, there might be a lot to say about "its faults and weaknesses." The republic wasn't bad, they keep on reiterating.

No, the republic wasn't "bad," but it was not imbued with realism. The Manns quote Article 151 of the Weimar constitution in defense of the lofty spirit of its originators. "Economic life is to be ordered according to the principles of justice with the aim of guaranteeing everyone a livelihood consistent with human dignity. Within these limits the economic freedom of the individual is to be secure." Considering the time, place, and circumstances into which the young republic was born, such optimistic phrasing seems audacious if not downright demagogic.

The best and freshest part of the book begins when its authors deal with the present regime in Germany and its actual and potential threats to the world. Here they report from first-hand knowledge, and they do it with discrimination and fire. But they seem certain that once Hitler is disposed of and the Nazi system destroyed all will be well again, that the Germans will then no longer be "bad" but "good."

> All the Germans need to do is to find themselves—and they will find their way to Europe. They are not to deny but to fulfil their national character. . . . Let them but listen to the noble voices that spring from their own midst! Let them follow the eloquent counsel of their own great, the flowing enthusiasm of their own music, the wisdom of their own philosophers!

Yes, all would be well if the whole complex business labeled "Nazism" could be made an affair of morals and, possibly, aesthetics. Unfortunately there are political and economic sides to it, too. Since 1918 Germany has actually had two revolutions. Twice—in 1919 and in 1933—it has changed its political regime and started to rebuild its economic system. It has done so from grim necessity. Even behind the repulsive and ridiculous front of the Nazi regime, there worked a steady impulse toward economic recovery. I say "worked," because since all this second impulse did was to precipitate a war, it too obviously failed. But after the war what? The will to survive and not the desire to be "good" or "philosophical" will push the nations into a coalition of cooperating states. Nor can the question now be solved as to whether this coalition will be voluntary—dictated by idealism—or enforced—dictated by the strongest state. The Germans may "find themselves"; this means, I suppose, that the inner springs of the nation's soul are to be touched so that the milk of human kindness and mutual understanding will flow again. But this utopian recipe à la Rousseau has never proved adequate in the establishment of a well-functioning society of nations.

The masses in Germany today are political fanatics to an unheard-of degree. To make them adapt themselves to more liberal standards of government and a universally established humanitarian code will demand years of systematic education. Paradoxically one might add that no liberal leader could accomplish such a task, nor will it be actually brought about unless such education is made tempting by a program of universal economic cooperation. TONI CHRISTEN

Huxley in Hollywood

AFTER MANY A SUMMER DIES THE SWAN. By Aldous Huxley. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THIS is Aldous Huxley writing very much in the manner of Aldous Huxley, which is to say, in the manner of a twentieth-century Swift, with a withering contempt for the human animal. To him, practically everyone is eyeless in Gaza, at the mill with slaves, each pushing his puny shoulder against the colossal stone of his own stupidity. The only happy people in his novels are those who live on the completely "animal plane" of appetite and its satisfaction and those who live on the "eternal plane" of stoical realism, forgetful of self, armored against desire. Of the latter type he usually places one in every novel to comment philosophically on the action, presumably voicing the author's own views, and Mr. Propter serves volubly and well as Huxley's mouthpiece in this latest devastating fable. "After Many a Summer" excoriates two human weaknesses: one local and specific, the other more or less universal. The local foible is Hollywood, which has been much more acidulously caricatured by writers who know it better—last year, for example, by Nathanael West in "The Day of the Locust"—and the general one is man's longing for eternal life. Here Mr. Huxley is on more familiar ground, for he can bring all of his tremendous learning in literature, philosophy, and science to bear on the absurd yet pathetic gropings of Jo Stoyte, a fabulously rich entrepreneur who surrounds himself with Arabian Nights' luxury in abominable taste and lives in terror of the conqueror worm. He knows that money cannot buy immortality, but at least it can buy the services of Dr. Obispo, a Mephistophelian scientist pursuing the secret of longevity.

To explain how a pleasant but grotesquely ineffectual

British gentleman and scholar helps to set Dr. Obispo on the right track would be giving away too much of the story, which is told with the usual Huxleyan compound of brilliant epigram, fantasy, irony, suave erudition, and skilful lubricity. If you have liked the earlier displays in the Huxley freak show, you will find this very good entertainment; if the others have shocked or bored you, steer clear.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

Colorful China

THROUGH CHINA'S WALL. By Graham Peck. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

OLD China hands invariably possess a lore regarding things Chinese which is fascinating to a novice. But they lack something which every newcomer to China possesses—capacity to see the color and the romance on every side. No old-timer could have written "Through China's Wall," because the things which Mr. Peck finds so exciting and colorful are, for the most part, merely the stage setting for China's real drama. For the average reader, the observations of the newcomer are the more absorbing because he sees the country and its people as the reader himself would see it if he had the opportunity to make the same trip.

This is not to suggest that Graham Peck is merely a novice who skims the surface in this fascinating story of his travels. It is rather to his credit that after more than two years in China he was able to impart all the freshness of a first impression. At the same time he has been able to assemble a mass of detail and folklore which would do credit to an observer with many more years' experience. To be sure, Mr. Peck had advantages of travel paralleled by few foreigners. After a stay of several months in China's most romantic city, Peking, he made an unusual and highly interesting trip to Kweihwa and from there into the Mongolian desert, spending a month as guest of a Mongolian chief in a yurt far removed from any town. The fact that he made this trip only a few weeks ahead of the advancing Japanese may mean that he was the last foreigner to see old Mongolia free from the Japanese yoke. His description of this remote region is both realistic and romantic. It is the kind of travel writing that makes the reader take out the literature of his favorite tourist agency and try to figure out the cost of a trip to the Far East. The sketches which accompany the text, Mr. Peck's presumable excuse for undertaking the trip, are fully as exotic.

After returning from Mongolia, Mr. Peck traveled down to Shanghai and thence up the Yangtze to Ichang and Chungking, settling down for a time at Chengtu in China's Far West. A brief trip to the borders of Tibet followed, after which he journeyed through Yunnan to Hanoi and back to Peking, in time to be on hand for the incidents which led to the present war. The last few chapters are darkened by the Japanese invasion, but this does not detract from the charm of the book. One is merely glad that a writer of Mr. Peck's descriptive powers saw the country before it was laid waste by the invader or modernized by its struggle for independence. For regardless of the outcome of the war, the China described in this book will never be seen again.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Thousands of extra copies of the 75th ANNIVERSARY NUMBER have been printed to fill the orders which are pouring in from schools, organizations, and clubs which need the issue for group use, and from subscribers who wish copies for friends.

Since the supply is running low, we urge individuals as well as groups to take immediate advantage of these rates:

5 copies - $1

12 copies - $2

more than 12 copies - 15c each

●

Single copies - 25c

Send your order and remittance to

THE Nation 55 Fifth Avenue, New York

Human Being into Saint

TESTAMENT OF FRIENDSHIP: THE STORY OF WINIFRED HOLTBY. By Vera Brittain. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IN HER "Testament of Friendship," a chronicle of the life of Winifred Holtby, Vera Brittain has succeeded in embalming her friend, sealing her up in air-tight devotion. The events of Miss Holtby's life are recorded with scrupulous fidelity, but a protective anxiety has taken a strangle-hold of Miss Brittain, and only rarely does her subject slip through the network of excellent prose and emerge as a fallible human being. "Winifred," says Miss Brittain, "was a saint."

Starting in Yorkshire, Winifred Holtby's birthplace, the story runs evenly through her school days, war-time service, life at Oxford, her journalistic bombardment of the not over-enthusiastic press, her lecture tour in South Africa, and so on. The growth of her success was steady and unspectacular. It increased with her increasing preoccupation with social and economic problems, and culminated in the acclaim that greeted her posthumously published "South Riding." Her concern for the oppressed and exploited was undoubtedly sincere, but her substantial middle-class background manifested itself in a trace of smugness in her attitude to those whose lot she strove, genuinely, to better.

Had the friendship of Vera Brittain for Winifred Holtby been untinctured by idolatry, "Testament of Friendship" might have been less redolent of an epitaph. The sustained impulse of the writer has been to extol, with the result that she has fabricated a woman in the semblance of a ministering angel, whose wings overshadow every human relationship. There is more than a suggestion that Winifred Holtby herself embraced too willingly the role of benefactress, shouldering the burdens of her multifarious relatives, friends, and acquaintances with a high-mindedness that evaded the rough and tumble of more equal contacts.

The last part of the story tells of her struggle against the encroachment of dire and lingering sickness, and of her final, almost gracious, acceptance of the knowledge of untimely death.

EILEEN HOLDING

MUSIC

THE campaign to get the public to pay $1,970,000 for the antiquated Metropolitan Opera House has begun; and the air is thick with the dust that is being thrown into the public's eyes. There has been talk, for example, of saving opera, which is not subsidized here as it is in European countries—conveying to some people the idea that the producing company is in financial trouble, when in fact it is not. Or the talk is of preserving opera's historic home—conveying the notion of an opera house with which the functioning and excellence of the producing company are so integrally bound up as to be impaired if it were lost, when in fact the Metropolitan, behind and in front of the proscenium arch, is possibly the worst theater in the world for its purpose. Or conceding its defects, which they promise to remedy, the Metropolitan directors contend that it is the only theater available, and that if it is not saved—that is, bought—opera is lost; when in fact opera could be given in a new opera house, and if the members of the Metropolitan Realty Company really are compelled to sell the old building by the failure of some stockholders to pay their assessments they should be willing not to sell if the deficit is made up, until the new opera house can be built.

The talk is also of "a true national music center" which will serve "broad public interests"; and this has caused even the Times, at last, to observe that "no one can cherish the illusion that the Opera House itself, in its present form, can serve such a purpose," and to conclude that if the interior cannot be remodeled "to serve the greatest good of the greatest possible number . . . plans for a new opera house should be resolutely kept in mind." Perhaps the Times, commenting on the promises of alterations backstage and more comfortable seating arrangements for the public, will point out that the additional space needed backstage is to be found only in Seventh Avenue, and that the public which is to be made more comfortable turns out to be the one which can afford the parterre boxes that are not subscribed for by their present owners, or the expensive seats that are to replace the grand-tier boxes.

But the Metropolitan directors have a more powerful ally than the Times in David Sarnoff. A friend told me recently of an occasion when his wife's parents, here on vacation from a mission in China, decided to make the farewell party a visit to the opera, and paid $8 for four seats in a rear row of the side of the Balcony for a performance of "Der Rosenkavalier" which was mostly invisible and only indistinctly audible. One would not expect this to be of concern to Mr. Cornelius Bliss or Mrs. August Belmont sitting downstairs all their lives; but Mr. Sarnoff began life as a poor boy whose love of opera may well have led him to pay $2 for a seat from which he could neither see nor hear; and one would suppose that today he would want the poorer opera lovers not to be mistreated in this way and would not ask them for money to insure the Blisses' and Belmonts' continued enjoyment and their own continued mistreatment—that wishing to see opera go on he would offer the help of his broadcasting network only for a campaign for a new opera house. And much the same thing can be said of Mayor LaGuardia.

My friend's story is one answer to President Roosevelt's statement that "grand opera has now become, in a real sense, the people's opera rather than the possession of only a privileged few." The President had in mind, of course, the millions of radio listeners all over the country who hear the performance that is broadcast once each week and who do not suffer from the present opera house's inadequacies. But as long as what they hear originates not in a studio but in a theater in which performances are given six or seven times each week for paying audiences of two or three thousand, this theater should serve the performers and audiences in a way that the Metropolitan Opera House does not and cannot possibly serve them.

W. J. Turner has pointed out that the passion, violence, demoniac intensity one is aware of in some of Mozart's music are crystallized into the purest, simplest, clearest, most delicate of musical forms, and that it is this fact which makes Mozart the supreme classical artist. It also provides a standard of judgment of performance: there was always a question whether Toscanini's performance of the G minor Symphony was not too explicitly impassioned for the style in which the emotional content of the work was implicitly crystallized; and now, on the records issued by Victor (M-631, $6.50), it is tumultuous, ferocious. On these records, also, it has a harshness of sound and an occasional blurring of sharp contour which are the fault not of Toscanini but of the place where the recording was made, and therefore of N. B. C., which prefers to broadcast and record Toscanini's performances imperfectly rather than admit that its studio is less than perfect for the purposes. But even with the defects in style and recording the performance has qualities that make any Toscanini performance something to marvel at.

The sounds which come from Stokowski's new set of Debussy's Three Nocturnes (M-630, $6.50) are fabulously beautiful; and on the record of "Fêtes" (2034) they add up to a superb performance of the work, recorded at different volume levels on the two sides and with a break, regrettably, in what should be the continuity of the procession. On the other hand, the lush sonorities on the record of "Nuages" would be better suited to the emotions of that famous "simple, sensuous, passionate being" on the morning after his famous afternoon; and for a performance which conveys the aspect of sky and clouds that Debussy intended one does best to acquire Inghelbrecht's version (Columbia P-69314-D). And "Sirènes" one can neglect entirely.

B. H. HAGGIN

FILMS

"PINOCCHIO," Walt Disney's second feature-length picture, is a free version of Collodi's fantasy; it tells the story of the puppet given life by the Blue Fairy and changed into a "real boy" when he proves in many adventures—after initial failures—his truthfulness, courage, and unselfishness. The picture surpasses "Snow White" in many respects though not in all, and presents at least three unforgettable characters: the amorous cat, the jealous fish, and the pompous, humorous cricket—the puppet's good but not too watchful conscience. Everybody, young and old, the world over will enjoy them thoroughly. They steal the show even from Pinocchio himself, who cannot compete with their personalities—the emphasis being on his adventures and not on him as an individual.

There is a variety of fantastic milieus: the woodcarver's shop full of clocks as only Disney can construct them; Stromboli's stage show with the best dancers yet produced; Pleasure Island, where children are allowed to behave like the villains they are, to smash mirrors and whole houses, to drink beer, and to smoke thick cigars, and are finally turned into jackasses—a scene of unsurpassed dramatic power; the journey to the bottom of the sea; the sojourn in the belly of the whale and the escape. Each sequence is full of life, satirical comment, color, and movement. Moreover, the sequences follow one other in a grand rhythm, yet, paradoxically,

64 TO 1
You're right with LAFAYETTE'S
Radio Line

Is it a portable? . . table model for office, den or "upstairs" . . . car radio . . . magnificent phono-combination? Lafayette has it. 64 distinct—and distinctive—models to choose from. All different in style and purpose, yet alike in this: dollar for dollar, Lafayette is finer in tone, superior in performance, greater in value than any other radio of your acquaintance. We invite you to visit our showroom nearest you for convincing proof of this statement. Or write for free catalog 78N. You can spend more, but you cannot buy a better value than Lafayette.

LAFAYETTE RADIO
100 SIXTH AVENUE ▪ NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
24 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

CREATIVE ENERGY
By MAX SCHWARTZ

How can the social and economic problems be solved without adopting the methods of communism, fascism, or nazism?

Why has science failed to prevent war? Can science lead mankind to freedom? What role is the United States destined to play among the nations of the world?

Answers to these and to many other questions may be found in this recently published book. A book in which the author approaches man and the universe from a new point of view. It is an attempt to construct a philosophy by way of science. $1.50 prepaid

J. CASPY, 648 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

You may buy

BOOKS

through The Nation

▼

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C.O.D.

▼

Please address your orders to

The Readers' Service Division
The Nation ▪ 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

TEST YOUR LITERARY MEMORY—FREE

as you enjoy the Saturday Review's special 12 weeks' offer

A booklet of ten quizzes based on the characters and events of famous books has been prepared by the Saturday Review of Literature.

Here are questions chosen from some of the quizzes:

What was Benjamin Franklin's feminine pen-name?

Who, while swimming the Bristol Channel, lost his toes because a porpoise carried away the piece of flannel in which his nose was wrapped?

Which super-sleuth was a brilliant Shakespearean actor who retired when he became deaf, and turned his talents to crime detection?

Who shot herself, hoping that the sound would warn her lover of his imminent capture?

The booklet will be sent free to all who take a trial subscription to the Saturday Review—12 weeks for $1. (That number of copies at the retail price would cost $1.80)

The SRL will, during the next twelve weeks, contain scores of sharply written articles on literature, profiles of authors, pre-views and reviews of new books, and reminiscences about old ones—all by distinguished critical names. The quiz booklet will give you several evenings' entertainment—itself a dollar's worth of fun.

Before your memory fails, fill out the coupon below, and get the 200 literary brain-testers (with answers) and the SRL for 12 weeks.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE

THE SATURDAY REVIEW, N-1
420 Madison Avenue, New York City

Please send me "A Collection of Literary Quizzes" and 12 weeks of the Saturday Review. $1.00 is enclosed.

Name ....

Address ....

City and State..

the whole picture seems smaller than its parts. The paradox is not difficult to explain. After achieving the creation and perfection of the cartoon film, Walt Disney is still on his way. He has worked out his means and is master of his technique. With "Snow White" he accomplished the step from the short to the full-length picture. "Pinocchio," with its variety of milieu and action, gives him the occasion to consolidate his technical position. It is, because of this same variety, a less homogeneous story. One misses some of the relaxation which the lyrical parts of "Snow White" provided, and also its stronger central idea. That this is so in spite of the excellence of detail shows only how far the cartoon film has once more been advanced. It is now equal to any theme. Consequently attention and demand are already shifting from the form to the content.

After "Pinocchio" one looks forward to "Fantasia," announced as Walt Disney's next production, with excitement. He will understand that we do not call him a "timeless genius," or "Pinocchio" the happiest event since the Armistice or even since the outbreak of the present European war. He shows in his work too great a sense of proportion not to smile to himself at the labels pinned on him and his productions. He is obviously far from his own goal and will therefore take extravagant notices—they differ from the reactions of the audience, which left "Pinocchio" in a divided mood, half smiling, half bewildered—not at their face value but as a symptom of escapist tendencies in a cruel time.

"The Fighting 69th" (Warner Brothers) is "Angels with Dirty Faces" all over again, in a war setting and sprinkled with historical incident and patriotism. James Cagney plays his bad East Side boy and Pat O'Brien the noble priest who never gives up trying to save him. The boy is as tough, cynical, and lonesome as ever, always ready to pick a fight behind the trenches, but shell-fire he cannot bear. He deserts, is caught, and is sentenced to death, only to escape in the last moment, this time to the front to die as a hero. Cagney is excellent. The variety of his expressions of fear is frightening. Otherwise the picture is a concoction which misuses a great theme by selling in new guise the stale melodramatics of the gangster films.

In "The Shop Around the Corner" (MGM) one finds genuine entertainment. Here is Ernst Lubitsch at his best, exploiting the good hearts and little peculiarities of nice average people. One is amused from beginning to end without being interrupted by stupidities or tastelessness. James Stewart plays a romantic inhibited salesman to perfection. Frank Morgan, Felix Bressart, Joseph Schildkraut, and Margaret Sullavan make up a most amiable supporting cast.

FRANZ HOELLERING

In Early Issues of The Nation

Hermann Rauschning's "THE VOICE OF DESTRUCTION"
Reviewed by Franz Hoellering

Erskine Caldwell's "TROUBLE IN JULY"
Reviewed by Margaret Marshall

Elizabeth Wiskemann's "PRELUDE TO WAR"
Reviewed by Rustem Vambery

Peter Quennell's "CAROLINE OF ENGLAND"
Reviewed by Louis Kronenberger

BURLINGAME

Letters to the Editors

Polls and Politics

Dear Sirs: Writing from the standpoint of one with some experience in social and regional surveys I must agree with much of what James Wechsler said in his article on Polling America in your January 20 issue.

No one with any experience with newspapers can deny the implicit pressure, not to say censorship, of a predominantly conservative press. But it must be conceded that most of this censorship is honestly exerted. The same forces that have served to insulate the politician have isolated the editor from large sections of his community. He honestly doubts any poll which does not reflect the conservative trend of the only class with which he has any extensive contacts.

But Wechsler, in common with most commentators on the polls and, indeed, with many professional statisticians as well, falls into one very bad error. This is best illustrated in his comment that because Roper employs only 72 persons, whom he knows intimately, as against Gallup's 1,000, mostly unknown to him, "if one or two of his staff go wrong, their defections will have proportionately greater impact on the result." This is to ignore the difference in the probability of error. Roper can virtually eliminate field errors by careful personal choice of staff, adequate training, and close personal supervision. The very size and distribution of Gallup's staff means that most of them must have been selected on the recommendation of persons who themselves may have no comprehension of the requirements of statistical surveys (in one case I know, the town preacher). Whether or not Gallup can "guarantee their integrity" is beside the point. Chosen haphazardly, insufficiently trained and supervised, they will inevitably make major field errors, and these errors will not counterbalance one another. For reference, look at the individual state errors in Gallup's 1936 poll. The greater accuracy of Roper's 1936 Presidential poll was not entirely chance.

All poll critics overlook the value of personal field experience to the polltaker. Only by actual participation in the field work is the chief in a position to interpret results properly. Roper's habit of doing some of his own field work gives him a check that Gallup cannot hope to duplicate.

Finally, no one can hope to make a good survey in an area with which he has no more than a casual tourist's acquaintance or simply book knowledge, or on a subject or situation with which he is not thoroughly familiar. Gallup's accuracy in New York elections speaks well for his current knowledge of that area and its politics. His results in my own more distant state of Minnesota have not been so felicitous. In 1936 he predicted that Roosevelt would get 50 per cent of the vote. The final count revealed a landslide of 62 per cent. Worse yet, he claimed to have found this summer that 81 per cent of Minnesota voters approved of our present Republican Governor, Harold Stassen. No one with an accurate knowledge of Minnesota politics would have released such a result. No candidate for governor in Minnesota has ever received over 60 per cent of the vote; and that includes the much more popular Floyd B. Olson. Indeed, as part of one of my own polls, I made a very careful check with a similar question and found that 45 per cent, not 81 per cent, actually approve of Stassen's administration.

Before closing let me emphasize that I believe implicitly in the personal integrity of both Roper and Gallup. But I also believe that Gallup is endangering his own prestige and the standing of polls in general by mass-production methods unsuited as yet to statistical surveys, and by expansion into local surveys where his knowledge, experience, and supervision are inadequate.

C. T. WASSON

St. Paul, Minn., February 9

Pacifist Defense

Dear Sirs: As I am a pacifist, a Socialist, and an Englishman, I may be excused for feeling some indignation at the assumptions which Reinhold Niebuhr, in The Nation for January 20, makes about pacifism, socialism, and England. The whole of his essay seems to me to be emotive rather than factual. I will content myself with a few citations from Mr. Niebuhr about pacifism. "The pacifists measure them [the evils of capitalist society] against an ideal world in which there will be neither coercion nor resistance"; "[their] attitude of irresponsibility . . . religious perfectionism"; "a religious and moral absolute such as perfect love"; "the disinclination of the pacifists to look at the horrible consequences of tyranny"; "the attitude of cynicism prompted by a disappointed idealism is morally intolerable. But that is a lesson which our present generation of college students has yet to learn"; "pacifism is all the more popular in the churches because it is unconsciously mixed with the national fear of being involved in the war."

Mr. Niebuhr would not speak so glibly of "the pacifists" if he were really acquainted with their views. The curious opinions he imputes to them may be held by someone somewhere, but they are not the opinions of most pacifists in Europe or in America. If Mr. Niebuhr thirsts for knowledge let him reread Huxley's "Ends and Means" and Bertrand Russell's "Which Way to Peace?"

I am not a cynic or an idealist, either in the philosophic or the ethical sense. I don't want to discuss the absolute of perfect love, but it was Mr. Niebuhr's Jesus, not a modern socialist, who said "Be ye perfect." Indeed, I am perfectly satisfied to think in terms of "relative tyranny and relative democracy." Nor do I look to find a world in which there is no resistance. Nor do I care that pacifism is the more popular because there is a national fear of being involved in war. I am glad the people fear being involved in war.

I think college students are wiser than their elders if the chief plank in their platform is "Keep America out of war" and if they consistently urge the United States government to avoid entanglements with the Allied cause. That does not disincline them "to look at the horrible consequences of tyranny" in the German Reich, or even in the treatment meted out to the Negroes in America or to the natives in India.

E. RUSSELL BENTLEY

New Haven, Conn., February 7

More Birthday Greetings

Dear Sirs: Radicals believe in yanking things up by their roots and remaking them. Liberals believe growing organisms can be shaped and directed by continuous and judicious fertilizing, grafting, and pruning. Conservatives believe the social organism should be let alone to follow solely its past habits of growth. The liberal belief in the possibility of social improvement by a continuous series of changes in the right direction is thus under continuous cross-fire, from the conservatives who oppose change and from the radicals who wish complete change.

The Nation's greatest strength has been in its continuous espousal of this middle yet forward-looking position. Liberals come to power are only too likely to be appalled by the magnitude of social problems and the slowness with which efforts to correct them can take hold. The Nation has put constant pressure on liberals in power to prevent their becoming "tired liberals" and, therefore, ineffective ones. Liberal programs are under constant attack and sabotage by conservative groups and vested interests, often on a basis of misunderstanding and lack of knowledge. The Nation has kept a continuous spotlight upon the activities of such groups, has emphasized the real points at issue, and thus has helped to illumine and clarify the problem. At the other extreme, The Nation has paid equal attention to the program and objectives of radical groups, and tried to distinguish clearly between the aid they could give to progressive social action and extreme programs which might actually tend to block helpful liberal progress.

In the confused world of today the position of the liberal is often a lonely one. Power politics, authoritarian ideologies, and extravagant nationalisms are muddying the waters of doctrine, social and economic action, and international affairs alike. The liberal can easily decide whom or what to dislike or distrust. He finds it harder and more hazardous to decide whom he likes or whom he can trust. Liberals need inspiration, information, and guidance more than ever in such troubled times. I hope The Nation will long continue as one of the major focal centers in this field.

MORDECAI EZEKIEL
Washington

Dear Sirs: Congratulations for The Nation on its seventy-fifth birthday are congratulations for the vitality of a democratic people's will to know the whole truth about themselves.

Ever since I was aware that the daily grist of print did not select for emphasis the things that were really important, or did not tell me all I felt I needed to know about those things, I have been reading The Nation to be sure of perspective. In the last few years in particular, The Nation's determined realism about affairs in Europe and Asia has been an indispensable corrective to an Irishman's optimistic instincts.

In wishing you many more birthdays I am wishing help to all who want to know.

THOMAS G. CORCORAN
Washington

Dear Sirs: I am pleased to send my greetings on the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of your magazine, wishing you may always remain as you are at present—ripe but young.

Paris JUAN NEGRIN

Dear Sirs: I consider The Nation, without flattery, one of the most important and significant organs of contemporary thought in the world. I do not always agree with it. I feel that The Nation has at times been swayed by influences which were not perhaps always favorable to the principles of our civilization, today so gravely menaced. But its errors, when it has committed them, have never been systematic. And it has proved over a long past that it always finally finds the right road again. I believe that it will continue to be a record of our era and a guide for our generation.

JULES ROMAINS
Saint-Avertin, France

Dear Sirs: It is a pleasure and a privilege to join in congratulating The Nation on its seventy-fifth birthday. I have been reading it since my high-school days and would feel lost if a week went by without my copy. Even when I was in the army during the World War, I somehow managed to get hold of it now and then and enjoyed its stimulating and informative contents.

I don't always agree with The Nation's articles and editorial views. In fact, sometimes I think they are pretty screwy, especially some of the pieces by elder "statesmen" who do more ranting than reasoning. But the magazine is a vital and necessary factor in our country, and its undiminished existence for many, many more birthdays can only be the wish of every patriotic American.

Washington ROBERT S. ALLEN

Dear Sirs: I congratulate The Nation on its seventy-fifth anniversary. It represents one of the finest characteristics of the Union, fearless and independent opinion. If I had not sometimes disagreed with The Nation, I should not so much value the times when it has expressed my own opinion. It hews to no "party line," thank God, and speaks for this country and for no other, though its sympathies are international. It's a first-rate fighting periodical, and I wish it well. WILLIAM ROSE BENÉT
New York

Dear Sirs: My enthusiastic, if somewhat belated, congratulations on The Nation's seventy-fifth birthday. It is the liveliest youngster that comes weekly to this house, and controversy only gives added verve to its youth. I can't pay it any higher tribute than to tell you it is the one paper which is my week-end necessity. And that is true whether I am lecturing up and down the country or rusticating on my mountain farm. I expect to be stimulated by it for at least another seventy-five years.

LOUIS UNTERMEYER
Elizabethtown, N. Y.

CONTRIBUTORS

LELAND STOWE, for many years Paris correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, is now covering the war in Finland for the Chicago Daily News and the New York Post.

LEWIS COREY is the author of "The Decline of American Capitalism," "The House of Morgan," and the "Crisis of the Middle Class."

ROSE M. STEIN is a Pittsburgh journalist who has covered labor news for various publications.

NERMIN MUVAFFAK is a Turkish journalist. Before her return to Turkey this fall she was in the Information Bureau of the Turkish Commission at the New York World's Fair.

HANS KOHN, professor of modern European history at Smith College, is the author of "Force or Reason," "Revolution and Dictatorships," and other books.

TONI CHRISTEN is the pseudonym of a German writer now living in the United States.

EILEEN HOLDING is an English critic who is now visiting the United States.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 24, 1940 NUMBER 8

The Shape of Things

THE RESCUE OF THE ALTMARK CAPTIVES was an enterprise stamped with the authentic "Nelson touch," which combines audacity with a willingness to wink at the law in emergencies. Determined not to allow the British seamen, who for three months had suffered close confinement in the hold of the German ship, to be carried to Germany, the British Admiralty deliberately gave orders involving the violation of Norwegian neutrality. The complete success which attended the operation makes the Nazis' fury understandable, but so far as international law is concerned their case looks weak. The Altmark appears to have been a warship masquerading as a merchant vessel, and its captain, when asking for Norway's protection while in its territorial waters, failed to disclose the fact he had prisoners aboard. Under these circumstances the British are taking a high line, refusing either to apologize or make reparation and reading Norway a lecture for failing in its duties as a neutral. Authorities on international law in this country support the view that Norway had allowed a breach of it, but this does not automatically excuse the British, who, strictly speaking, ought to have confined themselves to diplomatic action with a view to forcing Norway to detain and examine the Altmark. In war time, however, one violation of the law usually leads to another, and the position of small states which stand between big belligerents is a miserable one, since each side demands that neutrality be so interpreted as to favor its cause. Hitherto the Germans have been readier than the Allies to apply strong-arm methods to the neutrals, and as a result have received more favors. Now, it would appear, the Allies are preparing to redress the balance by becoming equally tough.

*

DURING THE PAST WEEK THE RED ARMY IN the Karelian Isthmus has been slowly but relentlessly pressing forward, and while the Mannerheim Line, which is a position fortified in depth, has not yet been broken, it is evident that the situation of its defenders is becoming increasingly grave. Now that it has successes to talk about, Moscow is more communicative, but it is worth noting that it considers it unwise to give the Russian people any hint about the price in killed and wounded. According to accounts from the Finnish side, the Soviet expenditure in men and munitions is prodigious. Meanwhile the Finnish shortage of man-power is making itself felt. There are few reserves available for a counter-attack if the Russian drive falters, and the difficulty of affording the front-line fighters adequate rest is a constant problem. Among experts there is general agreement that only large reinforcements from other countries can save Finland. Sweden, however, has flatly refused to intervene in a military way, nor will it permit organized bodies of troops to pass through its territories. Thus even if the Allies decided to send regular forces to aid Finland—and it is rumored that they were prepared to dispatch three divisions—the way is blocked. Sweden's reluctance to abandon its position of formal neutrality is understandable enough in view of the constant threat offered by Germany. Only this week ominous movements in the German Baltic ports have been noted, while the Nazi press is openly threatening.

*

THE COLDEST WINTER IN NORTHERN EUROPE for a century is adding to the miseries of war. In Finland the weather has undoubtedly been an aid to the defense, but it has intensified the suffering of the evacués from the cities and those whose homes have been destroyed by Soviet bombers. The Northern neutrals, dependent on Britain and Germany for coal, have found their reduced supplies still further diminished owing to the freezing of the Baltic and its approaches to an extent that has almost halted sea transport. In Copenhagen hot water has become a rare luxury, and in Sweden mobilized reservists have been diverted from drills to wood-cutting. Weather news from Britain is impeded by the censor, who fears it might provide the enemy with valuable information, but it is known that there has been at least one blizzard which dislocated railroad traffic for several days. Germany has suffered still more severely, and its chronic coal shortage has become acute. The German transport system was already strained, since the blockade made it necessary to move by rail and canal goods which formerly went by sea. Ice-blocked waterways and heavy snows have produced almost a breakdown, and Berlin and other large cities are experiencing a coal famine. The result is an epidemic of influenza—a foe better fought with butter than with guns. But hard as is the lot of Germans, it is paradise compared with that of the Poles and Jews, who are being shifted around the country in cattle trucks or left to face zero weather in shattered homes.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

IN THE MIDST OF ACCENTUATED ECONOMIC warfare throughout the world, representatives from ten countries gathered at The Hague under League auspices two weeks ago to discuss means of post-war economic collaboration. The conference obtained relatively small notice in the press and seems to have achieved little of immediate consequence. Yet it set up machinery which, if properly utilized, may make it possible for the world to avoid many of the economic blunders which characterized the peace following the last war. It is generally recognized that in its own field the economic section of the League has been far more successful than the political section. Given proper support from the United States and other neutrals, this expanded economic body, with facilities for thorough study and unlimited publicity at its disposal, may force statesmen to recognize realities in the post-war settlement.

*

SENATOR NORRIS IS RIGHT WHEN HE SAYS that a trustee, particularly in a receivership like that of the Associated Gas and Electric, should be above suspicion. To judge from Arthur Krock's column in the New York Times of February 13, Senator Norris concludes that John W. Hanes was picked for trustee by "insiders" before the bankruptcy proceedings were even begun. Some of the worst abuses in the history of corporate receiverships have resulted from just such attempts by management or controlling interest to arrange matters in advance. This may or may not be true in the case of A. G. and E. We impute no unethical conduct to Mr. Hanes. He may well have known nothing of what was going on, but we believe that under the circumstances Federal Judge Leibell would be wise to heed Senator Norris's warning, and name no trustee who can be linked in any way with the present management of A. G. and E. Too many small investors have lost too many millions in that company already, and complaisant federal courts have bred too many scandals in receiverships. Remember Judge Manton.

*

THAT DAMNABLE "COMMUNISTIC" DEVICE, the inheritance tax, has finally driven the House of Morgan to take out incorporation papers. According to the Wall Street Journal, not an unfriendly source, the decision of J. P. Morgan and Company to add an Inc. and become a state bank with trust powers is the result of the death of Charles Steele, a Morgan partner since 1900 and one of the firm's largest owners. Until now the firm has been a simple partnership. Incorporation, and the issuance of stock to the partners, will make it possible for the Steele estate to meet inheritance taxes without withdrawing more capital from the firm. Last September the Steele estate withdrew $5,000,000, reducing capital to $20,000,000. The sum, for so fabulously powerful a banking firm, seems a puny one to a public accustomed to think in terms of New Deal budgets. Perhaps more important than the decision to become a state bank and trust company is the announcement that the Morgans' old Philadelphia affiliate, Drexel and Company, will hand over its deposits to the Morgan bank and become a separate entity engaging in the securities and underwriting business. This will give Morgan and Company two "separate entities" in the marketing of securities, Drexel and Company and Morgan, Stanley.

*

MARTIN DIES CAME BACK TO WASHINGTON full of ideas for his spring offensive. He will expose "communism" in Hollywood, he will probe further into consumer organizations—under the distorted guidance of J. B. Matthews—and he will unveil "Communists in the government." There is little that is new in this program; for two years Mr. Dies has been promising to uncover Communists in the New Deal, and he has yet to produce one exhibit. But his announcement assured the country of another lurid instalment in the story of a committee which has become a standing menace to democratic institutions. It is only two months since the Dies committee issued its "moderate" report, winning the acclaim of liberal columnists like Raymond Clapper. Then we were told that Mr. Dies had "reformed" and that his investigation would follow a new pattern; now we know the degree of his reformation. The agenda he outlined continues a tradition: the committee will keep its eyes focused on the left and wink benevolently at the right; it will contribute valiantly to the Republican war chest; and—Mr. Dies promises—it will suspend operations this summer after the damage has been done. We would not, of course, urge the Dies committee to summon Coughlin, for under Dies's stewardship no effective treatment of Coughlin could be anticipated. If a real probe of Coughlin's affairs were made in advance, he could be cross-examined into extinction; but Mr. Dies doesn't do things that way, as earlier hearings have demonstrated. The simple truth is that liberals can expect nothing but disaster from this committee. While liberal pressure can force some improvements in procedure—such as preventing the chairman from talking at so great a rate—it cannot transform Dies. There is only one inquiry worth fighting for now: an investigation into the activities and associations of Martin Dies, as outlined by Representative Hook and The Nation.

WE COMMEND ATTORNEY GENERAL JACKSON for his courage and fairness in ordering the dismissal of the indictment against sixteen persons accused of recruiting soldiers for the Spanish Loyalists. He could see no good, he said, in "reviving in America at this late date the animosities of the Spanish conflict." The fact that Attorney General Murphy ordered these cases presented to the grand jury just before he was elevated to the Supreme Court makes us uneasy about his liberalism. The dismissal of the indictments confirms us in the belief that the budding Palmerism the Administration has been showing in the past few months is not favored by Attorney General Jackson and strengthens our suspicion that the FBI tail has been trying to wag the New Deal dog. To prosecute people for helping to enlist men for the Loyalists while inviting men to volunteer for the Finnish army, whatever the legal distinctions involved, was not to inspire confidence, and we are glad the matter has been dropped. We hope the job will be completed by a return of the papers taken in a raid on the headquarters of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade in New York. This action flouted basic constitutional guaranties against arbitrary police action. J. Edgar Hoover and his men seem to think themselves above such trivial matters as constitutional guaranties. A reproof is called for.

*

THE RESULTS OF THE QUESTIONNAIRE SUBmitted to the New York police force primarily to determine how many are members of the Christian Front are open to conflicting interpretations; Mayor LaGuardia's statement on the issue is not. He has vigorously seconded Police Commissioner Valentine's contention that membership in the Front and service on the force are incompatible. The immediate question is what measures will be taken to give substance to his words. According to preliminary figures issued by the Mayor's office, 27 policemen admit that they are still enrolled in the Christian Front; 380 others confess to membership in the past. We see no alternative in the case of the twenty-seven to a flat demand for their resignation from the Front or the force. There are already signs that last year's street violence will be renewed in the spring under Coughlinite auspices—which means that policemen identified with the Front have no business patrolling the streets. As for the 407 who disclaim present affiliation, obviously no reprisals are in order. Undoubtedly many of them joined in innocence; certainly there is no immediate way of knowing how many retain a secret sympathy with the terrorist organization. That will be determined by their behavior in the coming months. It would be foolish to believe that the problem will be dissipated overnight, but there is reassurance in the apparent determination of city officials to face the issue before it attains explosive proportions.

UNLIKE THE ROMAN CATHOLIC HIERARCHY we are not in favor of "bringing God back" into economic life. The phrase sounds too much like "pie in the sky." Theology, like politics, has its demagogy, and the best way to avoid antagonizing either the worker or his boss is to explain from the pulpit that what they really need is to let the Divine Presence take care of wage negotiations. We knew that Buchman was making progress, but until we read the National Catholic Welfare Conference statement, recently issued, on "The Church and the Social Order" we didn't know he had so many followers among the hierarchy. It reads strikingly like the platform of a major political party. The hierarchy is for private property—but the labor of a human being must not be regarded as a commodity. Wages ought not to be so high as to ruin the employer—but they ought not to be so low that the employee cannot live decently. Both workers and employers ought to organize, but labor monopolies are as bad as capitalist monopolies—particularly when they lead to "violence, riot, and disorder." Economic liberalism, that is, of the Hoover-Lippmann variety, is no good—but neither is communism-socialism. "Social incoherence and class conflict must be replaced by corporate unity and organic function"—is this a plea for the Catholic "corporate state" envisaged in the encyclical "Quadrigesimo Anno"? The new statement has been hailed as the most important since the organization of the National Catholic Welfare Conference in 1919. But we will let the reader in on a secret. The social program announced at that time—no doubt owing to the infiltration of Bolsheviks into the hierarchy—was a good deal more concrete. It advocated among other things federal legislation against child labor. The new slogan seems to be, "Let God do it."

*

THE RESTORATION OF A TWO-CENTS-A-MILE fare on the Eastern railways by order of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be welcomed by everyone, including the railways that fought it. For despite determined assertions to the contrary by officials of the Pennsylvania and New York Central, the evidence indicates quite clearly that the roads do better financially at the two-cent rate than at two and a half cents. Absolute proof of this contention is, of course, impossible since the volume of passenger traffic is affected by other factors which cannot be isolated. But the long-term fate of the roads plainly depends on their regaining some of the traffic lost to busses and private motor cars. The two-cent rate is competitive, while the higher rate is distinctly a handicap. A large share of the credit for the I. C. C.'s decision should be given to Daniel C. Willard, president of the Baltimore and Ohio, who has fought single-handed for lower fares against the officials of the other roads.

UNTIL A FEW YEARS AGO SYPHILIS WAS AN unmentionable word in any popular newspaper. Now in a picture entitled "Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet" it is being used for the the first time in a film, with the full approval of the Hays office and the enthusiastic blessing of the United States Public Health Service. Thus slowly we are shedding the taboos which in the past have added to the difficulties of eradicating venereal disease. Warner Brothers are to be congratulated for treating the subject with excellent taste and at the same time creating a picture which conveys the real drama of scientific research. Besides being a great scientist Ehrlich was a Jew, but it never occurred to him that the value of a discovery might depend on the racial origins of the discoverer. The present rulers of Germany think otherwise. In fact, it is credibly reported that "606"—the magic bullet which Ehrlich found to kill the spirochetes of syphilis—is verboten in the Third Reich.

* * *

FREDA KIRCHWEY, WHOSE WEEKLY ARTICLE is omitted from this issue, has just left for a tour of Puerto Rico, the Dominican Republic, and Haiti. She plans to send back reports of important recent developments in these islands, including a discussion of the project for settlement of Jewish refugees in Santo Domingo.

* * *

WILLIAM E. DODD WAS A GENUINE JEFFERSONIAN Democrat. Faith in the common man and a deep belief in human equality were the springs which enriched his contributions to history and determined his own conduct in public life. It was inevitable that his tenure as ambassador in Berlin should have been stormy. Dodd had a strong affection for Germany. He took his doctorate there and wrote his first book—on Jefferson—in German. He translated the great German historian Lamprecht, and when he left for Berlin it was in the belief that "economic and social cooperation" between this country and the land "of Luther, Stein, and Bismarck" was of great importance. But he soon found that he had not come to the land of Luther and Stein, or even of Bismarck, but to a strange and uncomfortable country. Dodd was no professional diplomat, no pourer of tea on troubled waters. His courage and his outspoken language soon made him persona non grata not only with the Hitler regime but with the State Department "cookie pushers" he detested. Germany made him physically ill, and he never really regained his health; he was unable to finish the history of the Old South that was to have been his major work. His writing and his teaching have left their impress on American life. His courage gave voice to the silenced millions of the Third Reich.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY'S NAME FIRST appeared on The Nation's masthead, as managing editor, in the issue of February 7, 1918. It was war time; Mussey gave up the security of his Columbia professorship of economics for an adventure in crusading journalism. The Nation, after four decades' association, was divorcing itself from the New York Evening Post and assuming that editorial independence which has kept it in hot water ever since. Mussey shared with Oswald Garrison Villard the responsibility of guiding The Nation through the sharpest change of direction in its history. Old subscribers canceled; new ones poured in; costs mounted; the government attempted suppression. Mussey carried on. After the crisis he returned to the university field, coming back to The Nation briefly in the Hoover years. He had never wholly left it, but most of his contributions were characteristically anonymous. So, too, though he was a keen interpreter of the quagmires of economics, he never was dogmatic enough to compose a book; his academic heritage is rather in the living minds of his students than on the university shelves.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 265

EDITORIALS:

JAPAN'S NEW STRATEGY 269
FOUR NEGROES 269
WAGNERIAN SOCIALISM 270
THE LEWIS-ROOSEVELT FEUD by Kenneth G. Crawford 271
MARXISM RECONSIDERED—II by Lewis Corey 272
HAS THE WAR CHANGED FRANCE? by Alexander Werth 275
JAPAN'S RED FLIRTATION by Freda Utley 278
IN THE WIND 281
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 282

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 283
AN EPILOGUE TO PEACE by Rustem Vambery 283
THE MEXICO OF CARDENAS by Harry Block 284
POLITICS AND PROGRESS by Lindsay Rogers 285
CROSS-SECTION by James Orrick 285
SMALL-TOWN EXILE by Louis B. Salomon 286
SHORTER NOTICES 286
DRAMA NOTE by Joseph Wood Krutch 287
ART: THE SLEEPING RENAISSANCE by Paul Rosenfeld 287
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 288

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

◆

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal

Japan's New Strategy

ALL signs indicate that the Far Eastern war is about to enter a new stage. The Japanese have officially announced that they will not expand their operations in the future, but will stand pat and seek to hold their previous conquests. This represents a fundamental shift in Japanese policy. Heretofore the Japanese have boasted that they would chase Chiang Kai-shek to Tibet, if necessary. There was no place for an anti-Japanese government in the "new order for East Asia." Now, it seems, Chiang is to be allowed to continue to rule in the areas of "free China" at present governed from Chungking. A glance at the map shows that this is a considerable area. Out of the eighteen provinces of China proper, the Chinese armies are still completely in control of eight and largely in control of five. Even in the coastal regions of the northeast, where the Japanese conquest has been most sweeping, Chinese guerrilla units, acting under orders from Chungking, dominate the entire back country.

The Japanese decision is clearly the result of military necessity rather than political sagacity. Five times recently the Japanese have sought to extend the area under their control. And on each occasion, after an initial success, they have suffered a severe reverse. The repulse of the Japanese drive on Changsha, capital of Hunan, still stands as the major Japanese defeat in the war. But it was followed by signal Chinese victories north of Canton and in Shansi. Conflicting claims leave the results of the recent Japanese drives against the communications with Indo-China and in Inner Mongolia still far from clear. About all we can be sure of is that the Japanese are back where they started and that they failed in their effort to cut the vital Indo-China-Yunnan railway. Although two bombing raids made on the road from the advanced Japanese position in Pinyang did considerable damage, they apparently caused only a temporary interruption of service. Less is known about the operations in Inner Mongolia, but the Japanese withdrawal from an area which would be of strategic importance in the event of a war with the Soviet Union can scarcely indicate a Japanese victory. Similarly, operations against Ningpo, the largest port still in Chinese hands, appear to have ended in failure.

All these developments suggest that Japan has no longer the capacity to organize a sustained offensive. The Japanese army, mired in the vastness of China, has found itself unable to deliver a decisive blow against the Chinese forces. At home, the shortage of coal and power resources, combined with a lack of imported raw materials, is seriously cutting down the material supremacy on which past Japanese victories have been based. Only one course, then, is open to Tokyo—to attempt to consolidate its gains as quickly as possible. But even here there are grave difficulties. Facing incessant guerrilla attacks whose success is dependent on the support of the local peasantry, the Japanese have long realized that their greatest hope lies in organizing a puppet regime which would command a measure of support from the Chinese. For this purpose, Wang Ching-wei's defection seemed a godsend, since Wang at one time had an immense popular following. But nearly a year has now passed since the Japanese began to talk of setting up a Wang Ching-wei regime. Its inauguration has been repeatedly postponed, presumably awaiting a major Japanese victory. The real test of Japan's latest strategy will come after the launching of the puppet government. This regime will doubtless command a certain amount of support both at home and abroad. It may even seriously undermine the unity with which the Chinese people have thus far opposed Japanese aggression. But this possibility seems to have been materially diminished by the repeated delays and the recent Chinese victories. Wang has lost several of his most prominent supporters, and the Japanese have made no progress in inducing other leading Chinese to play traitor to their country. As long as this is the case, Japan's efforts to consolidate its rule are destined to frustration. The war will continue until one side or the other is completely exhausted. While Japan is far from beaten, China's chances of ultimate victory seem better than at any time to date.

Four Negroes

ON THE night of Saturday, May 13, 1933, an elderly white man was robbed and murdered in Pompano, Florida. In a Southern town, when any crime is committed, the police instinctively reach for a Negro. One may dimly imagine the atmosphere when there has been a murder. In Pompano a convict guard appeared on the scene with bloodhounds. Nearly forty members of the Negro community were rounded up and taken to the county jail. No warrants had been issued for their arrest. No formal charges were filed against them. They were not permitted to communicate with relatives or friends, much less counsel. One by one, and over and over again for a week, each of the suspects was taken to a room of the jail for questioning. There he was confronted by four to ten men—the county sheriff, his deputies, the convict guard, and other white officers and citizens. The "questioning," one may be sure, was not purely a contest of dialectical skill. The third degree, particularly for Negroes in the South, does not confine itself to the classic form of the Socratic dialogue. On the night of Saturday, May 20, a week after the murder, the suspects were still denying that they had had anything to do with the crime. That night the sheriff and his aides, amateur and official, set to with new determination. The jail cook stood by to serve them coffee and sandwiches as they applied the full force of their logic to the prisoners. On Sunday morning one confessed, but the state's attorney, when shown the confession, was dissatisfied. "Tear this paper up," he said, "that isn't what I want. When you get something worth while call me." The rebuke may not have improved the temper of the police authorities, but it stimulated their efforts. Early next morning one prisoner had made a "worth-while" confession, and three others, one of whom had been kept in the death cell, also "broke." On the basis of these confessions the four Negroes were convicted and sentenced to death.

This story is one to make all Americans ashamed. The Pompano affair—by no means unusual in the South—indicates how far we have to go before the ideals in which we believe have been fully embodied in the lives we lead. It reflects racial inequality, mob spirit, brutal disregard for the most precious and fundamental rights, lawlessness in the guise of law. Dr. Goebbels collects just such items for retorts to our protests on Nazi mistreatment of the Jews. But we venture to say that though Dr. Goebbels may file this particular story away, he will forget where he placed it. For it has a happy ending of which we may all as Americans be proud. The four Negroes convicted in Florida were obscure and humble men. No political or economic issue was present in their case to mobilize vast protest. But the creaking machinery of the law kept them alive for almost seven years, and the Supreme Court has now set them free. Speaking through a Southerner who had himself once been a member of the Ku Klux Klan, a unanimous court declared, "To permit human lives to be forfeited upon confessions thus obtained would make of the constitutional requirement of due process a meaningless symbol." The court grappled here with a problem that was a severe test of the symbols on which its own power rests. It had to fight our worst form of race prejudice. It had to stand fast against the tide of the white man's unconscious fears in the Black Belt. It had to overcome the usual excuses put forward for law-enforcement agencies when they wink at the law. It passed that test. "Tyrannical goverments," Justice Black warned for the court, have "immemorially utilized dictatorial criminal procedure and punishment to make scapegoats of the weak or of helpless political, religious, or racial minorities and those who differed, who would not conform, and who resisted tyranny." We take out the stock of words required for comment, and find them all dirtied by hypocrisy and encrusted with cant. "The majesty of the law"; "equal justice"; "democratic processes"; "American ideals." We put the words away. All we can say is that the Supreme Court saved the lives of four Negroes. And saved something precious for the rest of us, too.

Wagnerian Socialism

THE newly concluded Russian-German trade pact has been hailed in the Nazi press as the practical equivalent of a defeat of the Allied blockade. It will result, according to semi-official estimates, in an exchange of goods amounting to upward of a billion marks annually, enabling Germany to make good its chief shortages of food and raw materials. Despite this ballyhoo there is not much evidence of an actual flow of commodities westward from Russia, which appears to have little surplus to export. In addition, transport difficulties, accentuated by the severe winter and the demands of the Finnish war, seem to be proving a formidable barrier.

But if trade in goods between the two dictatorships languishes, ideological commerce is flourishing. To an ever-increasing extent Goebbels's brass bands are interweaving the strains of the Internationale with the themes of Lebensraum and Nordic superiority. Britain is now being portrayed, not merely as the implacable enemy of the German Reich, but as the head and front of international capitalism, with whose destruction a new socialist millennium will open. Hitler in his last speech spoke of a "social war between nations in which the have-nots are fighting the haves for a new division of the world." Following this speech Nazi press and publicists have increasingly class-angled their propaganda. Dr. Robert Ley, head of the Labor Front, which is assuming a much more important role under the new policy, declared in a recent speech: "The National Socialist state leadership has not only destroyed plutocracy in Germany and allotted to money its proper role in economy, it has also freed the workers from the exploiters' fetters." This accomplished, it proposes to release the British and French workers from their bondage to capitalism and bestow on them the manifold blessings of National Socialism—a society in which every activity that is not forbidden is compulsory.

It would seem that this accent on socialism is intended primarily to influence domestic opinion and particularly to drum up enthusiasm for the regime and the war among the German workers. According to the Inside Germany Reports, published by the Friends of German Freedom, an attitude of unfriendly reserve toward the Nazis became prevalent when the war started. The German workers had always dreaded war, and their already low standard of living was further reduced by rationing and by the cancelation of payment for overtime and holiday work. Passive resistance seems to have led to reduced output, despite longer hours, and recently it was found necessary to restore overtime pay and to increase rations for employees of the heavy industries. But the workers' morale still leaves much to be desired from the point of view of the Nazi chiefs. Hence the effort to create a feeling of unity with the party and the state by revamping the anti-capitalist slogans of international socialism.

Propaganda of this kind may also be intended to stir up disunity in the enemy's camp. Certainly it gears in well with the furious anti-imperialist campaign which is being conducted underground by the French Communists and openly by their British comrades. These same campaigners, however, did an effective job in the years prior to August last in helping to convince British and French workers that fascism was the enemy, and Dr. Ley is hardly likely to change this opinion, however skilfully he wraps himself in a red flag. Beneath this disguise the cloven hoof of Nazism shows all too plainly, and the Berlin version of the Internationale cannot rid itself of its Wagnerian overtones: the Ubermensch Leitmotiv insists on breaking in. "Workers of all lands, including English and French workers—unite," cried Dr. Ley. "Combine to annihilate the old English dragon which blocks the treasures of the earth. . . . Your common enemy is English Jewish-democratic high finance." Plainly the Nazi Siegfried would like to borrow the sword of socialism. But we can be sure that if and when the British Fafnir is slain he will create a new monster compared with which that rather tired old dragon will be seen in retrospect as almost domesticated.

The Lewis-Roosevelt Feud

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, February 15

THERE is no longer room for doubt about the seriousness of the breach between the President of the United States and the president of the United Mine Workers. Even after Mr. Lewis's speech at Columbus predicting ignominious defeat for the President if he runs for a third term, a few hopeful liberals clung to the theory that it was a fake fight. The C. I. O. chief, they insisted, was merely building a backfire on the left to save the New Deal from the flames of reaction on the right—and with the consent, expressed or implied, of the White House. But the Roosevelt and Lewis speeches to the American Youth Congress revealed fundamental and apparently irreconcilable differences. They went beyond mere disagreement over rate of progression toward a common goal.

Drawing by Strom

John L. Lewis

In the beginning the Roosevelt-Lewis feud had seemed to be the outgrowth of such a disagreement. The President, a master-politician sensitive to every change in public opinion, had slowed down the New Deal after the 1938 Congressional elections to let the country catch up. By the turn of the election year 1940 the Administration had come to a dead stop—no new reforms, reduction of government spending, and reliance on foreign orders to keep the national plant in full-time operation. To Lewis, who judges national welfare from the condition of the under-dog's coat and who has little patience with the fickleness of middle-class opinion, this slow-down looked like a sit-down and was too much to bear. With 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 unemployed, political expediency was not an acceptable excuse for inaction.

The issue finally was joined on a question of foreign policy. In speaking to the Youth Congress delegates the President scoffed at apprehensions about his proposal to extend help to beleaguered Finland. Such help could not possibly lead the United States into war. Talk about the danger of loans to Finland was "twaddle" inspired by sympathy for Russia. The youngsters hadn't informed themselves. Speaking to the same audience a few hours later Lewis pointed out that his full-grown miners also had gone on record against loans to Finland because they feared involvement in the war.

The Finnish loan question may not be big enough in itself to split the liberal movement. But it is the handle to a bigger ax. Blocked on the domestic front by a hopelessly conservative Congress, the President must look to Europe for business. Finnish business wouldn't help much, but useful precedents might be established in the process of getting and financing it. More important, 98 per cent of the American people—the President's own estimate—sympathize with Finland. At least as large a proportion, it can be assumed, hate Communist Russia. Help for Finland obviously has emotional appeal and is good politics, which is not to imply that the President is insincere in its advocacy. Just as obviously, encouragement of the youths who oppose loans for Finland, presumably because of communistic leanings, is not very good politics.

Roosevelt had the popular side in the Youth Congress debate even though he got the boos and his critic the applause. Lewis apparently realized this. Two nights later, speaking at the Broun memorial meeting in New York, he said: "After all, my friends, no one man, no spirit, no matter how valiant, can turn itself alone against the great national mountains of indifference, self-satisfaction, and complacency."

But Lewis is not a spirit to tire easily, and he is not alone. His position on the Finnish question has made him a figure around whom the forces of the extreme left, badly demoralized by Russian collaboration with Germany in Poland and by the subsequent Russian invasion of Finland, can rally. These forces are numerically weak, but they are resourceful and persistent. In opposing the Roosevelt foreign policy they will find allies among the simon-pure isolationists, the peace advocates, and the militant laborites who regard foreign adventure, even though it is confined to peaceful assistance to belligerents, as a poor excuse for abandoning the home fight. That Lewis consciously planned to form and lead such an alliance is doubtful. His Youth Congress speech was extemporaneous and had the ring of indignant spontaneity.

Whether he planned it or not, Lewis has become the leader of an isolated left. Where he is going to lead it is a question. Assuming that Roosevelt does not himself run again, the Democratic nominee almost certainly will be to the right of the New Deal. No Republican who has a chance for the nomination can be acceptable to Lewis. His renewed offer to make peace with the A. F. of L. at once and settle the details at leisure has been turned down, which probably means that the labor wars will continue at least until after the election. This will encourage Congress to whittle down the Wagner Act and the wage-hour law before adjournment of the current session.

The break between Roosevelt and Lewis probably was inevitable. They are determined men, each used to having his way, and their individual brands of liberalism, while similar in objective, are compounded of dissimilar ingredients. That the blow-up should have come on the eve of a national election in which liberalism will need all its power to breast a strong reaction is more than unfortunate. It may be disastrous.

Marxism Reconsidered—II

BY LEWIS COREY

THE turmoil, changes, and problems of our age merge into one dominant fact: capitalism is being transformed. What, in the light of radical experience and frustration, do we need for the job of directing that transformation toward a desirable social order? We need a program of readjustments designed, first, to solve the economic crisis and, second, to set in motion the forces of transition toward the new order. We need tactics for the transition that will maintain and strengthen those democratic procedures and values that, going beyond capitalism, are achievements of civilization itself. We need an understanding of the institutional arrangements that are necessary to overcome the totalitarian potential in collectivism and to make collectivism democratic. There must be, finally, the harmony of ends and means; if means devour ends, victory will spell defeat for the purposes with which we started.

An aid to the understanding of those needs is found in an examination of the failure of Marxist radicalism, since no other movement has developed so much theory and practice on the problems of transition to a new order. The failure, I believe, must be blamed upon two fundamental limitations in the traditional socialist and Marxist conceptions of the transition from capitalism to socialism—misunderstanding of democracy, and emphasis on the proletariat as the "carrier" of socialism; from these flow other limitations of theory and practice.

Marx misunderstood democracy because he saw in the democratic struggle simply a means for proletarian seizure of power and dictatorship, a "catastrophic" conception of the transition from capitalism to socialism which, as we have seen in Russia, crushes the developing forces of democracy and leads to totalitarianism. While the revolutionary tactics of Marx were rejected by the traditional socialism that arose in Europe after the 1870's, democracy was misunderstood in another sense. Socialism was still identified with democracy, but was given several new twists. It was now a reformist struggle for greater democracy within capitalism, in a Europe still strewn with feudal survivals. The new creed was that democracy, a fully democratic capitalism, with gradually increasing government ownership and control of industry would "inevitably" move toward socialism.

The reformist theory worked for a time. Labor obtained greater democratic rights and political power; its social position was improved by greater material well-being, social legislation, and popular education. But other forces were at work. Democratic capitalism moved toward an economic collectivism of monopoly capital and a permanent economic crisis which were to unloose totalitarian forces. It now became necessary to broaden the struggle for democracy into a struggle for socialism. Democracy cannot survive and grow unless collectivism is democratized and the economic crisis is solved through progressive transformation of capitalism. Otherwise capitalist democracy will "inevitably" move toward fascism, which is wholly compatible with government ownership and control of industry. But traditional socialism could not break the entanglements of its accepted theory and practice. The defense of democracy in Germany met defeat because the Social Democrats and their allies were unable either to democratize collectivism or to solve the economic crisis that fed the devouring flames of fascism.

THE PROLETARIAT IS NOT ENOUGH

Disastrous, too, was the emphasis on the proletariat as the "carrier" of socialism, a theory which was bound up with the misunderstanding of democracy. There was, to be sure, historical justification for the emphasis. Against the utopian socialists who wanted to solve the social problem behind the back of society, Marx was right in wanting to give socialism a rational, material social basis; and in his day none but the brutally exploited proletariat could be identified with socialism, since all other classes saw their interests realized in the upswing of capitalism. Identifying the socialist mission with the proletariat broadened its consciousness and moral sense; the proletariat tackled its own tasks all the more vigorously because they were identified with larger historical tasks. Socialism was a tremendous human, cultural, and moral force among the workers, who were largely excluded from the benefits of capitalist civilization. But the proletarian emphasis proved historically justified only as long as the workers were struggling for greater democratic rights and well-being within capitalism. When the fight finally became a struggle for socialism itself, the emphasis on the proletariat revealed its disastrous limitations.

As socialism approached political power, especially in Germany, it was immobilized by failure to get the support of the non-proletarian groups necessary for a democratic majority. The emphasis on the proletariat alienated the middle classes and peasants, who saw in socialism an expression only of proletarian interests. Political necessity forced socialism to make an appeal to those groups. But emphasis on the proletariat was not abandoned. The appeal was never a broadening of socialism, in theory and practice, to include the interests and action of useful social groups other than the workers. It was an appeal of self-defeating opportunism. Socialism was watered down, virtually abandoned, to get the support of non-proletarian groups whose interests should have been unmistakably included in socialism and who should have been drawn into the struggle for socialism.

The contradictions between theory and practice created a split personality in traditional socialism which was expressed in an unprincipled and unwholesome combination of sectarianism and opportunism. Socialism was condemned to the futility of petty everyday tasks that had nothing to do with the transition from capitalism to socialism. The futility was rationalized in a "scientific" theory of the "inevitability of socialism"—an expression of the mystical faith in progress which ignores the fact that reaction may be as "inevitable" as progress.

While revolutionary emphasis on the proletariat led to the Bolshevik tragedy, the reformist emphasis converted traditional socialism into the political expression of "radical" trade unionism. But socialism cannot subordinate itself to unionism without still further limiting its appeal for non-proletarian groups. That is what happened in Germany: when the Social Democracy got government power after the World War it was revealed as simply a trade-union party. It made no effort to introduce measures to solve the economic crisis through progressive transformation of capitalism, or to break reactionary opposition by using those measures to arouse a people's movement for socialism. Solution of the crisis was left to the capitalists; it was considered their job. Social Democracy concentrated on the trade-union job of improving the workers' conditions within capitalism. Such a policy may work in a period of expanding capitalism, when the conditions of all classes are being improved; it is suicidal in a contracting economy, such as that of Germany in the 1920's, when gains for the workers spell losses for other classes. The burdens of the economic crisis were thrust upon the middle classes and peasants, who might have rallied to a socialism that solved the crisis but were repelled by a trade-union socialism that neglected their interests. They got their revenge in fascism.

FARMERS AND THE NEW MIDDLE CLASS

Emphasis on the proletariat is bound up with the failure of socialism to clarify its relation to other classes. That weakness, it now appears, is part of a larger failure—the failure to answer concretely the question, what is socialism? There never was a concrete understanding of what the socialist society was to be, beyond a collective ownership that we now see is compatible with totalitarianism; never a specific program of transition from capitalism to socialism; never a clear picture of where non-proletarian groups fit into socialism and the struggle for socialism. It seems an elementary conclusion to draw that socialism must express and realize the interests of all useful functional groups within society. But that conclusion was never drawn, except left-handedly and abstractly as "the liberation of all humanity." As a result socialism misunderstood all classes except the proletariat, a disaster which, among others, enabled fascism to catch socialism unawares.

Socialism misunderstood and neglected the farmers. It waited for capitalist large-scale farming to convert independent farmers—and peasants—into "proletarians" fit for socialism. But large-scale farming did not develop as predicted, and the new technology made it possible to work small farms efficiently. There are more tenants than wage workers in modern agriculture; and agrarian "proletarians" remain farmers and refuse to flock to proletarian socialism. Farmers must be approached on the basis of their functional interests as farmers, not as potential proletarians or "allies of the proletariat." They must be assured the independent ownership they want, limited only by the regulations of self-governing cooperatives where farming is unavoidably large-scale. Collectivization is both unnecessary and undesirable; its use in Russia was determined largely by the dictatorship's need for an agrarian bureaucracy—which numbered 2,000,000 as early as 1931—to control the peasants. The farmers must be fitted into the socialist pattern without violence to their own way of life.

There also existed misunderstanding and neglect of the new middle class. Traditional socialism and Marxism were largely right about the old middle class of small independent enterprisers: its economic power has declined enormously under monopoly capitalism, although the class is still a factor with which socialism must reckon. But a new middle class has arisen that is more important than the old—the new class of salaried employees and professionals, which in the United States includes one out of every six persons gainfully employed. The traditional socialist and communist approach to this class is much too simple: that its members are proletarians or will become proletarians. That is true of the majority, in an objective economic sense, but not of all. Moreover, whether or not they are "proletarians," members of the new middle class remain members of a class other than the proletariat, a class which performs different functions. And these are functions that carry beyond capitalism because they are the technical, administrative, and managerial functions of economic collectivism. The upper layers of the new middle class perform the job of organizing and directing industry, which was the capitalist's job before collectivism separated ownership from management. Whether collectivism is capitalist, fascist, communist, or democratic socialist, its higher functions are performed by members of the new middle class. This class, like the farmers, must be addressed on the basis of the services it can contribute to a socialist society and the benefits it can derive from one. This functional approach reveals more understanding and assures a greater unity than the class approach, with its tortured and ambiguous emphasis on the proletariat.

Continued misunderstanding and neglect may drive the new middle class to fascism. There are totalitarian elements in this class, especially in the upper layers, which come in contact with the reactionary big capitalists. The class now controls the managerial functions of a monopoly collectivism in which there is a totalitarian potential. One expression of that potential is the hierarchical and authoritarian set-up of corporate industry. The totalitarian potential is strengthened if the economic and the political bureaucracy are combined. There are in the new middle class, moreover, traditional prejudices and passions: the authoritarianism of industrial and scientific experts who imagine that socially, too, there is only "one right way" of doing things (their way), attitudes of contempt for the mass of people, consciousness of class and racial superiority, and the hunger for invidious distinctions and privileges. These manifestations in the new middle class may explode in fascism if insecurity and desperation are increased by failure to solve the economic crisis or to move toward a democratic collectivism.

ACCENT ON DEMOCRACY

The danger cannot be overcome by "revolutionary" struggle against the new middle class; that would surely mean fascism. Resort to violence in Russia was successful largely because the new middle class was small and fascism not yet invented. Violence in an advanced country like the United States would be fatal, because the new middle class is large and can dispose of more of today's specialized violence than the proletariat. It would be fatal, too, even if it were immediately successful. The ensuing dictatorship would cancel the advantage of our higher economic, democratic, and cultural levels, which should make it easier to build democratic socialism here than in Russia. And, most important, dictatorship over the new middle class would ultimately be converted into a dictatorship by that class over the workers and farmers. The trained personnel of that class must be called upon to administer the bureaucratic posts in government and industry; the class sneaks into power. That is what happened in Russia. For who are they who carry on the totalitarian dictatorship of Russian communism in the name of the workers? Members of what we call the new middle class: the bureaucracy in party, government, and industry, the officials, managers, and technicians, the trade-union functionaries, the professionals and intellectuals. It makes no difference that many of Russia's new bureaucratic middle class rose from the ranks of workers and peasants; so did many capitalists.

To escape the pincers of totalitarianism the new middle class must be drawn into the struggle for socialism. It can be done. The members of that class suffer from capitalist economic breakdown and not from the demands of the workers; they must reject the petty struggle to defend themselves against the workers, which leads to totalitarianism, for the bigger and nobler struggle to construct a democratic collectivism that will liberate and develop their functional talents. Totalitarianism offers privileges to the new middle class only under reactionary and oppressive conditions. Inherent in totalitarianism are insecurity and servility, suppression of independence and corruption of personality, degradation of the human spirit. Inherent also are limitation and distortion of economic progress, which limit functional services and lower standards of living, and the political and cultural reaction that drives toward a new barbarism. Against that totalitarian nightmare democratic collectivism offers security, freedom, and dignity.

Members of the new middle class will occupy positions of privilege and power in democratic socialism, as in any conceivable new order of the immediate future. So be it. It is not dangerous if the larger capitalist privileges and power are destroyed and if there is democracy which permits freedom of discussion and action to limit what privileges remain and to prevent abuse of power. The accent is on democracy. Bolshevism started with an absolute equality—no income higher than a skilled worker's—which is now brutal inequality with protest and action completely stifled.

If socialism becomes the expression and realization of the interests of all useful functional groups, it is transformed into a people's socialism. What becomes of the class concept? It is transformed from a source of confusion and ambiguity into a tool of social engineering; a tool with which to identify and delimit those class interests that must be destroyed in order to realize progressive class interests; a tool with which to gauge the strength and weakness of the different functional groups that make up the people, their relation to one another and to ends and means. The older class concept has been historically outlived; it gave rise to millennial abstractions, such as "workers' rule" and "workers' state," which dangerously distort both means and ends—means because support that is imperative for a democratic transition to socialism is alienated; ends because "workers' rule" and "workers' state" become in practice a dictatorship over the workers themselves.

[Part I of this article appeared last week. In the concluding section, which will appear in our next issue, Mr. Corey will suggest a transitional program.]

Has the War Changed France?

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris, January 30

ON THE east coast of England and Scotland they have been bombing trawlers and machine-gunning fishing boats. So far France has not experienced any such "frightfulness," and the war continues, after four and a half months, to be "this queer war," cette drôle de guerre. Of the five million men mobilized not more than thirty thousand or so have had any direct contact with the enemy; and the rest of the troops, and with them the rest of the country, are waiting. As I write I can see from my window the usual merry-go-round of cars and taxis in the cold but sunlit Place de l'Opéra; and armies of women are flocking past on their way to the January sales at the Galeries Lafayette. Carpeaux's Danse outside the Opéra building is covered with sandbags; and in the shop round the corner they are advertising some kind of tarred-paper vest, at twelve francs apiece, which "will keep the troops warm." But apart from little things like that Paris looks much the same as it did before the war.

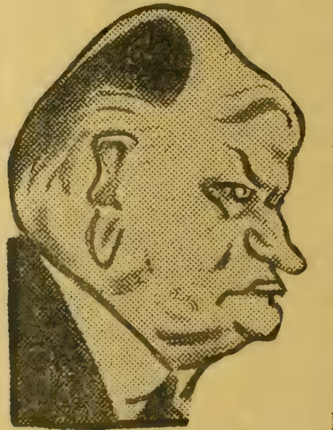
Food, which is already a problem in England, is scarcely a problem here. You can't eat meat on Fridays—for a Catholic country that is no hardship—and you can't eat certain varieties of meat on Mondays and Tuesdays. There are, occasionally, temporary shortages in coffee and in peanut and olive oil. Otherwise, there is plenty of everything, especially if you have the money to pay for it. Not that the cost of living has gone up very much, but incomes have gone down in many cases. Paul Reynaud, the Finance Minister, considers this essential; the "reduction of purchasing power" is one of the pillars of his war finance. The soldiers' wives are certainly much worse off than they were in peace time. A woman with two children receives only twenty-one francs a day to live on if she is in Paris and only sixteen francs fifty in the provinces. The working class is less well paid than it was before the war; it has been estimated that when account is taken of the 15 per cent war surtax on wages—in the case of men of "mobilizable" age—the fall in hourly wages is about 25 per cent. This is partly made up by overtime pay, but not to any great extent. But these are little hardships. Paul Reynaud has told France that "it has no idea yet of the sufferings and privations that will be demanded from it before the war is won."

In a country of forty million people, five million—that is, the greater part of its manhood, and its most productive part—are in the army. In the rear the work is carried on by the rest of the men, including those with affectations spéciales (roughly the equivalent of the British "reserved occupations"), and by the women. Female labor is employed on an ever-increasing scale in the armament works. Officially 900,000 men have been given affectations spéciales (these include the armament workers, the railwaymen and other transport workers, and miners); in reality, the number of mobilizable men who have remained in the rear is believed to be nearly twice that number. One hears it said, especially by men home on leave, that the proportion of peasants in the army seems abnormally high. M. Daladier has just set up a commission to inquire into the whole problem of "reserved occupations"; one of the tasks of this commission will be to set down more precise criteria of "indispensability" for those who wish to stay behind. All this, however, does not mean that France, or even a large part of France, has not its heart in the war.

Generally speaking, it may be said that France entered this war because it considered war inevitable. The French people had had enough of the "war of nerves," with those partial mobilizations every six months which in the end created in every French home a sense of insecurity that became truly intolerable. They were not willing to wait until Hitler had made himself strong enough to swallow England and France outright. Instinctively they knew that it was "now or never"; this last opportunity of stopping the progress of Hitlerism in Europe had to be seized. If in 1938 opinion on "giving Hitler a last chance" was divided, it was so no longer. Moreover, the country's leaders felt that France and England were better prepared for war than they were in 1938, for both British and French rearmament had made enormous progress in the preceding twelve months. Ciano made it plain in a recent speech that Germany had struck much too soon, and that this was one of the reasons why Italy dropped out.

Il faut en finir was the "peace aim" with which the French people entered this war, and at that moment they did not trouble about any of those other "peace aims" which continue to preoccupy some of our left-wing intellectuals in England. The French had no illusions about Hitlerism being one thing and the German people quite another. For had not the German people loudly applauded every crime of Hitler's—the march into Vienna, the seizure of Prague, the destruction of Warsaw?

While there has been less reflection in France than in England on "peace aims," one idea, at least, has caught on—that of some kind of Anglo-French federation which could become the starting-point for a wider European federation, though not, as Daladier said, "without material guaranties." This phrase, incidentally, was cheered from one end of the Chamber of Deputies to the other. France's distrust of Germany is complete; Herriot summed it up when he said, "We must make sure that our sons do not have to fight another war in twenty years' time." What the "material guaranties" are to be has not been stated by Daladier; some interpret the phrase as meaning, among other things, the creation of a buffer state on the left bank of the Rhine, a guaranty which France abandoned in 1919 for the abortive Anglo-American guaranty, and the reconstruction in one form or another, with or without the Hapsburgs, of a "Danubian federation." What encourages France and England in their federalist ideas is the fact that in this war the neutrals are suffering even more from the German menace than are England and France, and will not soon forget it. Brussels and Amsterdam and Copenhagen and Bucharest are much more uncomfortable places to live in today than London and Paris.



Premier Daladier

How long it will take to win the war and what terrible sacrifices may have to be made no one can say, but the conviction is general in France that it will be won. No doubt the Germans are reckoning, or have been until recently, on the eventual demoralization of the French army if it is kept long enough in a state of inactivity behind the Maginot Line; even some Frenchmen say: "We can stand a bloody war as long as necessary, but we shall not stand a bloodless war for longer than eighteen months." This kind of utterance, however, need not be taken literally. In any case, the French General Staff has done all it could to keep the troops busy; it has greatly strengthened the Maginot Line by increasing its depth, and has vastly developed the fortifications on the Belgian and Swiss borders. The soldiers may be "bored," but they have not been wasting their time. Germany has also relied, as one can see from its propaganda, on pacifist and anti-British currents in the French army, but this propaganda has failed completely, if only because every Frenchman knows that Great Britain has already lost many more men than France in this war and is bearing the brunt of the war on the seas, where it is being fought in real earnest.

The spirit of the French army is extremely good. Combining discipline and camaraderie, it is truly republican in spirit, and there is a freedom of discussion in the army among soldiers and officers alike which is unknown in the rear. The French army is essentially democratic, and unlike some British majors of the old-school-tie variety, no French officer would ever dream of objecting to eating in the same restaurant as a poilu. For if the French private respects his officer, it is not by virtue of any social considerations, but simply because he knows the officer's qualifications to be higher and his responsibility greater. Such is the real basis of the republican discipline of the French army.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

A question that has greatly worried some English left-wing intellectuals is whether France is still a democracy. The spirit of the French army seems a sufficient guaranty that, whatever may ultimately happen to the "democratic institutions" of France, its democratic spirit will remain intact. But in war time—and in this may be included the six or seven months that preceded the war—the government has been obliged to discard certain democratic principles. France is under a censorship; the decree of November 19 giving prefects discretionary powers to deport and imprison suspect persons is scarcely democratic; and the treatment of the Communists has been such as to cause a great deal of worry to democratic purists in England. However, one has to consider the simple fact that Stalinist propaganda in France is in reality the same as Hitler propaganda; it is sufficient to compare the copies of the clandestine Humanité with the radio talks of Paul Ferdonnet, "the traitor of Stuttgart," to see that there is mighty little to choose between the two. Both bellow against the "war of the British imperialists," for whom the people of France are shedding their blood, and some weeks ago it was a German airplane which flew one day over the Paris region and dropped leaflets printed in Moscow. As Frossard said in his speech in the Chamber of Deputies on January 16, "Stalin has placed at Hitler's disposal a valuable weapon—his disruptive propaganda among the French working class."

As for the expulsion of the Communists from the Chamber, it is well to remember that this was decided upon not by a mere government decree but by the unanimous vote of the French Parliament, and the Socialists themselves voted for the expulsion of their one-time comrades in the Front Populaire. What was voted was a loi d'exception—which in the annals of the French Republic is not unprecedented. In the past lois d'exception, particularly against members of the former ruling dynasties, have been voted in defense of the regime. The loi d'exception against the Communists was voted not merely in defense of the regime but in defense of France. Frossard, who cannot be suspected of being undemocratic, declared that "if communism is an opinion, Stalinism at the present time is a form of treason." France is still a democracy, but one that is run on the principle of salut public. Herriot, another man who could not by the widest stretch of the imagination be called anti-democratic, recalled in this connection the First Republic and its way of dealing with people guilty of collusion with enemy powers. This does not mean that the salut public regime is perfect. Far from it. Abuses and injustices have occurred. The censorship is often guilty of both arbitrariness and incompetence; and some of the sentences passed on rank-and-file Communists for "defeatist utterances" have been absurdly stiff.

A valid objection raised to the expulsion of the Communist deputies is that strong action has not at the same time been taken against certain persons, political figures and others, who are still guilty of "Hitlerite sympathies," and who have not got out of their system the poison of the old Nazi "anti-Communist" ("Hitler the defender of European civilization"), anti-British, and anti-Semitic slogans—a poison pumped into them for years by the laborious propaganda of German agents like Otto Abetz and Ferdonnet, both of whom used to be personae gratae in certain high quarters. Henri de Kerillis, the nationalist deputy, did well to ventilate the whole question, first in a series of articles in the Epoque, and later in a Chamber speech on January 16. His speech aroused great anger on some of the right-wing benches, where not all consciences were quite clear, at least as regards past contacts and sympathies. Kerillis did not mention any names in either his articles or his speech, but his dossier has now gone before the military authorities; and M. Sarraut, the Minister of the Interior, who said not long ago that "the prisoners' carts were ready," may soon get busy on an investigation.

Though not without danger, this propaganda, whether Nazi or Communist, cannot have very much effect; it is certainly not going to change the determination of the majority of the French people to go on with the war. The Stalin-Hitler pact caused the greatest confusion among the Communist rank and file; and although many of them refused for a long time to dissociate themselves from the dissolved Communist Party—partly for reasons of "party loyalty" and partly out of a general dislike of the Daladier government—few could have had any illusions that the Stalin-Hitler pact was in the interests of France, peace, or the working class. In the last two months the Communist cause in France has suffered several severe blows: first, the invasion of Finland, which the Communist rank and file found very difficult to swallow; then the setbacks of the Red Army, which greatly discredited Stalin in their eyes; and, lastly, the unanimous vote of the French Chamber expelling the Communist deputies. One has, indeed, to be fanatical to close one's eyes to the fact that the whole of French opinion, as represented by Parliament, has denounced the Communists as traitors. The moral weight of such a vote is far greater than that of any government decree would have been, for government action might have been attributed to "reactionary" influences.

Japan's Red Flirtation

BY FREDA UTLEY

HAVING for years endeavored to convince the West that Japan is fighting communism in China, the Japanese press is now threatening that "Japan will be driven into the Soviet camp" if the United States embargoes materials for the Japanese war machine. Japanese propagandists no longer attempt to disguise the fact that it is Chinese nationalism which Japan is striving to destroy and do not hesitate to proclaim that it may accept Communist assistance in order to conquer China. The new line shows signs of being more successful than the old, and the threat of a Russo-Japanese pact is taken seriously by many persons in Great Britain and America. Columnists whose wide knowledge of Europe is matched by their ignorance concerning the Far East warn newspaper readers that the United States should hold its hand lest Japan follow Germany's example. Without pausing to study Japan's economic position and trade relations, or the great differences between its situation and Germany's, they tremble before the bogy of the bolshevization of China through a Russo-Japanese pact.

There is, in fact, no similarity between the situation of Japan and that of Germany. Germany is not dependent on the British Empire and the United States for most of its imports or to take its goods. Germany has the greatest heavy industry in Europe, whereas Japan is the weakest of the great powers in this respect. Japan's production of pig iron, including that produced in Korea and Manchuria, is less than 4 million tons a year, against Germany's 19 million; its production of steel is a mere 6 million tons, against Germany's 23 million (plus 3 million from Czechoslovakia and Austria); the Japanese Empire's production of coal is 60 million tons, against the Reich's 200 million. Germany, moreover, makes practically all kinds of machinery as well as any country in the world or better, whereas Japan cannot manufacture certain important types at all. And Germany of course leads the world in various branches of engineering and chemistry. Iron ore, it is true, must be imported by Germany, but it is obtained from Sweden, and Sweden has no choice but to sell it to the Reich. Japan makes its steel out of iron imported from the British Empire and scrap from the United States; the British now require these supplies for themselves, and the United States need not sell to Japan.

Naturally Japan has become increasingly dependent upon the United States since the European war began. It can now obtain very little from Germany and much less than before from the British Empire. The figures for the first ten months of 1939 show a steep rise in Japan's imports of American power-driven metal-working machinery, refined copper, and iron and steel scrap. Even in 1938 Japan obtained 56 per cent of its imported war materials from the United States, as against 21 per cent from the British Empire. In that year it bought in this country 90 per cent of its scrap iron and steel, 90 per cent of its aviation gasoline, 94 per cent of its automobiles, and large quantities of special steels and alloys, trucks, and lumber. The total value of its imports of American scrap, copper, and oil or gasoline came to nearly 100 million dollars.

Japan's trade position with respect to Russia is in no way comparable to Germany's. It may be a long time before Russia is in a position to supply Germany with much in the way of metals and oil, but it can even now substantially relieve the shortage of food and fodder. More important, Germany can sell to Russia precisely those things which Russia needs to increase its output of the materials Germany requires. It can supply Russia with machinery and technicians. Japan's most vital need, on the other hand, is not food but gasoline, iron, special steels, and machinery, of which Russia has barely enough for its own use. Russia certainly cannot supply Japan with these things if in addition to carrying on its war against Finland it is to help Germany.

Even if Russia, to serve the interests of a Germany to which it is by now fatally bound, could squeeze out some supplies of metal and oil for Japan, how could Japan pay? Those who speak glibly of the possibility of Japan's joining Russia and Germany, or of the futility of an embargo when Japan could obtain American supplies through other countries, seem to be ignorant of the nature of Japan's export trade. Its primary exports are raw silk, textiles (made of imported raw materials), canned fish and fruit, cheap manufactured articles such as toys, fancy goods, electric bulbs, bicycles, rubber goods, and knit wear, and pottery—all these being things which Russia either cannot afford to buy or makes for itself. Unlike Germany, Japan cannot supply Russia with machinery or construction goods, or with skilled workers and engineers; Japanese industry is itself suffering from an acute shortage of qualified personnel. Japan, in short, cannot supply Russia with what it needs any better than Russia could satisfy Japanese war requirements. Hence Japan's value as an ally would disappear if it were cut off from the American market. The alliance would, in fact, become a liability rather than an asset to the totalitarian powers.

Germany would undoubtedly pay a high price to induce Japan to join with it against Britain and France, and Germany may soon be in a position to force Stalin to come to terms with Japan. Japan, for its part, would give a good deal to insure the cessation of Russian aid to China and the disruption of Chinese unity through the revival of class war by the Chinese Communists on orders from Moscow. But it is highly improbable that Japan could obtain these benefits without severing the hair by which the American sword of economic sanctions is suspended over its head. It would not serve the basic aims of the Japanese imperialists to have Chiang Kai-shek deprived of Russian arms if at the same time Japan itself were cut off from American war materials. And it would help Germany little to secure an already exhausted Japan as an ally against the British and French if Japan became a claimant for the scanty stocks of war materials held by Germany and Russia. In spite of American isolationism and in spite of the opinion voiced in some quarters that to save China means to pull British chestnuts out of the fire, it is hard to believe that the United States would continue to trade with a Japan which had allied itself with the Soviet Union and was partitioning China with the Communists to the exclusion of American trade.

If it is argued that a Russia which cannot supply Japan cannot furnish much aid to China, the answer is that China in this war depends on its great man-power and the endurance of its people, whereas Japan depends on superior armaments. With a limited supply of arms the Chinese can keep up their resistance, but the Japanese can neither conquer China nor hold the territory they have occupied without large quantities of modern war materials.

It must be admitted that if Stalin deserted China, and the United States failed to give it material aid, Chinese political and social unity might be destroyed, and the resistance to Japan broken. Should the Chinese Communists, upon instructions from the Comintern, proclaim Chiang Kai-shek to be the leader of Chinese White Guards and start fighting the Kuomintang government instead of the Japanese, China might once more sink into a state of anarchy or fall a prey to war lords. The Chinese Communist Party, however, is less subservient to Moscow than the artificially created Communist parties of Europe and America; it has in recent years enlisted in its ranks many prominent intellectuals, men primarily liberals and patriots; and it is rooted in a peasant movement in no sense Bolshevik in its aspirations. It is doubtful, therefore, whether a majority of its members would obey an order from Moscow to abandon the war of national liberation for a civil war against Chiang Kai-shek and the Kuomintang.

The gravest danger to China, and to the future of the Far East, is the possibility that the U. S. S. R. may secure a predominant influence over the Chinese National Government. This might happen if the United States as well as Britain abandoned China for the purpose of warding off the illusory menace of a Russo-Japanese alliance. Japan's threat to throw itself into the arms of Russia is as hollow as its threat to fight the United States. But China can with truth plead that if it is abandoned by the West it will have no alternatives except surrender to Japan and submission to Communist control. A China deprived of financial assistance from both Britain and the United States, and left to face a Japan armed by both, might find that it could only continue fighting at the cost of an agrarian revolution. If the Chinese peasants were given the land, the whole countryside could be counted upon to resist Japan as the Russian peasantry resisted the Allied intervention in 1920.

JAPANESE BALANCING ACT.

Since the Chinese Communists abandoned the class war in 1935, they have both advocated and practiced a policy of agrarian and governmental reform—not expropriation but rent reduction, not a Communist dictatorship but representative government. Nevertheless, account must be taken of the fact that the Comintern abandoned its democratic masquerade last August. Stalin would now have little to lose and might calculate that he had much to gain by ordering the Chinese Communists to revert to a revolutionary policy. China is one of the few countries where a revolutionary policy might succeed, and where the Communist Party is not too discredited to lead it. If Chiang Kai-shek decided to surrender to Japan rather than take a turn to the left so sharp as to lose him the support of the Chinese bankers, merchants, and landowners, we might see a mighty anarchic movement of the hungry and oppressed millions of China, compared with which the Kuomintang-Communist movement of 1924-27 would seem to have been but a breath of wind before the storm. Such a revolutionary movement, although it might not lead China to anything but disruption and misery, would engulf and destroy not only the Chinese possessing classes but also all foreign interests in China—American, European, and Japanese.

Japan so far has created only a "new disorder" in East Asia, but the forces of disruption have been held in check by the Kuomintang government, which is still striving to maintain China's ties with the democratic powers. The most progressive forces in the country, including not only the liberal intellectuals and the emerging middle class but also bankers of the type of T. V. Soong, hope for agrarian and administrative reforms and a democratic capitalist development with the aid of foreign loans and trade. If the United States at this juncture fails to take advantage of the situation to insure a free China and the Open Door—and at the same time the triumph of the moderate and progressive forces in Japan—China is more likely to fall a prey to bolshevism than to Japan. Now that the strain of war has begun to undermine Japanese unity and is giving the Japanese moderates a chance to assert themselves, it would be a tragedy if the United States were to relax the economic pressure which has already done so much to weaken the extremists.

Opponents of the embargo have argued that the Japanese army would lead Japan to commit hara-kiri as a nation rather than abandon the attempt to conquer China, that the Japanese would go to war with the United States over it even though they knew they would run short of essential war materials in a few weeks and had no hope of victory. This argument springs from an absurdly romantic view of the Japanese samurai, and ignores both the war-weary Japanese people and the big-business interests. The latter are by no means so powerless as is popularly supposed. Japan is not yet the fascist state that shortsighted friends of China have proclaimed it to be. The great monopoly business firms which control the economic life of Japan have not until now opposed the army, since they, no less than the military, desire the hegemony of China. Acquisition of a closed preserve for Japan in China was a policy from which all classes hoped to benefit as long as conquest seemed easy, and as long as the United States did not seriously oppose the "new order in East Asia." Today with an American embargo threatening, with no end to Chinese resistance in sight, with a financial crisis looming and a more colossal budget before the Diet than ever before, with the people murmuring at the shortage of rice, fish, and vegetables, at the charcoal famine, the coal shortage, with the shutting down of thousands of industrial enterprises for many days because of lack of power, the attitude of Japanese business men has changed. The "lean and hungry politicians," as the Japanese press terms them, have begun to raise their heads and to harass the government in the Diet.

If one realizes that the political parties in Japan are the spokesmen of big business in a literal sense unknown in the West, the action of Takao Saito on February 2 assumes especial significance. On that day this leading member of the Minseito Party threw a bombshell in the Diet by asking what Japan's war aims really are, and by suggesting that Japan should withdraw its army from China in order to make possible a negotiated peace. Ten days later Ryozo Makino of the Seiyukai Party demanded that the War Minister give a detailed account of army expenditures and spoke of the "uneasiness" of the people who, "debarred from making political criticism, are criticizing nevertheless." No one before has dared to oppose the war in China, or to question the huge military appropriations, and Mr. Saito and Mr. Makino would hardly have dared to do so if they had not been assured of the support of powerful interests.

The tone of the censored Japanese press warrants the assumption that the Japanese moderates perceive that their hour is at hand. The newspapers, like the people, have begun to ask, "When will this so-called long-term construction of a new order in East Asia be ended?" The following passage from an article in the Kokumin in December is particularly outspoken but not different in substance from many other comments now appearing in the press:

> There is a limit to the people's patience and endurance of hardship. The government should set up some goal which the people may determine to attain. The people cannot go on as they are indefinitely. Present conditions are like a long-distance race without any fixed goal. Even champions become exhausted in such a race. The nation will not be satisfied with a simple declaration that Japan does not want territories or indemnities but that the fighting will go on. The soldiers will be still more dissatisfied with such a declaration. Show us, say the people, the way and the goal.

Such articles as this could not be published in Japan if there were not powerful elements inside as well as outside the government favoring peace. The opportunity for gaining huge profits in foreign trade, now that Europe is involved in war, is an additional and potent motive impelling Japanese business interests to favor a peace with China which would release Japan's productive forces for the manufacture of export goods instead of armaments. But if the United States follows the British line of policy and "appeases" Japan, the moderates will be deprived of support and the extremists will regain their ascendancy.

In the Wind

WHEN MRS. ROOSEVELT visited one of the sessions of the Youth Congress in Washington, she encountered a picket line of Young Republicans in front of the hall. One of her escorts asked her whether she minded walking past the pickets. "Of course not," she replied, "I only stop for labor picket lines."

LOOK IS RUNNING a picture-history of the present war edited by Laurence Stallings. A recent number showed a picture of a starving child with the caption: "German Child." In Laurence Stallings's book "The First World War" the same picture appears—to illustrate the "post-war famine in Russia."

NO WHITE HORSE? The French weekly l'Europe Nouvelle published an item recording the demolition of the Soviet pavilion at the New York World's Fair. A description of the architectural beauty of the pavilion contained a reference to "the high column surmounted by a gigantic figure of a nude woman holding a star aloft."

SHORTLY AFTER the British monarchs visited the United States, George Backer, publisher of the New York Post, was a dinner guest at the White House. The menu was unusually elaborate, with caviar and similar dishes. When Backer seemed surprised, the President commented wryly: "Oh, this is just stuff that was left over after the party for the King and Queen."

SOCIETY NEWS: "The Regency Club, 15 East Sixty-seventh Street, a sumptuous playroom for the town's most affluent and spectacular bridge players, is planning a grand party tonight for Finnish relief. A polite and pleasant pandemonium is expected to reign in the plush quarters of the club tonight; and while it does not usually call out its members for 'causes,' Mrs. T. Charles Farrelly, vice-president, expressed the warm feeling the members had for the fighting Finns, adding, 'and we'd do anything for Mr. Hoover.' "—From the bridge column of the New York Herald Tribune.

FEMALE MEMBERS of the Communist Party have started wearing silk stockings again: party leaders decided that cotton made them too easy to identify. . . . In a recent Saturday Review of Literature poll one author was reported as favoring Mrs. Roosevelt for the Presidency; it was Rex Stout, the mystery writer. . . . A bitter row is raging on the Stanford University campus because the student council refused to sanction a Finnish relief program; Palo Alto, where the college is situated, is Herbert Hoover's home town, and Stanford his Alma Mater.

INTIMATES OF Morris Ernst were recalling his propensity to refer to celebrated people by their first names. Elmer Rice said he heard the neatest illustration of it at a Civil Liberties Union meeting some months ago. A member proposed that James Madison's birthday be linked to A. C. L. U. celebrations of the Bill of Rights; another protested that Madison's name wasn't meaningful enough to most Americans. Whereupon, reports Rice, Ernst protested excitedly: "Jim is damn well known."

IN THE LIST of instructions concerning the Youth Congress meeting, delegates were admonished to behave with "the utmost in decorum" when they met on the White House lawn. Apparently reading the last two words as one, they hissed on several occasions and applauded at the wrong places during the President's speech.

IN ITS MIDNIGHT edition on January 24 the New York Times carried a long account of a speech by Tom Dewey under the headline: "New Deal Means Ruin, Says Dewey." In the report of the address appeared two paragraphs hailing the Wagner Act as a "new liberty." It didn't sound like Mr. Dewey; it wasn't. The paragraphs had been transposed from another column quoting an address by J. Warren Madden.

ADVERTISEMENT in the London Times: "Sleeping partner required. Quick turn-over essential."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The Facts About Mr. Dewey

THE effrontery of District Attorney Dewey's candidacy for the Presidency of the United States has amazed me since my return from Europe. Americans cannot project themselves into the situation in Europe; they do not realize that the demands upon European statesmen and upon those who head the United States government will be greater after this war is over than at any other time in modern history. That in this grave crisis the Republicans of the United States should be asked to vote for a man who is totally without experience in foreign affairs and has never held any administrative position except that of his present office and one other would be an amusing joke if its possible consequences were not so serious.

What are the facts about Mr. Dewey? So far as I can ascertain them they are the following: He is thirty-eight years old and has been a member of the bar for fourteen years. He has been chief assistant to the United States Attorney of the Southern District of New York and for a short time United States Attorney. He has been District Attorney of New York City since 1937 and was defeated for Governor of the state in 1938. He did not wish to accept the position of District Attorney when it was first offered to him, for he was not interested in that service to the public because of the smallness of the salary attached. Not wishing to support his family on $10,000 a year, he had to be dragooned into taking the nomination. He promised, if elected, that he would serve out his term, and a year later accepted the nomination for Governor. On this extremely slim record of public service he is now contending for the nomination for President of the United States at a time when this country is confronting one of the gravest crises in its history.

Mr. Dewey has not distinguished himself at the New York bar. He has, however, made an excellent District Attorney and apparently has been a good administrator of the office. But he has been arrogant, very egotistical, and, if my information is correct, not popular with his own subordinates, for he seeks in every case all the praise for the achievements of his office. The newspapermen who come in contact with him in the main dislike him. He has been extremely high-handed in dealing with witnesses whom he has detained—under $10,000 bail without charges against them—and placed, not in regular state institutions, but in houses specially hired for the purpose, in one of which one of these witnesses committed suicide. Some of his acts along this line have been so censurable that representations have been made in Washington by those who are on the lookout to protect the public from breaches of the Bill of Rights and infringements of civil liberties. In talking recently with a high judge, a Republican, and with one of the foremost members of the New York bar, an independent Democrat, I found that both of them were emphatically of the opinion that even from the lawyer's point of view Dewey lacks the background to make him worthy of serious consideration for the great office to which he now aspires—he certainly seeks the office, and not the office the man. There is no comparison between his career and the early career of Charles E. Hughes, for whose nomination as Governor there was a widespread demand as a result of his services as counsel in the special inquiry into the maladministration of the insurance companies in New York City.

As for Mr. Dewey's speeches, which constitute his bid for the office, they show that he is hastily acquiring opinions upon all sorts of matters; it is reported that there is a brain trust which is carefully coaching him on what he shall say and think, notably on foreign issues. Already he has come out for the extreme big-navy position—navies in both oceans—without, I am willing to wager, ever having considered the arguments on the other side. He is trying to straddle on the New Deal in that, like so many other Republicans, he does not denounce it altogether but wants to keep part of it while opposing its manners and methods. He has as yet worked out no alternative program which is worth considering. That he is being put forward seriously merely testifies to the absolute lack of leadership in the Republican Party. It is true that he makes agreeable, at times skilful, speeches, that he has a fine speaking voice and therefore makes a good appeal on the radio, that he is personally attractive. None of these things warrant the assumption that at thirty-eight he is competent to administer the affairs of the United States in the middle of a war the gravity of which cannot be too much stressed. So far as his record is concerned, there are thousands of other Americans who are just as much entitled to consideration. I for one refuse to believe that he can possibly be put over in the Republican convention. He will not be if those who have come in contact with him in his work in New York say what they really think about him.

Notes by the Way

WHAT one remembers most vividly, at first, about Erskine Caldwell's new book, "Trouble in July" (Duell, Sloane, and Pearce, $2.50), is the sultry, oppressive atmosphere of the Georgia cotton country in summer. Then one realizes that the oppressive element is not a natural but a human one—the tension between blacks and whites and above all the white man's compulsion to cling, in his poverty of body and spirit, to his one remaining value, superiority over the Negro.

The story is a simple one; it is also one which has been enacted so often in real life in the South that it has taken on the quality of a sinister folk tale. A "poor white" girl in the Georgia setting Mr. Caldwell knows and has described so thoroughly in the past asserts that she has been raped by a young Negro. The boy is driven away by his own people out of fear and goes into hiding. Meanwhile the hunt begins; and as it runs its course to its predestined fatal end Mr. Caldwell gives us a picture which conveys better than anything else I have read the quality of a community obsessed and held in bondage by race prejudice. In at least two of the characters there is a conflict of feeling and will—with the will operating on the side of prejudice. It is one of these two who finally turns the boy over to his lynchers, though he is convinced of his innocence, in order to preserve his own status as a white man. After the lynching the girl reveals what everyone really knew, that there had been no rape, and is herself stoned by the mob. By that time it is clear that the hunt and the kill and race prejudice itself are expressions of impulses rooted deep in the human and social complex of the time and place. And the whole episode seems to float in the shimmering dusty heat as in some colorless preservative jelly.

Mr. Caldwell has always worked to a small scale. Many of his short stories are little more than anecdotes that seem hardly to justify formal publication; the present "novel" deals with one incident. Heretofore his most striking characters, being "submarginal," have been interesting not as human individuals but as biological types so low in the scale that their behavior arouses laughter that has always seemed to me half-defensive—to cover a recoil from the idea that these creatures are really fellow human beings. But his technical skill and his unsentimental approach to his material have given his stories an intrinsic interest as writing. In the present book the humor and the merciless objectivity of "Tobacco Road" remain. But the compassion and understanding which have shown through in his best shorter pieces are given fuller expression than in any of his previous work. And the fact that they are not baldly obtruded but woven into the fabric of the story is all the more decisive evidence of his growth as a writer and as an understanding observer of social processes. As a result, even the crudest characters in this book take on humanity, and though Mr. Caldwell has made no compromise with sentimentality—with one exception—he has given us human beings in a tragic situation rather than outlandish figures in a folk tale. The one exception is the characterization of Sonny, the Negro boy, which lacks the shading that gives reality to his persecutors. This defect, however, is less serious in relation to the plot than might be expected, for the reader's certainty of Sonny's innocence rests on Mr. Caldwell's convincing picture of him as young and scared in a white man's world rather than as a good boy.

"Trouble in July" illustrates once more that the first requirement for writing good fiction of "social significance" is the ability to write good fiction. This simple truth bears restating at a time when formless tracts are called novels, when static symbolic figures, in abject slavery to their authors, pass for characters, and when atmosphere, instead of being built into the structure of a given work, is largely achieved by means of a kind of literary demagogy with which the author exploits simple and known responses of the reading populace. This type of evocative writing may be socially useful—witness "The Grapes of Wrath." But the fact that such works are dependent for their main force on external rather than internal elements lessens their chances of standing by themselves in a different public climate—and that is still the test of a work of art. I should not hazard the prediction that "Trouble in July" will live forever; I am merely asserting that being self-sufficient—in form, character, atmosphere, and suspense—it has a life of its own. And art is one field in which autarchy is necessary for survival.

MARGARET MARSHALL

An Epilogue to Peace

PROLOGUE TO WAR. By Elizabeth Wiskemann. Oxford University Press. $3.

WHEN Lord Runciman embarked upon his sinister trip to Prague, a pictorial published a picture of him sitting in a railway compartment reading Miss Wiskemann's "Germans and Czechs." From what happened later we may infer that his journey was too short to allow him to finish this scholarly work; otherwise, perhaps, he would not so readily have assisted at the dismemberment of Europe's only post-war-created democracy, of which, as Mr. Chamberlain confessed, he and his colleagues knew so little. When Miss Wiskemann's new book appeared on the eve of the current war, it was too late for any study of it to avert the catastrophe, but no statesman who may be responsible for the future peace can afford to neglect it, lest the peace should be indeed no peace but merely a prologue to another war.

Bismarck is supposed to have said that there were only two people in Europe who understood the Balkans—himself and another statesman who went mad and, unfortunately, died. Miss Wiskemann, fortunately, is very much alive, and though I am loath to indulge in the Balkan habit of superlatives, her book reveals the most stupendous knowledge of the turmoil in all those countries east and west of the axis upon which Nazi imperialism is anxious to bestow its benefits. She presents a vivid picture of the political and economic pressure exerted by Germany upon the countries in its potential Lebensraum, and at the same time gives the clearest possible explanation of the conflicting national ambitions and economic interests in Eastern and Southeastern Europe.

No one has mastered the political and economic entanglements of these countries, with all their party antagonisms, intrigues, and personal ramifications, better than Miss Wiskemann. Not only was she there, "on the spot," as journalists used to be, but she really knows the spot, its history and all its problems, as correspondents do not always know it. This virtue of hers is responsible for her only sin. When, after the World War, society in all countries west of the Rhine and south of the Alps turned topsy-turvy, the upheaval brought adventurers, criminals, nobodies, and, as the Nazi example shows, even monsters to the political surface. Miss Wiskemann's knowledge of these new politicians is not only astonishing but, to the less erudite reader, even bewildering. In spite of her brilliant style, which makes all the details delightful reading, we sometimes wish that she would give us fewer facts and a more compact synopsis of the social background. Considering the ignorance of Western Europe and the United States about the Balkan mentality, it would have been illuminating if she had summarized for us that Eastern mind clad in Western garb for which falseness, deceitfulness, and trickery are natural ways and means to an end.

There could be no more convincing evidence of the keenness of Miss Wiskemann's political judgment than the unaltered publication in September, 1939, of a book finished in July, 1938. No politician who reads this book will have any excuse for believing it possible to come to terms with highwaymen whose craving for world domination implies the destruction of the most valuable achievements of Christian civilization. Certainly no one should feel entitled to express an opinion about the issues of the war without having read its prologue, which harmoniously combines the full command of all relevant facts with a keen understanding.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

The Mexico of Cárdenas

THE RECONQUEST OF MEXICO. By Nathaniel and Sylvia Weyl. The Oxford University Press. $3.

THE project of this book is ambitious: to combine a biography of President Lázaro Cárdenas and an examination of the sometimes spectacular events of his administration with a retrospective view of the Mexican Revolution. The result is not, unhappily, uniformly successful. In an attempt, apparently, to avoid retracing ground already surveyed by previous commentators, the Weyls present their reading of the revolution in terms of the childhood and youth of their protagonist. But the subject of the revolutionary origins and development has by no means been exhausted; on the contrary, it is literally impossible to understand why the Cárdenas government has been unique without a thorough analysis of the pre-Cárdenas period and of the peculiar configuration of historical forces which has permitted its extraordinary experimentation. This the Weyls have failed adequately to provide. Owing perhaps to the divided attention implicit in their approach, their treatment of the revolution is superficial and spotty, and is further marred by hasty and unwarranted judgments, such as their underestimation of Venustiano Carranza, without whom the entire revolutionary movement must inevitably have degenerated into a sterile anarchy leading to nothing but a restoration of the Porfirio Díaz feudalism.

The Weyls are on firmer ground in their discussion of contemporary problems. Their chapters on the agrarian reform, the oil controversy, the nationalization of the railroads, the growing power of the labor movement and its struggles with native and foreign industry, and on education, hygiene, and social welfare are an admirably clear exposition of the policies and accomplishments of the past five years, buttressed by a good deal of valuable statistical and other data which are not readily available to the casual inquirer into Mexican affairs.

The authors see the Cárdenas government as a transition regime between a hybrid capitalism and some form of the cooperative commonwealth, and they find Cárdenas himself the ablest exponent of an emerging Mexican democracy. It is true, of course, that the present administration has made immense strides toward the goal of preparing the Mexican masses for an enlarged degree of participation in political and economic affairs and has shown remarkable invention and imagination in devising new forms by which to canalize the growing political demands of an awakening but still semi-illiterate and half-starved people.

It would be dangerous, nevertheless, to confuse the forms with the underlying reality. Liberal capitalism, as the term is understood in the great industrial countries, has never existed in Mexico, where its struggles to develop have been frustrated by well-defined alien distortions of the national economy. Too weak economically and too timid politically to reap the full harvest of its own revolution, the middle class has lost direct political control of the country to the workers and peasants who are Cárdenas's chief supporters. But despite the growth of public ownership of industry and of collective agriculture in certain regions, Mexico's economy is still preponderantly "feudo-capitalist," with imperialist overtones, while the efforts of the government in behalf of the working classes—that is, its measures to promote literacy, health, and mass purchasing power—are coming ever closer to the dilemma that confronts all liberal regimes: if on the one hand they are building a wider base for the capitalist market, they simultaneously hold back industrial expansion by diverting a limited surplus into social services. This route is progressive, and extremely beneficial to the great majority of the Mexican people, but it does not of itself lead to socialism. What it does lead to immediately is political crisis, as in the current presidential campaign, in which a resentful middle class is preparing, either by violent counter-revolution or by seduction or intimidation of his successor, to bury the policies of the hated Cárdenas regime under a reactionary avalanche.

The Weyls have tackled an extremely difficult task in their endeavor to provide a handbook to the puzzling Cárdenas government, and except for some more or less serious errors —space is lacking to deal with them all in detail—their study is a generally reliable guide. It presents objectively and with considerable insight the essential facts in most of the recent matters of controversy; it is thus an excellent antidote to such "smear-Mexico" propaganda as that currently emanating from oil-company and other interested quarters.

HARRY BLOCK

Politics and Progress

THE TWENTY YEARS' CRISIS: 1919-1939. AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS. By Edward Hallet Carr. The Macmillan Company. $3.

FORMERLY an official of the British Foreign Office and now a university professor, Mr. Carr, in a book of this title, might be expected to resurvey the history of the past twenty years and to expatiate on the blunders which, in his opinion, were the chief architects of recent moral and material ruin. The crisis which he discusses, however, is a crisis of thought. We have had two decades of muddled thinking. "Politics," he declares, "are made up of two elements—utopia and reality—belonging to two different planes which can never meet. There is no greater barrier to clear political thinking than failure to distinguish between ideals which are utopia and institutions which are reality."

The "utopians" have not seen that morality and power have their connections. This is Mr. Carr's argument, and it is greatly influenced by Bertrand Russell's excellent book entitled "Power." We have had too much morality which ignored power—the League; and too much power without morality—Bolshevism and National Socialism. Mr. Carr sets for himself the task of bringing "down the whole cardboard structure of post-war utopian thought by exposing the hollowness of the material out of which it is built." After he has diagnosed and described the disease, he proposes not a surgical operation but only a dose of salts—that is, clearer thinking; and he himself says that the directions toward which he would push the thinking are "utopian."

Writing smoothly and clearly, widely read in political theory, and with a gift for apt quotation, Mr. Carr devotes much of his book to catching the "utopians"—Sir Alfred Zimmern or Professor Toynbee, for example—in mental undress and demonstrating that their negligee is careless. He is more interested in silly things that utopians may have said than in what statesmen have done and whether they could have persuaded their peoples to support them in doing otherwise. The result is a series of straw men set up and triumphantly knocked down. When he cannot find a personal straw man he creates an impersonal one: "some utopians," "a commonly held view," and the like.

In his final chapter Mr. Carr fuses some of his dialectical points into an analysis which is persuasive and in some respects fresh. He asks whether the satisfied powers which identified international morality "with security, law and order, and other time-honored slogans of privileged groups" do not divide responsibility for recent disasters with the dissatisfied powers which "practically denied the validity of an international morality so constituted." He draws an interesting analogy between intra-state developments with particular reference to the position of labor organizations. A century ago self-help by labor was illegal. Now, although the right to strike is conceded everywhere save in the totalitarian states, the vast majority of labor disputes are adjusted through various forms of conciliation or arbitration. There is almost a regular system of "peaceful change," the costs of which to employers and the possessors of property are constantly mounting. They pay the higher costs, albeit reluctantly, and thereby maintain their position as employers and owners. The parallel cannot be pressed too far, but Mr. Carr argues that a realistic view of a possible new international order must recognize the necessity of making less irrepressible the conflict between privileged and underprivileged in the international sphere. The difficulty is an unwillingness to accept the truth that "conflict between nations, like the conflict between classes, can only be resolved by sacrifice."

So, Mr. Carr concludes, "all states are being compelled to subordinate economic advantage to social ends," and he thinks that the more "the provision of a rational employment supplants maximum profit as an aim of economic policy," the more inclined states will be to see that their social ends are not limited by frontiers. After the last war they recognized this to an extent in granting "relief credits." Loans from which there can be no adequate economic or even military return are now considered sound statecraft. If we further broaden our view of national policy this may help "to broaden our view of international policy." Mr. Carr admits that "this, too, is a utopia," and his readers will agree. But some may be comforted if they recall that, in discussing a league to enforce peace—this was before the drafting of the Covenant—Senator Henry Cabot Lodge declared that it is only by striving for utopias that any real progress can be made.

LINDSAY ROGERS

Cross-Section

BOOKS THAT CHANGED OUR MINDS. Edited by Malcolm Cowley and Bernard Smith. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

THIS symposium is the result of an inquiry addressed to a number of representative men by the editors of the New Republic as to the books published in the twentieth century which have influenced them fundamentally. The final list, with the writers who have contributed the evaluations, is: Freud and "The Interpretation of Dreams," by George Soule; "The Education of Henry Adams," by Louis Kronenberger; Turner's "The Frontier in American History," by Charles A. Beard; Sumner's "Folkways," by John Chamberlain; Veblen and "Business Enterprise," by R. G. Tugwell; Dewey and his "Studies in Logical Theory," by C. E. Ayres; Boas and "The Mind of Primitive Man," by Paul Radin; Beard's "Economic Interpretation of the Constitution," by Max Lerner; Richards's "The Principles of Literary Criticism," by David Daiches; Parrington's "Main Currents in American Thought," by Bernard Smith; Lenin's "The State and Revolution," by Max Lerner; Spengler's "The Decline of the West," by Lewis Mumford.

The choice was heavily weighted in advance: first, by excluding all works of fiction, in a time which has been strongly affected by at least two writers of fiction, Marcel Proust and James Joyce, and perhaps a third, the Sinclair Lewis of "Main Street" and "Babbitt"; second, by what Mr. Cowley, in an Afterword on the Modern Mind, which, with his Foreword giving book lists submitted, goes far to redress the balance and disarm criticism, calls "the political temper of its editors and their advisers." "Most of these are progressives," he explains, "in the sense that they believe in democratic control and in the possibility of social progress."

Most of us are progressives in this sense; but the scales are further weighted by the predominance of one particular progressive preoccupation. The exposition of the principle of economic determinism—which all of us whose minds have been "changed" by the twentieth century believe in—is given, through accidents of treatment as well as choice, a preponderance which, in the light of the total omission of literary and scientific works, is almost exclusive. ("The Principles of Literary Criticism," though an important book for students of literature, belongs more in the realm of philosophy and psychology.)

I cannot believe Spengler's "The Decline of the West," however stimulating in detail, changed many progressive minds; nor does Mr. Mumford's beautifully written essay argue very strongly for it. Its inclusion seems to result from a tendency which we share with the Germans: on the one hand, to be impressed by writers who wear their learning heavy with multiplied detail, and, obversely, to be almost ruthlessly preoccupied with one phase of truth (to use a dangerously convenient word) at a time.

In practice it means, at best, a preoccupation with passing phases of the American scene, at worst, the extension of the best-seller system to the world of ideas. Mr. Cowley, using some well-selected passages from Mill as a foil, shows cogently how "the history of thought for the last eighty years might be centered round the attack on the Reasoning Man." Of the eight American writers considered, only Dewey and Boas have played fundamental parts in this attack, and neither of them is quite comparable to Freud—or to Lenin, who leads the attack on another front. Naturally, not all the books which have changed our minds are of the same order of theoretical importance. Yet it is noteworthy that so large a proportion of those which demanded a place in this cross-section of the mind of the American intellectual should be expressions of purely American—and in all but two cases, passing—aspects of "truth." This is a comment and not a criticism. It is even more remarkable that the attack on the Reasoning Man on the biological and cosmological fronts should be unrepresented in an age which has seen a revolutionary break-up of traditional concepts.

But where everyone differs no one can be dogmatic, nor have the editors fallen into this error. Not the least valuable and enlightening feature is Mr. Cowley's humane and reasonable summing up. Which may go to show that the attack on the Reasoning Man has only resulted in more careful reasoning. JAMES ORRICK

Small-Town Exile

THE MORNING IS NEAR US. By Susan Glaspell. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

AS IN her Pulitzer Prize play, "Alison's House," Susan Glaspell again depicts the unraveling of a dead woman's secret, which certain members of her family have assiduously kept shrouded in order to protect her memory. But instead of a literary personage as the vehicle for the mystery, we have a very beautiful woman who married, under unusual and disturbing circumstances, into a middle-class family in a small American town. The focal character is her daughter, Lydia Chippman, who was sent away from home while barely in her teens, and who for twenty-five years has wandered restlessly over the world, hating her nomadic existence, but always finding obstacles placed by her relatives in the way of her returning home. When she does come back she sets herself to ferret out the reasons for her protracted exile, for the ambiguous terms on which she is allowed to take possession of the old family home, and for the mystery surrounding her mother's past, but at every turn she runs into more blind alleys, more admonishments to relinquish the quest. A large share of her puzzlement results not so much from lack of clues as from Lydia's thorough guilelessness and innocence of spirit—she has even adopted two children, one Greek and one Mexican, to say nothing of a sweet-tempered donkey, yet she cannot understand why the townspeople consider her queer. Long before Lydia discovers it, the reader will have guessed that she is an illegitimate child, and guessing that, may feel that the author makes a world of pother and delay in getting to the dénouement; but the explanation turns out to be not quite so simple, involving a tortuous psychological labyrinth in the relations between Lydia's mother and father, the final clarification of which is reserved for a melodramatic reconciliation scene, with appropriate obbligato of night and rainstorm. Except for this unnecessarily shrill climax, however, the book preserves a tone of quiet sympathy and searching analysis entirely worthy of Miss Glaspell's competent hand. LOUIS B. SALOMON

Shorter Notices

ARETINO, SCOURGE OF PRINCES. By Thomas Caldecot Chubb. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.50.

A life of the Cinquecento shoemaker's son, called by Milton "the ribald of Arezzo," who raised libel and pornography to the rank of literature and blackmail to the status of a career. Associated with three popes, Henry VIII, François I, and several lesser notables, he was finally bought off by Charles V himself. Mr. Chubb, author of "The Life of Giovanni Boccaccio," knows a great deal about the Italian Renaissance, but he seems occasionally to supply details from memory and always writes in the style of a mail-order advertisement. This does not prevent the book from being interesting.

WHY BRITAIN IS AT WAR. By Harold Nicolson. Penguin Books. 25 cents.

"The answer to that question can be given in two words, 'Adolf Hitler,' " says Mr. Nicolson, but an additional reason emerges—the extreme gullibility of the British government. He explains to his readers that the ordinary Britisher's instinct for self-preservation and moral sense have been outraged, and offers good advice on war aims and peace conferences. There is no mention of India.

THE CASE FOR FEDERAL UNION. By W. B. Curry. Penguin Books. 25 cents.

A convincing demonstration of the necessity of world order and the desirability of a federal order. The book leans heavily on "Union Now," by Clarence Streit, who contributes the American preface. It was largely written before last September, and the author's afterthoughts fail to dispose of the now obvious objections to Mr. Streit's plan of beginning with a few selected "democracies." Nor is adequate consideration given to the desirability of federating on geographical lines first if only a partial beginning is feasible. The British Empire renders a United States of Europe so difficult that it would seem to be world federation or none.

THE ART AND LIFE OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. By Hazelton Spencer. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

All the known facts, together with a compendium of criticism, interpretation, and stage history which represents a remarkable job of sifting. Copious, beautiful, and informative illustrations, notes that interest and enlighten, and a select critical bibliography that is an excellent guide to further study make this a book which any student of Shakespeare will find interesting and useful. The only defect is that the author sometimes overemphasizes common sense at the expense of more interpretative and speculative writers.

THE EMPEROR CHARLES V: THE GROWTH AND DESTINY OF A MAN AND OF A WORLD-EMPIRE. By Karl Brandi. Translated from the German by C. V. Wedgwood. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

This biography of the remarkable man who directly or indirectly ruled most of the sixteenth-century world from Poland to Peru, and of all the Holy Roman Emperors since Charlemagne came nearest to achieving their common goal, combines a history of the times with an interpretation of the inner development of a human being. It is not only scholarly—the author is the greatest living authority on this ramified subject—but readable, and the translation is of the smoothest.

Drama Note

SO FAR only two new plays have disturbed the tranquillity of Lent, and neither will be long remembered. Bernard Shaw's "Geneva" was perhaps not quite so dull as one had been led to expect, but there is no reason for deeply regretting its quick disappearance. It was a rather bald mixture of farce and argument whose only conclusion was perfectly familiar to readers of Shaw: as a political animal man is a complete failure. Few would care to dispute that statement, but the implied corollary is not particularly helpful. We can't wait for the superman.

"The Unconquered" (Biltmore Theater) is Ayn Rand's own dramatization of her novel "We the Living." It is a mixture of melodrama and farce purporting to show what happens to personal integrity under the Soviet regime. It is heavy-handed and neither more nor less interesting than most of the plays defending what the present author attacks.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ART

The Sleeping Renaissance

EXCUSES have come from the directors of the Museum of Modern Art for its exhibition, now current, of the group of paintings and sculptures of the Renaissance and the Baroque period lent by the Italian government to the San Francisco Fair—the group which includes such marvels as Michelangelo's Madonna Pitti, The Birth of Venus by Botticelli, Verrocchio's David, and Titian's Paul III. Defensively the catalogue stresses the appropriateness, to a modern museum, of this show of old masterpieces, insisting that three great traditions of European art have their sources in the art represented: the Venetian tradition of rich color and dynamic motion, the Florentine tradition of classic line and static sculptural forms influenced by antiquity, and the Bolognese tradition of optical realism, realistic subject matter, and analysis of light. Almost defiantly it points to the fact that not only the opulent Titian and the jewel-like Giovanni Bellini now on the museum walls but their neighbor, the delicately coloristic St. George by Mantegna, are connected through Rubens and Delacroix with the painting of Renoir. A straight line, again it affirms, leads from another of the marvelous exhibits, Masaccio's powerful, tactile little Crucifixion, and from the elegantly composed Madonna of the Chair by Raphael—hanging close by—through Poussin and Ingres to the art of Degas and Seurat. As for the Boy Bitten by a Lizard, the sensational Caravaggio prominent in the Baroque section—that, or at least the experiments in violent lighting represented by it, the catalogue avers, helped engender Velasquez and Goya, who helped engender Manet and the impressionists.

Possibly all these claims are just. But such excuses on the part of an institution dedicated to the appreciation of modern art and the illumination of contemporary life were unnecessary. The show, which is effectively, reverently, magnificently spaced and lighted, constitutes a standard of comparison favorable in particular to the judgment of modern art and to a knowledge of our time. The relative freedom of the great modern masters grows distinct as one stands in the midst of it. The old masters, one perceives, were more constrained by conventions than were their recent successors, not only in their choice of subjects but in their techniques and means of solving problems. The relatively more complete aestheticism of the modern masterpieces also grows plain: their greater independence of subject matter for their interest. Simultaneously the exhibition makes evident the degree to which we, who but recently considered ourselves heirs to the Renaissance, have become alienated from its world and spirit.

Among these works one suddenly finds oneself in a world of strangely self-confident creatures, of surprisingly energetic, able individuals who delighted in their personalities, knowing they contained the seeds of universal life, mastered a vast circle of spiritual interests, and aspired to universality; who felt about them, with intoxication, the magic breath of the cosmos. As in a dream, bit by bit, all this becomes clear to us from its expressions, in themselves so curiously philosophical. We recover the intense appreciation of personality and of the beauty of wholeness of soul and body from the serene Donatello portrait-bust; the deification of manhood from the tragic and virile figure of the Christ by Masaccio; the pride, the purposefulness, the self-reliance from the nervous and individualized form of Verrocchio's sinewy little David. In the wavy, gentle lines of the Botticelli reverberates a hymn to the spirit of the blowing earth. Out of the broadly conceived and architectonic Michelangelo low-relief surges a presentiment of the coming god-man, the co-Creator. The unfailing social rhythm not only of the Venetian art but of all the work, the harmony of the feelings objectified in it, and the simplicity of the objectification overwhelmingly bring this strange world home. One grasps that for these artists and the culture they embodied divinity was latent in the whole nature of man. Pico della Mirandola, indeed, spoke for them all in saying, "To us it has been given to turn ourselves of our free will into godlike beings!"

The feeling of remoteness persists. This vernal world of amazing, immense individuals moved to multilateral self-development and still in harmony with nature and society, this world above all of the reborn "Promethean" thought, seems lost in some past of the human being. Is it possible, one wonders, that the abuse of machinery has permanently impaired delight in personality, the sense of the individual's sanctity, and his impulse to self-development?

That thought, however, the exhibition refuses to corroborate. The expression of the consciousness of a great opportunity missed, of disappointed ambition and smothering materialism in Titian's melancholy Paul III; the vision of the ruined, pestilence-smitten Italy of the puritanical Counter-Reformation evoked by Tintoretto's furious, dynamic proclamation of the unity of the spiritual and material realms in St. Augustine Healing the Plague-Stricken, suddenly remind us that even in the sixteenth century the spirit of the rebirth must have seemed frustrated. We know its death was deceptive. Never the possession merely of an élite, the self-confidence of the Renaissance awoke in other lands. Periodically it has died and then resumed: men whom the race has accepted as representative, men close to ourselves, have been moved to universality—Goethe, for example. The "Promethean" thought lives in Beethoven's music and in the poetry of Whitman. We are in one of the periods of seeming death.

PAUL ROSENFELD

There are
64 VALUES
in LAFAYETTE'S
Radio Line

Whatever the radio you have in mind—portable, table model, automatic radio-phonograph combination . . . whatever the price you choose to pay, Lafayette has the set for you, and offers more for your money. More wanted features, more realism of reproduction, more cabinet beauty, more fine quality throughout. There are sixty-four distinguished models in the Lafayette line for 1940—every one a value! Send today for Catalog No. NB4 describing the complete line.

LAFAYETTE RADIO
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
24 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

RECORDS

A READER in Arkansas A. and M. College writes to call my attention to "the fact that not one major radio station in the whole South carries the Saturday evening N.B.C. Symphony broadcasts"; and that since the stations which the Radio Guide lists for the C.S.T. belt cannot be satisfactorily heard there, "all we have now is Mr. Barbirolli and his constant repetitions of those damned Enigma Variations!" But there are other parts of the South, I was once told, which don't get even that. "Letters to individual radio stations," my correspondent goes on, "bring the reply that the N.B.C. chain selects the stations which will carry the concerts; and the N.B.C. office writes that it is left to individual stations to decide if they will broadcast the concerts. Someone is certainly prevaricating." He feels that "until N.B.C. does something to remedy this situation it should pull in its proud chest and cease this blabbering about the wonderful service it is rendering the cause of good music in America." And his concluding sentence is: "Mr. Olin Downes was too timorous of stepping on somebody's toes to print a letter in the New York Times."

Dorothy Maynor's singing of Handel's "O Sleep! Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" on her second Victor record (15826, $2) is very beautiful, but not as extraordinary as what she accomplished with the piece at her New York debut; and the voice is not as faithfully reproduced as it is in "Ach, ich fühl's" from "The Magic Flute" on the reverse side. There one hears the loveliness of timbre and good taste in phrasing, but also the absence, as yet, of anything that could be called style—the style, for example, which contributes as much as the sheer beauty of Milizia Korjus's voice to making her record of arias from Verdi's "Ernani" and "I Vespri Siciliani" (12603, $1.50) outstanding. Expert listeners note another important difference—that the beauty of Korjus's voice rests on a secure foundation of thorough schooling, and the loveliness of Miss Maynor's does not. And the importance of this difference is that a beautiful voice which is well schooled retains its beauty, whereas one that is not well schooled loses it. These people feel that Miss Maynor has been pushed out on the concert platform before she is ready and may suffer for it.

Kipnis sings Schubert's "Erlkönig" on his new Victor record (15825, $2) with more dramatic point than on his older Columbia record, but with less beauty of voice. On the reverse side is Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," excellently done. Melchior's voice in its best present-day condition and the superb sound of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy are faithfully reproduced on the record (2035, $1.50) of Siegmund's Spring Song from "Die Walküre" and Siegfried's Forge Song from "Siegfried." As for Igor Gorin's set of Mussorgsky's songs (M-636, $6.50), it offers Rimsky-Korsakov's objectionable modifications of the Mussorgsky originals, sung agreeably but wholly without significant phrasing, and in Russian that is lacerating to Russian ears.

Continuing its Beethoven series the Coolidge Quartet has recorded a polished performance of Beethoven's Opus 18 No. 2 (M-622, $4), a work which I find uninteresting. Some of the music of "Façade" that Walton has recorded with the London Philharmonic (12532, $1.50) is amusing; but in other parts the humor is not apparent without the text. Hindemith's Sonata for piano four hands, recorded by Sanroma and the composer (M-637, $4), one can neglect.

The Soviet Russian records that were sold at the World's Fair and are now being sold by Stinson Trading Company offer good recording and surfaces. The few that I have heard include a coupling of "Kalinka" (7696) and "In the Moonlit Meadows" (6228), both superbly sung by a Red Army group; a coupling of two Ukrainian folksongs, "Gretchanyki" (5215) and "Vzyav by ya Banduru" (5199), as superbly sung by Patorzhinsky and a Ukrainian ensemble; an interesting excerpt from the Armenian opera "Anush" (6691/2), in which an authentically Armenian vocal style is heard over a modern European orchestral accompaniment that is well contrived and effective, though not with the effect that an Armenian accompaniment would produce. Interested in the singing that is to be heard in Russian opera houses I picked at random the coupling of two arias from "Faust" (5958/9) sung by Pirogov, formerly one of the greatest artists in Russia, who turns out to have now only the wobbly remains of a voice. And a coupling of Lykov's aria from "The Tsar's Bride" sung by Sereda (5746) and the Gypsy's Song from "Aleko" sung by Khromtchenko (4598) discloses that in Russia, too, young singers may be pushed out on the stage with insufficiently schooled voices. The reasons are different, but not the results.

What should be Columbia's outstanding February release, the Prelude to Act 3 of "Tristan und Isolde" recorded by Weingartner, has not yet arrived. The rest of Columbia's list offers nothing to get excited over: a performance of the Chicago Symphony under Stock which gives us the letter of Tschaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and the letter clouded by reverberant recording (M-395, $5); six English folk dances arranged by Arnold Foster and recorded by his Folk Dance Octet (M-394, $3.50)—charming tunes, but repeated too many times and in too elaborate arrangements; Fauré's Theme and Variations Opus 73 for piano (X-156, $3.50), which says very little very fluently and is well played by Carmen Guilbert and excellently recorded; a dull Geminiani sonata for violin (X-155, $3.50) played by sixteen-year-old Arnold Belnick with good musical taste but with a tone that, on these records, sounds wiry; and Strauss's "Zueignung" and "Allerseelen" (17185-D, $1), luridly sung and played by Nelson Eddy and an orchestra under Nathaniel Finston.

B. B. HAGGIN

No Paid Advertising Accepted!

The Progressive (formerly La Follette's Magazine) stands unique in America as a full-size weekly newspaper that does not accept a line of paid advertising!

The Progressive prints the big economic, social, and political news of the day from the liberal viewpoint. It is free from the influence and pressure from big advertising interests. Here you'll find fearlessly presented the facts about:

Municipal and public ownership.

The co-operative movement.

The labor movement.

The revelations concerning monopoly, insurance, investment banking, and monopoly policies.

The 'Isms.'

These and many other subjects are in Progressive headlines, this week and every week.

If you are not a progressive reader, here is a new trial subscription offer that will interest you. SEND 20 CENTS FOR A 10-WEEKS' TRIAL SUBSCRIPTION—NOW! Address:

THE PROGRESSIVE
Dept. N, Madison, Wisconsin

GRAPES OF WRATH DINNER-FORUM

on

"THE SHARECROPPER PROBLEM"

Chairman

Hon. NEWBOLD MORRIS

Speakers

U. S. SEN. JOSH LEE of Oklahoma
MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT
MR. NORMAN THOMAS
and others

HOTEL COMMODORE
TUESDAY • MARCH 5th • 7 p. m.

Reservations $2.50 per plate—$25 table of ten
Auspices N. Y. Com. for National Sharecroppers Week
Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll ■ Hon. F. H. LaGuardia
Co-Chairmen

Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Chairman
GRAPES OF WRATH Dinner-Forum
112 East 19th Street, New York City

Please reserve.............. places for the GRAPES OF WRATH Dinner-Forum. Enclosed is check for $............. in payment. ($2.50 per plate.)

Name ....

Street Address................................. City...........

Letters to the Editors

No Adjournment of the War!

Dear Sirs: I know Oswald Garrison Villard too well not to know that he has no desire or intention to play into Hitler's hands, but his proposal in The Nation of January 27 that an attempt should be made to bring the Allies and Hitler together would, I fear, do just that.

Mr. Villard says that considerable elements in both the German Army and the German Foreign Office would like peace negotiations. I have no doubt that he is right. Indeed, I would go farther and say that, in all probability, most of the German military and civil authorities, including Hitler himself, would like them. The methods of German propaganda suggest this. The aim seems to be, on the one hand, to terrify us into negotiating by threatening various forms of frightfulness and certain defeat, and on the other hand to persuade us that if we do not make peace we shall have communism in Germany. Mr. Villard says that "undoubtedly" many German military men and a great many civilian officials believe that Germany will win easily next spring. Undoubtedly they say so, but I doubt very much whether they really believe it. It is more probable that this is part of the propaganda.

In general I fear that Mr. Villard has taken too much for granted the sincerity of the remarks that were made to him in Germany. When I was in Berlin in 1933 perfect strangers sometimes talked to me in much the same way, and some of them even called on me to do it. Many of my friends had the same experience. We never doubted that such persons were acting under instructions. I cannot believe that there are as many people in Germany willing to risk a concentration camp or worse as Mr. Villard's experience would suggest.

The question what terms Hitler might or might not be willing to discuss seems to me futile. It is incredible to me that anybody could suppose, after all our experience in the past, that Hitler's signature to any peace treaty would be of the smallest value. He is perhaps capable of pretending to retire for the purpose of allowing other people to sign the treaty and then returning to office to break it. Whatever the immediate result of peace negotiations might be, they would merely adjourn the war—not end it.

The war aim of the Allies has been stated again and again. It is to destroy the present German regime as the first step toward ridding Europe of the German menace. All the foreigners living in Germany that I know agree that nothing will do this but the defeat of Germany in war. I agree with Mr. Villard that defeat in itself will not cleanse Germany of Hitlerism and National Socialism—they are too deeply rooted in the German subconsciousness—but we cannot do everything at once.

ROBERT DELL

Washington, February 13

German Refugees in France

Dear Sirs: In a letter which appeared in The Nation on December 16 Gustav Richter complained of the treatment of anti-Nazi refugees in France. While the lot of refugees in France is not a happy one, it is necessary to guard against creating the impression that France is wilfully mistreating them. There is evidence that the French government has taken action to rectify some of the conditions which Mr. Richter discussed.

When war broke out, France was obliged to intern all aliens from enemy countries (Poles and Czechoslovaks were exempted), but since then has been sifting the wheat from the chaff and has released thousands of anti-Nazi refugees. While the internment involved various privations, they were apparently unavoidable. The French government has evacuated the frontier population in Alsace-Lorraine, and these people, housed in camps like those of the German aliens, are suffering similar inconvenience.

France, it must be remembered, is a country of universal conscription. When war comes, there is a sudden disappearance of able-bodied men from the streets. Had the refugees been allowed to remain at large, sitting conspicuously in cafes and taking the jobs of the Frenchmen who went off to the front, there would have been a serious reaction among the French citizenry. The government was in a sense protecting the refugees by interning them.

Furthermore, France, unlike England, adjoins the enemy country, and consequently is obliged to take more severe precautions against espionage. Even refugee relief organizations admitted that there were some among the refugees who might be "unreliable"—perhaps German agents posing as refugees—and these organizations would not take the responsibility of asking for mass release.

Since the mass internment, there has been an individual examination of German aliens and those found to be not sympathetic with Germany have been released. According to a Paris dispatch of December 16 to the New York Times, about 10,500 aliens of the 15,000 rounded up at the beginning of the war are still in camps. Other dispatches have quoted Minister of Interior Albert Sarraut as reporting to Parliament on December 12 that about 7,000 aliens had been released and as promising to pursue a liberal policy in regard to the remaining refugees.

The Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported on December 15 that two groups of refugees with visas for Palestine and the United States were released en masse on the condition that they emigrate immediately. And on January 22 the same agency published a list of 156 of the most prominent refugees who had been unconditionally released from the camps.

Men of military age were from the outset given an opportunity to enlist in the Foreign Legion. However, no duress has been used against aliens to compel their enlistment, and no punitive measures have been taken for refusal to enlist. The alien is given the alternative of being immediately released by enlistment in the legion or awaiting his hearing in due course. There is a humanitarian reason for designating the Foreign Legion instead of the regular army. German soldiers in the French army on the western front would be exposed to inhuman cruelty and certain death if captured.

Conditions within the internment camps have improved, according to a Paris dispatch to the New York Times, which states: "At the beginning of the war there were undoubtedly hardships for interned enemy aliens, since arrangements were largely makeshift, but conditions have improved vastly in all camps, the informant states, and today every refugee may be said to be satisfactorily lodged under fair hygienic conditions."

MAX WINKLER

New York, February 8

The New Copyright Bill

Dear Sirs: A new proposal for a thorough amendment of the copyright legislation of the United States was presented to Congress on January 8, Senate Bill No. 3043. It should be given very careful study before enactment.

One drastic change proposed with respect to obligatory American manufacture should be eliminated. This major blot on our copyright legislation has existed since July 1, 1891; but since the Act of March 4, 1909, it has been confined to "Books and Periodicals" and, so far as foreign authors are concerned, to such of their books as are printed in the English language. From 1891 to the present time no British author has been able to secure full legal protection for his book, written and printed in his own language, until an American reprint of it has been published "printed from type set within the limits of the United States."

In this bill there has been substituted for existing law the following sweeping declaration: "All copies of any copyrighted work which shall be distributed in the United States in book, pamphlet, map, or sheet form, including illustrations, shall be printed from type set within the limits of the United States or its dependencies. . . ."

To ameliorate the hardship of immediate reprinting of the English author's book, under existing law, registration for it for an ad interim copyright of four months' duration may be made, and this period can be extended to twenty-eight years by the production of the British author's book manufactured in the United States. If no American reprint is so produced the copyright protection terminates at the end of four months.

In the bill this ad interim copyright is eliminated, and there is substituted permitted importation of the first 500 copies of the British author's own edition of his book. If copies beyond that number are imported, however, "then no remedies shall be available under this act for the printing, reprinting, publication, distribution, or vending of copies of such works made by any process set forth in Subsection 1 of Section 29." That is to say, the author loses his right to sue in case of American infringement of the copyright of his book.

The proponents of the bill in a note explain that "the sanction of the obligation not to import more than 500 copies of a foreign author's work is not the loss of the copyright in general." The author "merely has no remedy against the printing, publication, or sale of a domestically manufactured work, but he maintains all other rights, for instance, for other versions of his work, for radio communications, for performance."

Two copies of the British author's book must be deposited in the Library of Congress within ninety days after publication, together with an affidavit declaring "that all copies of the deposited work have been of American manufacture." In the event of failure, the Register of Copyrights is authorized within two years after first publication to make a written demand for such copies, and within ninety days after its receipt, the publisher must either comply therewith, or "file with the Register of Copyrights in lieu thereof a written relinquishment and dedication of the publication rights." In the event of noncompliance, he "shall be subject to a penalty of $100 to be paid to the Register of Copyrights."

It is believed that this novel procedure will be held contrary to the provisions of the Berne International Copyright Convention, Article 4 of which provides that the authors of any country of the Copyright Union shall have in the other union countries such rights as the respective laws "now accord or shall hereafter accord to nationals" and that "the enjoyment and the exercise of such rights are not subject to any formality."

This new proposal should be struck out together with the required obligatory American manufacture of "all copies of any copyright work in book, pamphlet, map, or sheet form," and there should be eliminated from the present copyright law Sections 21 and 22, providing for ad interim copyright.

These antiquated and illiberal provisions have nothing to do with the principles of copyright. What is demanded in the way of copyright legislation at this juncture is a bill based solely upon the acknowledged principles of literary property. THORVALD SOLBERG

Washington, D. C., February 6

"The Nation's" Sour Grapes

Dear Sirs: To this unwavering subscriber it beats all how The Nation does carry on at times. I am thinking now of the piece by Michel Mok in the issue of February 3. All these years haven't I heard The Nation screaming itself blue in the face because Hollywood was not dealing honestly with contemporary social themes? Now comes "The Grapes of Wrath," which Franz Hoellering calls "Hollywood's most distinguished offering," and The Nation, through Mr. Mok, sticks out its tongue at Darryl Zanuck et al.

"The Grapes of Wrath" is bringing the migratory workers' plight to the attention of a vaster audience—including those at the preview—than John Steinbeck himself could reach through his book. That's something to cheer, not to sneer about. KENNETH CLARK

New York, February 14

[If Michel Mok did any "sneering," it wasn't at Mr. Zanuck's excellent picture but at the preview audience, weighted with those elements that were responsible in part for the Okies' plight. Just irony, that's all.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Professor Taylor

Dear Sirs: Paul S. Taylor, coauthor of "An American Exodus," reviewed by Margaret Marshall in The Nation of January 20, is professor of economics at the University of California—not at Stanford University.

LUCY WARD STEBBINS

Berkeley, Cal., February 15

More Birthday Greetings

Dear Sirs: I am very sorry that I have not been able to send you a more handsome present on the seventy-fifth birthday of The Nation. I can only offer you my heartiest congratulations and best wishes for many, many happy returns of your weekly, which has been not only my best friend for the last thirty years but also a best friend of my country and my people throughout its long life.

HU SHIH, Chinese Ambassador

Washington

Dear Sirs: An attentive reader of The Nation for many years I have mostly admired its effort to extol national values without becoming nationalistic. Some people might call such effort an un-American activity, but in my view it is the only true Americanism. The Nation has always had a very definite meaning, but the term "nation" is unfortunately vague and ambiguous.

What is a nation? Is it a unity of economic interests, of race, of language, of history? It would be easy to quote examples disproving all these assumptions. Most likely it is a spiritual community, recognizable, according to Max Scheler, in its creations of art and in its leading personalities. However, the American national idea includes a diversity of ideals in art and very different personalities, representative of New England, the Middle West, California, and the South. This is why the American national idea, in spite of the fire that heated the traditional melting-pot and in spite of nationalistic hotspurs, was and is international, just as the British Empire is an international community in spite of its Horatio Bottomleys, Sir Oswald Mosleys, and Colonel Blimps.

Those who are anxious to harden the pliable and ever growing national idea into a nationalistic idol should glance at the other hemisphere, where "patriotic snobbery," as Carlton Hayes termed it, is at work to destroy nations whose greatness chauvinism has boasted of creating. "Keep out of foreign entanglements" is an excellent catchword, but it should be realized that unfortunate Europe was caught in such entanglements by misinterpretation of the national idea. It seems to be a tragedy of mankind that the most sublime ideas underlying the state—such as religion in the past, nationality at present—are fated to become disastrous to the state they have created. Every sincere admirer of this country must hope that neither The Nation nor this nation will forsake its past in the future.

New York RUSTEM VAMBERY

Dear Sirs: On its seventy-fifth birthday The Nation is to be congratulated on the theme which it has chosen for its anniversary issue—that of "taking stock of our period and its own record as well as looking ahead into the stormy future." This is a reflection of the breadth of editorial objective that has always characterized the publication.

In spite of its comparatively small circulation The Nation has been a potent force in the formation of public opinion in the United States. It gained this influence because it was read by editors and writers and the articulate opinion-forming people in America, also because the intellectually curious and experimental young people of the country were attracted by its provocative content. In literary and dramatic criticism it has had reality and authority. Whether one agreed with The Nation's analyses and conclusions has been beside the point. Its service in clarifying minds through stimulating comment on the current scene is what has counted.

New York HELEN ROGERS REID

Dear Sirs: At the Time and Tide offices we have taken The Nation, I believe, ever since we came into existence, and almost every Wednesday—our press day—I take it out to read over a late lunch. Not quite every Wednesday, because, especially since the war started, Atlantic posts are a little uncertain.

Before the war I used to take it out along with a big bundle of other oversea papers and pick from each what seemed of special interest that week. Now I find that on Wednesdays it is enough by itself, for I want to read it pretty well straight through. Our own papers are so full of war news that we don't get so much American news as we used to, and one is greedy both for American home news and for American reactions to the war. Incidentally The Nation has had almost the best set of correspondents on the war that I have seen anywhere—as, for example, Louis Fischer from Paris and Rome, and Oswald Garrison Villard from Berlin and Amsterdam. The London Daily Telegraph printed a series of Oswald Garrison Villard's articles, but I do not think that anyone over here has had Louis Fischer, and he is one of the best correspondents writing today.

I disagree with The Nation quite often. I sometimes think it unfair to Britain and to the British government. I don't hold any special brief for the Chamberlain government. It has made some very bad mistakes. But it has had uncommonly difficult problems to tackle. I am not sure that The Nation three thousand miles away from Europe always appreciates fully just how difficult those problems were—and are. No, I don't always agree with it—but I couldn't do without it.

London LADY RHONDDA

Dear Sirs: I think I am the oldest subscriber to the Nation. I did not read the first issue, but I have read every issue since the first one I read. That was about fifty years ago. At my age and in this era of disillusionment I still preserve some enthusiasms. I value The Nation for more reasons than I can take your space to enumerate, but chiefly for its fearlessness, for its sturdy espousal of the forlorn and oppressed, who have few to take up the cudgels for them, and for its ready acknowledgment of the few mistakes it makes. I love it for the enemies it has made.

Some years ago I took myself severely in hand when I found myself suspending judgment until I could see what The Nation said. I thought that an unhealthy attitude intellectually. It no longer worries me, for I know I shall agree.

Dover, N. H. JANE S. BRYAN

Dear Sirs: I congratulate The Nation on attaining its seventy-fifth birthday. It is one of the few publications that I read from cover to cover. I always find it stimulating, even when I do not agree with its conclusions.

When I was in my district this summer I was told by one of my friends—a leading member of the bar in the Pacific Northwest and an exceptionally scholarly gentleman—that he read and enjoyed The Nation. Although he is conservative in his opinions, he said that he always found it an intellectual treat.

I wish you another seventy-five years of useful service to the American people.

MARTIN F. SMITH, Representative
Hoquiam, Wash.

CONTRIBUTORS

KENNETH CRAWFORD, who writes regularly from Washington for The Nation, was recently elected president of the American Newspaper Guild.

LEWIS COREY is the author of "The Decline of American Capitalism," "The House of Morgan," and "The Crisis of the Middle Class."

ALEXANDER WERTH, Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, is the author of "France and Munich—Before and After the Surrender."

FREDA UTLEY was in the Chinese war zone in 1938 as correspondent for the London News-Chronicle. She is the author of "Japan's Feet of Clay" and "China at War."

RUSTEM VAMBERY, noted Hungarian criminologist and sociologist, is now on the teaching staff of the New School for Social Research in New York.

HARRY BLOCK is The Nation's Mexican correspondent.

LINDSAY ROGERS is Burgess Professor of Public Law at Columbia University.

JAMES ORRICK was for many years on the staff of the Oxford University Press.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 2, 1940 NUMBER 9

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Shape of Things

IN THE KARELIAN ISTHMUS THE RUSSIAN army continues to advance, although slowly and at heavy cost. The Finns have abandoned the fortified Koivisto Islands, and Viipuri is admittedly in grave danger. But even if that key position is lost, strong lines of defense remain. However, with the limited man power at its command the Finnish army is increasingly in need of more substantial reinforcement than the trickle of foreign volunteers can provide. In Sweden agitation for open intervention continues, but majority opinion appears to support the government's determination to remain neutral. War with Russia, it is argued, would probably mean less rather than more assistance for Finland, since it would almost certainly lead to German invasion and the mobilization of all resources for home defense. Allied intervention would no doubt follow, and southern Scandinavia would then become a major battlefield of the greater war. No one can deny the basis of reality on which this forecast rests, but as long as Sweden and Norway seek to limit their risks in this way, large-scale assistance from the west is blocked. Few suitable volunteers seem to have been obtained by the opening of recruitment in London, but the government has sent a good deal of material to Finland, including 144 planes.

*

A BREACH BETWEEN THE U. S. S. R. AND THE Allies is becoming increasingly probable even if the Scandinavian states continue on their present course. Extension of the British naval patrols to Arctic waters and activities in the Near East may be taken as preparatory moves, but the final decision is yet to be made. Public opinion in Britain seems to be adverse to war with Russia, partly because it doubts the wisdom of tackling a new enemy at this time, partly because of distrust of the government's motives. But opinion may change if the Red Army continues to advance, for the dangers of a Russo-German hegemony over Scandinavia will become more obvious. In terms of grand strategy, the question to be decided by the Allied governments is whether the additional weight of Russia in the ranks of the enemy would be counterbalanced by the chance of opening up a flank against Germany. Extension of the war would make possible a tightening of the blockade by stopping such loopholes as Murmansk and Vladivostock. But these are of minor importance, and on the other side of the ledger would be the reinforcement of the counter-blockade by the Russian submarine fleet. A weightier consideration is the possibility of a campaign in the Near East. This assumes Turkish willingness to participate in action against Russia, and, in fact, the preparations of the government and the tone of its press suggest that little remains of the former friendship between Ankara and Moscow. Geographical factors render an invasion of the Caucasus a formidable undertaking, but an Allied-Turkish fleet could probably control the Black Sea while aerial action might destroy the Baku oil fields, thus cutting off one of the chief sources of oil for both Germany and Russia. The effects of such a stroke would be so far-reaching that the Allies may decide that the game is worth the candle.

*

WHY BRITAIN FAILED TO OBTAIN A PACT with Moscow is still an unanswered question, although a White Paper was promised by London weeks ago. On February 21 Richard Austen Butler, Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, declared in the House of Commons that he was still unable to name a date for publication of the documents and seemed to hint that the French government might be the obstacle. One suspects that neitner party to these negotiations is anxious to publish the documents involved because both were dickering behind the scenes with Berlin at the same time. Raymond Daniell, in a New York Times dispatch from London on February 7, put forward an explanation of the repeated postponement of the British White Paper on negotiations with Russia which is worth noting. The document was scheduled for publication nearly a month ago. Daniell wrote, "It can be said authoritatively"—and the censor passed the remark—that the postponement is not due to fear that the White Paper might "precipitate a crisis in Anglo-Russian relations." "The explanation," he went on, "lies rather in the belated realization that the document as originally prepared failed to make out as good a case against the Soviet government as the compilators planned, and that it might be more embarrassing to Britain's allies than to anyone else, especially after Soviet casuists and apologists had finished talking about it." In the last war the various Blue Books, White Papers, Yellow Books, and the like on both sides were liberally falsified. Is the British case too weak to stand exposure? Or is the reference to Britain's allies a hint that the French and Poles had as much to do with the breakdown of negotiations as Moscow?

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THE ENTHRONEMENT OF THE NEW DALAI Lama at Lhasa, Tibet, is an event of great religious and political significance in that far-off land. For nearly a generation Tibet has been, for all practical purposes, a British colony. British control was exercised through the clique which dominated the late Dalai Lama and finally succeeded in expelling his chief ecclesiastical rival, the Panchan Lama. In recent months, as the Chinese government has shifted its base to the west, Chinese influence in Tibet has grown. The new Lama seems to have been the choice of a group which is far more pro-Chinese than the previous ruling clique. There is no evidence, however, that the British have suffered a complete defeat. It is probable that in the three-cornered struggle of Britain, the Soviet Union, and Japan for control of Central Asia, Tibet will remain under British suzerainty.

*

HOPE FOR AN EMBARGO AGAINST JAPAN HAS grown even dimmer this past week as a result of the failure of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to take any action on the measures before it. Senator Pittman, chairman of the committee and author of one of the embargo resolutions, has indicated that as far as he is concerned the committee has finished its work for this session of Congress. The elimination of the million-dollar item for harbor improvements at Guam from the naval-appropriation bill suggests that the House, like the Senate, is disinclined to take any action at this time that might antagonize Japan. To a certain extent this is reflection of isolationist sentiment. But isolationist sentiment has never wholly dominated Congress, and its existence cannot account for the growing tenderness for Japan which has been apparent in recent weeks. There is ground for suspicion that the shift in Congress is a reflection of the more basic change in Britain's policy toward Japan. For it can no longer be doubted that London is seeking a compromise with Tokyo on whatever terms are possible, and that it would like to see the United States take similar action. To the uninitiated it may seem odd that the United States should sacrifice its own interests to please Mr. Chamberlain, but just two years ago the United States did exactly this in refusing to lift the embargo on war supplies to Republican Spain.

JOHN W. HANES IS TO BE COMMENDED FOR withdrawing his name from the list of possible appointees as trustee in the Associated Gas and Electric bankruptcy. Jerome Frank, chairman of the SEC, in a letter to Senator Norris admitted that Hanes had been recommended for the trusteeship by Lazard Frères and by officials of the Guaranty Trust, Bankers' Trust, and Chase National. He was also favored by Roger Whiteford, according to Frank's letter, and Whiteford himself was made president of A. G. and E. "at the instance of the sisters and a brother-in-law of Mr. Hopson." One wonders why these facts were not brought to the attention of the court before Senator Norris wrote his first letter of protest to Frank, or why the latter did not make them public earlier. It is true, as the chairman and a majority of the SEC contend, that these facts "do not constitute a statutory disqualification," but to rest on that is to beg the question. Commissioner Eicher, in charge of the commission's Chandler Act division, took a sounder position when he declared in a minority opinion that "the exercise of a sound discretion applied to the available facts requires a finding of disqualification." The SEC seems to us to be interpreting its own powers too narrowly in a case where the greatest vigilance is required to protect a mass of small investors, and we are not yet convinced that this was not a situation in which the SEC should itself act as trustee. Secretary Morgenthau and Attorney General Jackson still think so.

*

THE NEED FOR KEEPING THE REGULATORY agencies of the federal government free from interference either by the President or the courts is stressed in a report just issued by the Brookings Institution. These conclusions are especially pertinent since the Senate is soon to consider the Logan-Walter bill, which would place such agencies as the National Labor Relations Board or the Securities Exchange Commission at the mercy of the courts. Brookings's opposition to the Logan-Walter bill is based on the fact that the implementation of statutes is an integral part of the legislative process and as such should not, under the constitutional separation of powers, be subject to judicial intervention. The proposed establishment of inter-agency boards is also attacked as inconsistent with the needs of day-to-day administration. Experience has amply demonstrated the wisdom of the Brookings conclusions. At one time or another the work of practically all the regulatory agencies has been gravely handicapped by adverse judicial decisions, and thereby the express intent of Congress has been controverted. Although the courts have the duty of safeguarding individuals against arbitrary or high-handed administration of the law, Congress alone should have the power to revise the rules and regulations established by the agencies which it creates.

MORE THAN ONCE FATHER COUGHLIN HAS stolen his text from other people's mouths—without benefit of quotation marks. His most common and willing victim has been Dr. Goebbels. But recently Coughlin has gone in for a new form of plagiarism: he puts quotation marks around utterances which are completely and exclusively his own, and attributes them to some scholar more reputable than Charles Coughlin. The newest example of this technique appears in Coughlin's current crusade, which is designed to show, in the most impeccably academic fashion, that Jews were responsible for the Civil War in America. In the first of a series of articles which will "prove" this point, Coughlin's Social Justice pretends to quote from a book by John Reeves called "The Rothschilds, the Financial Rulers of Nations," published in 1887. The quotation is of a speech said to have been made by Disraeli at the time of the marriage of Lionel Rothschild's daughter to James Rothschild's son. According to Social Justice, the passage in Reeves read: "Disraeli is reported to have said: 'Under this roof are the heads of the family of Rothschild—a name famous in every capital of Europe and every division of the globe. If you like we shall divide the United States into two parts, one for you, James, and one for you, Lionel. Napoleon will do exactly and all that I advise him.' " But if you look on page 228, of the Reeves book you discover a strikingly different passage: "In the course of his speech he [Disraeli] made a remark worth reproducing: 'Under this roof are the heads of the name and family of Rothschild—a name famous in every capital in Europe and every division of the globe—a family not more regarded for its riches than esteemed for its honor, virtues, integrity, and public spirit.' "

✶

LAST YEAR'S RISE IN NATIONAL INCOME from $64,000,000,000 to $68,500,000,000 should provide excellent grist for the 1940 Democratic campaign mill. For as prices were approximately the same as in the previous year, the gain is a real one and reflects a substantial improvement in the American people's standard of living. Nor can the improvement be attributed solely to the war. The upturn in business began in early summer and continued unchecked throughout the remainder of the year. What is not generally realized is that the 1939 national income of $68,500,000,000 at the present price level is substantially the same as the record $81,000,000,000 income of 1929. The fact that the population has increased in the interval means, of course, that the per capita income is still well under the 1929 level. But another gain comparable to the one achieved last year would put the country at least abreast of 1929. Comparisons with 1932 are far more encouraging. Republican campaign speakers may be expected to ignore the basic indices of our national well-being.

TWO SERIOUS GAPS IN OUR SOCIAL-SECURITY legislation would be filled by adoption of the bills about to be introduced by Senator Wagner providing voluntary annuities for persons not now covered by old-age insurance and benefits for total disability before the age of sixty-five. Despite the improvements made through last year's amendments to the Social Security Act, approximately one-third of all workers are not now protected by old-age insurance. Although many individuals, such as the self-employed, cannot easily be included in a compulsory system, there is no reason why they should be denied the protection afforded to the majority. Voluntary old-age insurance has long been successfully provided in some European countries, and could readily be incorporated in our present system. Even more urgent is the need for some provision for the disabled. Investigations, both here and abroad, have shown that nearly half of all workers become disabled by sickness, accident, or premature old age before reaching sixty-five. This group is obviously in greater need of benefits than those who reach sixty-five without serious physical impairment. Practically all other countries provide disability benefits as an integral part of old-age insurance. It is time the United States caught up with Europe in this respect.

✶

IN FRAMING HIS PROPOSAL FOR A UNITED States Mediation Board, Senator Wagner has carefully avoided the dangers common to most measures of this sort. The board he plans would be established in the Department of Labor to extend the conciliation service of that department. But its powers would be sharply defined. Specifically the plan eliminates any idea of "compulsory mediation" or of a fixed "waiting period" in which claims would be weighed. Nor would the board have authority to impose penalties or issue subpoenas. The processes of mediation, in other words, would be entirely voluntary. Within these boundaries such an agency would perform a real service. Its most valuable contributions would be in those areas of industrial conflict not covered by the National Labor Relations Act—conflict over hours, working conditions, and other matters which in many cases are susceptible of mediation. If there is any danger at all in this proposal, it is that it may become identified with other and far less liberal measures now pending in Washington; at least one bill already introduced proposes a system of compulsory mediation in every intrastate industry. The sanction for such projects is drawn from the Railway Labor Act, but in less well-organized industries the "waiting period" decreed by this act could be disastrous to union action. Senator Wagner has made clear his own lack of sympathy with such schemes—which seem to be designed primarily to emasculate the labor-relations act which bears his name.

Our Lawless G-Men

THE secret police of totalitarian countries, whether Communist, Fascist, or Nazi, need refer to no statute books in order to investigate, arrest, or imprison. They, and not the law, decide what constitutes a crime. Our G-men, like those other G-men of the Gestapo and GPU, are beginning to act on similar principles. Our evidence for this statement comes from J. Edgar Hoover himself. His testimony last November and again in January before the House Appropriations Committee shows that the Federal Bureau of Investigation is engaging in activities for which it has no legal authorization. We believe it the Attorney General's duty to investigate and forbid the extra-legal activities of the FBI.

In September, 1939, the FBI organized a "General Intelligence Division," and when Hoover appeared before the House Appropriations Committee to ask a supplemental appropriation in November, he described the activities of this division. He said it had "compiled extensive indices of individuals, groups, and organizations engaged in these subversive activities, in espionage activities, or any activities that are possibly detrimental to the internal security of the United States." The detection of espionage is part of the bureau's duty, but what does Hoover mean by "subversive activities" and "any activities that are possibly detrimental to the internal security of the United States"? Either category can be as broad as the head of the FBI chooses to make it, and neither is made a subject for inquiry by any federal law. What is the purpose of these "extensive indices"? They have been arranged "not only alphabetically," Hoover explained, "but also geographically, so that at any time, should we enter into the conflict abroad, we would be able to go into any of these communities and identify individuals or groups who might be a source of grave danger to the security of this country. These indexes will be extremely important and valuable in grave emergency." That is, lists of persons he considers dangerous have been compiled by J. Edgar Hoover for a mass roundup in the event of war or "grave emergency." No such compilation is authorized by law. Is Hoover to act as an American Himmler?

Hoover's notions of what constitutes the "subversive" are sufficiently well known. They parallel the views of his greatest booster, William Randolph Hearst, and it is sufficient to say that they are broad enough to include among the "enemies to society" advocates of as mild a reform as parole. The words quoted are from Hoover's address in July, 1935, before the International Association of Chiefs of Police. Hoover's methods of operation were dramatically demonstrated the other day in Detroit when he chose five o'clock in the morning as the hour to rouse twelve reputable citizens of Detroit from their beds and bring them into court in chains on charges the Attorney General several days later dismissed. The early-morning raid, as a means of striking terror into the victims, is part of the technique of every totalitarian secret-police agency. Some idea of the breadth of Hoover's ambitions may be obtained from the release he sent out last September suggesting that local authorities throughout the country, in granting permits for public meetings, notify the FBI of such meetings in advance. In September, Hoover testified, he wrote to many persons and organizations, including "banks, business houses, railroads," asking for their cooperation in the "general intelligence" work. The definition of "subversive" held by some bankers, business men, and railroad executives is apt to be a broad one, sometimes broad enough to take in the whole of the New Deal from Mr. Roosevelt down. Later in the same month Hoover issued a statement which invited the cooperation of citizens everywhere in "ridding America of those who desire to undermine the federal government."

This is not the country's first experience with either a General Intelligence Division or J. Edgar Hoover. Hoover was head of the General Intelligence Division from 1919 to 1924, when it was abolished by Harlan F. Stone, now a justice of the United States Supreme Court, when he became Attorney General. William J. Burns was then head of the FBI. The division played a part, according to Felix Frankfurter, in framing Sacco and Vanzetti. It compiled biographies, according to the Attorney General's report in 1920, "of all authors, publishers, editors, etc., showing any connection with an ultra-radical body or movement." The ramifications of the FBI's "general intelligence" work were protested by the American Civil Liberties Union in a famous report of May, 1924, entitled "The Nation-wide Spy System Centering in the Department of Justice." According to an article by Ray Tucker in Collier's for August 19, 1933, former President Hoover was among the dangerous radicals shadowed by the FBI in that period, and "at one time or another the bureau's files have contained reports on such prominent Americans as Justice Stone, the late Senator Thomas, Senator Wheeler, Senator Borah, Dean Roscoe Pound, Professor Felix Frankfurter, Professor Zechariah Chaffee, Jr., Frank P. Walsh, and John L. Lewis."

The FBI has now been granted $10,000,000 for the next fiscal year, much of it to revive illegal practices of the kind that marked its conduct during the days of A. Mitchell Palmer and William J. Burns. That amount is roughly fifteen times as great as the bureau's appropriation in the year we entered the war, 1917. Congress has failed in its duty by voting that $10,000,000 as a routine matter, consenting by silence to the continuation of activities totally at variance with American principles of government. The Attorney General must now take steps to confine the FBI to its statutory job. That job is not to be a combination of Dick Tracy and Mrs. Dilling.

Trade Agreements Upheld

THE action of the House in deciding, by a vote of 216 to 168, to extend the Trade Agreements Act three more years would be wholly gratifying if it had not been taken on what appears to be almost entirely partisan grounds. While a few individuals broke party ranks and voted according to conviction, an overwhelming majority of Representatives divided strictly along party lines with apparent indifference to the basic issues of the controversy. From one point of view this is fully understandable. For many decades the tariff was the main, if not the only, issue which clearly divided the Republican from the Democratic Party. The Hull trade program is directly in line with the historic tariff policy of the Democratic Party, and therefore has been bitterly opposed by the Republicans.

This may explain but it does not justify such an overwhelmingly partisan vote on a matter of deep public concern. There is no such clear-cut division of interests among the rank and file of men and women who vote the Democratic or Republican tickets. It is true that most persons who live in the South would naturally, in view of the section's dependence on exports, be in the camp of the supporters of the Hull trade policy. And it happens that the South's Representatives in Congress are all Democrats. A similar identity of interest and party inspired New York City's Democratic Congressmen, for New York, as the country's chief port, stands to benefit substantially from an increase in foreign trade.

But on what basis, economic or logical, can the bulk of the Republican vote be justified? The assertion that the Hull trade program is ruinous to agriculture represents, as we have repeatedly shown in these pages, so gross a falsification of the facts that it is to be doubted whether it is believed even by Republican leaders. Similarly, it would be difficult to find any industry of importance which has been materially injured by the trade agreements. If such an industry existed, we should be deluged with "statistics" showing how the program was destroying American industry. On the other hand, several important industries have been materially aided by the trade pacts. In some cases these industries have been virtually unheard in Washington because the Representatives from the states in which they are located happened to be Republicans. Mr. Vandenberg, for example, as the senior Senator from Michigan, is acting in a manner that is fundamentally antagonistic to the best interests of the automobile industry when he attacks the Hull program.

Passage of the bill, under the circumstances, was a foregone conclusion. The crucial vote was not on the bill itself but on the amendment introduced by Representative Crowther of New York to make all agreements contingent on approval by both houses of Congress. Adoption of such a provision, or the alternative proposal of Representative Coffee of Nebraska requiring Senate ratification, would have scuttled the entire program. It would have had the effect of reopening the whole question of specific tariff rates every time an agreement came up for ratification. History has shown that the result would be an orgy of log-rolling and vote-trading, with little, if any, progress in the direction of stimulating foreign trade. Equally indefensible was the amendment offered by Representative Disney of Oklahoma, which would have forbidden the American negotiators to make reductions in the excise duties recently applied on imports of copper, oil, lumber, coal, and vegetable oils. These "excise duties" are clearly tariff duties masquerading under another name, and very bad duties at that.

The bill for the extension of the Hull program now goes to the Senate, where it is believed that the Administration has sufficient votes to force its adoption in substantially its present form. Here party lines are not quite so strong, and it is to be hoped that the debate will be on a higher level than that in the House. But if we are to judge by some of the statements already issued by leading Senators, the prospects for an enlightened discussion are none too bright.

Can Britain Afford Chamberlain?

LAST WEEK, in a purely working-class London constituency, a district of docks and factories, an official Labor Party candidate who supported the war was elected to Parliament with 14,343 votes. Opposing him was Harry Pollitt, one of the ablest and most popular Communist leaders, and a member of Mosley's Fascist Party, both of whom denounced the "imperialist" war. They polled 966 and 151 votes, respectively.

The result of this by-election is a clear indication that the defeatist propaganda of the Communist Party is making little headway among the British working classes despite the freedom accorded to it. But as Ernest Davies points out in an article on page 302, the fact that the British Labor Party is supporting the war does not mean that it is satisfied with the Chamberlain government. On the contrary, the policies pursued by the government both at home and abroad are causing increasing restiveness.

The progressive elements in Britain, as represented by the Labor movement, and the conservative upper classes, from whose ranks the government is wholly recruited, seek the defeat of Nazism from quite different motives.

Long ago the Labor movement, apart from a small pacifist section, realized that Hitler must be stopped if any democracy was to survive in Europe. Mr. Chamberlain's supporters, on the other hand, closed their eyes to the significance of National Socialism. They were dominated by a dread of war because they believed—and with reason—that its economic consequences would be ruinous to the social system on which their power and security rested. Hence they continued to pursue appeasement up to the moment that it became clear, even to them, that Hitler, so far from being a bulwark against bolshevism, represented a revolutionary movement which unless halted would sweep away not only British democracy but the British Empire as well. Once Mr. Chamberlain and his followers had firmly grasped this fact there was little reason to fear another Munich. But since their primary purpose in seeking the defeat of Hitler is to safeguard their economic security, their conduct of the war against him is conditioned by their desire to save as much from the wreck as possible. This is made clear by the direction of those "incitements to treason" of which Raymond Swing wrote in The Nation's anniversary number. These appeals to Germans to throw off the Hitler yoke are intended to reach the reactionary rather than the democratic elements inside the Reich. They look toward the reestablishment of a respectable capitalist society on a pre-1914 rather than a pre-Hitler model and, with this in view, patronize the right-wing exiles, the monarchists, the Austrian clericals, the industrialists, and tend to ignore the democrats and the socialists.

The same wish to turn back the clock inspires the domestic policy of the Chamberlain government. Ernest Davies describes the results of its attempts to construct a war economy with a minimum of disturbance and inconvenience to private enterprise. Industry has been organized on a kind of NRA plan largely under the control of its own leaders. Taxes have been steeply increased, but the fact that capital gains are not subject to any levy in Britain leaves a wide loophole for wealthy speculators. Again excess profits are being taxed but only to the extent of 60 per cent. With the war-time powers over production possessed by the government there is no need for it to provide additional incentives to entrepreneurs, and no reason why it should not take all excess profits. A further example of its tenderness toward capitalist interests is provided by the recent agreement with the British railroads, which appears to guarantee for the duration of the war a net income considerably above their earnings in recent years.

Under these circumstances it is hardly surprising that the workers should kick when told that in order to avoid inflation their wages must be kept down despite a steep rise in the cost of living. There is no doubt that prevention of inflation is a wise policy, but with a large proportion of British workers near the subsistence level, it would appear that a tighter hand on prices is the first essential. This means, however, greater interference with private enterprise and a much wider system of rationing so that the well-to-do cannot bid up the prices of scarce necessities.

Add to the class-conscious timidity of the Chamberlain government in tackling the problem of war economy its penchant for old party hacks in responsible positions, its unwillingness to prove the good faith of its democratic protestations by meeting the claims of India, and its appalling record in resisting totalitarian aggressions, and the sum total explains the distrust of a large section of the British people. Under such leadership the kind of unity necessary for a fully effective British war effort can hardly be developed, and the question arises: can Britain afford to retain Mr. Chamberlain? As the conflict moves into a more active stage, as it becomes more and more a struggle for national existence, with the fate of Poland the penalty for defeat, that question will demand an answer.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 293

EDITORIALS:

OUR LAWLESS G-MEN 296
TRADE AGREEMENTS UPHELD 297
CAN BRITAIN AFFORD CHAMBERLAIN? 297

MEN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT

I. JOHN NANCE GARNER by Allan A. Michie 299
LABOR DISTRUSTS CHAMBERLAIN by Ernest Davies 302
MARXISM RECONSIDERED—III by Lewis Corey 305
A LINCOLN NOBODY KNEW by I. F. Stone 307
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 308
IN THE WIND 309
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 310

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

FAITH, HOPE, AND CLARITY by Margaret Marshall 311
MR. MENCKEN'S CRANFORD by Morton Dauwen Zabel 312
PORTRAIT OF HITLER by Franz Hoellering 313
BUSINESS AND GOVERNMENT by Maxwell S. Stewart 314
COUSIN FROM AUSTRALIA by Jacques Barzun 315
SHORTER NOTICES 315
DRAMA: COULD YOU AND I CONSPIRE by Joseph Wood Krutch 316
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 317

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

•

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Men Who Would Be President

I. JOHN NANCE GARNER

BY ALLAN A. MICHIE

SIX months ago Vice-President Garner's chance of shortening his title by one word seemed a good deal brighter than it is today. But the visible slump in his stock has not darkened the Raleigh Hotel in Washington, where John Nance Garner has his campaign headquarters. "Garner is in the race to win, regardless of whether there are any other candidates" is the official pronouncement at the Raleigh.

Presiding at headquarters is affable, glad-handing Roy Miller, a Garnerite of many years' standing, with a long and unenviable record as lobbyist for the Texas Gulf Sulphur Company. It is one of Miller's functions to tell all comers of the career of Cactus Jack, the cattle-country politician, of his climb from an obscure country law office to a position of financial importance in Texas—as banker, mortgage-holder, and landowner—and finally to the status of the country's "foremost Presidential candidate." His old age is laughed at—"Jack Garner has the mental and physical vigor of a man twenty years his junior"—and his liking for hunting and fishing, baseball, poker, and neat whiskey is cited as evidence of a homely Americanism designed to withstand the pressures of alien isms. The log-cabin birthplace, the self-education, the simple virtues and simple vices of the rugged individual are all part of the Garner legend which time, more recently aided by smart press agents, has created.

Garner had to be born in a log cabin, since there were few other types of dwelling in Texas when he came into the world on November 22, 1868, at Blossom Prairie, a hamlet in Red River County. He had a sickly childhood, which periodically interrupted his early education, but he was able to achieve a youthful reputation as the crack shortstop for the Coon Soup Hollow baseball nine. Unable to get a higher education at Nashville's Vanderbilt University because of failing eyesight, he came back to the Texas plains and punched cattle in an effort to regain his health, but ultimately abandoned this occupation in favor of reading Blackstone in a small law office in Clarksville, county seat of Red River County. Admitted to the bar, he received an offer of a partnership in Uvalde, at that time a dusty, unpainted little village of 2,000 inhabitants, where he has maintained a residence ever since. The partnership prospered. Garner, whose tight-fistedness is legend in Washington, drove hard bargains and made shrewd deals. Today he owns Uvalde's main bank, holds mortgages on half the homes in the little town, and has acquired vast farming, ranching, and pecan-growing lands either through purchase or foreclosure.

The parsimonious young lawyer had two extravagances—poker and whiskey—but he has done well with both. When a righteous young woman by the name of Ettie Rheiner opposed Garner's appointment as judge of Uvalde County on the ground that poker playing made him a first cousin of the devil, Garner married her. She has served as his secretary ever since. The Garner legend still has the Vice-President playing poker for huge stakes. Actually, Garner has not played cards for money, except when off on a rare Congressional trip, for eighteen years. Mrs. Garner made him stop because the size of the stakes he collected often made poor losers into political enemies.

Convivial nights with local political bosses gave Garner his start. Texas fortunes in those days were founded on cattle, and the ranchers needed politicians in the right places to safeguard the interests of their feudal domains. Big Jim Wells, the boss of south Texas, was the first to cotton to Jack Garner. He had the young lawyer elected to the state legislature to keep one eye on the Wells estate. Four years later Garner moved upward. The census at the turn of the century entitled Texas to another Congressional district, and Boss Wells, anxious to have another representative in Washington, wanted the new district carved out of south Texas. Garner was made chairman of the committee to redistrict the state. The new district, it turned out, was drawn around the region where his own strength was greatest. His colleagues were furious, but Wells, Archie Parr, czar of Duval County, and the owners of the King ranch, still the largest cattle empire in the world, silenced the opposition. In 1902 Garner was duly elected to a seat in Washington, where he has remained ever since.

Unlike the majority of Southern politicians, Garner never had to fight for reelection. Every two years the political bosses in the Fifteenth Congressional District herded the illiterate Mexican Americans to the polls and had them vote in blocks. Returns from some Garner-represented counties read like those turned in by Boss Crump in Memphis. Archie Parr, Garner's old crony, who once ruled Duval County but has now outlived his political usefulness, used to say that since people were sheep anyway, he voted sheep too. With this powerful machine behind him Garner didn't have to bother with campaign promises, or even constructive legislation. A few dips into the pork barrel each term repaid the bosses back home. Cactus Jack, a nickname he acquired when he once sought to make the cactus the official flower of the Lone Star State, had ample time to cultivate his natural talents for making friends who could stand him in good political stead.

It is incredible that a politician with Garner's record—or lack of record—should be seriously considered as a Presidential candidate. His public career has been amazingly barren of achievement: despite thirty years of service in Congress his name does not appear on one major piece of legislation. He attained his position, first as Speaker of the House, then as Vice-President, through the unavoidable process of seniority. "The only way to get anywhere in Congress is to stay there and let seniority take its course," is Garner's advice to freshmen Texas Representatives, and Garner has followed it to the letter. He scarcely opened his mouth during his first eight years in the House, and when he did, it was usually to engage in meaningless, futile attacks on Republican tariff policies.

Garner is far from a liberal, but the well-defined conservative label doesn't fit him either. In fact, it is doubtful whether he understands the meaning of the terms. Never a deep thinker, Garner, quite naturally, has the outlook of a small-town conservative banker, but his whole political philosophy is based on expediency. In one indiscreet outburst he admitted: "I have always done what I thought best for my country, never varying unless I was advised that two-thirds of the Democrats were for a bill, and then I voted for it." The Garner policy of taking the course that was most profitable is nowhere more glaringly revealed than in the field of foreign affairs. Although an isolationist by nature if not by conviction during his early years in Congress, Garner went down the line for Woodrow Wilson and willingly ran for two terms alongside Franklin Roosevelt, two of the most international-minded of American Presidents. In April, 1917, Garner voted for the war resolution, and while America was in the war served as liaison man between Wilson and Capitol Hill, since the President was on bad terms with Speaker Champ Clark and Claude Kitchen, chairman of the influential Ways and Means Committee. Garner balked, however, when it came to lending money to the Allies, and it was only his intimate connection with Wilson that made him hold his tongue against them in public. Today, Washington observers believe, the Vice-President personally favors lending money to Finland. Politically, however, such a course would put him in direct agreement with President Roosevelt and might also cost him support among the more ardent isolationists. In view of these considerations, Garner has allowed his favorite Washington correspondents to hint that "the V.P. is ag'in" lending money to the Finns.

In 1924 Garner earned the fleeting newspaper reputation of a "radical" when he unleashed a characteristic Western attack on a particularly foul tax-reduction bill which Andrew Mellon and Wall Street sponsored. In 1931 he went off in the other direction. W. R. Hearst was anxious to see a nation-wide sales tax enacted, and Garner got behind a bill for a federal sales levy. The tax bill was defeated, but only after a heroic fight by the progressive bloc. Whereupon Garner did an about-face and sponsored a gigantic $2,500,000,000 pump-priming relief bill—largely because Hoover refused to use large-scale spending methods to combat the depression. Representative LaGuardia of New York and Senator Bob La Follette of Wisconsin had long urged relief spending, but Garner's ideas of governmental spending were quite different. He advocated enough new post offices so that every Democratic member of the Congress could claim one; he threw in highways, flood-control projects, and $100,000,000 for outright grants to the states for unemployment relief, plus the provision to print a billion dollars of paper money if necessary. Garner, figure-head leader of the economy bloc of the past few years, doesn't like to be reminded of his spending proposals, which became known as "Garner's pork-barrel triplets." One of the three bills passed the House and Senate, but Hoover vetoed it, and the others died before passage. When spending failed, Garner once again turned to Hearst. The publisher did not forget Garner's services in the sales-tax campaign. On January 11, 1932, he told the country over a national hook-up that Jack Garner should be the next President of the United States.

Garner is not an out-in-the-open fighter, and his attacks on the C. I. O. and the rights of labor, in particular, have always been confined to the cloakrooms. Back in 1926, however, Congressman Garner went on record to defend the exploitation of the Mexican Americans who worked the fields of south Texas. There were rumors in Washington that quota restrictions would be applied on the immigration of Mexicans, and Cactus Jack scurried before the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to testify. Defending the virtues of cheap Mexican labor, Garner explained: "They do not cause any trouble unless they stay a long time and become Americanized. They are a very docile people. They can be imposed upon. The sheriff can go out and make them do anything. That is the way they are."

When the conservative-controlled first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress was gaveled into history a year ago, Garner's political fortunes were at their peak. As leader of the conservative Democratic and Republican coalition, and as the willing symbol of anti-

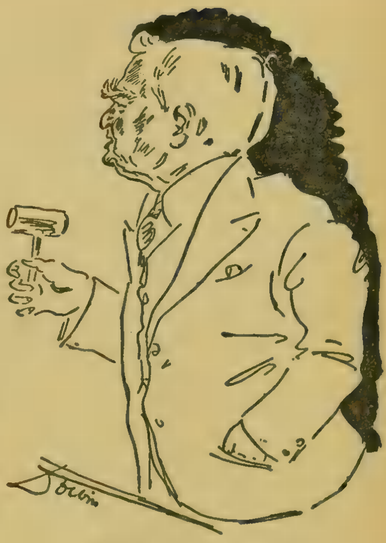
Roosevelt sentiment in Congress and throughout the country, the seventy-one-year-old Vice-President was a serious Presidential candidate, with a nation-wide poll popularity equal to or better than that of Taft, Hull, Dewey, Farley, or Vandenberg. Congressional "beat Roosevelt" maneuvers were worked out in the privacy of his offices, and Senators Pat Harrison of Mississippi and Jimmy Byrnes of South Carolina, master-strategists of the conservative bloc, called daily at the V. P.'s sanctuary to "strike a blow for liberty" with three fingers of Bourbon.

In recent months the play and the players have changed rapidly, and Garner is now given far less prominent billing in the coming Democratic drama. Regardless of what the little Texan's campaign managers say, the early Garner-for-President boom was a simple "stop Roosevelt" movement as far as its conservative Democratic backers were concerned, and its strength came from the reasonable assumption that President Roosevelt would remain outspokenly liberal up to and through the 1940 election. But Garner and his backers have been reminded during recent months that their chief at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue is also a pretty shrewd politician. The new Roosevelt strategy of appeasing the conservative Democrats in the interest of "party unity" has cut some of the ground from under Garner, and the quiet campaign to "draft" Secretary of State Cordell Hull, who is conservative enough to satisfy the right wing of the party, hasn't helped the Garner candidacy.

Garner is acutely aware of his altered position. When I interviewed him in his Senate office, he perched like a puzzled owl behind his desk and testily refused to comment on or off the record on any subject, even the recent death of Senator Borah. His handy supply of liquor, which broke the ice for many a visiting newspaperman in the old days, remained locked in the cupboard. The Vice-President is extremely touchy on his Presidential candidacy. As soon as I mentioned "Democratic Presidential possibilities," I was shown the door. What irritates Garner most is that his offices are no longer the scene of strategy-mapping conferences where Roosevelt-sponsored legislation is crippled before it reaches the floor of the Senate or House. Byrnes and Harrison, who were among the first to encourage Garner to make himself "available" for the Presidency, still drop in to pass the time of day, but they now have almost daily conferences at the White House, and Jimmy Byrnes, an on-again, off-again Roosevelt man since 1936, is once more the President's wheelhorse in the Senate. To rejuvenate the Garner candidacy Roosevelt would have to renounce his policy of appeasement and declare himself a candidate for a third term on a New Deal program or openly commit himself to the choice of a liberal, such as Attorney General Robert H. Jackson, likewise on a New Deal platform.

If, for purposes of speculation, it is conceded that Garner could get the Democratic nomination, what are his chances of election? Washington observers believe they are almost non-existent. Any Republican, they contend, except perhaps Herbert Hoover, could defeat Garner, for if the people honestly want a conservative candidate, they will turn to the party with traditionally conservative candidates. The Democrats, these observers point out, have never won with a conservative.

What the Vice-President would do in the White House in the remote eventuality that he were elected must remain, for the present, a matter of speculation. He has no program. He has come a long way by keeping his mouth closed, and he is not going to ruin his slim chance of nomination by opening it now. To all questions concerning his views on neutrality, relief, housing, civil rights, labor, or anything else he has one answer: "I have no opinion."



Vice-President Garner

Nevertheless, some generalizations on a Garner Administration are permissible in the light of his record. The Dies committee, for example, would most certainly be retained. Garner is still behind Dies, but just as quietly as when he first encouraged the Bad Boy from Orange to begin his investigations. Majority Leader Sam Rayburn, Garner's man in the House, has been instrumental in getting Congressional support for Dies. As a politician who has been maintained in office by the votes of a boss-ridden electorate, Garner has been untroubled by the denial of constitutional rights. In the words of one of his admirers, Colonel Carl Estes, Texas publisher and oil man, "Jack Garner is a Democrat who has no desire to substitute the autocracy of the masses for that of the classes." Garner would like to see relief dumped back on the states, with perhaps small federal contributions, but it is possible that even his conservative Democratic advisers would convince him of the impossibility of such an arrangement. Republicans and Democrats of all shades agree that certain New Deal measures, notably the Social Security Act, TVA, and perhaps the SEC, will have to be retained in principle, if not in spirit, no matter who heads the next Administration. Garner as President would also maintain such agencies as the FHA and the RFC, simply because they are self-supporting, middle-class agencies which, on the whole, meet the approval of a small-town banker like himself. If President Roosevelt is renominated, Garner will be given the chance to run again as Vice-President purely as a courtesy. And he will probably refuse it. Three terms as President are one thing; three sessions in the Vice-Presidential sinecure are quite another. As things now stand, John Nance Garner, retired, will be Uvalde's leading resident in 1941.

Labor Distrusts Chamberlain

BY ERNEST DAVIES

London, January 22

AS THE war develops, British Labor's doubts concerning it are strengthened rather than weakened. When Germany invaded Poland and Mr. Chamberlain appeared to hesitate about honoring England's guaranty, Arthur Greenwood, deputy leader of the Labor Party, was urged to "speak for England." He did so by demanding that a stand against Hitler's aggression be taken and our pledge to Poland honored. At that time the whole Labor movement, including, be it noted, the Communists, was behind him. Had Chamberlain not delivered an ultimatum to Germany, he would probably have been driven from office and the war would have taken place none the less. Support of the war at the outset, therefore, aroused little dissension in Labor's ranks. Doubts only began to arise when the conduct of the war became incomprehensible to the layman, and when many began to wonder whether the National Government was in earnest in its prosecution. This may have been due partly to the failure of the Allies to give any genuine help to Poland and to the widespread ignorance in this country of the dispatch of an expeditionary force to France. Labor's doubts were increased when Soviet Russia marched into Poland and effectively blocked Germany's advance eastward; here were explanation and justification of the German-Soviet pact. But with Russia's subsequent action in the Baltic, culminating in the invasion of Finland, they diminished. At the same time, however, concern spread as to whether a war conducted by a Conservative and capitalist government could really be that war for democracy and freedom the world was led to believe it to be. Had Russia left Finland alone, Labor's opposition to the war might have mounted to vociferous protest. Before Russia's aggression the Communists, who had suddenly reversed their support of the war against Nazism, even though the shift meant the expulsion of their general secretary from office, were able to make a case against the "imperialist" war, and they exploited the situation to the full.

The official Labor movement, however, at no time wavered in its support of the war. It issued a statement condemning Russia's invasion of Poland; and the party's leader, Clement Attlee, in his speech on Labor's peace aims, referred to Russia as "sharing the booty" with Germany. At this point the leadership was possibly more farsighted than the rank and file, with whom it seemed somewhat out of touch. This was partly because at first the impression was created that in supporting the war Labor was supporting the government. Later, when Labor leaders were invited to participate in the War Cabinet they refused to do so, making it clear that Labor wished to retain its political independence. In this they had the whole-hearted support of the entire movement. Labor would reserve its right to criticize the government in its conduct of the war, and at the same time give general support to the war effort.

But there were still sources of confusion. The Labor Party's agreement with the Conservatives and Liberals on a by-election truce was one of these. Under this agreement, when vacancies occurred for parliamentary seats, an election would not be fought, but the party which held the seat would nominate the candidate. This by-election truce was immediately interpreted as a political truce, extending to complete support of the government, come what might. It was not, however, so far-reaching, and the leaders have since made it clear that the by-election truce can be terminated at any time by either side, and that in the meantime normal political activities of the local parties should continue. The government, of course, took advantage of this truce, was inclined to interpret it as a complete surrender, and did its utmost to rope the Labor Party organization into war activities. It strove to make use of the party machine through Transport House, headquarters of the Labor movement. The local parties, however, used passive resistance and did not respond. Ministry of Information posters sent out by Transport House found their way into the waste-paper baskets, and pretense at cooperation has now ended. The demand to end the by-election pact has increased, and recently the Labor Party Executive, composed of representatives of the trade unions and political leaders, turned down by a very narrow margin a proposal to end it Confusion arises from the inability of the rank-and-file party member, whose work is for the most part confined to electioneering, to conceive of any effective opposition outside election propaganda in the constituencies. To him a truce in by-elections means a political truce and the abandonment of all hope of removing the government as long as that truce exists. This state of affairs cannot last indefinitely because the rank-and-file member, who has been fighting the National Government since 1931 and has been loud in condemnation of its foreign policy from that date, cannot believe in its declared war aims now.

Refusal to cooperate and increasing doubts about the desirability of giving the government support in its prosecution of the war have their origin largely in distrust of the Chamberlain ministry. Swept along by the tide of oncoming war the whole Labor movement at first accepted the government's change of front. But belief that Mr. Chamberlain in his seventy-first year could switch from a policy of friendship to Germany to one of enmity proved only temporary. The Labor Party member no longer believes in the genuine conversion of a Prime Minister whose record has shown a decided preference for fascism over socialism. The more documents that are published disclosing the foreign policy of the government up to the outbreak of war, the greater the disbelief. The shrewd but quiescent voter who reads the official documents telling of the barbarities committed in Nazi Germany during the last years realizes that the government knew of these things when it was following a policy of appeasement. If, knowing these things, it still desired friendship with Germany, can it now, he asks, be fighting a war for a new social order? As the picture of the government's pre-war foreign policy emerges, he questions whether the government which destroyed the League of Nations and in effect acquiesced in aggression against Abyssinia, Austria, Spain, Czechoslovakia, and Albania, can be trusted to fight for democracy and freedom or even a federal Europe. It just does not appear logical. The government was formerly willing to shake hands with all it now claims to abhor and to condone the very antithesis of what it now professes to be fighting for. With these doubts latent in their minds, Laborites have watched the prosecution of the war with skepticism. The expulsion of Russia from the League when no action was taken against other aggressor nations reinforced their incredulity.

This distrust of the Chamberlain government is not based solely on its foreign policy, but equally on its actions at home both before and since the war. The National Government's pre-war record was one of protecting private monopoly. Precisely the same policy has been followed during the war. The government hesitates to go the whole way toward state capitalism; that is, it is reluctant to compel the subservience of all industry to the needs of the state. With the possible exception of the United States, England is the supreme example of the capitalist system. Before the war, state interference in industry was at a minimum. Manufacture was divided among a myriad of firms, and where coordination or cooperation existed it was instituted by the industry itself along monopoly lines, with only friendly state interference. In fact, government in Britain since 1931 has not only guarded capitalist interests at every turn but also aided them to build up monopolies which the state protected with tariffs and preferential taxation. The relationship between the state and industry became closer, but it was always on terms that showed the interests of private enterprise to be paramount. It is this hesitation to interfere with the capitalist organization of industry that has so far prevented the complete mobilization and control of production that must come if the war on the economic front is to be won.

When the outbreak of war made it necessary to switch production from a peace-time to a war-time basis, the government tended to rely upon capitalist industry to meet its requirements; where control was unavoidable, it handed it over to existing capitalist organizations, calling upon individual industrialists to act in an advisory capacity. In thus putting capitalist interests first the government is playing a dangerous game as regards the trade unions, which in the beginning were most cooperative. In fact, the trade-union leaders were even more active in their support of the government than Labor's political leaders. Now the industrial and political branches of the movement are becoming equally skeptical of the government's intentions, mainly because of its attack on the standard of living of the workers and its determination to prevent wages from rising.

Clement Attlee

This action on the part of the government is the inevitable outcome of the monetary, economic, and financial policy that it has embarked upon. Aware of the huge cost of the war, estimated already at $24,000,000 a day, the government fears inflation. Because inflation would be fatal to the capitalist system, desperate efforts are being made to prevent it. Runaway inflation can only be avoided in war time when war production is substituted for production for normal consumption, that is, when the war is financed through savings made on a very much increased scale. To achieve this, consumption must be reduced through increased taxation, voluntary or compulsory saving, rationing, or higher prices. Increased purchasing power in the hands of the community resulting from war spending must not be used to buy more goods. On the contrary, the government argues, current spending must be cut down. To bring this about the government is attempting to follow a very definite line. It wants to keep wages down so that the workers will not be in a position to consume more. Professor Maynard Keynes suggests that spending can be cut only if the worker is compelled to save by having a percentage of his wages deducted at the source and retained until after the war. Since two-thirds of the total consumption is originated by the workers, they must curtail their consumption. This argument has been accepted with alacrity by the government because it serves its interests. It does not want to increase direct taxation further; it views with horror any form of capital taxation; and it fears inflation because that would reduce the purchasing power of the rentier class.

The government has, therefore, from the outset of the war resisted all demands to adjust incomes to the increased cost of living. Old-age pensioners in receipt of $2.50 a week are only now to receive a meager increase as the result of a universal demand. Unemployment insurance remains unchanged, and expenditures on all social services are being restricted. Wage increases have taken place, but the government has repeatedly made it known that it views with concern any rise in the general level of wages. Mr. Chamberlain went so far as to declare in a recent speech that there should be no tying of wages to the cost of living: wages should not be automatically adjusted upward as prices rise. Such remarks, demonstrating the policy of the government, are anathema to the workers. Quite rightly they argue that even their pre-war wage left no margin, that they have never been able to maintain their families at the minimum standards set by the British Medical Council, and that they cannot meet any increase in living costs. If the government wishes to keep wages down, it must keep prices down. This it has failed to do because it has been reluctant to go the whole way in controlling production and distribution. It has left too much control to private enterprise; it delayed the introduction of rationing until prices had already risen; and far from stopping profiteering, it shares in it through its excess-profits tax. These are among the reasons why the workers will refuse to fall in line with government policy. If prices rise they will demand wage increases; and because, as Keynes has pointed out, in the race between prices and wages prices always win, inflation is threatened. To avoid it, the government must stick to its policy in the face of resistance from the trade unions, Labor, and the cooperative movement, and either tax wages or introduce compulsory saving. Repeated declarations of this policy by the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are strongly influencing the attitude of Labor to the war.

The worker accepted the coming of war as inevitable. He believed we were fighting to end Hitlerism and all that Hitlerism represented—suppression of the working-class movement, tyrannical rule. He wanted to restore international law. He hoped to see a new world order arise after an Allied victory. At first he believed the National Government was fighting for these ends. The concentration of the demand for sacrifices on the wage-earning class has aroused serious doubts in his mind. He begins to wonder whether there is not something in the arguments put forward by the left wing of the movement that this is just another war between the rival imperialisms of the British and German empires. He wonders whether it is not after all just a capitalist government's fight to preserve capitalism, so that the capitalist class can continue to exploit the workers. While such doubts are beginning to stir in many minds, they have not necessarily been crystallized, and the government can yet win back or retain the workers' support through an effective demonstration of its sincerity of purpose. To attack the standard of living of the workers without clearly showing that the capitalist class is making even greater sacrifices is not the way. If the government kept prices down by enforcing reduced profit margins, if it increased taxation of the wealthier classes, even to the extent of a tax on capital, and if it extended state control over industry and prevented all profiteering, it might convince the worker that there was equality of sacrifice.

Since the invasion of Finland, Russia is playing a far less important role in the thinking of the worker, for he is whole-heartedly behind the Finns in their resistance. Nevertheless, he has not lost faith in the Russian Revolution, believing that Stalin has betrayed Russia and not Russia, socialism. Even Sir Walter Citrine, general secretary of the Trade Union Congress, who has always been critical of the Soviet Union, has issued a warning that the workers would not stand for a war against Russia. In this fact is found another reason for the workers' distrust of the Chamberlain government. They are fearful that if the war extends to Scandinavia, and if the Soviet-German alliance becomes closer, the government may ultimately be glad of an excuse to fight against Russia also.

The doubts existing in the minds of the workers must not be misinterpreted. In spite of them, British workers support the war now for the same reasons that animated them on September 3, 1939. They will fight for an Allied victory; they see no purpose in stopping the war today. They desire, however, the fall of the present British government as much as the defeat of the German. As long as the Tories remain in power, Labor will continue to doubt whether the war is being fought for the reasons given, and whether out of it can come a just peace which will build a new order in Europe.

Marxism Reconsidered—III

BY LEWIS COREY

TRANSITION TO A NEW ORDER

THE popular unity that a people's functional socialism might create would make possible a democratic transition to the new order. Such a transition depends upon successful action to solve the economic crisis, to release the forces of abundance and raise the standard of living of all functional groups. Lack of such action was a shortcoming of the "popular front." The "front" was doomed by its defensive nature, for democracy cannot survive the totalitarian danger and grow if it stands still. Failure to solve the economic crisis means a cat-and-dog struggle of group against group for a larger share in the smaller output of a shrinking economy. Those are the conditions upon which fascism feeds. What is needed is aggressive action based on a program of measures to solve the economic crisis which will at the same time create a transition to the new order.

That kind of program is possible today. For capitalism is already being transformed, and effective economic measures to solve the crisis must mean the progressive transformation of capitalism toward democratic socialism. We must seize upon that unity and formulate it in a transitional program of social-economic reconstruction.

The program I suggest means gradualism. Social Democratic gradualism failed? Yes and no. Social Democracy was right in its emphasis on democracy and gradualism; but it misunderstood democracy, and its gradualism never had any teeth and never drove toward socialism. Moreover, the older gradualism was limited and distorted by the upswing of capitalism; economic expansion and relative prosperity provided no base upon which to advance toward socialism. That base is now provided by capitalist decline and crisis, which compel increasing state intervention in economic activity, whatever the form of government. That intervention is good or bad, progressive or reactionary, depending solely upon whether or not it heads in the direction of democratic collectivism. It can be made the starting-point of a new gradualism that avoids both Social Democratic futility and Communist catastrophism.

There is no sharp economic break between capitalism and socialism. If the measures of a transitional program are forthright and direct, if they create a new economic balance that solves the crisis while safeguarding democracy, the cumulative effects must mean a progressive transformation of capitalism into democratic socialism. An effective transitional program involves a minimum of strategic economic changes: nationalization of investment and credit, because capitalist decline and crisis are primarily the result of a relative economic maturity that offers decreasing opportunity for the private investment of capital, upon which capitalist economic activity depends; nationalization of large-scale industry, because its systematic limitation of output and its monopoly share of corporate profits unbalance the whole economic system; and planning, because it is now evident that the economy is no longer self-adjusting and the new social controls must be deliberately unified. These are strategic controls that might solve the economic crisis while moving toward socialism. They allow room for the encouragement and free play of small independent enterprise and investment. Small business has everything to gain by a release from monopoly exploitation and by renewal of economic activity on higher levels. That is equally true of the farmers, although special measures are necessary in their case. Such a program of transitional reconstruction limits the number of interests that must be destroyed, while it promotes the interests of all useful functional groups and so creates a popular movement that may beat down reactionary opposition.

But if there is no sharp economic break between capitalism and socialism, there are differences that must be recognized. Failure to recognize them may imply a groundless faith in measures to make capitalism—not the economic system—work; it may mean efforts to escape the minimum of fundamental strategic controls. The ensuing failure will multiply totalitarian controls, whereas limitation of government controls is necessary for a democratic transition to the new order.

And what shape shall that new order take? What institutional arrangements are necessary to overcome the totalitarian potential in collectivism, to make that collectivism democratic? While collectivism is the inescapable economic basis of the new order, the collectivism need not be absolute or all-inclusive. Nationalization, or collective ownership, should be limited by definite ends: to break oligarchical capitalist controls, to balance the economic system, to release the forces of abundance, to plan. This can be done in an economic set-up which permits independent ownership among small enterprisers, farmers, and cooperatives. Nor need there be absolute centralization of power even in the nationalized economic sector. Advances in technology make decentralization more efficient. Moreover, decentralization of enterprises and plants permits of that regional decentralization which is necessary for a balanced national economy. Another limitation and control of power is available in the representation of all functional interests in the administration of nationalized enterprises: labor, management, and consumers, as well as regional and local interests. The democratic force of such economic arrangements is clear. Diversity of economic forms and interests and their freedom of action are safeguards against tyranny. Decentralization of economic institutions, authority, and controls encourages initiative, freedom of decision, and democratic responsibility.

Planning is wholly practical within a system of limited nationalization that allows for a large measure of economic decentralization, independent property, and cooperatives. What are the ends of planning? To create a new, upward-moving economic balance, to release the forces of abundance, to serve all functional interests. This can be done with planning limited to regulation of strategic economic factors: investment and large-scale industry, the relation between capital goods and consumption goods, prices. It is not necessary that planning should control all economic activity. And planning is wholly practical, too, with a money-and-market mechanism which, although deprived of its absolute control of production and investment, allows freedom of choice to the consumers.

These institutional arrangements limit the danger of bureaucratic totalitarianism but do not destroy it. An additional factor is necessary: freedom of association, the independence of employee organizations and other functional groups in relation to the political and economic bureaucracy. The traditional socialist idea of "workers' ownership," is ambiguous, and it promotes bureaucratic usurpation of power. For between the workers and the industries they "own" is interposed the bureaucratic state, which under a system of absolute collective ownership wields effective power over economic institutions. The twin ideas of "workers' ownership" and "workers' state" permit the bureaucracy to raise the question, as it does in Russia: Why independent unions? Why should workers strike against themselves, their industries, and their state? The answer, it is now clear, is that the workers remain workers. The wage relation still remains, and in a worse form where there is no democracy and the state is the only employer: wage slavery is absolute. Workers should have at least as much right to strike against the government-employer as against the capitalist employer. Syndicalism offered a solution in the form of union ownership of industry, but that would strengthen bureaucracy through the combination of control over unions and industry. Unions must have a share in management along with other functional interests and groups. But they must keep their independence. It is the tragedy of labor, in Communist Russia as in Fascist Germany and Italy, that "unions" are instruments of bureaucratic control of the workers. Trade unionism, unlike socialism, is a creation of the workers and the bulwark of their democratic rights under capitalism and socialism. Independent unions, with the right of collective bargaining and the right to strike, must exist to protect the interests of the workers who still remain workers and to limit the threat of bureaucracy.

For bureaucracy is the chief danger, though socialism and Marxism have shown amazingly little awareness of that fact. Another millennial abstraction behind which lurk a dangerous unclarity and ambiguity that make for bureaucratic totalitarianism is the socialist idea that the abolition of capitalism means abolition of all class distinctions and exploitation and of all conflict of economic interests. The truth is that all sorts of distinctions and conflicts remain. New forms of exploitation may arise, and the bureaucracy may become a new ruling class. Only all-inclusive democracy can overcome the danger. To weaken or yield political democracy to get economic democracy will end in no democracy at all. There must be the freest expression of conflicting interests and ideas under socialism. That is why there is no room for the one-party system or for the destruction of parliamentarism. Nor is there room for the Marxist governmental theory of the combination of powers as contrasted with the democratic concept of separation of powers. We need, in fact, a new application of the system of checks and balances to limit the power of state and bureaucracy in favor of largely self-governing economic and cultural institutions and groups; a new application of the old liberal theory that "that state is best which governs least."

MARX AND THE STATE

Combination of powers and the abolition of parliamentarism are facets of Marx's theory that the proletariat cannot use the existing state for its own purposes but must destroy the state and build anew. The theory is logical if the state is only an organ of class oppression and if the proletariat must seize political power and impose "its" dictatorship over the people. But what are the results? Lenin himself gave part of the answer in the final years of his life—the efforts to build a "democratic commune" according to the formula of Marx having proved a failure—when on several occasions he pointed out that the Soviet state was a "bourgeois and czarist mechanism . . . borrowed from czarism and barely touched by the Soviet world. . . . At the top we have perhaps 10,000—I don't know how many—of our own people; in the lower ranks hundreds of thousands of former czarist officials. . . . The Soviet state mechanism is a survival to a large extent of the former bureaucracy . . . with only a superficial new coat of paint." It now seems obvious that no other result was possible. A governing personnel is not created overnight. Dictatorship, which is inevitable if the state must be destroyed and built anew, crushes vital democratic elements that might have been introduced into the state mechanism to democratize it; the new "proletarian" masters and the most unprincipled and servile of the old bureaucratic crowd merge finally into a new bureaucratic despotism which is independent of democratic pressures and ideas. The new state, which was to be the servant of society, becomes a new, more monstrous, and absolute master of society, the mastery being modified neither by parliamentarism nor by a system of checks and balances. All states develop their own self-interests, which can be made to serve society only through greater democracy. The Marxist theory may have seemed justified in backward countries, where the state was almost exclusively an organ of class oppression. But Russian experience proves the contrary. And the theory is even more obviously untenable for advanced countries like the United States, where the state has a usable democratic tradition, is still responsive to democratic pressures, and performs an unusually large and growing number of constructive services. We must learn to use the democratic state, overcome its class nature and limitations, democratize it still further with greater popular controls, and increase its constructive services. Upon this depend the democratic transition to socialism and democratic socialism itself. The task, it is true, is a hard one. But we must find ways of doing it. The alternative is the "easy" Marxist way, which, history now shows, ends in totalitarian nightmare.

One final word on the state. Its powers necessarily increase during the transition from capitalism to socialism. There are dangers in that situation which traditional socialism dismissed, as many non-Marxist radicals do today. The dangers were dismissed largely because the Marxist theory assumes that as socialism abolishes classes the need for the state disappears and it "withers away." Marx did a great job of stripping off the metaphysical wrappings of the state by giving it a definite historical location and meaning. But his theory was shaped too much by the nature of the capitalist state, which is dominated by an economic ruling class that derives its economic power from property ownership. Its serious limitations are clearly revealed when the theory is projected either backward or forward. The feudal lords were not an economic ruling class; it was political control over the land that gave them economic power. Similarly, the bureaucratic caste under socialism has no direct economic power in the form of property ownership, and Marxists therefore conclude that it cannot become a ruling class. But it may, in fact, become a new ruling class with vested interests intrenched indirectly in the political control of economic power instead of directly, as under capitalism, in economic power itself. That leads to the "feudal socialism" toward which communism and fascism move. Another limitation of the Marxist theory of the state is the conception of the proletariat as the final ruling class in a succession of ruling classes. Logically, however, if there is to be a new ruling class it will be the new middle-class bureaucracy because of its strategic position in government and industry. Such a class, whether Communist or Fascist, must rule by means of a totalitarian state, since its privileges and power are wholly political. The answer to that threat is democracy. A system of pluralism in government and industry which permits the largest measure of self-government and freedom of expression and action to the community's economic and cultural interests is the final assurance of a democratic collectivism, a functional democracy.

[This is the concluding section of Mr. Corey's article.]

A Lincoln Nobody Knew

BY I. F. STONE

JUDGING from the quality of the speeches made by leading Republican hopefuls on Lincoln's Birthday the country may be in danger of a fourth term for Mr. Roosevelt. The speeches were not altogether bad. Some of the phrases were good, but the good ones had all been used by Lincoln. At Portland Mr. Dewey said we had been too long a house divided and declared it time "real economic freedom" was restored so that government of the people, by the people, and for the people should not perish from the earth. At Grand Rapids Governor James of Pennsylvania thought we ought to bear malice toward none, except possibly New Dealers. At Oklahoma City Senator Bridges was certain that "industry, labor, and agriculture alike cannot progress half free and half under the domination of those who hold public office" unless, of course, the office-holders were Republicans. One began to wonder whether Lincoln died to free Republican politicians from the necessity of writing their own speeches. Those who invoked Lincoln were as bad as those who borrowed from him. Mr. Hoover, who sat without fidgeting in the same Cabinet with Fall and Daugherty, appealed for more morals in government in order to "assure Abraham Lincoln's America." John D. M. Hamilton, with that flair for the right time and place that has made him so helpful to Mr. Farley, picked the Waldorf-Astoria as the setting for a speech calling Lincoln's common people "the backbone of the nation." These were Mr. Hamilton's exact words. I hope I infringe no copyright by quoting them. Senator Capper, with some aid from Julia Ward Howe, worked himself into a fine crescendo at Baltimore. "Abraham Lincoln's soul," he cried, "is marching on." He might have added that his party seems to lie a-moldering in the grave.

Were it not for Bruce Barton I should be content to leave these speeches to closely reasoned analysis by Mr. Lippmann. Mr. Barton's Lincoln's Birthday speech at Buffalo, if not what one would ordinarily term memorable, was certainly something to remember. At Buffalo he set out to do for Lincoln what he once did for Jesus. Some readers may recall, though with mixed emotions, Bruce Barton's "The Man Nobody Knows." One chapter of the Gospel According to Barton was headed A Founder of Modern Business, and a passage that should be famous said that the parables were "marvelously condensed, as all good advertising must be." Barton's Lincoln, like his Jesus, is not cut to conventional patterns. "We are met here," he said at Buffalo, "to honor the memory of an American who was ill fed, ill clothed, ill housed—and did not know it." "Inwardly warmed by spiritual fires," he continued, holding up Lincoln as an example to the unemployed, "he was almost unconscious of being ill fed or well fed, ill clothed or well clothed, ill housed or well housed." These spiritual fires would be useful in balancing the budget, but they suggest a dangerously high capacity for sales resistance. A man who doesn't know—or care—whether he is ill fed or well fed is not an encouraging business prospect.

The Lincoln Nobody Knows goes too far. "The Man Nobody Knows" may have seemed bizarre, but Bruce Barton knew what he was doing. The book swung lightly from what Jesus said on the Mount to what the chairman of the board said in the Pullman lounge, and the reader was given to understand that both voiced eternal verities. Barton's Jesus flattered business. Barton's Lincoln seems less than respectful of widely advertised business products. Mr. Barton was not content to say that Lincoln was born in a log cabin. He emphasized that it was a log cabin "without heat, running water, or any modern convenience." He commented loftily that "according to a philosophy now widely current, this was a hopeless environment." Sources less radical than the New Deal spread propaganda for plumbing.

The clothing industry is spending no money to disprove the notion that clothes make the man. Mr. Barton insisted on being an iconoclast. "His clothes," he said of Lincoln, "were of crude homespun, ill fitting, and worn until the fabric would no longer patch." This is not orthodox Hart, Schaffner, and Marxism. Lincoln's "diet of corn pone and bacon," Mr. Barton gloated, "lacked essential vitamins." Does he think this will endear him to tomato-juice accounts?

A few unthinking business men may be pleased by Barton's Lincoln. An America in which young men didn't know or care whether they were ill fed, ill clothed, or ill housed would be an America that didn't bother about higher wages. But it would also be an America emancipated from free wheeling, tiled bathrooms, five-foot bookshelves, and Sunkist oranges. Mr. Barton's program may allow for an occasional Lincoln, but it implies a mass of Jeeter Lesters. "Be Poor White Trash—and Like It" is a snappy slogan, but not for vote-getting. Even Mr. Hoover had the tact to call it rugged individualism.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Poor Man's Credit

MONEY is cheap today. The cost to the Treasury of borrowing on short-term bills is infinitesimal; in fact, there have been occasions recently when lenders were willing to pay the government for using their money. New 4¾-year Treasury notes were offered in December last on a 1 per cent interest basis, while 12-to-14-year bonds carrying a 2¼ per cent coupon stand 3 points above par. Cities and states can obtain loans almost as cheaply, and private corporations with first-class credit standing find a ready market for 3 per cent bonds. If you want a million dollars and have the right kind of credit rating, your bank will probably give you a warm welcome and make you a term loan for six or seven years for as little as 2 per cent. Even if you only wanted a thousand, and were able to provide ample Stock Exchange collateral, you could do business on a 4 per cent basis.

Most people, however, have no formal credit rating, but nevertheless stand in need of loans from time to time. There are a variety of agencies anxious to cater to them but not at 4 per cent. A person with a steady salaried job can apply to a commercial bank with a personal-loan department, and if his credentials are considered satisfactory can obtain a loan for 10 per cent or a little less. More expensive is credit received from industrial banks of the Morris Plan kind. According to one of the valuable economic studies sponsored by the Twentieth Century Fund,* the average cost to a borrower of an industrial-bank loan is about 16 per cent, or nearly three times the normal commercial-bank discount rate on small business loans. Moreover, the signature of a relative or friend as comaker is required for the typical loan of this kind. Borrowers from personal finance companies are not called upon to find an outside comaker but are asked for a wage assignment and a chattel mortgage. The cost, however, is again higher and may legally be as much as 36 per cent per annum on sums of less than $150.

None of the institutions mentioned, however, fulfil the needs of the low-paid worker requiring $5 or $10 to tide him over between pay days. If he has anything to pledge he may get accommodation from a pawnbroker, whose charges will range from 1 to 10 per cent per month. A man who lives in New York City can apply to the Provident Loan Society, a limited-dividend company conducting a pawnbroking business and charging only ¾ per cent per month, or 9 per cent per annum. Finally, he can have recourse to one of the numerous "loan sharks" who still flourish despite the laws against them. And, indeed, in a sense they do perform a social function in that they provide credit, albeit at an exorbitant rate, to people who desperately need it and cannot get it from any respectable source.

The high cost of small loans is not due to monopoly, nor is it, as might be assumed, necessitated by a tremendous ratio of bad debts. The primary cause is the amount of labor involved in preliminary investigation and in collections. A special report of the New York State Superintendent of Banks just issued shows that the chief expense item in the accounts of licensed lenders in the state is salaries, which on the average amount to nearly 5½ per cent of the assets employed in the business. Advertising and federal taxes both cost more than bad debts, which average only 1.62 per cent.

* "Does Distribution Cost Too Much?" Twentieth Century Fund. $3.50.

The New York Licensed Lenders' Act of 1932, which is paralleled by legislation in many other states, applies to all persons lending sums of $300 or less at rates greater than 6 per cent a year, except pawnbrokers and institutions chartered under other sections of the banking law. It provides for the supervision and regulation of their business practices and prescribes maximum charges of 3 per cent per month on that part of a loan not in excess of $150, and 2½ per cent thereafter. These rates may seem usurious as compared with the cost of money to men of substance, but the fixing of maximum charges is a delicate business. The object of the legislation was to attract capital to the legitimate small-loan field and thus circumscribe the activities of the "loan shark." To a considerable extent it has succeeded. The number of licensees in the state rose from 78 in 1932 to 269 in 1938, and loans outstanding increased from $10,000,000 to $55,000,000.

According to the report previously mentioned, which analyzes in detail financial returns made by licensed lenders in accordance with the 1932 act, net earnings of the business as a whole amount to 11.25 per cent on used and useful assets. But as the larger firms in the business are able to obtain part of their capital at comparatively low rates of interest, the return on their equity is far above even this handsome ratio. Household Finance Corporation, one of the two large chain enterprises which do some 40 per cent of the total volume of regulated small-loan business throughout the country, had gross assets at the end of 1939 of $74,518,000. Of its capital liabilities $24,460,000 was represented by bank loans, on which the average interest may be as low as 2 per cent, and $18,000,000 by 5 per cent preference shares. Common stock and surplus amounted to $28,787,000, or just under 40 per cent of the total capital employed, receiving a net return of almost 19 per cent.

The average charges of this company to borrowers are below the legal maxima, and as it is probably more efficiently organized than the smaller offices, its proportion of operating expenses may be rather lower. It serves to illustrate, however, the profit-making potentialities of the small-loan business and justifies the contention of the New York Superintendent of Banks that the time has come to reduce legal rates. His proposals, which Governor Lehman has recommended to the legislature, are for a maximum of 2½ per cent per month on any part of a loan not exceeding $100 and 2 per cent thereafter. The resulting saving to borrowers, on a loan volume equal to that of 1938, will be, he calculates, $2,392,163—an addition to the purchasing power of the poorest section of the community which is not to be despised. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the legislature will act speedily on the Governor's recommendations, which have been incorporated in a bill sponsored by Senator Gutman of Brooklyn and Assemblyman Cariello of Queens, and that other states will consider similar action.

In the Wind

PHILADELPHIA CITY EDITORS received a terse release last Christmas from the local recruiting headquarters of the United States Army. It read: "The inclosed Christmas dinner menu of the Quartermaster School, Schuylkill Arsenal, 2620 Gray's Ferry Road, Philadelphia, may be of some interest to your readers. The army still lacks about 17,000 men in its efforts to reach the goal of 227,000 set by the President, and the publication of this essentially normal seasonal menu which is prepared annually at the many army posts throughout the nation and its possessions might show the way to some young men to a better future."

OVER THE United Press wires last week came reports of a student strike at Young Harris College, Georgia. The dispatch reported that "a strike of 250 students for the right to hold hands with co-eds was under control tonight. . . . After Dr. Lance [president of the college] expelled five ringleaders of the fight for hand-holding he warned their surviving classmates: 'This is one institution where the faculty will not brook bolshevism.' "

A MINOR DIPLOMATIC crisis occurred in Miami recently. President Vincent of Haiti, a Negro, planned to stop there on his way to Washington. First he was told he would have to live in the Negro quarter; when he protested he was offered the whole floor of a hotel. State Department officials vetoed that plan as being another form of segregation.

THERE IS GROWING evidence of a rift between J. Edgar Hoover and liberals in the Department of Justice. That Hoover owes his post to a liberal Supreme Court Justice, Harlan F. Stone, is not generally known. Hoover was appointed by Stone when the latter was Attorney General; in 1932, after the Republican defeat, most departments were overhauled, and Hoover was slated to go. Stone quietly exerted pressure to have him retained on the ground that the post should be "above politics." Hoover was kept.

CAMPAIGN NEWS: Paul McNutt's campaign headquarters are at 1 Wall Street, but his stationery is stamped 80 Broadway, another entrance to the building, because "Wall Street" sounds sinister. . . . Key figure at Garner's New York headquarters is William Goodwin, intimate of Father Coughlin and recipient of Coughlin's ardent support when he ran for Congress in '36.

THE NEW SPAIN: In a recent address reported in the Spanish press, José Maria Alfaro, Under Secretary for Press and Propaganda in the women's section of Falange, complained: "Bayonet in hand, under Franco's command, we were able to win a war, but we have not succeeded yet in reaching far down into the sensibility of our enemies or even in winning to our side those who profess to be our friends."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

BECAUSE my opposition to a third term for Mr. Roosevelt is so well known, I am constantly receiving requests that I name my candidate. I can think of several men who have shown themselves to be great administrators, true patriots, liberal-minded citizens, and unusually capable leaders. If the Democratic Party were thinking less of votes and more of the genuine needs of the country it could not fail to give the most serious attention to the records of Harold Ickes, Secretary of the Interior; Henry Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture; and Joseph B. Eastman of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Since the selection rests upon something else than proved administrative ability, these suggestions will be ruled out at once as totally unpractical. Take Mr. Eastman, for example. It will be said that he is not known to the country as a whole, that he has lived in Washington too long to be identified with any state, and that he has no political influence. These things are true. Yet the fact remains that his record is an extraordinarily fine one: he has shown unusual ability; he has worked himself up in the government service; and he has proved again and again that he has intellectual ability of a very high order. Secretary Ickes has antagonized the politicians and is regarded as not a Democrat because he used to be a Republican progressive. Secretary Wallace has antagonized the farmers—or many of them—and so it goes. But I repeat that if our party conventions were genuine, free debating affairs bent only on choosing the fittest men to lead the government in Washington, these men would have to be considered among the first.

Since they are ruled out because of the decay of our nominating system, one must look elsewhere. Usually the choice is made from among Governors and Senators. There is no outstanding Democratic Governor. Were Governor Lehman of New York not a Jew—I say this with shame and humiliation—he would naturally be considered, although he is not an orator or a man to rouse great popular enthusiasm. When one thinks how often the Governor of New York has been nominated or come near to being nominated for the Presidency, it is obvious that if almost anyone else now held the position he would be considered. Of the Senators only two stand out, Burton K. Wheeler and Bennett C. Clark. But the New Deal backers have never forgiven Wheeler because he opposed the packing of the Supreme Court by the President, which time has proved to be so unnecessary. Sometimes I agree with the statement recently made by Senator Wheeler that liberals often seem more intolerant than conservatives. At least many of them are so unforgiving that if a man once deviates from the course they have marked out he is at once tagged with having sold out to big business. Wheeler is criticized for having made speeches that were favorably received by the merchants' associations before which he spoke, while his appearances before great labor bodies, like the United Mine Workers, are carefully overlooked. It is said that he cannot be trusted, and so that is an end to him. Senator Clark, whose health has not been good of late, has refused to allow his friends to run him as a candidate. The reason that I should consider his nomination very favorably is that, as I have written before, I trust him absolutely on the all-important question of war and peace. If he, the son of Champ Clark, should come out for our going to war, I should give up all hope of finding anyone who would withstand the war hysteria.

The new Justice of the Supreme Court, William O. Douglas, ought surely to be considered. I am well aware of the objections to taking a judge from the Supreme Court—I was one of those who were much disturbed when Justice Charles E. Hughes ran for the Presidency in 1916. But if a man is capable and the country needs him in a higher position, I do not think that prejudice ought to stand in the way. Nor do I find a reason against Justice Douglas's selection in the fact that he is not known to the country at large. A candidate speedily becomes known if he has the intellectual qualities necessary for leadership; if he is not a Landon he is bound to impress the public very soon. Mr. Douglas has risen to a very high position without influence, solely on his merits, and he ought to be carefully considered. I have not spoken of Mr. Hull because there are obvious reasons why he could not stand the strain of a campaign and the Presidential office.

I am not in the least impressed by the statement that if war comes to us we must have President Roosevelt to direct our participation. In that event, more than ever, we shall need a great administrator, and Mr. Roosevelt is anything but that. Some months ago, in an article which called forth violent protest, I wrote that he ought to think less about Europe and more about home conditions and apply himself to domestic problems. I was denounced as a "tired old liberal," as one who had sold out to the interests and gone conservative. It has amused me, therefore, to find both Matthew Woll and John Lewis saying exactly the same thing about the administrative failure of the New Deal. A great administrator is what the hour calls for, and if either party wishes to serve the Republic it will look primarily for such a candidate.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Faith, Hope, and Clarity

THERE is something very appealing in the spectacle of Oswald Garrison Villard invading the Nazi hell and lecturing the devils on the iniquity of their behavior. I can fairly hear him holding forth on human rights and a free press. He says in his little book "Within Germany" (D. Appleton-Century, $1) that he intended to say "Heil, Roosevelt!" to any greetings of "Heil, Hitler!" but had no opportunity. When Mr. Villard wrote this book, he was the first American journalist to have been in both Germany and England after the outbreak of war, and the first outside journalist to visit Prague since July, 1939. He brought back a picture of a confused and depressed people, opposed to the regime, to its persecution of the Jews, to the war, yet going along because they feel helpless in the face of overwhelming terror—"the other fellow has the revolvers"—but also for other reasons. "Unfortunately," says Mr. Villard, "patriotism and the Hitler teachings that the men of a nation live only to die on the battlefield are bound to hold millions in line who at heart do not like the Nazis or their creed."

Perhaps the most striking chapter in the book is the seventh, which describes the herding of Jews into a "Jewish state" in Poland, a stretch of land 80 by 100 kilometers, inclosed by barbed wire, which is in reality a vast concentration camp where prisoners are dying like flies from cold, disease, and starvation. In Germany proper, he says, Jews sit in their homes, "and every time the doorbell rings, they expect that the order to prepare for immediate departure for Poland, and what they consider certain death, has come." The order came two weeks ago to the 1,200 Jews of Stettin, who were allowed to take with them only food for two days and a single suitcase of clothing.

Mr. Villard closes his book with an Epilogue entitled England at War which made me feel he had better look to his reputation as a pacifist and an isolationist. He justly regards all wars as senseless; for good reasons, based on his experience of the last one, his mind rejects the present conflict as merely another European struggle for power; but his heart belongs to the Allies, not because they have treated it so well but because he cannot face the prospect of a Hitler victory. His book ends as follows: "Goodby, England! I go unafraid. For Justice, Humanity, and Right are standing on your right hand. And to them Victory will come in time."

I should be the last to reproach Mr. Villard for his inconsistency, for I am bothered by the same internal conflict. And what makes reproach even more irrelevant is the probability that his state of mind-versus-heart mirrors the predicament of the great majority of Americans. The prospect of the United States getting involved in another European war, and another European peace, under the auspices of Chamberlain and Daladier is the most revolting of all prospects—except that of a Europe organized by Hitler and Stalin. On the left only the Trotskyists and the Communists have it easy these days. They say it is another imperialist war, and they say the hell with it. What's more, to them the Russian attack on Finland is one step in the world revolution. Only the other day a Communist sympathizer asked what difference there was between what Stalin is doing and world revolution—to such depths has revolutionary "thinking" sunk. Since, to such men of faith, there can be neither socialism nor genuine democracy until capitalism is overthrown, they do not flinch before the idea that Europe may have to undergo the ordeal of totalitarianism, red and brown, secure in the certainty that a united and collective Europe and presumably a classless and democratic Europe must eventually emerge. (For the Communists, of course, the "socialist democracy" of Russia is the model!)

It would be stupid to deny that there is a dynamism in Russian and German totalitarianism that seems to be more powerful than that of democracy in the non-fascist nations. This drive is anti-capitalist; it is also collectivist; but above all it is anti-democratic. And Lewis Corey, in the first of the series of articles concluded in this issue, demonstrated thoroughly enough for most of us the fact that collectivism without democracy equals fascism. The mind rejects the thesis that the proletariat will inevitably have its innings even if Hitler and Stalin overrun Europe, or that if it does it will get anything better than it has today in Russia. The dictatorship of the proletariat is a myth that will be hard to revive in this generation at least—and there is no apparent reason why collective totalitarianism cannot go on indefinitely.

And so, throwing neutrality to the winds, most of us hope the Allies and the Finns will win and cannot bring ourselves to deny them the material aid that may drag us in. Meanwhile, we hug the isolationist hope that they will win in time to keep America from entering what is bound to be another shambles abroad, even if they do win, and a new dictatorship at home.

I do not pretend to have the answer to this dilemma. But in concentrating so exclusively on a dilemma we cannot hope to resolve, aren't we neglecting a job we have at least a chance of accomplishing? Charmed by the spectacle of Europe as by some fabulous deadly snake, we have pretty much turned our backs on America. This group on the left is spending too much energy on campaigns to keep America out of war; that one is spending too much energy on paper projects to keep the European belligerents from making a bad peace. Both are legitimate and admirable objectives; both are negative and cursed with vagueness. One of their few positive effects is to create a rift between groups which are certainly united in their desire to do something fundamental about unemployment, monopoly, and all the other problems that will consign us, unless they are solved, to the fate of Europe, whether we go into this war or stay out. Certainly none will deny that the political temptation to foreign adventures will grow as our own economic situation worsens; if we become involved, there is no doubt that the speed and the certainty with which the inevitable war-time dictatorship "withers away" will depend on the strength of our economy. If we don't become involved, the mills of the economic gods will continue to grind on and not so slowly either.

I have no illusions about the extent or depth of capitalist democracy. But neither have I any illusions about the imminence of a socialist, democratic world as an inevitable sequence of the "second imperialist war." That happy event lies at the end of a long road of preparation. I happen to think that it has infinitely more chance of being carried on in the "capitalist democracy" of England and France even in war time than in a totalitarian Europe even if it were collectivist. But it can best be carried on in the United States of America—now.

In relation to the war, liberals and socialists, it seems to me, can do a few realistic things. They can strengthen the hand of the left in England and France by raising a continuous howl over war-time infringements of civil rights, by preserving in general a sharply critical attitude toward the Chamberlain and Daladier governments, and by refusing to be taken in by appeals for total support in the name of democracy in the face of such negations of democracy as the British government's present treatment of India's just demands. I should like to see a campaign in America on the Indian question. It would have the advantage of being geared to a specific, clear, and extremely vital issue; the British government is very sensitive on the matter of India, and it cannot afford to ignore American opinion unless that opinion is allowed to remain inarticulate. We should maintain a healthy skepticism toward the spate of plans for post-war Europe, pick and choose between concrete, possible programs and vague, high-flown schemes which may in the end mainly serve, like Wilson's Fourteen Points, as a smoke screen for the real work being carried on in diplomatic back rooms. The surest way to get bad terms is to postulate impossible or vague ones. Harold Nicolson's "Peacemaking, 1919," is very illuminating on this point.

But the main job, war in and war out, is at home. We must realize and force others to realize that unemployment and not the fighting on the Karelian Isthmus is a matter of life and death to the future of this country. We happen to inhabit an enormous and rich continent where economic convulsions that in a smaller country like Germany threw up a Hitler are dissipated like the splash of a stone in a lake. Even with 10,000,000 unemployed the rest of us are not actually aware of the catastrophe in our daily lives. But that cannot go on forever. The state of mind and body of that one-third of our people who are ill fed and ill housed must gradually undermine the well-being and the pleasant liberties of the other two-thirds. I am in favor of helping the Finns, but in the long run it won't do us any good to help the Finns unless we do something specific and far-reaching about the thousands of farm workers who are living on nothing a year or wandering over the country looking for a place to settle. (Dorothea Lange, coauthor of "An American Exodus," reports that 8,000 families entered California in January, more than at the height of the Dust Bowl migration.)

It is admittedly difficult to dramatize an issue like unemployment. Government relief has stopped headline hunger riots; it has also lulled the left into a false security. But it is our job to find ways of dramatizing unemployment. . . . Labor must be enlisted in a campaign for a decent house for every American family. . . . Let's have TVA clubs as well as a Paquet au Front. . . . Let's hound the Administration and Congress until they are forced to act on the railroads, public health, and all the other problems. Too many of us have joined the Sidewalk Superintendents to watch Europe being torn down—while our own house is slowly falling to pieces. I know that the European war impinges on every domestic issue, but I don't believe it rules out completely the possibility of doing something about that man who has been out of work or out of land so long that he will soon be fit for nothing but tinder for a demagogue's inflammatory breath.

The fact that the do-nothing psychology of an election year is likely to be extended until the war is settled one way or another makes it all the more imperative to build fires under politicians and carry on the job of clarifying and defining and acting upon domestic issues.

It may be, of course, that the dogmatists of the left will turn out to be right. Perhaps it is impossible to extend the limits of economic democracy peacefully, even though they have been extended in the past. One thing, however, is sure: the chances grow slighter as time goes on.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Mr. Mencken's Cranford

HAPPY DAYS: 1880-1892. By H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

THIS bright and aromatic memoir, emerging from the Menckendämmerung that for a decade has shrouded the fire-eating and fire-striking angers of its author's prime, will doubtless confirm in the minds of his baiters and nay-sayers the backsliding reaction of his latter-day views on politics, progress, and literature. The more so since "Happy Days" is offered without apologies as recording the childhood, "placid, secure, uneventful, and happy," of "a larva of the comfortable and complacent bourgeoisie," who was "encapsulated in affection and kept fat, saucy, and contented"; as having "no psychological, sociological, or politico-economic significance"; as the testimony of a man who, though his "days of work have been spent . . . in recording the current scene, usually in a far from acquiescent spirit," must now admit that he has "found existence on this meanest of planets extremely amusing, and, taking one day with another, perfectly satisfactory."

The glow of serene and chuckling affection that bathes the ensuing twenty chapters will thus be taken by all well-equipped psychologists as a more than adequate explanation of the fury with which Mr. Mencken once laid about him against every threat of smugness and puritanism that endangered his birthright. He has never lost the verve and exhilaration that came to him as his portion of the German-American Gemütlichkeit of Baltimore. His pages show that he neither lived that life nor was felled at an early age by the "terrific impact" of "Huckleberry Finn" in vain. Obviously no later standards of mental harmony or high seriousness could equal those of his life's first decade. If those first years gave him his zest for the good life they also gave him his sense of the bad: of every spurious dogmatism, inhibition, maggot of reform, and self-righteous theory of existence that rose to chide the well-fed Americanism of his boyhood. He tells us that his early Sunday-school tutelage by the Reverend Sylvanus Stall, D. D., didn't take; that this famous moral hygienist's "What a Young Boy Ought to Know" was wasted on his ears. It may, however, be the irony of Mr. Mencken's old age to have his happiest book used not merely as an opportunity for dreadful pointings of the finger by social and economic moralists but for a fresh "explosion of the Freudian ammunition dump of horrors" by those to whom every detail of these pages, from their doughnut and pancake orgies to their tribal fear of cops, will uncover symptoms of bourgeois decadence never dreamed of in the complacent philosophy of the Mencken household.

"This," said Mr. Eliot lately of a piece of self-portraiture by Byron, "strikes me as a masterpiece of self-analysis, but of a self that is largely a deliberate fabrication—a fabrication that is only completed in the actual writing of the lines. The reason why Byron understood this self so well is that it is largely his own invention; and it is only the self that he invented that he understood perfectly." As much, for what it says for and against the methods of romantic self-regard, might be said of Mr. M. But all solemn issues aside, it must be impossible for anyone to read this immensely enjoyable book and not be grateful that here is at least one example of modern memory that is unburdened by dreary and boring efforts to extract the last drop of moral and deterministic juice from one's youthful fragments; one piece of autobiography in which neurotic portents are left for others to decide instead of being laid on in thick slabs of significance by the trowel of an uneasy vanity; one book of social history whose writing is as clear as water and a credit to the tradition of Mark Twain. It should remind us, against whatever doubts may persist about Mr. Mencken's reactionary excesses, his aesthetic crudities, or his philosophical light-handedness, that he remains one of the few authentic and creative historians of our national manners and folkways. From the early Baltimore Sun days down through "The Book of Prefaces," the books of "Prejudices," and the satirical heyday of the American Mercury to the latest edition of "The American Language," he has offset his crochets, blind spots, and obtuse literary loyalties by his instinctive feeling for vulgar health and realism, by his unmatched skill in nailing the oddities and idiocies of our folk mind and speech, by the humorous spirit he brought to journalism, by the healthy and evocative sympathies that now quicken the dimmest trivia of pre-war America and should quicken again the sadly enfeebled common sense of the present hour.

Mencken's eclipse in American cultural circles is a necessary preliminary to rediscovering his real place and office in twentieth-century life. When that fact reemerges, the lively validity of his best work will not only excuse the bluntness of his insights and the decided limitations of his judgment, but will reveal the fresh air he let in on our human and social relations, the relief he brought to our aesthetic and cultural suffocation, his honorable disgust, as Scott Fitzgerald recently recalled, "for what passed as criticism before he arrived and made his public," and "his bravery and his tremendous and profound love of letters." These services it is compulsory to remember, by a reviewer of differing loyalties no less than by "the jackals who are already tearing at what they imprudently regard as a moribund lion" and who cannot remember, with Fitzgerald's creditable justice, the attitude Mencken once brought "to any new effort by a new man."

Mencken's attitude toward new efforts and new men was unstable but it was his own; it was honest and vigorous; and however moribund he has allowed it to become in his public offices, it serves him here in the resurrection of his twelve first and angel years. One's immediate hope is that he will proceed to give us his next twelve, of adolescence and journalistic apprenticeship; and his next twelve, of Sun labors, political satire, and the Huneker era; and especially his next twelve, of bugbear-baiting and literary championing during one of the most colorful and demented prospecting periods in our history. One's second hope is that he will bring the same salt of sense and charm to leaven their gaseous pretensions. No one who ever shared even a small part of the heroic age of "Happy Days" will miss the beauty of his trophies, from the family rites of Christmas morning to the festivals of F. Knapp's Institute, from summer days on the Patapsco River to the discovery of "The Moose Hunters" in the Chatterbox, and from music lessons on the Stieff square at the hands of a roving damsel who mentioned "three sharps" or "five flats" but never a key, to the little girl with a piano solo at the school picnic who was "invariably drowned out by a freight train of the Pennsylvania Railroad, which ran only a few blocks away." They are impaled here infallibly on the pins of his wit, and their special honor is that they merit their place among the classic relics of American life, whose full context was displayed in "The American Language." MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Portrait of Hitler

THE VOICE OF DESTRUCTION. By Hermann Rauschning. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.75.

THE author of "The Revolution of Nihilism" reports in his newest volume the conversations which he, as a high official of the Nazi Party and president of the Free City of Danzig, had with Hitler in the years from 1932 till 1935. He assures us that he "jotted them down under the immediate influence of what he had heard." But even if in the process of making Hitler's unprintable verbiage printable, not to speak of the difficulty of translating it into readable English, the emphasis may have been changed here or there, the report in no wise contradicts our knowledge of Hitler and his politics as it has come to us from other sources—Hitler's own writing, his public speeches, and most important of all his actions. Yet the author is mistaken when he states in his foreword that "only in exclusive circles is it known what Hitler really intends and what National Socialism is." He need only have read the German weeklies the Tagebuch and the Weltbühne during the years when he was an intimate of Hitler to realize that not everybody was fooled. Even before Hitler, with the help of the Rauschnings, came to power, Carl von Ossietzki, Leopold Schwarzschild, Conrad Heiden, Rudolf Olden—to name only a few independent writers—without having the advantage of belonging to the exclusive circles of the Nazi Party, told who Hitler was and what his aims were and are. They told the truth in time and never believed for a second—as Herr Rauschning did—that the Communists had burned the Reichstag. He also seems to overestimate the news value of his recollections when he writes: "To have published these conversations only six months ago would have earned me at that time an accusation of malicious invention and defamation." Or is he thinking of the English and French Rauschnings who cherished at Munich and for some time afterward his own illusions of 1932?

The real value of "The Voice of Destruction" lies rather in the fact that its author is able to confirm as an insider, by means of a hundred characteristic and convincing details, what could be deduced before only from circumstantial evidence. And the report has another and very fascinating virtue: it gives the most vivid and most comprehensive character sketch yet drawn of Hitler. So plastic becomes his personality and so clear the workings of his mind that in reading this volume one often imagines oneself sitting opposite the Führer in the Berlin chancellery or behind the glass walls of the Berchtesgaden mountain retreat. One also learns to know more intimately such second-string Nazi leaders as Förster, Himmler, Röhm, or the bourgeois backers and allies of Hitler like Herr von Neurath. And one realizes Hitler's superiority in good and evil over all of them. In spite of the great tragedy under discussion one is often tempted to laugh aloud at the cunning advice Hitler gave to the perplexed president of the Danzig senate, who associated with pogromists and expected them to behave like law-abiding citizens.

Rauschning restates his theory of the Nazi movement as the revolution of "nihilism." Yet one feels this time even more strongly than before that he is describing, at best, surface phenomena. He calls National Socialism now the "St. Vitus's dance of the twentieth century." As descriptions of the hysterical aspects of Hitler and his politics such phrases may be accepted, but they are of little help if one attempts to diagnose the sickness which has shaken Europe, and not Europe alone, since the beginning of the twentieth century. It would not be necessary to stress this point in a review of a work which does not deal with the causes of Hitlerism but merely presents, and this with admirable skill, the personality and lack of principle of its leader if Rauschning's books did not tend to arouse escapists of all sorts to a frenzy about the desirability of morality instead of making them thoughtful about the forces which give scope to Hitler's, and for that matter Stalin's, immorality and transform it into forces from which the whole world suffers.

Herr Rauschning has come a long way since the day when he joined the Nazi Party. The shock of his disillusionment transformed him into a first-rank anti-Nazi. It also made him a first-rate writer. One looks forward with great expectations to his next work. It will show whether he is able to make a constructive step or whether he will again join the well-bred bankrupt conservatives who gave Hitler Germany and almost gave him Europe as well.

FRANZ HOELLERING

Business and Government

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMIC LIFE. DEVELOPMENT AND CURRENT ISSUES OF AMERICAN PUBLIC POLICY. Volume I. By Leverett S. Lyon, Myron W. Watkins, and Victor Abramson. The Brookings Institution. $3.

ONE could wish there were some law compelling everyone who participates in the current fad of denouncing New Deal "interference" in business to read and assimilate this first volume of the Brookings Institution's comprehensive study of public policy with respect to economic life. The chances are that few of them will. Its 490 pages of closely packed analysis are not easy reading. Nor would their content be particularly agreeable to those whose minds are already made up on these fundamental issues. Yet it is an extraordinarily important and timely book And it is extraordinarily well done.

The volume traces the evolution of governmental policy toward our economic relationships from colonial times to the present day. It covers, successively, governmental procedures implementing private enterprise—those that affect business organization, bankruptcy, patent rights, and monetary policy—the regulation of private enterprise, and governmental policies toward labor. At the conclusion of each section the issues now on the frontier of public concern are thoroughly explored.

As might be suspected, the government's interest in economic affairs is by no means a new one. Certain established policies are traced back to our colonial period and from there to English common law. This is not to say that profound changes have not taken place in governmental policy since the founding of the Union. Changes of great significance are shown to have occurred, but few of them have emerged full-blown within the past six years. Most of them had their roots in the development of large-scale industry. Early American policy toward business is shown to have been almost completely dominated by the doctrines of individual enterprise then current. During the early nineteenth century it was strongly influenced by the popular idea that private enterprise was "natural" and therefore desirable, while government regulation was "artificial." This does not mean that the government was wholly passive with regard to business. On the contrary, it had a fairly vigorous program for implementing business and removing the obstacles to competition. And throughout the entire period there was some recognition of the fact that the community as a whole had certain interests which must be protected by the government. This responsibility became increasingly heavy as the impersonal corporation gained a dominant role in economic enterprise. Special consideration is given in this book to the as yet unsolved problems growing out of the separation of ownership and control in the modern corporation. It is recognized that the solution of these problems must inevitably lead to a further extension of government control over economic life.

A similar extension of governmental regulation is implied in the discussion of industrial combinations and the activities of trade associations. More striking, however, is the growing sense of public responsibility for the maintenance of "fair" standards of business behavior. Even in this field government activity is by no means new but is rooted in the common law which was taken over from England. The establishment of the Federal Trade Commission a quarter of a century ago has resulted, however, in the development of a brand-new philosophy of trade which is more applicable to modern conditions. Many of the commission's activities have been directed toward preventing the inaccurate branding of products, but not, in most cases, in order to protect the consumer. That is a field in which governmental regulation has scarcely begun. The commission's mandate has extended only to stopping misbranding which injured legitimate competitors. But there are indications that a social conscience is being developed which will demand regulation of a much more far-reaching and socially defensible character.

The section on labor policy is particularly penetrating and objective. Most earlier governmental activities are shown to have been, for obvious reasons, restrictive of organized labor. But in recent years there has been a growing disposition to recognize the legitimacy of certain basic labor rights. These have been defined and implemented, for the first time, in the Wagner Act. Efforts of employers to have that act amended to give them the same right to try to influence workers with respect to their union affiliations are shown to be directed against the underlying philosophy of the act, as, indeed, are most proposals to "equalize" the act. In its final two or three pages, the book touches upon an issue which is basic to the entire discussion. Justice Holmes is quoted as suggesting that the machine technique has made inevitable the trend toward increased governmental control of large-scale combinations; this truth would seem abundantly documented in the preceding pages of the book. Yet the implications of this important fact for the future are ignored. If the study is to have the influence it deserves, this omission should be remedied in the second volume.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Cousin from Australia

BERNARD'S BRETHREN. By C. M. Shaw. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

IN THE most exciting plays there generally turns up near the end a cousin from Australia who in a few innocent words sets everybody right. In the life of George Bernard Shaw—which in many ways resembles a play—this incident has not failed to happen. Charles MacMahon Shaw, of Melbourne, Australia, has turned up, with a smile on his face and a manuscript under his arm. It is the manuscript, now printed as "Bernard's Brethren," that sets everybody right.

If you are in doubt about what the aboriginal Shaw was doing when the Life Force got under way, if you wish to know how real live Shaws sat for pen-portraits by Shakespeare, Sir Walter Scott, and W. S. Gilbert (O Captain Shaw), if it would amuse you to learn how many Shaws have been shot, hanged, and deported in the course of a long and honorable family history, with a few details on their finances and tastes in drinks, if, in short, you have been thinking all this while that G. B. S. was an original product of the nineteenth century—Shelley reincarnated and bent on making everybody drink water and eat chlorophyll—then read the cousin-from-Australia's book.

It is a beautifully got-up thing, with interleavings printed in red for George Bernard's comments on Cousin Charles's inaccuracies, perverted judgments, and occasional incoherence. Not that these foibles are characteristic of the Antipodean Shaw, or that the Dublin Ditto is hard on his cousin. Indeed, the statements and counter-statements provide an interesting comparison between the customary attitudes about trivial matters of a genius and a respectable citizen of more than average intelligence.

Once Cousin Charles has got over imagining that he is taking his life in his hands in writing the book, he becomes a fascinator in his own right and almost makes us wish for more. His chapter on Fanny Cashel Hoey—another literary connection of the Shaws—is a top-notch piece of exposition and literary criticism. And throughout the volume, when he lets himself go and doesn't refer to his "battered old typewriter"—a doubtful verbal asset which should be written off, since it certainly cannot be written on—he displays genuine Shavian wit. The quality is a rare one to find in such a tentacular genealogist. Which reminds me: where in all these illustrious kinsmen, including Marshal MacMahon, one time President of France, are Robert Gould Shaw of Civil War fame, the Mikado's Katishaw, and that most appealing of all figures, the Shaw of Persia?

JACQUES BARZUN

Shorter Notices

FINLAND. By J. Hampden Jackson. The Macmillan Company. $2.

This book is heartily recommended to those who suspect that the truth about Finland is to be found neither in uncritical eulogies of "a brave little people" nor in ferocious smears dictated in Moscow. For it is a study in black and white which tells the story of Finland's years of independence without slurring over the dark spots while giving due credit to the Finnish ability to shake off reaction and follow the paths of progress. In addition it provides a brief but useful sketch of the country's history prior to 1918 and an account of social conditions which helps us to understand why Finnish peasants and workers are looking Moscow's stalking horse, Mr. Kuusinnen, very sternly in the mouth. It should be made plain, perhaps, that this book was written, and published in England, in 1938 and has not been revised to include the events immediately preceding the present war.

PAGES FROM A WORKER'S LIFE. By William Z. Foster. International Publishers. $2.50.

A collection of stories from Foster's experience arranged under seven headings: work, sailing-ship days, hoboing, strikes, enemy agents, prison life, party life. Inferior as autobiography since the arrangement of material shows no relation between experience and either character or political development. Much magnificent short-story material frequently marred by poor story-telling. Fresh data on hobo techniques. A source book for Foster's future biographer. An injustice, as it stands, to one of America's greatest organizers.

STALIN and HITLER

The Reasons for and the Results of
THE NAZI-BOLSHEVIK PACT

a new 10c booklet
by Louis Fischer

To thousands of liberal Americans, August 23, 1939, was the darkest moment of the post-war years. On that day Soviet Russia signed its pact with Nazi Germany. There were long hours of mingled disbelief and disappointment; then came the realization that an era of faith and hope had ended. What was the story behind the pact? What had happened inside Russia—and outside—to make the alliance possible? What did the event augur for the future of the Western world?

These are the questions that Louis Fischer weighs in this 64-page booklet. While a small part of this material has already appeared in The Nation, Mr. Fischer has added many fresh facts and more detailed documentation. Probably no contemporary journalist is better equipped to discuss the issues. Fischer covered Moscow for twelve years. In his dispatches to The Nation during that period—1924 to 1936—the observations of the keen reporter were presented with the perspective of the historian. By reason of Mr. Fischer's background and training, his analysis of the pact is not only exciting as journalism but important as history.

Give copies to your friends at these reduced prices—

Let us mail them for you without extra charge at the reduced prices for large quantities or at the single copy price. Send us your list —today!

Single copies........10c each
50 copies or more.....9c each
100 copies or more....8c each
250 copies or more....7c each
500 copies or more....6c each
1,000 copies or more...5c each

ORDER FORM

THE NATION 55 Fifth Avenue New York City
3-2-40

I inclose $.............. for .... copies of Louis Fischer's booklet, "Stalin and Hitler."

☐ Send copies to the names on the list attached
OR ☐ Send copies to me.

Name..
Address..
....

DRAMA

Could You and I Conspire

CLIFFORD ODETS'S "Night Music," performed at the Broadhurst by the Group Theater's excellent company, is not, I think, one of the best of its author's plays, but it is at least a lively and interesting production which ought to set at rest the fears of those who have been saying that Mr. Odets was growing conventional and conservative in method if not in philosophy. The new piece is fantastic, episodic, and explosive. It is also, despite bitter and protestant overtones, predominantly comic, and if taken in conjunction with two other recent plays might be signalized as part of still another "new movement." First-night wags were trying out phrases like "The Time of Mr. Odets's Life," and it is likely enough that I am not the first to suggest that another good title would be "Two Others on the Same Island." Nor are these mild jokes wholly inappropriate. It is not merely that the Messrs. Saroyan, Rice, and Odets have all abandoned realism for a sort of romantic extravaganza and that the two last have also abandoned realistic staging, but also that all three have adopted the same theme—namely, the triumph of youthful spirits over the confusions and cruelties of contemporary life. The differences—and they are surely considerable —are chiefly differences of temperament. Mr. Odets's angry defiance and his recurrent determination that his characters shall devote themselves to the task of doing something drastic about this sorry scheme of things are not the same as either Mr. Rice's amiable optimism or Mr. Saroyan's romantic primitivism, but all three come out at pretty much the same place. Boy meets girl, and, taking that fact into consideration, life is worth living after all. Perhaps it is also worth pointing out that all three feel the need for a deus to lend a hand with word and deed. Mr. Rice provides a hard-bitten man of the world who gives advice and pours champagne at the end. Mr. Saroyan, going the whole way as usual, introduces the mysterious Joe, who acts suspiciously like God himself. Mr. Odets gives us a kindly detective who follows the two innocents about and supplies whatever comments the hero himself is not able to give. For a taste of his quality one might cite the scene in which he squelches the protest of the heroine's father, who cannot understand why his daughter does not see that it is her duty to return with him to safety and Philadelphia. "The only function of parents," says the detective, "is to render themselves unnecessary."

"Night Music," to be more specific, deals with the fantastic and frequently farcical adventures of an unhappy young man sent from Hollywood to fetch two trained monkeys but held in New York over a week-end by events which are beyond his control but which he is desperately sure will cost him his job. He is a bumptious and self-pitying young man with, as one of the characters remarks, "the temper of a crocodile and only half its charm." But he is bumptious only because he is frightened and because he is reminded so frequently and so effectively that, bluster as he will, everyone knows that he is nobody and everyone knows that he knows it. As a whole "Night Music" is centripetal; it explodes, often brilliantly, in all directions—perhaps it would not be inaccurate to say that it is in impulse lyrical rather than dramatic—but the character of this superficially unpleasant young man serves to bring it to some kind of focus, probably because he is plainly a kind of mouthpiece for the author's feelings if not for his thoughts. It is also this young man who finally articulates the theme. His girl makes some comment on the singing of the crickets. "Why shouldn't they sing," he says. "They've got nothing to worry about. But we can sing through any night."

It is hardly necessary any more to say that a production by the Group Theater is extremely well acted. Elia Kazan is well-nigh perfect as the bumptious young man and so is Morris Carnovsky as the detective. All the other parts are also very well played, including that of the heroine, undertaken by an actress new to the group, Jane Wyatt, who is attractive and appealing.

"Reunion in New York" (Little Theater) is the new entertainment provided by the group of exiles who last year gave a similar performance called "From Vienna." The company seems already more at home in both the American language and the American idiom, and there are three or four excellent satiric numbers as well as a general atmosphere of pleasant informality. Lotta Goslar's dances are always amusing. I should also single out the illustrated lecture on the kinds of laughter and the scene in the gallery of modern art.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

READERS keep wanting to know whether the New York Post records were made by "the world's greatest orchestras and the world's greatest conductors," whether they are as good as the regular-priced records, whether they are good value for the Post price. With one exception, which I will speak of later, the records were made by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy and the New York Philharmonic under Reiner. Some of the performances, then, have greater precision and finish than others; and, as on more expensive records, the performances vary in interpretative understanding and effectiveness. Good are the Mozart, Schubert, Wagner, Debussy's "Fêtes," the first two movements of the Franck, the first three movements of the Tschaikovsky (if one excepts an occasional fussiness in phrasing); poor are the last movements of the Franck and Tschaikovsky, the Beethoven, the Brahms, the Bach; and the performances of Debussy's "Nuages" and "L'après-midi d'un faune," the most beautiful in tone, are in a lush style that I do not consider good.

The recording of all these performances is inferior to the best that can be done nowadays—this, I take it, being Victor's way of making value correspond to price (surfaces, however, are quiet). The Schubert and Beethoven recordings are clear without present-day brilliance; the Mozart, Bach, Wagner, Tschaikovsky, and Franck are brilliant without present-day refinement of sonority and balance; the Brahms

64 TO 1
You're right with LAFAYETTE'S Radio Line

Is it a portable? . . table model for office, den or "upstairs" . . . car radio . . . magnificent phono-combination? Lafayette has it. 64 distinct—and distinctive—models to choose from. All different in style and purpose, yet alike in this: dollar for dollar, Lafayette is finer in tone, superior in performance, greater in value than any other radio of your acquaintance. We invite you to visit our showroom nearest you for convincing proof of this statement. Or write for free catalog. You can spend more, but you cannot buy a better value than Lafayette.

LAFAYETTE RADIO
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
24 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

THE LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
Invites you to a Dinner-Discussion
The Relationship of Power to Justice in a Socialized Society
Speaker: REINHOLD NIEBUHR
at the
PARKSIDE HOTEL, 18 Gramercy Park
Wednesday, MARCH 6 at 7 P. M.
Ticket: $1.10 Make reservations in advance
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
112 East 19th Street New York City

Indispensable for a clear understanding of Nazi methods used to gain dominance over smaller states to the South, East and West of the Axis.

Prologue To War
by ELIZABETH WISKEMANN

Miss Wiskemann with her customary clarity and brilliance examines each country that has fallen prey to Pan-German aspirations. She first describes its general historical structure and then proceeds to analyze Nazi methods of penetration in both the racial and economic spheres from the Baltic to the Balkans and from Denmark to Switzerland.

The section on Switzerland is perhaps the clearest presentation we have had of the resistance of this multi-racial, and really democratic state to Nazi pressure. $3.00

At All Booksellers

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, 114 Fifth Avenue, New York City

Was Marx Wrong?

This week The Nation prints the last of three articles by Lewis Corey, called "Marxism Reconsidered." Mr. Corey not only finds the Marxist parties—both Communist and Socialist varieties—a failure, but he challenges some of the basic premises of Marx himself.

●

What do the Marxist leaders of America say?

Read Their Answers---

NORMAN THOMAS
for the Socialists
EARL BROWDER
for the Communists
MAX SHACHTMAN
for the Socialist Workers (Trotskyists)
BERTRAM D. WOLFE
for the Independent Labor League (Lovestoneites)
ALGERNON LEE
for the Social-Democratic Federation

All in next week's issue of
THE Nation

MAIL YOUR SUBSCRIPTION TODAY

THE NATION ▪ 55 Fifth Avenue ▪ New York
3-2-40
Special Introductory Offer to New Readers
13 Weeks for $1.

Regular Rates—1 Year $5 2 Years $8 3 Years $11

For the inclosed $...................... please enter my Nation subscription for .... (term).

Name...

Address...
Additional postage per year: Canadian, 50c; Foreign, $1 is excessively coarse in tone and unclear in texture; the Debussy has the refinement the others lack, but in "Fêtes" the muted trumpets at the beginning of the procession and at the very end of the piece were not recorded so as to sound magically distant as they do on Stokowski's record.

Haydn's Symphony No. 99 was recorded by the little orchestra of the New Friends of Music under Stiedry; and performance and recording make this one of the best sets in the Post series—which is not to say that it is the equal of the Columbia set with its finer recording of the more beautiful sound of the London Philharmonic and Beecham's phrasing.

Feuermann is a greater 'cellist than the member of the Busch-Serkin Trio whom he was called in to substitute for at a recent New Friends of Music concert; but two members of a group like the Busch-Serkin Trio playing with a stranger do not exhibit the ease and freedom and incandescent ensemble execution born of the mutual understanding, the unanimity of feeling and purpose which the three members of the Trio have from years of playing together. In this situation Messrs. Busch, Serkin, and Feuermann fell back on vigor, with which they were able to cover up defects of ensemble performance in Beethoven's Trio Opus 70 No. 1 but not in Mozart's Trio K. 548; and I don't recall hearing from a pianist of Serkin's eminence anything as heavy-handed, graceless, and insensitive as his phrasing of the Mozart slow movement. He did better playing in Mozart's Concerto K. 271 with the National Orchestral Association, but playing which did not have the sharpness, sparkle, and wit of Gieseking's in the Columbia recording, and which made it clear that Serkin is a pianist who cannot do for music in the classical style what he can do for Brahms.

For its first public concert of its own the Primrose Quartet chose a curious program of unfamiliar and inferior music: Haydn's "Seven Last Words of Christ" and Smetana's Quartet in E minor. It turned out that the Haydn, largely for solo violin with string accompaniment, exhibited the beautiful playing and phrasing of the group's first violin, Oscar Shumsky, while the Smetana provided solo passages in which one heard some rasping sounds from William Primrose's viola and some fine playing by the 'cellist, Harvey Schapiro. Also, the Haydn exhibited at length the group's beautifully blended and inflected tone in piano and pianissimo; but above forte the tone became rough and lusterless and sometimes departed from pitch.

As for Milstein's recital, he is a virtuoso, but as such he is unusual in possessing the good musical instincts which enabled him to give an excellent performance of the Vivaldi sonata and a good one—even if not the one a great artist would have given—of the Bach Chaconne, but which did not prevent him from tearing through the Beethoven sonata.

B. H. HAGGIN

[We regret that through an unfortunate error The Nation carried in its last issue notices of two books which are not yet available. Susan Glaspell's "The Morning Is Near Us" will be published on March 20; "Aretino: Scourge of Princes," by Thomas Caldecot Chubb, on March 8.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Letters to the Editors

Refugee Enterprises

Dear Sirs: Many of the compassionate friends of the European refugees in this country urge them to leave the overcrowded cities and seek the small towns, where they will have a better chance to start a new life. But Robert Lynd, the author of "Middletown," surely a competent adviser in this matter, foresees that immigrants coming from an intellectualized and complicated environment might encounter difficulties in the adjustment to a more primitive milieu. For this reason, if for no other, no enforced placement of the refugees, such as was suggested by a prominent immigrant to this country some time ago, can be considered a desirable solution.

Other reasons are found, however, in the financial status of the refugees now entering this country. Whereas until two years ago many of the emigrants were well to do and were allowed to take with them at least part of their property, there is now a stampede of people running for their naked lives. This second wave of immigrants, comprising Jews from Vienna, Czechoslovakia, and Poland, is a problem for the resettlement program because neither the few who have a little capital of their own nor the many who have nothing but business initiative or specific technical knowledge can solve their very great difficulties by their own strength alone.

Erich Warburg, a member of the internationally known family of bankers, now a leading spirit in the field of refugee service, has recently pointed to the opportunities offered to the immigrant by small business and small industry. However, very definite opportunities have to be found, and when found have to be investigated and appraised. Many of the immigrants who have a little money are so aware of their ignorance of the conditions and technique of business in this country that they vacillate between the fear of losing their last reserves by bad investments and the dread of having to eat them up. The rash ones often lose their capital very quickly. Those who possess nothing except business initiative or some special skill struggle, mostly in vain, to obtain financial assistance. These are the ones that form the long queues in the offices of various refugee organizations, filling out endless questionnaires.

One or two small endowments have as their special purpose financial assistance to immigrants in the way of capitalization of small enterprises. Much more is needed—above all, a well-planned, constructive policy based on sufficient loan funds and carried out by a business organization with the cooperation of refugee organizations and public authorities. In England two years ago the government established in connection with the Board of Trade a bureau with the task of examining the various refugee proposals for new enterprises. Under the auspices of this bureau, aided by the local authorities, many plants in the so-called "distressed areas" were reopened for the manufacture of specialties, some of which had heretofore had to be imported. Several hundred enterprises, most of them quite new to England, have been established, and more than 15,000 British workers, reputedly more than the total number of permanent immigrants admitted to England, have found employment. In the United States the establishment of new business enterprises is not a matter of government control, but a more fertile cooperation with local banks and credit organizations could surely be established by a business organization having as its sole program the directing and financing of resettlement.

The ideal form for such an organization would be an endowed foundation. The experience of institutions with similar purposes may encourage social-minded capitalists. If properly managed, such foundations are not only able to preserve their capital in a revolving investment cycle but even to increase it. Many of the Polish refugees could give reports of what had been accomplished in the way of agricultural resettlement in former Austrian Poland with the help of the Baron de Hirsch Foundation. To preserve their capital, to see it used in a way that would be a blessing for thousands of now distressed but worthy individuals, to take the lead in a field of activity which is of greatest importance in the life of the nation—might that not be a most attractive goal for owners of "idle money"?

VICTOR HELLER

Forest Hills, N. Y., February 21

Imperfect Alternatives

Dear Sirs: I wish to congratulate you on the article by Reinhold Niebuhr that was printed in The Nation of January 20. Mr. Niebuhr's argument that in the United States today we do not have the privilege of choosing between ideal international policies but must choose among imperfect alternatives is a view that, elementary as it is, needs somehow to be got into the consciousness of Americans and especially into the consciousness of American liberals. No better commentary on our present confused state of mind could be made than that clarification of this point at the present time is of basic importance.

I wish to carry Mr. Niebuhr's argument a little farther. In my opinion, there is no possibility that this country can follow indefinitely a policy of isolation. We must consider what our situation will be if Germany and Russia, one or the other or both, emerge victorious from the present conflict. Will this country be able to maintain peaceful relations with a Nazi or Communist or Nazi-Communist Europe? More particularly, have American liberals come to the point where they are in favor of a peaceful policy toward nations which exemplify everything that has been abhorrent to liberals in the past?

I, for one, am convinced that in the present European conflict we must sooner or later choose one side or the other. Though the governments and economies of France, England, and Finland are perhaps not the best possible, yet they are so much better than the ones to which they stand opposed, they are so much more in accord with our own, that we shall sooner or later support them rather than see them fall.

At present, France, England, and Finland do not need our men. If we supply them with all the armaments, munitions, and supplies that they need, they can almost certainly win the war. Nothing could be more shortsighted and contemptible than our present policy of requiring payment in cash. What will be the value of this gold when we have it all in vaults in this country? Whatever our interest in the present European struggle, one thing is certain: this interest cannot be measured by gold. If we do not send supplies and furnish credits so that these may be secured as needed, Russia by sheer weight of numbers will overrun Finland and within the next year or two France and England may be faced with the prospect of defeat. When this situation develops, it is very likely that we shall become seriously concerned, and then armaments, munitions, and supplies will not be enough. Then we shall have to send men as well.

There probably is not much time left to make choices calmly, to shape policies carefully, to achieve by positive, intelligent action the ends that the overwhelming majority of the country certainly desires—namely, defeat of Hitler and Stalin and peace with the least loss in the shortest time. If this country does not adopt the policy here suggested, which admittedly is not an ideal one, it may later be faced with the necessity of following a course which will be far worse. W. T. COUCH

Chapel Hill, N. C., February 19

"Cultural" Intimacies

Dear Sirs: Archibald MacLeish, in donning the mantle of prophet (The Art of the Good Neighbor in The Nation of February 10) apparently has allowed the urgency of his message to overbalance his sense of logic.

He suggests that North America must fear the development of closer "cultural relations" between Nazi Germany and the nations of the southern continent more than an economic struggle for markets. Yet he admits that thus far the cultural intimacy of South America with Western Europe has been largely with Paris. And, further, he himself stresses the influence of the "small and sophisticated and discriminating jury of critics and artists and professional scholars" in Latin America. Again, obviously, the culture of Paris and the culture of the United States are from the point of view of Western democracy, closely allied.

These are, we believe, the basic premises in Mr. MacLeish's argument. But what happens to this argument under analysis? If South America refuses to accept in any great measure our American culture, will it not, on one hand, still be under the influence of Paris and consequently averse to that of Germany and other totalitarian lands? And, on the other hand, will not the sensitivity and intelligence of our Latin neighbors enable them to perceive the emptiness of Nazi culture as compared with the culture of Paris and with democratic culture in general? Thus, using Mr. MacLeish's own premises, one must conclude that the danger for Western democratic culture is not so great. If Mr. MacLeish believes, as we do, that there is a danger, he must demonstrate it upon other grounds.

We do not attempt to deny the validity of Mr. MacLeish's contention that it is necessary to persuade Latin America that Hollywood and the tabloids do not represent the total of North American culture. But while persuading and prophesying it might not be amiss to develop the argument more stringently; possibly the road to better "cultural relations" might thereby be smoothed. HARRY W. BASEHART
SEYMOUR RIKLIN

Chicago, February 22

And Still They Come

Dear Sirs: Congratulations and greetings on the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of The Nation. In critical examination of current events, in studied analysis of social thought, and action, The Nation stands pre-eminently as the most consistent, objective, and liberal magazine in the world today.

It has treated the acute problems of the Negro people with a generosity and earnestness that should be exemplary to other so-called liberal publications. It represents the most vital force, and perhaps the only redeeming feature, in our democracy.

Chicago METZ T. P. LOCHARD

Dear Sirs: As a frequent contributor to The Nation in its older management, and in appreciation of Mr. Villard and the tradition he represents in the present continuity, I send greetings and good wishes on the occasion of the anniversary. JOSEPH JASTROW

Stockbridge, Mass.

Dear Sirs: Somewhat belatedly I should like to add my word of congratulation on The Nation's seventy-fifth anniversary.

I cannot remember just when my reading of The Nation began. I am under the impression that it was in Canada some years before I came to this country on New Year's Day, 1919, with the intention of becoming an American citizen. I do know that during the eighteen years of my editorship here in Boston, first of the Congregationalist and then of its successor, the Advance, The Nation has been a constant medium of information and reference.

The Nation would not be the free-minded organ of inquiry and discussion that it is if one did not find oneself frequently at variance with some expression in its editorial or contributed columns. But one always looks to it for honesty of judgment and integrity of record, according to the writer's viewpoint. A paper managed and edited upon that basis will always be a source of inspiration and encouragement to journalists, either in the secular or in the religious field, who are endeavoring to carry on their work with that same high ideal in mind.

Boston WILLIAM GILROY

CONTRIBUTORS

ALLAN A. MICHIE is coauthor of a recently published book called "Dixie Demagogues."

ERNEST DAVIES is a British writer who has long been associated with the Labor Party. Last year he was adopted as labor candidate for Enfield.

LEWIS COREY is the author of "The Decline of American Capitalism," "The House of Morgan," and "The Crisis of the Middle Class."

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL is the editor of an anthology of "Literary Opinion in America."

FRANZ HOELLERING was formerly editor of the Arbeiter Illustrierte Zeitung, and on the editorial staff of the Ullstein publications. He is now living in this country.

JACQUES BARZUN, assistant professor of history at Columbia University, is the author of "Culture in the Democracy" and "Of Human Freedom."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave,, New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY : MARCH 9, 1940 NUMBER 10

The Shape of Things

THE RED ARMY CLAIMS THAT IT IS NOW closing in on Viipuri from three sides, but the Finns, while admitting a slow retreat, declare that the enemy will yet pay dearly for its ruins. It is not clear, moreover, whether the capture of this city will enable the Russians to outflank the remainder of the Mannerheim Line, or whether they will still face defenses comparable to those that forced them to spend three months in advancing fifty miles. But while the Finns are still far from conquered, their situation is inevitably deteriorating. Nor will the loan which has been granted by the Export-Import Bank do a great deal to turn the tide. It does give Finland command of credit here, but before it can be translated into the planes and guns which are the most urgent necessity, Finland must go through the time-consuming process of finding markets for the non-military goods to the purchase of which the loan is restricted. As a gesture from a great and secure democracy to a small one fighting for existence, the device adopted by the Administration and Congress for helping Finland appears neither very heroic nor very generous. Nor does it provide very substantial backing for the rumored efforts of our Ambassador in Moscow, Laurence A. Steinhardt, to persuade the Soviet government to call a halt and attempt to negotiate peace. Now that they have seized so much of the Karelian Isthmus, the Russians cannot claim that Leningrad is in danger, and the Finns, whose hopes of really adequate assistance from outside have dwindled, might now be willing to meet demands at which they formerly balked. Of course, if Stalin is determined to enthrone Kuusinen in Helsinki, no peace is possible, but in view of Soviet losses and dangers threatening elsewhere, it might be worth while to discover that this comrade is a Trotskyite and liquidate him.

* * *

ITALY'S PROTEST TO BRITAIN AGAINST THE stoppage of coal imports from Germany, though strongly worded, is probably not to be taken too seriously. The inconveniences caused by Britain's drastic system of contraband control may give Italy grounds for complaint, but there is little, short of declaring war, that it can do about it. Transport difficulties impede the importation of coal, which is vital to Italian industry, by overland routes. Freight routes from the United States are almost prohibitive. And entry into the war on the side of Germany would complicate rather than solve the problem. So in the long run it may be assumed that Italy will have to obtain its coal in England, despite its obvious reluctance to do so. Meanwhile, Mussolini is doubtless under pressure from his axis partner to make his protests as vigorous as possible, and there is a possibility that he hopes his threats will gain for him some concesssions from Britain, such as a relaxation of contraband control. The violence of his protests may also serve, in an indirect way, to embarrass the Allied position in the Near East.

* * *

THE CASE OF GUSTAV REGLER THREATENS to mar the visage of la belle France. Regler, a victim of Hitler and a fighter against Franco, seems now to have become a victim of Daladier's concentration-camp method of dealing with anti-fascist refugees. Longmans, Green announces the coming publication of Regler's latest book, "The Great Crusade." In this work the distinguished German novelist tells the story of the International Brigades, with which he served in Spain. Why a man of his caliber and known anti-Nazi sympathies should be in a French concentration camp is beyond us, but M. Blum might add the case to his dossier on the poor publicity job the French are doing abroad.

* * *

A COMPLETELY CLOSED DOOR FOR WESTERN capital is indicated in the agreement between Japan and the Wang Ching-wei puppet government as disclosed by two of Wang's former followers. The terms of the agreement, which have not been denied in Tokyo, provide a virtual Japanese monopoly in the fields of mining, railways, aviation, telegraphs, telephone, and water and electric power. These are, almost without exception, the areas in which Western capital has been chiefly invested. Great Britain has extensive interests in mining and railways, and the United States has heavy investments in aviation, telephones, and other public utilities. Needless to say, Japan did not consult the United States or any other Western power in concluding these arrangements. They confirm our long-standing suspicion that the Japanese invasion of China, though ostensibly directed against the Chinese, was primarily an attack on American and European interests. From this standpoint, China has indeed been fighting our war, and the assistance given it has been pitifully weak and inadequate.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THANKS TO SENATOR NORRIS'S FIGHTING ability and Arthur Krock's indiscretions, the 250,000 holders of securities in the bankrupt Associated Gas and Electric system will not be at the mercy of trustees picked by A. G. and E. management and Wall Street bankers. Federal Judge Leibell's choice of Walter H. Pollak, Denis J. Driscoll, and Dr. Willard Long Thorp to manage the billion-dollar holding-company system could hardly have been bettered for competence and courage. Mr. Pollak's record as a lawyer and his reputation as a liberal inspire confidence. Dr. Thorp brings the widest knowledge of economic and financial affairs to his new assignment. He is economic adviser to the Secretary of Commerce and director of economic research for Dun and Bradstreet. Mr. Driscoll was the Congressman who brought the famous phony A. G. and E. telegrams to light in the fight over the Wheeler-Rayburn Holding Company Act; there seems to have been no small connection between his defeat for reelection and A. G. and E. enmity. He was later appointed head of the Pennsylvania Utilities Commission. In view of the calm attitude taken by the SEC toward the fact that John W. Hanes was sponsored by interests close to A. G. and E., this trio of trustees is probably better than the SEC itself would have been. Again we must thank Mr. Krock, whose column in the New York Times gave the public its first glimpse of the Hanes affair, and Senator Norris, who took up the challenge of what might have been another typical "arranged" receivership.

*

THE A. G. AND E. BANKRUPTCY COINCIDES in time with the SEC order to start the long-awaited reshuffling of holding-company systems under Section 11, the so-called "death sentence" section, of the Holding Company Act. The bankruptcy serves to remind the public of the grave evils made possible by holding-company complexities in the field of public utilities. The act itself has been criticized as a menace to property rights, but the real menace to property rights lies in the use that a smart promoter can make of holding-company devices to loot other people's property. The A. G. and E. proceedings should serve to dramatize the evils that enforcement of Section 11 may bring to an end, for a comparatively infinitesimal $500 tail wagged that huge billion-dollar dog. The Federal Trade Commission inquiry showed that Hopson's control of A. G. and E. derived from a $500 investment in a Massachusetts Mutual Trust tucked away at the top of the corporate pyramid he erected. The same potentialities, if not actualities, of abuse exist in the other holding-company systems. Electric Bond and Share and Engineers Public Service are the first systems to be tackled by the SEC. Exchange of plant or sale of stock are but two of the methods that may be used in reorganizing these huge holding-company systems into geographically integrated and economically sound systems. The investor will be protected rather than hurt by the law's enforcement.

*

AS AN EXAMPLE OF DIRTY POLITICS THE attack being made on this year's census questionnaire is hard to match. Eager to grasp any stick to beat the New Deal with, a group of Republicans are attempting to work up popular feeling by assertions that the Administration is violating the Bill of Rights by seeking information about such matters as housing conditions and unemployment. These are two problems which all political parties agree are definitely the concern of the government but in regard to which accurate and complete information is lacking. Yet objections are being raised because the census-takers are being instructed to inquire not only about the employed status of each adult but about family income. This second question is of major importance since there is reason to believe that chronic underemployment constitutes a very important part of what we call the unemployment problem. Its true extent, however, can only be gauged by asking questions about income. The housing section of the census, which seeks information about the construction of homes, appliances and services used, mortgage position, and so on, will yield facts essential for the development of housing policies. Moreover, data of this kind are needed, and have been requested, by an important group of industries which were consulted in drawing up the schedules. The American census is, in many ways, a statistical model, and the Bureau of the Census has an honorable record for efficiency and integrity. The individual returns it handles cannot be made available to any outside department. Census-taking depends on the cooperation of all the people rather than on penalties, and demagogues who for political reasons attempt to sabotage it by working on the fears of the ignorant and hysterical deserve condemnation for utter irresponsibility.

*

GENUINELY SUBVERSIVE IS THE ATTACK ON the alien in this country, for it breeds a habit of racial discrimination and a consciousness of different racial stocks that menace national unity. The American Committee for the Protection of the Foreign Born, which has just ended a two-day conference in Washington, is also protecting the American born. Time and again the entering wedge for an attack on civil liberties or trade unionism has been an attack on the foreign born. This was true in the days of the Alien and Sedition Bills under John Adams as it was true in the days of the Palmer red raids, and it is true again today. United States Commissioner of Immigration Houghteling in a letter to the conference stated that only 19,398 more aliens entered than left the country from July 1, 1930, to June 30, 1939. During the same period death reduced our unnaturalized immigrant population, most of it elderly, by 900,000. The conference launched a campaign against anti-alien measures and received a message from the President implying his general support of that campaign. Mr. Roosevelt called it one of our greatest achievements that racial groups divided by hatred abroad are united and merged into a common Americanism here. He warned that "any oppression, any injustice, any hatred, is a wedge designed to attack our civilization."

*

ONLY SIX OF THE STATES HAVE BUDGETS larger than the cost of relief in New York City, and two recent reports on its administration merit nation-wide attention, for both reveal conditions also existing elsewhere. William Hodson, the city's welfare commissioner, points out that arbitrary cuts in WPA have greatly increased the burden of relief on the city, and asks that the federal government again assume part of the cost of home relief. Washington has been too prone to believe that it has reduced unemployment and the need for relief when it has cut the WPA rolls. The Commissioner also objects that criticism of relief "is placed upon the act of giving and taking relief rather than upon the fact that millions of our workers who are ready and willing and able to work cannot find jobs." In 1934 New York saw disorders and mass protests over the city's refusal to deal with organizations of persons on relief. The Commissioner now reports that trouble of this kind has almost vanished since city officials and organizations have become used to negotiating problems in much the same way that these are handled by recognized and established trade unions. In this connection it is interesting to note that Colonel F. C. Harrington, WPA administrator in the city, reports that 13,000 skilled workers were discharged from WPA for striking against the abandonment of prevailing wages. Colonel Harrington also declares that work has been disrupted, morale lowered, and production costs on projects doubled by the loss of skilled workers under the new eighteen-month "furlough" law. We hope that progressives in Congress will fight for repeal of this provision.

OUR FAVORITE RED MENACER OF THE WEEK was Arthur J. W. Hilly, former corporation counsel of New York City. Mr. Hilly told the Order of Seville at a communion breakfast that subversive elements were trying to stop the Dies investigation and that united Catholic action was needed to fight this "evil influence which would tear Jesus Christ out of the very heart and soul of mankind." Mr. Hilly went on to express the hope that "the order's communion breakfast in 1941 will see a Democratic Mayor in office once again and the proud glories of Tammany Hall restored." Good old 100 per cent American Tammany!

"Plot" Against Hoover

THAT bulwark of civil liberties, the Hearst press, has sprung to the defense of J. Edgar Hoover. Black headlines screamed from the front pages of the New York Journal-American last week: "Plot to Smear G-Man Hoover" and "Reds 'Smear' FBI." Mr. Hoover has long been a protege of Hearst. No public figure is treated more tenderly by the Hearst newspapers than J. Edgar Hoover. The Daily Worker, the New Masses, the New Republic, The Nation, Senator Norris, and Representative Marcantonio were all linked together by the Journal-American as conspirators in this "red plot."

But Hearst's New York newspaper, and no doubt his papers in other cities, neglected to name some of the other participants in the "plot." The New York Daily News, slightly to the right of the Daily Worker, has been running some embarrassing stories on the chief G-man from Washington ("Hoover FBI Hunts Vice, with Major Crimes Unsolved") and from Miami ("J. Edgar Chases Nothing but Sun, Miami Mutters"). Mr. Hoover's "swanky cottage at the exclusive and expensive Nautilus Hotel" in Miami has drawn the fire of the Daily News, and it has asked editorially whether Congress would not be wise to investigate Mr. Hoover. The Scripps-Howard press seems to be another participant in this plot. Both Ludwell Denny and that well-known fellow-traveler, Westbrook Pegler, have been taking pot shots at the G-man. Pegler called Marcantonio a "Bolo statesman," but he coined some new Peglerisms for J. Edgar and his works. He called the G-man "a night-club fly-cop" and a publicity hound pandering to "gents'-room journalism." "He would be a great attraction," Mr. Pegler wrote, "as a keyhole columnist and log-roller, and he should be worth something at current rates, with fifteen minutes of hysterics on the air composed of unimportant and unconfirmed innuendoes about people too big and too contemptuous to talk back." Mr. Hoover had better put Mr. Pegler in that card file right away.

It happens that Mr. Hoover is a victim not of a red plot but of his own itch to publicize and dramatize himself. The Detroit and New York raids on Spanish veteran organizations so far overstepped the bounds of decency and legality as to make many people wonder about Mr. Hoover's trustworthiness as a law-enforcement officer. It sent them back to examine his little-publicized testimony in November and again in January before the House Appropriations Committee, and what they found indicated that he was prepared for a repetition of the Mitchell Palmer raids and roundups that disgraced the Department of Justice after the war. The Nation called attention to this testimony last week, and we shall have more to say of Mr. Hoover's methods later. We are glad to see that Attorney General Jackson is also alive to the danger of permitting the FBI to grow into an OGPU. "Law-enforcement officers," he said at Philadelphia the other night, "must be the first to obey the law." The secret services of both the Treasury and the Post Office seem to manage to operate with great efficiency without overstepping legality. But one never meets their directors in our niftier night spots, nor do they get their pictures in the papers.

Safe for Fascism

SINCE Sumner Welles is maintaining complete silence during his mission, we shall not know until he returns and reports to the President what impressions he has received as a result of his visits to Rome and Berlin. But calculated indiscretions in both those capitals have given us some clue to the kind of impression the Italian and German governments have tried to give him. Mussolini, it is fairly certain, talked peace and talked it with sincerity, for although Italy is deriving some economic advantages from the war, a prolonged conflict will render its position, and that of the Fascist regime, more and more precarious. Should the war spread to the Near East, the pressure on Italy to choose sides may become irresistible before it has become clear which is the safe side to choose. Geography and the sentiments of the people tend to push Italy toward the Allies, but the Duce's own inclinations and the ideological identity of his regime with Nazism make the pull of the axis strong. An early peace which recognized Hitler's right to keep his conquests would suit Mussolini's book very well. By heightening totalitarian prestige it would bolster his domestic position; by weakening that of the democracies it would help him to press his claims on Tunis, Suez, and Djibouti. In short, it would make Europe safe for fascism.

On the other hand, if unofficial but obviously inspired statements made in Berlin are to be believed, the Nazi leaders emphasized to Mr. Welles their determination to fight until Britain is smashed. The war aims they are supposed to have communicated to him are ones that could only be realized after a total victory. They include an absolutely free hand in Eastern and Central Europe, the return of the old German colonies as a preliminary to German participation in the world's riches, economic organization of Europe in a way which would permit the "dispossessed" but virile nations to trade on equal terms with the "plutocracies," the surrender by Britain of such key positions as Gibraltar, Suez, and Singapore, together with a "freedom of the seas" which would insure Germany against any future blockade. If these modest proposals really represent Hitler's minimum terms, then clearly he is looking for a fight to a finish. It is interesting to note, however, that the German people have been told nothing of the substance of the conversations with Mr. Welles. The "high authority" talked for foreign ears only; Germans cannot be allowed to know that a possible mediator has been presented with a program which, if seriously intended, would shatter the last hope of peace by negotiation.

Under these circumstances it seems likely that this statement of war aims, like the new threats of a Blitzkrieg which have accompanied it, is really a move in the war of nerves and designed to persuade the Allies to talk peace. For simultaneously suggestions have been reaching London, through channels connected with Berlin, hinting at a plan of accommodation which would leave Poland and Czechoslovakia nominally independent. Once again Hitler is saying in effect: Come to terms now, or else. . . . And why not? Any peace which left him in effective control of Eastern and Central Europe, and free to cement economic ties with Russia, would give him all the fruits of victory. Europe would be safe for fascism, and a final settlement with France and Britain could await his convenience.

India in Revolt

IN ITS resolution proclaiming a campaign of civil disobedience unless Britain takes immediate steps to assure India's independence, the Executive Committee of the Indian National Congress has issued a final warning. For months the Congress leaders have been engaged in futile negotiations with the Viceroy and other British representatives. Both sides have been adamant. The British, while assuring India of their ultimate desire to grant self-government to the Indian people, have insisted that no action could be taken during the war because of the as yet unsolved problem of the Moslem and other minorities. The Congress leaders, remembering the unfulfilled promises given during the last war, have made their support in the present war conditional on immediate concessions in the direction of full independence.

To what extent the British government is sincere in maintaining that it dare not grant immediate independence because of the minority problem it is difficult to say. While no one would deny that the minorities exist, they are quantitatively much less important than is usually supposed. The Moslems make up only about one-fourth of the population, while the aggregate of princes, Europeans, Eurasians, and other minority groups opposed to the Congress is negligible. Moreover, a very substantial proportion of the Moslems are members or supporters of the National Congress. In fact, the civil-disobedience movement was first announced by Maulana Abdul Kalan Azad, a Moslem who has just been elected president of the Congress to succeed Nehru. It is a matter of some dispute whether Mohammed Ali Jinnah, president of the Moslem League, actually represents a majority of the Moslems in opposing immediate independence for India. In any case, Gandhi has given concrete assurances that the interests of the minorities will be respected, and as the British have had ample opportunity to discover, Gandhi's word is never given lightly. Nor is there any reason to believe that he could not bring the Indian people as a whole to honor any pledge he might give. Although there have been times when extremists have violated his pledges, he has always been able in the long run, by appealing to the loyalty of the masses of the Indian people, to redeem them in full. If Britain is sincere in its professed intention of granting self-government to India, there is every reason why it should act while Gandhi is yet alive to work out the necessary guaranties for the minority groups.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

To some it seems indefensible for India to threaten civil disobedience while Britain is engaged in a life-and-death struggle against Nazi aggression. On this issue the position of the Congress is admittedly a difficult one. But it is one that has been studied and debated for years. As one looks back over the resolutions of the Congress, one finds that it has been grappling with the issue since 1936 with ever-growing clarity. The Congress leaders have made it plain from the beginning that they are unqualifiedly opposed to fascist aggression. But they have not neglected to point out the British government's very great responsibility for that aggression. And they have reiterated, over and over again, that the decision regarding Indian participation in the war must be made, not in London, but by the Indian people themselves. Furthermore, India has asked that Britain demonstrate its faith in the democratic ideal for which it professes to be fighting by extending democratic rights to India. The latest Congress resolution sums this up as follows:

> If Great Britain fights for the maintenance and extension of democracy, then she must necessarily end imperialism in her own possessions, establish full democracy in India, and the Indian people must have the right of self-determination by framing their own constitution through a Constituent Assembly without external interference. . . . A free, democratic India will gladly associate herself with other free nations for mutual defense against aggression. . . . The working committee, therefore, invite the British government to declare in unequivocal terms what their war aims are in regard to democracy and imperialism and . . . in particular, how these aims are going to apply to India.

The declaration of a civil-disobedience campaign puts Britain in a position where it must make an immediate decision. While action is being deferred a few days, at Gandhi's request, in order to allow time for negotiation, it is probable that the campaign will start no later than March 17, the date set for the next session of the Congress. Rejection of the demands of the Congress will precipitate a costly and fateful struggle for Britain, one which will have repercussions on British prestige throughout the world. In the United States, for example, much of the sympathy and support which Britain now receives will be forfeited if it brutally represses India's striving for independence. Whatever its past record in India, the British government can hardly be prepared to pay the price of such a struggle.

Frank but Not Candid

THE easiest way to summarize the report of Glenn Frank's Republican Program Committee is to say that it comes out for the New Deal with ifs and buts. The report was intended to serve as an arsenal for the 1940 campaign, but the weapons supplied seem chiefly boomerangs. The Democrats could find no more graphic testimonial to the permanent character and historical importance of the changes associated with Mr. Roosevelt's Presidency. Read in the light of the "rugged individualism" campaign of 1932, the report shows the extent to which the Republican Party has been forced to accept the leadership, not of Mr. Hoover or of Mr. Landon, but of Mr. Roosevelt. The intent to sabotage his reforms is clear enough to one who reads this program carefully —and between the lines—but the report is nevertheless forced to pay him the tribute of indorsing the principle of virtually everything he has done. Mr. Hoover still belongs to the Republican Party, but the Republican Party no longer seems to belong to Mr. Hoover. It accepts collective bargaining, relief for the unemployed, social security, soil conservation, subsidies for agriculture, reciprocal trade agreements, regulation of stock markets, government "yardstick" competition where necessary, minimum-wage and maximum-hour legislation, and even the impossibility of returning to the gold standard at this time. In what, then, does it differ from the policies of Mr. Roosevelt?

It differs only as the plugged nickel does from the genuine. This program is no doubt honest in its implied pledge to keep New Deal legislation on the statute books, but there are more ways than one to skin a statute. The Republican administrations which followed Wilson's repealed neither the Clayton Act nor the Federal Trade Commission Act. The Federal Trade Commission continued in existence, but it soon became a means not of policing industry but of extending old-age assistance to some of the Grand Old Party's deserving poor. New Deal reforms are susceptible to the same treatment. It may be that we are over-suspicious. It may be that Ernest T. Weir, who has just been appointed chairman of the Republican National Finance Committee, is preparing to pass the hat among his Wall Street friends on the basis of a frank pledge to carry on the New Deal. We have too high an opinion of Mr. Weir's astuteness to believe it. The program shows that the contributors will get their money's worth if the Republicans win. Its position on the Securities Act is an example. The Glenn Frank brain trust—another Democratic imitation, incidentally—thinks "full disclosure" on security sales "as vital as protecting consumers against adulterated or poisonous foods." But they believe sellers of securities are being asked to disclose too much. The reference to protecting consumers against adulterated foods is itself a wink that potential contributors will not be slow to understand.

Similarly, the ifs and buts on collective bargaining and the Wagner Act are sufficient to give business all the amendments it has been asking. Without saying so, the report implies repeal of the Wage and Hours Act, for it proposes wage-and-hour protection only where collective bargaining is not possible. The program committee does not object to government "yardsticks" in the power industry, but its proposals on accounting methods and delimitation of territory will not antagonize Mr. Willkie. It approves reciprocal trade agreements but recognizes with equanimity that "the present trend toward national self-sufficiency" may require another and bigger dose of Hawley-Smootism. It agrees that the unemployed must be fed, but wants "local forces" to determine relief allowances and methods. It is for social security but objects that pay-roll taxes do not represent taxation on the basis of ability to pay. It is for taxation on the basis of ability to pay, but wants lower taxes on higher incomes. It wants a balanced budget, but it proposes reduction in the higher individual surtax rates, repeal of the capital-stock and excess-profits taxes, and abolition of the normal tax on dividends. It is true that these tax proposals are coupled with elimination of tax exemption on future issues of government bonds, but this reform would have its compensation in a higher interest rate. Mr. Weir should not find it difficult to raise money for the campaign on the basis of this program. Contributions might well represent a self-liquidating investment.

There are more half-truths, juggled figures, and stacked cards in this report than we can attempt to set straight in this editorial. There are proposals of the purest Throttlebottom variety, such as the suggestion that corporations make annual reports to their workers as well as their stockholders. There are passages of unconscious humor Max Beerbohm could hardly surpass. The 200 experts, after two years of work, have reached some profound conclusions. "Expenditures," they decide solemnly in one passage, "are at the heart of most fiscal problems." This is, indeed, a discovery. There are analyses which one would ponder respectfully if they came from Norman Thomas but which are pure non-sequiturs in the context of Republicanism. Of such are the discovery that the farm problem would be solved of itself if every American family enjoyed a decent diet and the discovery that there would be a boom in building and in household accessories if every American family had a decent home. But how are we to enable every American family to afford a decent diet and a decent home? On this new version of the full dinner pail and two cars in every garage the experts are silent. And in that silence, now as in 1932 and 1936, lies the New Deal's opportunity.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 321

EDITORIALS:

THE "PLOT" AGAINST HOOVER 323
SAFE FOR FASCISM 324
INDIA IN REVOLT 324
FRANK BUT NOT CANDID 325
PUERTO RICO: TOURIST'S-EYE VIEW by Freda Kirchwey 327
THE MARXISTS REPLY TO COREY by Norman Thomas, Earl Browder, Bertram D. Wolfe, Algernon Lee, Max Schachtman 328
DOES MEXICO FACE REBELLION? by Harry Block 332
DE VALERA'S DILEMMA by Florence M. Baker 335
IN THE WIND 337
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 338

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE WILD GOOSE by Morton Dauwen Zabel 339
DISSENTING OPINION by I. F. Stone 340
AMERICAN PAINTING AS AMERICAN by Constance Rourke 342
THE IMPERFECT YANKEE by Lovell Thompson 342
MURDER STORIES WILL OUT by Louis B. Salomon 344
ABOUT VITAMINS by Hugh H. Darby 344
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 345
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 346

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Assistant Editor
JAMES WECHSLER

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

*

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL GRAY

Puerto Rico: Tourist's-Eye View

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

San Juan, P. R., February 23

IT'S a strange and not entirely pleasant sensation to be in a place which is palpably foreign and at the same time aggressively a part of the United States. I want to put down this feeling before it evaporates in the warmth of closer acquaintance. It is a feeling that more accustomed senses could not register; only a newcomer would notice those small anomalies that betray an inner, perhaps essential and unchangeable, disharmony. After a while other things come to seem more important: political conflicts, economic distress, open clashes of cultural values. Perhaps they are more important, certainly they are more clamorous, but they belong to another scale and they are likely to hide rather than explain differences that lie closer to the bone. The senses, on the other hand, while quick, superficial reporters, often reveal matters that mean much in the life of a people. They tell the newcomer one important fact, at least; they tell whether the society he looks at and feels has a sound, firm texture—however worn, however blurred the pattern.

To this newcomer the texture of Puerto Rico seems badly made, a patchwork affair. And the patches that pain the eye were slapped on by the United States. I'm not forgetting about the "progress" of the last forty years or about reconstruction and relief in the past five; but those matters belong on the other scale and I don't know much about them yet. So far I am aware only of small items that catch the eye and afflict the ear or the palate. Most of my fellow-tourists don't agree, and so I may be wrong. They like finding someone who speaks bad English in every store and on almost every street corner; you can get around without using your own much worse Spanish. They like using American money and stamps in a foreign port—for it is profoundly foreign—and paying no duty on the stuff they bring home. But those benefits are offset for me by the aggressive American continental pattern laid over, sometimes obliterating, sometimes just distorting, the pattern of Spanish living, adapted gradually through four hundred years to warmth and mixed blood and a colonial economy.

Here on our hotel terrace, sitting in the sun, with a lizard beside us on the wall, we eat canned tomato juice and butter and meat and vegetables imported from the States and cooked badly with American seasoning by a Puerto Rican cook. One can, it is fair to say, get some native fruit, papayas any time and pineapples in season. But the backbone of the menu is mediocre, imported American food. Since this is not to be endured three times a day, we go often to a restaurant in the center of town, recommended by a Puerto Rican friend. It is good, and one can eat the food of the island, along with some dishes that are more Spanish than native: cuttlefish cooked in its own ink (calamares en su tinta) is delicate though it looks forbidding; asopao de pollo al Jerez offers a rich blend of spices and sherry; paella Valenciana combines a variety of shellfish with rice in a well-seasoned sauce.

But even in this good place corruption is evident. The oysters, here as elsewhere, are sent over from the States. Puerto Rican oysters are too small, and perhaps, as the waiter tells us, the harbors are too dirty. But in Cuba oysters of the same sort, slim and small as mussels, are served heaped high on the plate and eaten with relish by tourist and Cuban alike. The music of Puerto Rico is its own, much like that of Cuba in rhythm, but distinct in tone and mood and tempo. And, I am glad to admit, it is played. Our excellent hotel orchestra plays three boleros and bolero-sons for every "fox." But here in the Puerto Rican restaurant four young American naval officers struggle hopelessly with a willing, smiling Puerto Rican accordion player. The accordion is not a native instrument though he squeezes from it authentic-sounding native songs. But the American boys need more sustaining nourishment. They want "Home on the Range." They want it badly; they sing the air off key with earnest insistence. The accordion player tries to oblige; he is amiable and he needs the dollar that may be waiting, but "Home on the Range" simply won't come. Finally they all compromise, with fair grace, on "Ai, Ai, Ai," a bond beween the races. But soon, next week perhaps, the accordion player will know "Home on the Range."

The Fortaleza—for three hundred years the palace of governors from Spain and the United States and one of the most beautiful public buildings to be found in the Americas—is wrapped in scaffolding. It is being completely renovated and repaired and is, I am told on the highest authority, to be restored exactly: tiles, frescoes, every detail. But Puerto Rico doesn't believe it. People think it will be "Americanized"; what horrors of plastic and chromium they expect I can only imagine. It is characteristic of the underlying disharmony of the place that they have no trust in first-rate architects and engineers sent by "Washington." The Fortaleza belongs to Puerto Rico, and the Americans are tearing it to pieces.

Puerto Ricans are apprehensive and say so freely. And they tell you in the same breath that General Daley, commander of the American forces in Puerto Rico, has closed the Casa Blanca to the public. Now the Casa Blanca is as important a national—Puerto Rican—monument as the Fortaleza. It was the home of the family of Ponce de León, and it has stood through peace and war and sun and hurricane for 417 years. It is now the home of General Daley, who has chosen to close its doors and treat it as if it were a private house. But Puerto Ricans say the Casa Blanca also belongs to Puerto Rico; naturally it is General Daley's official residence, but how could it hurt him to open it to the public on certain days for certain hours? Especially since the General is a bachelor. Behind this quite logical attitude one senses a complex emotion compounded of national pride and possessiveness along with a less conscious resentment that the particular dog in this manger should be the general commanding the American troops, now multiplying so fast and so visibly in the streets of the city.

Do you notice that I use the word "American" in speaking of people or things or influences from the United States? If I were writing from any other Latin American country, I would not do that. I would say "North American" or "United States" (though the latter is an atrocious adjective), because obviously the people of all the countries are equally "American" and the tendency of the United States to apply the term to itself alone is properly resented throughout the rest of the hemisphere.

Except in Puerto Rico. Strange irony, in Puerto Rico, which is part of the United States, the people, who are citizens of the United States, always call themselves "Puerto Ricans" and always call people from the United States "Americans." It is as if, in their anxious national pride and their determination to make the difference felt, they were deliberately forfeiting their claim to the larger title. Since they cannot share it as equals or independents, they will not share it at all. The people from the mainland can be Americans; Puerto Ricans will be Puerto Ricans.

The Marxists Reply to Corey

[Because of the wide interest and controversy aroused by Lewis Corey's series of articles—Marxism Reconsidered—in the last three numbers of The Nation, we asked leaders of five Marxist parties to set forth their "first reactions" to Mr. Corey's argument. Their answers are published herewith. We hope in the near future to publish other and more detailed analyses of the issues raised by Mr. Corey.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

NORMAN THOMAS

Socialist Party

THE era now drawing to its end has been dominated by the interaction of two great loyalties, or concepts, and the institutions based upon them: in the political world, nationalism; in the economic world, private capitalism. The failure of the social order founded upon these concepts is tragically evident. Socialism, which was the most vigorous and scientific critic of that order, is itself today universally on the defensive because of its failure to achieve its own ends, either under the forms of social democracy in Germany or of communism in Russia.

From that double failure we have at least learned this: that the drift toward, or the achievement of, a high degree of collectivism not only is not of itself equivalent to socialism but does not bring socialism inevitably nearer. It is a sign of life and vigor that within Socialist ranks there is such a searching reexamination of the external situation and of Socialist dogmas in relation to it as Lewis Corey has given us in recent issues of The Nation.

With what Mr. Corey has said I am largely in agreement. I have not space in the limits assigned me to clarify my position adequately. Three points I must make, briefly and dogmatically.

1. It is true that "socialism must express and realize the interest of all useful functional groups within society." That fact must lead Socialists to a reappraisal of their definitions of both the "working class" and the "middle class," and they must take respectful account of important elements of society which regard themselves as middle class. But not at the cost of losing their concern for the dispossessed, which Fortune recently estimated at 23 per cent of our American population, and their hope in the wage-earning proletariat. Moreover, it is highly important for the achievement of a better society that farmers, engineers, and other useful sections of the American middle class should learn to think of themselves as workers in the best sense of the word, and to realize that labor of hand and brain should bring economic rewards. This is an idea not popular with a middle class which, however blurred the boundaries, is more class conscious than the proletariat.

2. The "final conflict," as Socialists used to envision it, was to be between a vigorous and ruthless class of private owners, symbolized and led by what we call "Wall Street," and a Socialist collectivism for which the workers consistently would struggle. Actually, as

UBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Mr. Corey points out in his third article, "capitalism is already being transformed." The whole world drift is toward collectivism. The real final conflict will be between a fascist collectivism, or more accurately the collectivism of the totalitarian state, and a democratic socialism. Recognition of this fact in time would give new hope, at any rate in America, for the success of non-violent methods of struggle.

Mr. Corey gives a good general picture of his "people's functional socialism" and the steps toward it, but it is imperatively necessary for him, as for all Socialists who agree with the point of view which he has expressed, to fill in the important details of their program more explicitly. I await his fuller treatment eagerly.

3. If the older socialism was mistaken in believing that it was the historical destiny of the "working class" almost automatically to achieve socialism, so will the modern advocates of the glories of "democracy," or even of a "people's functional socialism," be mistaken if they think that there is anything in the untutored and instinctive processes of the democracy we now have by which we shall achieve plenty, peace, and freedom. It is the failure of that democracy which gives rise to fascism. The achievement of our great ends requires socialism, and it requires a creative socialism, a socialism conscious of its goal and of its program, a socialism which must rest on its own organizational power. To be sure, such socialism must work in and through mass movements and mass organizations of various sorts, but emphatically it needs its own political expression. What the New Deal has done, especially if it involves America in war, can be a preparation for fascism just as truly as for the achievement of democratic socialism. Indeed, fascism, military or otherwise, in some form and under some name will win the day in America unless within the next few years a democratic Socialist movement can be built.

EARL BROWDER

Communist Party

Your invitation to write a "critical first reaction" to Lewis Corey's articles, Marxism Reconsidered, has caused me to read them. Here is my critical first reaction.

The underlying thought, it seems to me, could be most clearly set forth in a syllogism of formal logic:

Major premise: Mr. Corey was the most penetrating exponent of Marxist thought after Marx himself.

Minor premise: Mr. Corey failed.

Conclusion: Marxism is a failure.

Granted the first premise, the conclusion is irrefutable. But it is the first premise that must be rejected. Mr. Corey, in all his independent writings, has always struggled against Marxism, not expounded it (see the pamphlet "Leninism—the Only Marxism Today," by Bittelman and Jerome, 1934). What he has now reconsidered is not the validity of Marxism but rather the method of struggle against it; where formerly he conducted his fight under the guise of an adherent, he now comes out openly as an opponent. That much, at least is clear gain. May the Lord protect us from our friends; our enemies we have learned how to deal with.

As I plodded through Mr. Corey's "arguments," my subconscious mind was busy rummaging in the dim past, and as I laid the papers aside there was thrust into my consciousness a famous phrase from the age of the good Queen Victoria: "the blessed word, Mesopotamia." Yes, Mr. Corey has his blessed word, which he substitutes impartially for all the missing elements of the rational process, and which casts over all a thick aura of righteousness (or should one say self-righteousness?). It is the magic word "totalitarianism."

With this blessed word Mr. Corey conjures up the whole of his newly acquired ideology, without the inconvenience of having to set it forth in specific terms; with this word he assumes as established, without further examination, the propositions which his articles purport to prove to the reader. This little sleight-of-hand performance will not, of course, disturb those whose minds operate from the same assumption. We may fairly expect Mr. Corey to be quite a lion, for the next few weeks, in those circles where the blessed word solves all problems and answers all questions. With equal assurance we may expect that in critical and thinking circles, whether Marxian or otherwise, Mr. Corey's "reconsideration" will gain him but the recognition that here is a man who should go far under a Rooseveltian third term.

As honest and forthright men are more and more driven from public life by the hunger-and-war program of the "national unity" camp forming around Roosevelt, they will be replaced by the most glib devotees of the blessed word "totalitarianism." This word is the battle cry of the American bourgeoisie embarked upon a holy crusade to save Europe from socialism, from proletarian revolution, and to assure itself the lion's share of profit from a salvaged European capitalism.

Mr. Corey should hear the knock of opportunity upon his door with increasing insistence, once these articles come to the attention of the right people.

BERTRAM D. WOLFE

Independent Labor League (Lovestonites)

Western socialism, based on traditions of bourgeois democracy and democratic unionism, has for some time been trying to shake off the incubus of blind acceptance —and blind rejection—of the Russian Revolution, a revolution occurring where both bourgeois and proletarian democracy were lacking. The Corey articles now broaden the scope of the discussion and thereby perform a significant service, for out of such discussion alone can come the necessary clarification, reunification, and new advance toward socialism.

Corey makes it clear that socialism's errors and defeats do not give capitalism new vigor. Decay continues: from free trade to monopoly; toward longer and deeper crises; from productive abundance to legislated scarcity; toward autarchy and recurrent war. Capitalism is in transition toward "some sort of collectivism"—the real choice being between monopolistic, oligarchical, authoritarian forms and democratic socialism. What we have learned is that nationalization of industry does not automatically lead to increased democracy or to "withering of the state," but rather increases the dangers of totalitarianism and the need of a conscious drive to achieve freedom. This emphasis on the inseparability of democracy and socialism is the major service of Corey's articles.

With Corey's analyses I have several disagreements:

1. I think he underestimates the trade union as the most important single institution for the development of economic democracy.

2. Corey rightly emphasizes the need for a socialism expressing the interests of all functionally useful groups. But if socialism is not, in the first instance, the expression of a democratic mass movement of which labor is the most important constituent, then it is nothing at all. Is not the working class the most numerous and significant single class in modern society? Who else is to form the core and driving force? With whom shall Corey's "new middle class" combine, when it is won away from adherence to monopoly capitalism and the status quo? The greater danger is not, as Corey seems to imply, that of dictatorship by the mass of producers over technicians and administrators, but—as happened in Russia—the dictatorship of indispensable technician-administrators over the mass of producer-consumers. If the "new middle class," as some technocrats and other followers of Common Sense imply, is to become the core of the movement toward a new order, then bureaucracy and totalitarianism are hardly avoidable.

3. Corey rightly rejects the schematic caricature concept of class often advanced, and would use it rather as "a tool with which to identify and delimit those class interests that must be destroyed in order to realize progressive class interests." But this is quite different from the sweeping title The Class-War Fallacy, which I fancy is a cuckoo egg laid in his nest by some Nation editor.

At the extremes of the social spectrum there is more class consciousness, actual and potential, than the articles seem to reckon with. At the right, a handful has sufficient power to sway governments, manipulate opinion, subsidize fascist movements. The inclusion in the "popular front" of parties controlled by such monopolists of economic power is the real reason for the sterility of such fronts, which Corey notes but does not analyze.

4. He rightly rejects that caricature revolutionism which worships violence and upheaval for their own sake; he warns of the destructiveness and "totalitarian potential" involved. Rightly, too, he emphasizes continuity where many have one-sidedly emphasized break; but he seems to fall into an opposite one-sidedness.

In order to move toward, not away from, a new social order we require a sharp break: (a) in the direction of development; (b) in the central purpose of production —from private profit to social use; (c) in the control of the mainsprings of economic and political power. Otherwise, as the "older gradualism was distorted by the upswing of capitalism," Corey will find that his new "gradualism"—an equivocal word—will be distorted by the prevailing downswing into becoming, not a new order, but gradual decay and collapse of the very foundations on which such order might be constructed.

5. Undoubtedly violence is a matrix of totalitarianism, yet history still fails to show examples of transitions to a new order without some violent attempt of the privileged to hold on to power. Against such force a democratic majority might conceivably have to use force, in addition to persuasion and affirmation of its will. The latest examples are Austria and Spain. This dilemma must be faced, not evaded.

6. To what extent is modern industry compatible with Marx's belated rejection of centralization (after the Paris Commune) and advocacy of the non-bureaucratic, decentralized, libertarian commune-state? And with Lenin's hope that "every cook" would become a polytechnic multi-expert on every phase of economic, cultural, and social life?

Incidentally, that approach derives, via France, from Jefferson, who proposed an arrangement where "every man is a sharer in the direction of his ward-republic . . . not merely at election one day in the year but every day . . . there shall not be a man in the state who will not be a member of some one of its councils . . . and every citizen can act in person . . . in all things relating to him . . . and in the offices nearest and most interesting to him." Is Jefferson really as out-of-date as the "horse and buggy" spurners glibly imply?

The major lack in the articles I find to be omission of the overshadowing problem of peace and war. It is inextricably tied up with the problems treated. There can be no healthy socialist regrouping if this is evaded or ignored. Modern war involves maximal totalitarianism. The struggle for socialism and freedom is first of all a struggle to prevent war, limit and shorten it where it occurs, transform the institutional and economic arrangements from which it springs.

Finally, these comments are inadequate both as to praise and difference because of limitations of space; and they are personal rather than "official," since the Independent Labor League possesses no "pontifical" views on these questions; nor does it believe that matters essentially experimental and scientific can possibly be "settled" by a vote of a committee, an "authoritative" citation, or adoption of twenty-one points or ninety-five theses.

ALGERNON LEE

Social-Democratic Federation

"History," says Lewis Corey, "has played one of her stupefying tricks; for it is now clear that democracy is on the defensive as much against the totalitarianism of Russian communism as against that of fascism."

Poor Mr. Corey! His position is surely not an enviable one. But we could better sympathize with him if he took it like a man instead of blaming History. The fault, poor Corey, is not History's, but yours, if you are stupefied. History may be a Theban Sphinx, who slays those who misread her riddles, but a shabby trickstress she is not.

Mr. Corey had served the Bolshevist Moloch for years, and striven to justify his ways before men; had seen him murder the young republic and slaughter its defenders and make Russia a house of horrors; had heard him revile democracy, ridicule men who valued truth above expediency, and explicitly command his acolytes to lie for his greater glory. Five years ago he had seen his Moloch put on a false-face clumsily simulating the features of democracy—but meanwhile explaining to puzzled worshipers in a whisper that all this was only a maneuver. Last August he saw the mask cast aside, saw Bolshevism and Nazism clasping hands—and was Mr. Corey stupefied! Or was he really?

Anyway, he has now more or less emerged from his stupor. Six months, in such a case, is perhaps no more than a fair equivalent for the ten seconds allowed in pugilistic practice. Barely in time, Mr. Corey has come to—somewhat groggy but still in the ring. He really is not clear as to who it was that hit him—maybe it was History, maybe not—and after three-quarters of a column he decides to "square accounts with Marx." Brave man, after all—or perhaps I'd better say rash man! Marx has taken a lot of pounding since he started to fight, but his assailants' knuckles have suffered most.

Am I being too flippant? Not a whit. Mr. Corey seems to have developed what the psychiatrists call a delusion of grandeur. With a magnificent flourish he makes an "admission of failure" on behalf of everybody in sight—save only himself. Communism has failed, Social Democracy has failed, "all variants of Marxism" have failed, non-Marxian radicalism has failed, democracy has failed, and so on. The field is clear—now just watch.

To follow Mr. Corey through some 9,000 words of pontifical irresponsibility and undertake to analyze and answer his argument systematically within my allotted space of 700 words would be folly. The subjects on which he expatiates are important. They must be adequately discussed. But Mr. Corey does not lay the basis.

MAX SHACHTMAN

Socialist Workers Party (Trotskyists)

The title of Mr. Corey's articles is misleading. What he is really reconsidering is post-war Social Democratic reformism, and with a few unimportant verbal improvements he finds it quite acceptable. The fact that he attaches to it the not entirely novel label of "people's socialism" or "functional democratic socialism" testifies only to his squeamishness about fathering what is so thoroughly bankrupt and discredited.

What Corey leaves of revolutionary Marxism after his "reconsideration" is scarcely visible to the naked eye. The Marxian theory of the state is dropped down the chute because, you see, the modern democratic state also performs some useful functions. Presumably its principal function of maintaining the social rule of the propertied class by armed force is secondary to its meritorious work of providing farmers with weather reports and regulating traffic. The Marxian theory of the class struggle and the decisive progressive role of the proletariat goes down the same chute, to be replaced by "the interests of all useful functional groups." The Marxian theory of the seizure of power for the socialist reorganization of society meets the same fate, and is replaced by the ludicrous and outworn theory of a parliamentarian democracy that will absorb as much social justice as this sinful world makes possible, but absorb it by a process of osmosis, so "gradually" that the crisis-maddened capitalist class will not notice it. What is left of Marxism? A few liberalist phrases.

Corey's criticism of Social Democratic reformism leaves it essentially intact. The central point in the criticism—the stress which the German Social Democracy laid on the proletariat to the exclusion of the middle class—is simply groundless. To an ever-increasing degree, from the days of Eduard Bernstein at the turn of the century, the German Social Democracy put emphasis on the middle class; all its policies proceeded from fear of "alienating" the middle class. It ended by being completely dominated by middle-class elements. Corey is arguing against a Social Democracy that did not exist only to recommend one that did and still does exist.

This becomes quite clear in the programmatic conclusions at the end of his series. His discomfort in shifting from Marxism to reformism sticks out in every apologetic line. Gradualism? "Yes and no." But far more "yes" than "no." The only serious difference between Corey and the German Social Democrats is that he promises to put "teeth" into his gradualism. The promise need not be taken too seriously, however. Otto Bauer used to talk the same way just before he gave way to Dollfuss. Léon Blum swore that he would not be a Kerensky, only to surrender to the economic and political democracy that now flourishes so sturdily under Daladier.

In reality, Mr. Corey's teeth, and those of most middle-class radicals, are chattering with fright in the growing totalitarian darkness. Despite the strong talk, there is nothing aggressive in their program. The long but essentially temporary series of defeats and setbacks suffered by labor has caused them to abandon the bold socialist program with which they had some measure of sympathy in the early post-war years. Every paragraph of Corey's is defensive. He stresses not so much what he proposes to accomplish as what he proposes to prevent. In genetics, such an approach to the problem would result in ridding us eventually of all cretins to be sure, but also in drying up the human race. In politics, it would be little less disastrous. One must be purblind not to see that the policy of defending the status quo, of preserving a rotted capitalist order by "democratic" means, as the mild and impotent left wing of this order has tried to do for the last quarter of a century, leads neither to socialism nor even to the maintenance of bourgeois democracy.

Stalinist totalitarianism is not, of course, the only alternative to the inexorable trend toward fascism inherent in disintegrating capitalist democracy. In identifying Stalinism with revolutionary Marxism Corey shows that he does not understand either one of them. Revolutionary Marxism came closer to solving the problem of the middle class, both theoretically and in practice, than any other movement. The Bolsheviks, a proletarian party, led a hundred million peasants—Russia's middle class—to victory; but in that alliance (not fusion) of the two classes the workers led the middle class. The victory of Stalinism, significantly enough, was obtained by abandoning the world-revolutionary outlook and submitting to the same middle class at the expense of the workers. At bottom Stalinism and fascism are not identical but "symmetrical phenomena," as Trotsky puts it, products of a revolutionary decline and a failure of the working class and its party to fight militantly for a program of hope, a program of radical socialist reorganization that would enlist the support of the rural and urban middle classes as it did in 1917.

Corey's familiar attempt at a program midway between capitalism and socialist revolution would only facilitate the progress of the demagogic fascist "radicals," as it did in Central Europe. The "accent on democracy" means here essentially what it meant there: preservation of that status quo, touched up a bit here and there, with which all classes are increasingly discontented. In 1940, however, it means even more: it is the slogan of the chauvinists seeking to whip the people into another blood bath, this time against "Hitler-Stalin totalitarianism." Corey's amazing success in eliminating all references to the Second World War, and to the role of the "democracies" and the "democrats" in it, is perhaps accidental. It is to be hoped that in his further reconsiderations he does not follow his first big step to Social Democratic reformism with the much shorter step required to land in the "democratic" war camp, which is already proceeding, in its own way, to reconstruct the world.

Does Mexico Face Rebellion?

BY HARRY BLOCK

Mexico City, February 20

ALL presidential elections in Mexico are overshadowed by the question: Will the transfer of power be effected by peaceful means, or will the candidate counted out try to seize by force of arms what he was unable to win at the polls? As July 7, date of the elections to choose Cárdenas's successor, approaches, Mexico begins to hold its breath in anxiety about what the immediate future may bring.

The difference between the coming contest and the numerous putsches since 1920 is that the previous upheavals, although of varying severity, were hardly more than quarrels over the spoils between members of the ruling clique; only incidentally if at all were genuine social antagonisms involved. The Cárdenas regime now drawing to a close is unique in that it has really challenged many of the basic premises by which Mexico formerly lived and worked, and has adventurously struck out to create a new organization of the nation's economy. In so doing, it has stepped on many toes, native as well as foreign; as a matter of fact, it was only comparatively late in the process that foreign interests were affected. The plight of Mexico's own landlords and capitalists has been less publicized abroad, but many are infuriated by measures which have divided their estates and reduced their swollen profits.

Mexico's middle class is thus thoroughly aroused. Having wrought a considerable amount of economic damage in its bitter struggle against Cárdenas during the past five years, it is now shedding tears over the resultant havoc and is seeking to make political capital out of it by blaming the broken crockery on the President's "communist" regime. This is the chief argument of the Almazán campaign. The candidate himself is one of the most discredited of Mexico's nest-feathering generals and is taken seriously by only a small fraction even of his most ardent supporters. The truth is that the reaction is sublimely indifferent to the name of its standard-bearer; what it wants is someone willing to stick out his neck and carry the brunt of the offensive—which it hopes will this time be decisive—against the whole nexus of social trends known as the Mexican Revolution.

For a brief time two years ago it thought it had found its fighting cock in General Cedillo, but that illusion was dissipated when Cárdenas adroitly forced Cedillo out into the open, where he either had to put up or shut up. When he elected to fight, the very groups which had most noisily inflamed his ambitions, realizing the hopelessness of his cause, quickly deserted him and retired to await more propitious times. Almazán, for all his shady record, is a far better bet. He is able and intelligent, and if his campaign tour has not been attended by any notable demonstrations of enthusiasm on the part of the lower strata of the population, there has been a sufficient turnout of landowners, small ranchers, and professional and business men to make an impressive showing in the press reports.

On New Year's Day, according to an apparently well-founded rumor now current here, Almazán and his principal advisers met secretly in a house on Mexico City's fashionable Paseo de la Reforma to map out the concluding phases of their campaign. The plan adopted, if these reports are true, was to induce a state of mind in the public receptive to armed uprising. Waves of sporadic terrorism have since been invading small cities and villages throughout the country; the atrocities, some real and some imaginary, have all been calculated to fan existing prejudices and hatreds to greater fury and to create sympathy for Almazán as a fearless democrat persecuted by a cruel dictatorship. The same technique was used during the months preceding the Franco uprising in Spain. Here, too, churches have been burned by unknown hands so that the newspapers on the following day could attribute the outrages to phantom Communist bands. The Yaqui Indians, whose ancestral lands were recently restored to them, have been unaccountably reported in revolt. Strikes are deliberately provoked to whip up public alarm, and if responsible trade unions cannot be trapped into strike action, fake strikes are staged by the small groups still controlled by Luis N. Morones, the deposed labor czar, who has characteristically turned up among the Almazán stalwarts.

Editorial and oratorical attack has chiefly converged, however, on the act recently passed by Congress to enforce the provisions of Article 3 of the constitution, establishing socialism as the basic philosophy of official education. Here is an issue which reaction believes will be capable of reviving the religious struggles of the 1926-28 period and of stirring the former cristeros to renewed armed resistance to the government in the name of Christ the King. This, too, is largely a shadow battle. Article 3 was already in force before the "regulations" were passed, and there is nothing to show that Catholics have been prevented from bringing up their children as believers, nor are they hindered from so doing under the new law. Actually, the government's "socialist education," as even its bitterest opponents will admit off the record, is nine parts verbal fireworks and only one part serious endeavor to impart the principles of socialism to the new generations. Nor is Mexico at present in possession of the army of trained teachers, the educational equipment, or the vast funds necessary to launch an integrated program of effective socialist instruction on a national scale. The program itself has not even been elaborated, much less put into effect, and the whole problem is one that will not arise in actual practice for years to come. This does not, however, prevent its being excellent political ammunition, and the reaction is making the most of it.

The deceptive surface harmony within the P. R. M. (Party of the Mexican Revolution) and the forces of its presidential candidate, General Manuel Avila Camacho, has been abruptly disturbed by Emilio Portes Gil, who (1929-30) was one of the series of dummy presidents through whom ex-Dictator Calles ruled the country until Cárdenas dissolved his political monopoly in 1935. An agile politician, Portes Gil helped Cárdenas to throw off the Calles tutelage, but in 1936 he was himself forced to resign the presidency of the National Revolutionary Party under combined pressure from the Congressional left wing and the labor movement. He has since devoted himself to backstage intrigue, and apparently he joined Avila Camacho early in the latter's campaign in the expectation of repairing his political fortunes.

In a speech made several weeks ago Vicente Lombardo Toledano, general secretary of the C. T. M. (Confederation of Mexican Workers), referred to Portes Gil as a puppet of Calles during the 1929-34 period of revolutionary decline. The statement has been made scores of times in Mexico and is certainly no news to anyone. But Portes Gill, at present in New York, chose suddenly to take offense at the unflattering characterization and replied with a blast against Lombardo that was curiously reminiscent of the Calles philippic which provoked the break with Cárdenas in June, 1935, particularly in the phrases proclaiming that labor's present leaders are responsible for the "chaos" toward which the country is heading. The National Committee of the C. T. M.—all the important labor unions have already expressed their indorsement of the Lombardo leadership—is expected to counter with a comprehensive indictment of Portes Gil's whole political career; as a result the P. R. M. is currently in an uproar.

Such billingsgate is so common among Mexican politicians that ordinarily it would hardly cause a ripple, but there is more to this exchange of amenities than appears on the surface. Lombardo and Portes Gil are both, after all, prominent supporters of the same candidate; Lombardo heads the labor sector of the P. R. M., while Portes Gil's political strength is largely derived from the agrarian organizations, in which he has considerable influence. A row on this scale may produce serious dissensions within the party, and in the case of so astute a politician as Portes Gil, who does not often allow his feelings, no matter how outraged, to run away with his good sense, it is hard to avoid the suspicion that this was the end sought; if so, he is acting uncommonly like an agent of the reaction within the Avila Camacho forces. It is likewise said here that the incident is perhaps not unconnected with Portes Gil's present mission in New York, where he was sent, according to a cryptic official announcement some days ago, "on oil business." Could his attack on Lombardo possibly be intended to convince the oil companies that a new day is dawning in Mexico in which labor's voice will carry considerably less weight than in the recent unhappy past? In the meantime, if the fight continues, it seems calculated to drive a wedge between workers and peasants, one of the opposition's chief objectives, and to strengthen the efforts of the conservative factions of the P. R. M. to wean Avila Camacho from his present friendship with labor.

On the international front oil is still leading the offensive. There is no great mystery about the recent breakdown of negotiations between Mexico and the oil companies. Mexico had consistently maintained that it would deal only directly with the companies, without the intervention of their governments. Apparently the American companies were finally persuaded that Washington could do nothing for them unless they complied with this not unreasonable request. They therefore went through the motions of sending a representative—Donald R. Richberg—to discuss a settlement, but when it developed that their idea of compromise included a return of the properties under conditions clearly violating the Mexican constitution, only a single outcome could be anticipated. The Richberg pamphlet since distributed by the Standard Oil Company is apparently designed to convince the American public and Washington that there is no longer anything to be gained by temporizing with the Mexican bandits. "A deliberate distortion of the facts," Mexico has flatly called Mr. Richberg's presentation of the case, and there for the time being the matter rests.

More serious in its effect on Mexico's internal economy and hence on the political situation is the continuing boycott of Mexican goods. The high hopes entertained at the outbreak of the war, on the basis of which the peso moved sharply upward for the first time since March, 1938, have been rudely blasted by the failure of the United States to take up the slack in Mexican exports caused by the collapse of European markets. Increased imports naturally followed the improved exchange rate and were themselves a factor in driving the peso back to its former rate of six to the dollar, since exports were progressively dwindling. Threatened with still further depreciation of the currency, the Bank of Mexico is at last taking steps to check the fall. It has announced the retirement from circulation of some 40,000,000 pesos in paper money and is staking its gold reserves to defend the existing rate. It has likewise initiated restriction on credit for speculative purposes, and other official moves to reduce prices seem imminent. At the same time the government has stated that oil and mineral exports are again mounting and that this year's excellent crops from the cooperative ejidos will eliminate the need for costly imports of foodstuffs. By next June, it is confidently promised, the peso will have risen to five to one, its rate before the price of silver was forced down last June. But even should this optimistic forecast be fulfilled, the improvement worked by the deflationary measures is hardly likely to come soon enough or to be widely enough felt to cut very much ground from under Almazán's feet.

What, actually, are the chances of armed struggle next summer? The answer to this question depends on a number of factors. First of all, who will join the rebellion? The workers, who have made tremendous trade-union advances under Cárdenas, and the peasants, who have been given land—and credit and machinery with which to work it—are surely not going to revolt against their benefactor. Nor does the middle class, although largely sympathetic to Almazán, seem imbued with the spirit of street fighting and barricades. The conspirators are thus placing their reliance on disaffected elements in the army—chiefly among the officer class, which is said to resent what it considers the coddling of the workers; on certain backward and fanatically religious rural sections, including even some recipients of government land grants whose purely local grievances are being cleverly exploited; on a few labor organizations run by racketeer henchmen of Morones; on the more militant members of the numerous but small fascist groups; and, above all, on the hope of foreign aid.

The alliance that has been formed at last, after many false starts, between Almazán and the Calles faction of Generals Amaro and Pérez Treviño is an indication that the latter group is prepared to sacrifice its own ambitions and to throw in its lot with Almazán as the best way to secure a circuitous return to power. (Close associates of Amaro were arrested last week after police investigation revealed that they were in possession of subversive propaganda and detailed plans for military action. The government contemptuously turned them loose as a demonstration of strength.) Nevertheless, in spite of this fresh addition to his ranks, Almazán cannot be so bemused by his own speeches as not to realize the numerical weakness of his forces. Informed opinion here ridicules the notion that he will be rash enough to be trapped

LINGAME
BLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

as was Cedillo or that he will voluntarily embark on a possibly fatal adventure. But political commitments are no respecters of personal inclinations: it is difficult to say at this moment how deeply enmeshed Almazán has become with his more determined backers and whether he is not by this time their prisoner. Should it come to fighting, he may find it more dangerous to attempt to run out on his "army" than to take his chances on amnesty or safety in exile in the event of defeat.

On only one condition can this hypothetical revolt be conceded a probability of success, and that is, of course, active support or an attitude of benevolent "neutrality" on the part of the United States. The unfortunate precedent of the Spanish embargo might conceivably be repeated, with the Central American countries providing a convenient base of supplies for the rebels. It seems clear that the present "war of nerves" will not be followed by large-scale civil war unless there is assurance of concrete aid from abroad. My own guess is that the odds for a peaceful election are at least seventy to thirty and perhaps better. But I could easily be wrong. One thing, however, is certain. If the United States commits the colossal blunder of supporting a fascist bid for power in Mexico, it will at one blow destroy the growing confidence and good-will so laboriously nurtured in the Western Hemisphere by the Good Neighbor policy.

De Valera's Dilemma

BY FLORENCE M. BAKER

THE Irish Republican Army is making trouble not only for the government of Great Britain but also for the government of Eire, that state which under the adroit manipulations of Eamon de Valera has become a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations, free except for some defense obligations, and whole except for six out of its thirty-two counties. It is against these limitations that the I. R. A. is protesting, protesting chiefly on English soil and in the British portion of Ulster. But no matter where the bombs are bursting there is no one who hears their thunder with more dismay than Mr. de Valera. As Prime Minister of Eire he had hoped for many years of peaceful relations with the British government; it was for that reason that after sh-sh-ing the rebels as long as he could, he recently secured the passage of an amendment to the Emergency Powers Act which permits him to intern without trial citizens suspected of treason.

In taking this step, however, he has not enjoyed the unanimous support of his countrymen. Cries of "pro-British" are coming from the hills and glens of Eire and from Irishmen across the Atlantic, many of them former members of the now outlawed army. Such an accusation is an empty one; Mr. de Valera is not, and never was, pro-British. He himself once belonged to the I. R. A. and to that even doughtier company that preceded it, the Irish Volunteers, who set the mills of republicanism grinding in 1916. He made no whimper when he was condemned to death in an English prison; and when, in 1921, a treaty was made with Great Britain establishing the Irish Free State, he was the first to spurn it. Even after he had become leader of the Free State in 1932 he still professed his old friendship with the Republican Army, and would salute it from the reviewing stand.

But there were men in its ranks who even then suspected that Eamon de Valera had no intention of establishing a republic in Ireland, for they knew that religion meant more to him than patriotism and that the day would come when the Catholic church would tell him that he had gone far enough. To the rest of his countrymen he seemed to be taking all the steps necessary to a complete separation from Great Britain. He repudiated the oath of allegiance to the British government; he shooed the Governor General out of his handsome Viceregal Lodge in Dublin; he suspended the payment of land-purchase annuities; and he forced British ships to pull up their anchors from Irish harbors and be on their way. Nevertheless, when Mrs. Tom Clarke, now Lord Mayor of Dublin, an ardent old-time supporter of Mr. de Valera, stood up in the Dail in 1937 and declared that there were indications that "the government is no longer aiming at a republic," she voiced the opinion of thousands, especially the young men and women, that the slogan "Irish Republic" which had secured their cooperation was little more than a bunch of carrots at the end of a pole.

It was then that the I. R. A. took matters in its own hands and proposed to seize for the Prime Minister the republic he asserted he desired. He repulsed them then, and he repulsed them two years later when British soldiers were moving into France and they reminded him that "Ireland's opportunity" had come once again. Few Irishmen will accept his excuse that tariff barriers would be thrown up if a step were too hastily taken, for he plunged unhesitatingly into the economic ruin which faced the country when payment of the land-purchase annuities was suspended and the British Parliament empowered the Treasury to impose tariffs up to 100 per cent on imports from the Irish Free State.

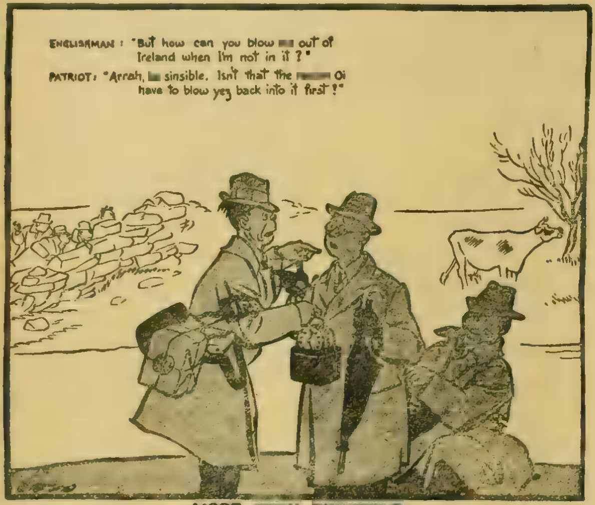
It is a different kind of economic crisis that makes Mr. de Valera hesitate before this last step, which would mean lifting the bridge that is flung across the Irish Sea. Over this bridge pass in never-ending file the young men and women looking for work in England or the far-flung lands of the British Empire. They send money home from their earnings, but he does not fear the loss of that any more than he would fear a tariff. He refuses to lift that bridge because across it walk not only the peasant and workingman but thousands of the middle class, graduates of colleges and universities, persons who, if they stayed at home, might interfere with the smooth working of his own hand-made constitution, which "recognizes the special position of the Catholic Apostolic Church as the guardian of the faith professed by the great majority of the citizens." Establishment of an Irish republic would make them aliens in the British Empire, and once forced to find work at home they would quickly challenge this "special position," protesting that the church is too deeply imbedded in the economic life of the country, that church services and visits to the sick form only a tiny fraction of the activities of the priests, monks, and nuns.



ENGLISHMAN: "But how can you blow [redacted] out of Ireland when I'm not in it?"
PATRIOT: "Arrah, [redacted] sinsible. Isn't that the [redacted] Oi have to blow yez back into it first!"

MORE [redacted] [redacted]

Take from the hands of lay workers the vast educational system of a country, positions in both public and private schools ranging from that of principal to kindergartner; take from them the manifold jobs connected with social service, orphanages, settlement houses, hospitals, clinics, visiting charities, homes for the aged, and institutions for delinquents—and you have taken away the means of livelihood of a large section of the population. The lay teachers occasionally found in Irish schools and the few lay nurses in the hospitals are usually brothers, sisters, nieces, or nephews of a member of the clergy. Even doctors, lawyers, and business men, occupying positions in which the clergy cannot compete, are dependent on the latter for good-will, and outside the city of Dublin would be hard put to make a living should they incur the priests' disapproval.

It was not the power of Rome, as it was in France and Spain, that lifted the Irish clergy to their high place, nor do they hold it solely by the support of a superstitious peasantry. They are part of the very fabric of the country's history, and history is something that no Irishman willingly forgets. It is little more than a hundred years since Catholicism and patriotism ceased to be synonymous; before that the priest played as perilous a role as does the I. R. A. soldier of today. He was an outlaw, saying Mass on the bleak hilltops, teaching in the foggy "hedge schools," visiting the sick at night, sleeping and eating when he could. Reckless in the pursuance of his duty, he became a heroic figure, embodying in his person all the qualities which the Irish most revered. These qualities are no longer evident, but the tradition lasts and has created a country that is more clerical than religious. The tourist will not find in Eire the stately cathedrals or lovely shrines of Catholic Europe, but he will see lots of fat priests strolling through the towns and villages while a respectful population doffs its hat.

"Why," one may ask, "has not this hero-worship cooled in three generations?" The answer is that the people who could have whittled the priest down to his proper size have left for other lands. The moment Catholic emancipation was established the church came forward and took charge while a bewildered, unorganized Irish population stood by. Since that time the priests have maintained their strangle-hold on the economic life of the middle class; and emigration has seemed the obvious solution. In the meantime the shrewd peasant, instead of using his earnings to give all his children an equal chance, spends everything to make one of them a priest. This son in his turn obtains for his brothers and sisters the lay positions that the church controls. Thus an artificially created bourgeoisie moves steadily into seats left vacant by the emigrants.

Emigration in Catholic countries has always been a vital prop to clerical power. In France, a nation of stay-at-homes, the struggle between the layman and the priest came to a head more than half a century ago; in Spain, with South America offering work to the people in considerable numbers, it arrived a good deal later; in Ireland, with unlimited opportunities for the painless deportation of intellectuals, the problem has not been attacked at all. It never will be if Mr. de Valera can help it. Not that he wants the clergy to have so much more of the good things of life than the common people enjoy; it is simply the only condition under which he can maintain the Ireland of today and yesterday. A deeply religious man, he wants a land free of divorce and birth control, where boys and girls are brought up in purity and where neither they nor their fathers and mothers read "bad" books. In the anxious years that he has steered the ship of state he has never loosed his hold upon the censorship he established, a censorship which is two parts religion and one part English puritanism and probably the most rigid in the modern world. Yet he has never officially banished or persecuted a writer. Armed with vast powers for a seven-year period, he lives in a veritable dictator's paradise, a paradise sans purges, sans martyrs, thanks to the British Empire, which takes to its bosom the more refractory of his fellow-citizens.

It is no wonder that the I. R. A. is a thorn in his side, for he knows that if it succeeds in making a separate, independent country of Holy Ireland, it will open a Pandora's box, and he will not be able to cope with the middle-class men and women who, forced to stay at home, will lock horns with the clergy in their struggle for a living.

So Eire's Prime Minister is making it plain to Britain that he will join it in suppressing the I. R. A. At times, however, he gets an uneasy feeling that Britain may not join him. Changes are taking place within the empire. In Ulster young descendants of British settlers are growing up who feel remote from England and who wonder if their interests do not lie to the south rather than to the east. Nor is the picture in England as clear cut as the American sees it—millions of Britons standing shoulder to shoulder opposing separation. There are plenty of practical men who feel that in England's present crisis a free Irishman growing wheat around the corner is more to be desired than a subject Irishman throwing bombs in English sewers. Among them are merchants, executives, and business men, and more numerous still, employed and unemployed workingmen, who are sick of the Irish question. You need attend only an occasional meeting in Liverpool, Manchester, Edinburgh, or Glasgow, or read the letters which appear in such abundance in the newspapers, to realize that the sentiments of thousands could be summed up in one sentence, "Give them their blasted republic and send them back to it." Reams of statistics are quoted to show how unemployment could be reduced if the inhabitants of the Land of Heart's Desire would stay at home.

The I. R. A. leaders are fully aware of this sentiment; what they do not know is how much support they can expect from the officers and men of Eire's own army, or how many recruits they will get from Northern Ireland and the Irish dwelling in England. They realize that the hanging of two of their members will arouse sympathy, and sympathy can be translated into more volunteers from Eire and more money from the United States. Such assets are worth little in the present state of affairs, but if the European war is intensified and the I. R. A. continues to snap at the heels of the harassed British lion, it is not impossible that the dismayed Mr. de Valera may find a republic handed to him on a platter.

In the Wind

REPRESENTATIVE FRANK HOOK is planning to renew his attack on Martin Dies, and a new blast is likely to be issued soon. When the letters linking Pelley to Dies were shown to be forgeries, Hook withdrew his whole address. Now he is rewriting it, stressing the evidence of Dies's collaboration with Merwin K. Hart. Meanwhile, Pelley's magazine Liberation is becoming a perennial embarrassment to Dies and his committee; its latest issue boasts that Chairman Starnes promised to "protect" Pelley if he came to Washington to testify.

SOME MONTHS ago, anti-Nazis relate, Robert Ley, head of the German Labor Front, bought a house near Berchtesgaden for 100,000 marks. The night he moved in a sign was mysteriously placed on the door reading: "Where did Ley get 100,000 marks to buy this house?" Indignant, Ley posted a notice the next day offering a 1,000-mark reward for apprehension of the man who posted the sign. That night another sign mysteriously appeared on the house: "Where did Ley get 101,000 marks?"

LONDON IS flooded with stories lampooning the war-time censorship. The latest is about an officer, on leave from his regiment, who received a letter from a friend at the front. The letter concluded with this sentence: "If only the Nazis would come over here, we'd chase the whole lot to ——." The last word had been struck out by the censor with the notation: "All references to future movements of enemy troops are strictly forbidden." When the officer returned to his regiment he asked the writer what the censored word had been. It was "hell."

MRS. ELLWOOD J. TURNER, corresponding secretary of the Daughters of Colonial Wars, has appealed to Philadelphia school authorities to ban a textbook written by Harold Rugg. Mrs. Turner, according to the Associated Press, pointed out that "all the old histories taught 'my country, right or wrong.' The Rugg book teaches children to be biased instead of teaching them real Americanism."

FREDERICK T. BIRCHALL, former managing editor of the New York Times, who now covers Canada, is engaged in a minor war with Times executives. It all started when Birchall sent a dispatch describing repressive activities of the Catholic church in Quebec. The copy was slashed by one of the night editors and all references to the church deleted. Whereupon Birchall dispatched a bitter protest to managing editor Edwin L. James and publisher Arthur Hays Sulzberger, and the tumult hasn't subsided yet.

THE SPRING CATALOGUE of Columbia University lists this course: "Russian, Russian conversation (for U. S. Army officers)."

[The prize for the best item submitted during February goes to Norton Thompson of Long Island City for the item about war pictures published two weeks ago.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE apparent espousal of the Allied cause by Turkey is not so easy to explain, for it was believed at the outset of the war, even by such an able observer as H. N. Brailsford, the English authority on Russia, that Turkey would remain neutral lest it get into war with the Soviet Union. It is not certain just what Turkey is to receive from the Allies for this aid besides the Syrian province of Aleppo and a French agreement to sell to it planes, machine-guns, rifles, and the like. Remembering, however, the secret treaties of the last war, and knowing that the Allies were under the absolute necessity of coming to terms with Turkey, one cannot but wonder if there are not other considerations. Even so, the aggressive acts of the Turkish government—the expulsion of German workmen and experts, the taking over of German ships being built in Turkey, the declaration of a state of emergency, and the alleged threats to Russian oil holdings in Baku—are not easy to understand, though they are obviously a cause of rejoicing for the Allies.

This aggressiveness is bound to have an important influence upon Italy. It will be accepted in Rome that the Turks have made up their minds that the Allies are going to win and therefore have joined their standard. Whether Italy can continue to hesitate or seek to stay on the fence remains to be seen; emboldened by Turkish friendliness the Allies may be more inclined to compel Mussolini to take sides. Il Duce cannot but be rendered nervous by Turkey's apparent readiness to fight when there is no emergency and no threat to its sovereignty. As Mr. Brailsford has written, "They are linked opponents who must watch each other's steps." Finally, it must be noted that, if the Allies are seriously contemplating moving upon Rumania, Turkish aid to enable them to enter the Black Sea with warships and transports is essential. Should Rumania decide to cut Germany off from the 130,000 tons of oil a month it has agreed to supply to Hitler, that might well be the direct result of the aggressiveness of the Turkish government.

With Turkey actively lined up with the Allies it would more than ever be difficult to speak of them as "the democracies." Although it ranks as a republic and has a parliament, Turkey has actually been a complete dictatorship ever since the last war. There is only one party, the People's Party, and this has been represented in parliament by 389 members out of 399. Kemal Atatürk worked incessantly until his death to modernize and rebuild Turkey. Under him the country made amazing advances, and he was so fearful of another war with the Allies, or of one with Russia, that he was responsible for moving the capital from Constantinople to the specially developed city of Ankara, which is only a few miles beyond the furthermost point in Anatolia reached by the armies of the Allies during the last war. It is surely a remarkable about-face which makes the government now apparently lean so far toward the side of the nations against which it fought in 1914-18. That the possibility of going to war on their side is being seriously considered—even invited—is proof of the extraordinary changes—social, economic, and political—that have taken place in Turkey in the last quarter of a century.

The government's present attitude is even more striking in view of the fact that Germany has been Turkey's best customer. During the first eight months of 1939 more than 50 per cent of all Turkish exports were sold to Germany, which in turn provided 55 per cent of Turkey's total imports. Obviously the Allies must have given Turkey complete assurance that it will be able to find other customers with which to do business, at least until the war is over; there was a Turkish-German commercial agreement which expired about the time of Germany's invasion of Poland. The London Economist is strongly of the opinion that the redistribution of trade was essential for Turkey and that continued subservience to German economic methods might have seriously endangered the very foundations of Turkish foreign trade. The first move of the Turkish government after the arrangement with Germany ended was to insure a complete supply of foodstuffs, and the next was to relax the control of exports in order to obtain necessary supplies of raw materials and semi-finished products from abroad.

Curiously enough, it is the United States that will profit most. The Turks decided to stimulate immediately the purchase of supplies of vital American goods, and the government obligated itself to lend dollars for use in the New York market. Limited companies have been set up to handle this new trade with the United States, and have been granted the exclusive right to deal with this country—a new departure in Turkish trade. Undoubtedly these new arrangements have given to Kemal's successor, Ismet Inönü, some of the confidence manifest in his sudden change of attitude and in the government's announcement that Turkey is not neutral. Naturally the Turkish people have no say about this; their dictator tells them what to do and when to die on the battlefield. Theirs but to do and die.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Wild Goose

JAMES JOYCE. By Herbert Gorman. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.50.

THE structure of Joyce's life is defined in his colophons. Dublin, 1904-Trieste, 1914; Trieste-Zurich-Paris, 1914-1921; Paris, 1922-1939. These cities are the signals of his destiny, these dates the index of his elected career, and they tell a story that found its symbol in the title and allegory of his greatest book. It has remained for Mr. Gorman to supply one date and to span one interval—that from Joyce's birth in Rathgar on February 2, 1882, to the fateful morning of Bloomsday, June 16, 1904—for the design to stand complete. And it requires only a glance at the portraits in this biography—aloof, quizzical, intense, remote—to catch the note of daemonic conviction that drove its hero to repudiate his Irish birthright that he might claim his European inheritance and so forge in the smithy of his soul the uncreated conscience of his race. Yet he remained spiritually anchored in his native port, whose subtlest details of life and history no long term of "silence, exile, and cunning" was ever able to efface from his mind.

No life—certainly no creative life—is successful that does not find its instinctive pattern, its final embodiment in a myth or allegory of the spirit. In Joyce a tenacious egoism of this kind existed from childhood. It is not strange that he held contemptuously aloof from the conscious aestheticism and elaborately dramatized cultural ambitions of the Irish Revival of his youth. Yeats's pursuit of selfhood, of "unity of being," must have seemed a luxurious and experimental indulgence to the fierce sense of integrity that possessed Joyce in 1904, dictating his future course of exile and hardship, and standing over him, like a tyrant with a rod, until he had vindicated his pride by producing his books. He wrote them against every conceivable obstacle of poverty, persecuting publishers, popular hostility, and terrifying physical affliction. "Steeled in the school of old Aquinas," he accepted a logic more ruthless than that of the eclectic schools or aesthetic experiments flourishing around him. Fitful, defeated, and tragically distracted though his middle years appear in this narrative, there flies through them the arrow of his life's central and undeviating passion. When it struck its goal the last word of "Ulysses" was written, and the word was Yes.

"Formal criticism of Joyce's work has no part in this book," says Mr. Gorman, and the quality of its writing—rough, rapid, graphic, and gross—does not make one regret the omission. Even in matters of fact there is some room for protest. One would like to have more details on Joyce's early studies and reading. At least three generally known aspects of his personal life are vaguely passed over. The making of "Finnegans Wake" is handled sketchily by comparison with the exhaustive genesis supplied for "Ulysses," and its central motives are wholly ignored. And despite Joyce's close assistance, Mr. Gorman grows obtuse when it comes to specifying the nature of Joyce's family relations, his religious and political emotions, and his aesthetic beliefs. None of these facts is omitted by the test of formal criticism, and they insist on the future collaboration between biography and criticism which a career, a background, and an art like Joyce's make imperative. Meanwhile, Mr. Gorman's documents are of the liveliest appeal. His account of the Dublin days, of schooling at Clongowes, Belvedere, and University College, of the Italian and Swiss years, and of Joyce's reappearance on the scene of Paris supplements at every point the exegesis of Stuart Gilbert and Frank Budgen.

The central fact of Joyce's career is his unremitting and undeflected tenacity of purpose. But another fact emerges—the felicity of his defeats. They caused his break with Dublin at what appears to have been the precisely opportune moment; they rescued him from Paris bohemianism in 1903; they saved him from obscure collusion with the frightened publishers of Dublin and London and so gave his books time to have a critical reception prepared for them before being mauled by the general public; at their worst, in the shape of his ruined eyesight, they even brought him munificent financial relief just when he most needed the seclusion that prepared the path for his ascent to the lonely and uncharted country of "Finnegans Wake." What Mr. Gorman makes most impressive is the unflagging enthusiasm of Joyce's spirit, not only in relation to the endless labor of his manuscripts and proof sheets, but in the personal contacts, trivial diversions, and practical anxieties of his life. To anyone who has caught, at the heart of his tales, their piercing human compassion, high mirth, and exquisite sympathy for the meanest pathos of obscure and blundering lives, it comes as a special force to find that Joyce carried these qualities into his daily life, making them the obverse of the pride and intransigence of his aesthetic and moral temper. Like many men of taste and intelligence, he has written ribald and scurrilous verse all his life, and like most men of taste and intelligence he has left them unpublished. Mr. Gorman includes a number of them, and they immediately suggest the tradition of Swift. Joyce's lifelong love of music and lyric verse, his early reverence for Ibsen, his taste in verse translation, his wit in satire and travesty, the domiciliary restlessness natural to a man who has rejected the true home of his spirit—these facets of his intelligence reveal the complex and multiplied consciousness that has existed in a physical life of the most rigorous and straitened circumstances. They account for a temperament endlessly curious, exploring, mercurial, and sympathetic—and quite as endlessly disciplined by a purpose and by ineffaceable personal and racial allegiances.

They also make it imperative to recognize in Joyce's art the basic components of his character: its Catholic conscience, its racial and aesthetic sentimentality, its formal discipline, its expressive faculty, and the continuous sublimation of its fancies in the most minutely recorded and remembered realism, even when it plumbs the darkest abysses of dream. Superficially his life is fitful, defiant, agonized, and remote.

It has never been evasive, listless, irresponsible, or unreal. The daemon that possessed it made virtues of its defects, and so gave Joyce's books the tragic insight, the long persistence, the comprehensive humor, and the isolated courage that form their claim to distinction among the discoveries of the spirit. MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Dissenting Opinion

THE AMERICAN ENTENTE. By R. B. Mowat. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

THE DEADLY PARALLEL. By C. Hartley Grattan. Stackpole Sons. $2.

KEEP AMERICA OUT OF WAR. By Norman Thomas and Bertram D. Wolfe. Frederick A. Stokes. $1.50.

THE SECOND WORLD WAR: FIRST PHASE. By Duff Cooper. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

HITLER'S GERMANY. By Karl Loewenstein. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

THE WAY OUT OF WAR. By Cesar Saerchinger. The Macmillan Company. 60 cents.

EGOTISM IN GERMAN PHILOSOPHY. By George Santayana. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

WAR IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY. Edited by Willard Waller. Random House. $3.

CAN AMERICA STAY NEUTRAL? By Allen W. Dulles and Hamilton Fish Armstrong. $2.50.

AMERICA'S CHANCE OF PEACE. By Duncan Aikman and Blair Bolles. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $1.

COMMON SENSE NEUTRALITY. Edited by Paul Comly French. Hastings House. $2.

IM WESTEN, NICHTS NEUES, but on the American literary front the carnage is terrific. The point of view expressed in this latest batch of war books ranges from that of R. B. Mowat's "American Entente" to that of C. Hartley Grattan's "The Deadly Parallel." Mowat's book may win him the Garter, but Grattan's will shut the door forever on an honorary degree from Nicholas Murray Butler. Mowat is professor of history at an English university, but judging from his book he does not always practice what he professes. His account of Anglo-American relations, ending in the conclusion that the two nations "completely trust each other," has a high sugar content and is rich in butter fat. Grattan's book is a fighting-mad comparison between the propaganda that took us into the last war and the propaganda helping to get us into this one. Norman Thomas and Bertram D. Wolfe present a no-entanglement program that includes restoration of the arms embargo, reduction of Presidential powers to make war (and mischief), and control or government ownership of the munitions industry. The articles and speeches of Duff Cooper collected in "The Second World War: First Phase" should help disabuse Americans of the notion that the British ruling class has any intention of turning this war into a crusade for democracy. I hasten to add that the conclusions I drew from the book do not seem to be the ones intended.

None of my best friends are Nazis, but I cannot approach these books in the belief that the present war is "a struggle between two totally incompatible ideas of man's destiny." In Karl Loewenstein's able and compact "Hitler's Germany: The Nazi Background to War" I see the picture of a state based on ideas of man's destiny totally incompatible with those which underlie democracy. But judging from their conduct at Munich and on other occasions, I am not at all sure that Chamberlain and Daladier share that point of view, and they are not without influence in the running of the war. It may be, as Loewenstein contends, that Hitler will be overthrown "only if the regime is shaken in its foundations by serious blows on the battlefield." But I am dubious when he writes that revolution "will occur only if and when the victorious armies of the Western powers pour into Germany and allow the people to burn out the regime to its roots." I find it hard to picture the armies of Chamberlain and Daladier supporting a German revolution. Neither can fairly be described as Old Bolsheviks. Their own preferences are for a "conservative insurrection." Pale pink is apt to look red in Chamberlain's limited political spectrum. As for helping to burn out the regime "to its roots," that seems definitely on the optimistic side. For the roots of Hitlerism are intertwined with the roots of Anglo-French imperialism, with the rivalry of Britain and Germany for markets and for sea power, and with the old struggle between Germany and France over the Rhine. Hitler cannot "organize" Europe. But neither can Britain and France, except in the sense that they organized it at Versailles. As Cesar Saerchinger says in "The Way Out of War," a new addition to the Macmillan People's Library, "Hitler himself was only the symptom of a disease that has been gnawing at Europe's vitals for years." The struggle between the fascist and the democratic powers seems to me only an extension in intensified form of the imperialist struggle. The ideological factor is largely a smoke screen. The Nazis were ready to give up their hatred for bolshevism when a pact with the U. S. S. R. suited their purposes. The U. S. S. R. was ready to revise the "line" of the Comintern for a pact with Berlin. The Allies, cultivating the friendship of those well-known democrats, Franco and Mussolini, might be glad to give up the struggle between "two incompatible ideas of man's destiny" for an alliance with Hitler against the U. S. S. R.

Like Grattan, I see no issue here that warrants American intervention. I see no solution to this conflict that could possibly compensate us for the expenditure of lives and money, and for the bigotry, madness, and folly inevitably unchained by war. This struggle among England, France, Germany, and Russia, with the line-up shifting as strategy dictates, has been going on ever since the appearance of the European state system. The ideologies change. The basic factors of national interest, geographical position, and commercial rivalry remain virtually the same. I strongly suspect that the interminable wars will end only, as did the similarly suicidal warfare of the Greek cities, with mutual exhaustion. The issues, as always, are cloaked in moral terms. They were last time, as "The Deadly Parallel" shows. Grattan's hard-hitting little book may be recommended to the fevered and the perplexed. This new war began as the last war did—in a clash between German and Anglo-French imperialism, masked on the Allied side then as a crusade against Kaiserism. Judging from Duff Cooper's interview with reporters last October on his arrival in New York, the Allies—having fought one war to get rid of Kaiserism—are now fighting another to restore it.

The present struggle may also take up where the last one left off—in an attempt to make Russia safe for oil cartels and capitalism. I am not prepared to champion the present Russian regime. It seems to use the same kind of propaganda against the Finns that big powers—ourselves included—invariably use in their attacks on smaller neighbors. But whatever the true nature of the regime in Moscow, a holy war against it, like England's holy war against the "ungodly" Jacobinism of France a century and half ago, will be an excuse for the fiercest kind of repression at home of all who believe in social reform, though it be of the mildest variety. It is this, indeed, rather than concern for the poor downtrodden, ill-clothed, ill-housed, and ill-fed Russian workers that gives the idea of an anti-Soviet crusade such appeal in some circles. There comes to mind a certain Mr. Hoover, who made a reputation as a humanitarian by feeding hungry Belgians, lost it by refusing to feed hungry Americans, and is trying to regain it by feeding hungry Finns.

All the old nonsense about the Germans as a basically wicked and depraved people is reappearing. Scribner's has brought out a new edition of George Santayana's "Egotism in German Philosophy," which first showed us in 1916 the painful but instructive spectacle of the philosopher as mob. Santayana again abandons the life of reason in war time. Harry Elmer Barnes, writing of the last war in Willard Waller's comprehensive and useful symposium on "Wars in the Twentieth Century," should serve to remind us that the seeds of Kaiserism and Hitlerism may be found in the political thinking of Americans, Englishmen, and Frenchmen as well as in that of Germans. If Germany had its Treitschke and Bernhardi, France had its Barrès and Déroulède, England its Kipling and Cramb, we our Hearsts and Teddy Roosevelts.

Nothing is so likely to fertilize the seeds of fascism in the democracies as another war to end war. War is part of our civilization, just as the hope of ending war is always part of war propaganda. "The Western state system," Max Lerner writes in his shrewd contribution to the Waller symposium, "is as surely a war system as it is economically a capitalist system and politically a system of organized force." Idealists able to sway the masses with their eloquence are as necessary to a war system as munitions makers or professional soldiers. Men will not kill each other en masse except for the loftiest reasons. You will find these rationalizations of war time debated pro and con in "Can We Stay Neutral?" by Dulles and Armstrong (they think we can't), in "America's Chances of Peace" by Aikman and Bolles (they are not too hopeful), and in Paul C. French's symposium on "Common Sense Neutrality." Charles A. Beard's contribution to this symposium may be useful to those over-fearful of a German victory, and there is blunt Marine language in Major General Smedley D. Butler's warnings in the same volume. I particularly recommend for meditation two sentences from Willard Waller's discussion of theories as to the origins of war. "Perhaps the simplest theory, and the most widely held," Waller says, "is what we may call the moralistic theory. Wars are bad because bad men make them." Hitler is a bad man, but there's more to the war than that.

I. F. STONE

THREE SHORT NOVELS BY

KAY BOYLE

The Crazy Hunter

Here in one book are three novelettes which undeniably constitute the finest writing of this great modern artist. They are all, in their different ways, love stories. Even Kay Boyle's most fervent admirers will be amazed at the perceptive power, the almost eerie subtlety and truth of stories which represent an even fuller flowering of her art.
$2.50

THE ART AND LIFE OF

William Shakespeare

By HAZELTON SPENCER

"By all odds the best compendium of Shakespeareana ever written and is right up to this date of 1940. It presents all that the inquisitive layman need know, and more than most scholars do." —N. Y. Times Book Review

"For the general reader, the ideally useful, informative companion volume to the plays." —Time Magazine

"All the known facts, together with a compendium of criticism, interpretation, and stage history which represents a remarkable job of sifting." —The Nation

"A witty and scholarly book, distinguished by good sense and excellent literary taste." —The New Yorker

495 pages, and many photographs, $3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

American Painting as American

THE BIRTH OF THE AMERICAN TRADITION IN ART. By Oskar Hagen. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

THE question of European influences upon American culture has smoldered sullenly for a good many years, occasionally flaring up into acrimonious debate. Is American culture only an extension of European culture or has it developed a character of its own? In the field of art the contenders for a simple European transit have had things pretty much their own way, and their conclusions have been mainly disparaging. What they found in American art in its early phases was "illiterate versions" of European art and in recent decades feeble imitations or a backwash of European movements.

The weakness of this debate has been that its terms have been generalized. The prime materials, the pictures, have been insufficiently considered. Though other critics have done invaluable spade work in dating and describing early American paintings, Mr. Hagen is the first to view them in close comparison with the European art from which they have been supposed to derive. He is also the first to consider the early, mainly anonymous American works of the late seventeenth and early eighteenth century as anything more than scattered and sporadic. He finds in them a common approach that differs from that of the English or Dutch art to which they have been generally related: in other words, he advances, and I think successfully proves, that American art began to be distinctively American at the beginning, mainly by a reduction to primitive elements. In this connection Mr. Hagen's evaluation of Tudor and Stuart art is new. At many points he offers the fruits of fresh research and a fresh synthesis, and he constantly ranges pictures or groups of pictures beside each other, the American against typical Dutch or English works, to establish comparisons. Fortunately he has a most sensitive perception of the peculiar qualities in form, color, handling which distinguish given works.

The lines which Mr. Hagen traces through our colonial art run from the early anonymous works through Feke—rather than Smibert, who is related here to the English school in portraiture—and thence to Copley, who makes the final subject of the book. Mr. Hagen has much that is illuminating to say about Copley's development in his American phase but perhaps even more about this artist's European career. The accepted conclusion has been that Copley's work declined when he went to England and entered the popular field of history painting, that he merely tagged after the prevailing English school. Mr. Hagen shows interestingly and conclusively that this was not true but that Copley achieved for this phase of art a new and broad use of form and a new emphasis upon detailed portraiture.

The tragedy for American art, as Mr. Hagen sees it, was that Copley did not return to this country to become the official history painter of the Revolution, thus to reestablish his powerful influence here in new terms. Perhaps in his enthusiasm for Copley Mr. Hagen argues in too summary a fashion that essential strands in an American tradition were cut because this artist chose to remain in England. Mr. Hagen himself has proved with much force that the tradition to which Copley gave a rich climax was well rooted in this country. This conclusion might have been demonstrated with even greater breadth, I believe, if he had chosen to consider more fully the varied work subsumed under the name of Pietr Vanderlyn, and, in its time sequence, that of Ralph Earl, to whom he gives only a few paragraphs. We could wish, too, that the qualities which Mr. Hagen believes to be peculiarly American had been discussed more freely. A somewhat naive angularity, a departure from social graces, a fairly uncompromising realism, a bold emphasis upon design: these make the main portion of it, but for the most part we must derive these qualities for ourselves, and occasionally the sense of them is lost in the abundance of biographical detail and in the running arguments with Mr. Alan Burroughs.

But the details have their importance, and Mr. Hagen's ardors are refreshing. He has written a basic work in all senses of the term, as important for its method of approach as for its disclosures. In "The Birth of the American Tradition" he reaches the era of the Revolution. Successive periods in American art are still pretty well tangled. We shall hope that he will bring to them his special discernments and similar comparisons in further volumes.

CONSTANCE ROURKE

The Imperfect Yankee

CALVIN COOLIDGE. By Claude M. Fuess. Little, Brown and Company. $4.75.

MOST people who begin to read a biography of Coolidge find themselves lying in wait for the didactic statement about New England. In the present book it appears on page 4: "Coolidge bore the unmistakable stamp of the perfect Yankee." The trouble with Coolidge biographers continues to be that they are suckers for Vermont. Cal was "New England incarnate," but in a country largely populated by New Englanders that is hardly a descriptive phrase. Let's forget then the platitudes about New England and remember only the simpler picture of a runt in a lean land.

Mr. Fuess's biography invites comparison with William Allen White's "Puritan in Babylon." In his introduction Mr. White admits that his book is an apology. Mr. Fuess's introduction on the other hand closes with these words: ". . . he was a great and a good man." And his book is the more revealing because he has been less aware of what there was to conceal.

"Calvin Coolidge" is an "in-no-sense-official" biography. Writing in the easy, assured style of the after-dinner biographer Mr. Fuess paints a picture of a pocket Lincoln. It's a portrait for the White House library, but the interesting thing about it is that the painter let something slip in. Unseen by the artist the unhappy shadow of the true Cal rises from the canvas like a mist.

The trouble all began when Galoosh Coolidge, who had a touch of the heroic, married the woman who introduced the pickle-puss strain into the Coolidges. Humor went; only up-country wit remained. Cal's father was a big man with Galoosh's big expressive mouth, but he wore it pulled down at the corners in complacent, unrelenting righteousness; his son Cal was to make the pickle famous.

LIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Coolidge's mother was slight of frame and a chronic invalid; she died when he was twelve. From her Cal inherited his smallish stature and less rugged health. He was a high-average boy in most ways, this runt, and strong enough to get along; but he liked to tease smaller boys and little girls and therefore must have been teased himself. He was very, very shy; so probably he was intimidated at home. His grandmother used to shut him in a windowless attic, and he never went there twice for the same offense. Once she gave him a dollar not to go to a dance, and he not only took the money but stayed away from the dance. Of his father he said, "I cannot recall that I ever knew of his doing a wrong thing." Cal never rebelled against authority. He just harbored a wistful memory of his mother and tried hard to please. If he forgot to fill the wood-box he got up in the night to do it so as to avoid a row in the morning. Spending his childhood among more vital people, Cal, the runt, had to live by his wits. His strategy was simple: be a good boy and never fly in the face of authority.

At Amherst the runt came in among the last in a ceremonial sophomore race and as a forfeit had to make a speech. This is how it ended, "Remember, boys, the Good Book says, 'The last shall be first, the first last.' " That crack made Coolidge popular, but it did more. It summed up the philosophy of the runt who survives because there is no glory in his defeat. From here on the successful life of Coolidge presents itself with tragic justice. The exultation of victory deserved was never his. He could achieve only scorn, the scorn of the wood-box filler for the fire lighter; the scorn that a man like Coolidge, who above all knows his own value, must have for the fool world that will swallow Coolidge. He had self-respect resting on a conviction of inadequacy and motivated by a consuming filial love.

When Coolidge got out of Amherst, he asked his father to decide what he should do. He went to the Massachusetts legislature, and the first bill he introduced was one to prohibit the licensing of cars that could go over twenty miles an hour. As governor he did nothing in the Boston police strike, but when the smoke had cleared he admirably stated the people's case. Here was Cal who always knew the score as a wood-box filler, knew how much wood had been burned, yet who could never call the next play because he had never dared try to lead. Here was Cal who understood that the world couldn't tell a score-keeper from a score-maker; here was Cal, made by a dozen fools, as the Boston Herald pointed out in an article that it and Fuess thought was a defense; here was Cal, pathetically, honestly grateful to all those dozen fools; here was Cal who asked his father to swear him into office ostensibly as a loving publicity gesture while really he compelled a final obeisance to Colonel John's good boy. When his father was dying Calvin wrote him: "I think only two or three fathers have seen their sons chosen to be President. . . If that was what you wanted you have much to be thankful for. . . ." In March, 1926, Coolidge's father died, and a little more than a year later Coolidge handed his "I do not choose" to the reporters. Coolidge did not choose because the man who in spirit—and often in fact—had always chosen for him was dead. Cal was just biographer bait from then on.

This is the man who in the platinum-plated twenties was so far behind the age that all the world thought he might be

"Do you know how I would live if I renounced religion and was illogical enough to disbelieve in a life beyond—in the real life? Why, if I threw away and denounced my faith, I would surround myself with the most adroit hijackers, learn every trick of the highest banking and stock manipulations, avail myself of the laws under which to hide my own crimes, create a smokescreen to throw into the eyes of men and—believe me, I would become the world's champion crook."

—From an interview between Father Coughlin and Ruth Mugglebee, author of Father Coughlin, the Radio Priest.

JOHN L. SPIVAK....

America's Ace Detective Reporter wanted to know about

Father Coughlin:

Is he the brains behind the Christian Front? What happens to the money he collects? In whose interest is it collected? Have his books ever been audited? Is he hand-in-glove with Nazi agents? Is he inciting to riot? Is he violating Canon Law?

HE UNEARTHED THE TRUTH . . . HE PRESENTS THE FACTS . . . THE DOCUMENTS TO PROVE THEM

Here is the complete low-down on the various activities of the radio priest—with photostats, documents, letters, brokerage accounts to back each vitally important finding. $2.00

SHRINE OF THE SILVER DOLLAR

MODERN AGE BOOKS, INC., 432—4th AVENUE, N. Y.

ahead; the laissez-faire-weather President who let the bandwagon get out of hand and quacked speedometer readings to the heedless world with the voice of Donald Duck and the heart of the third little pig. This is the ghost that rises from the pages of the Fuess biography, and this is Mr. Fuess's great and good man, his "perfect Yankee." It is a merit of the painting that it gives off a ghost so easily, a ghost who is just one of history's routine ironies but who, none the less, undeceived and sad, looks at his oily portrait with a pathos that is tragic and—in a nation of imperfect Yankees—universal as well. LOVELL THOMPSON

Murder Stories Will Out

WINDLESS CABINS. By Mark Van Doren. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

I HAVE too much respect for Mr. Van Doren's abilities to believe that this second novel of his is actually a very recent piece of writing, unless, like Carlyle with "Past and Present," he may have dashed it off as a bit of recreation after the arduous labor of a large, serious volume—in this case, his study of Shakespeare. "Windless Cabins" is a very romantic murder story in which the principal characters have all the trappings of Victorian melodrama except black cloak and lace-trimmed parasol. Not that a poetic murder yarn is anomalous per se—witness "Macbeth" and "Hamlet"—but when you make your hero a man-of-all-work in a tourist cabin camp and furnish him with a family of plain American white trash, the reader wants to be able to believe in him and wants his simple country sweetheart to be a woman of flesh and blood. Here the rustic protagonists talk like starry-eyed hero and ethereal lady out of Charlotte M. Yonge; the diabolical Mr. Delano, with his smooth tongue and slick city ways, merely drives a sleek roadster instead of twirling a sleek mustache; and the eccentric old aunt who terrifies everyone but eventually solves the lovers' problem sounds about as plausible as a ghost.

There is some beautiful writing in the chapters that depict the young hero's morbid imaginings after he has accidentally killed Delano in a fit of anger; that is the part in which a poet, like Mr. Van Doren, naturally would let himself out, reveling in vivid, fanciful prose. But you have to believe in people before you sympathize with their self-torturings, and I found the only convincing folk in the story were Dutch Berger and his wife, cloddish owners of Windless Cabins, where the whole unlikely tragedy occurs.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

Coming Soon in The Nation

Max Eastman's "Stalin's Russia and the Crisis in Socialism"

Reviewed by ABRAM L. HARRIS

"The Collected Poems of A. E. Housman"

Reviewed by MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

About Vitamins

VITAMINS IN THEORY AND PRACTICE. By Leslie J. Harris. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE VITAMINS—A SYMPOSIUM. The Americal Medical Association. $1.50.

IN THE past year I have received a number of requests for good books on nutrition and on vitamins. In response to these inquiries, I recommend the two volumes listed above.

In "Vitamins in Theory and Practice," a worker in this particular field has put together the various lines of attack leading to the knowledge that proteins, carbohydrates, minerals, and fats alone are not sufficient to maintain an animal. Dr. Harris writes well and is not afraid to depict the struggles and the drama that surrounded these investigations. It is not generally known that two lines of scientific work converged in the vitamin field. There was on the one hand the study of adequate diet, which led to the startling discovery, for a long time not accepted, that the old basic dietary mentioned above—proteins, etc.—needed accessory foods to complete it. On the other hand, scientists had found that certain diseases, such as beri-beri, scurvy, and rickets, could be cured by minute amounts of some mysterious substance. When these two avenues finally converged, a new group of deficiency diseases emerged, separate from diseases of germ origin. The League of Nations last year officially recognized this classification of diseases, and in so doing took an important step in the liberation of medical thought in general from the over-application of the germ theory to all diseases.

Dr. Harris surveys the older work that led to remedies for this or that disease without any knowledge of the mechanism of the cure. This makes interesting reading today, because it can now be seen how significant those early discoveries were. In the last few years England has awakened to the problem of general malnutrition resulting from inadequate vitamins. For this awakening men like the author have been largely responsible, because they have taken their discoveries into the field of public health and demanded that the knowledge be used for the public betterment. In the United States we still lack, to cite one example, any organized attack upon pellagra in the South, a disease known to be due to the lack of vitamin P. Our public-health departments have elected the germ in preference to economic conditions as their arch-enemy. However, even the economic aspect of deficiency disease is well treated by Dr. Harris.

The increasingly wide demand for vitamins in this country has led the American Medical Association to prepare a symposium on the subject, in which authorities in various sections of vitamin research have summarized the work in their own special fields. The result of this method is of course that some chapters are extremely lucid, while others are not. It is, however, an excellent compilation and, in combination with Dr. Harris's book, makes a reference work of great usefulness. To those wishing authoritative information on this subject, such as dietitians, teachers, and parents, I suggest the reading of the first book and consultation of the second. The symposium is, of course, the better annotated, but since Harris was writing for the general public his account is by far the more readable. HUGH H. DARBY

MUSIC

WEBSTER AITKEN'S playing at his recent recital reminded one of the fact that the performer's art, no less than the composer's, the painter's, the writer's, involves the operation of mind and feeling on a material, and that a performance, no less than a painting, a piece of writing, or music, may exhibit the style that is the impress on a material of individual and forceful qualities of mind and feeling. For listening to Mr. Aitken's playing in the first movement of the Schubert-Krenek Sonata—listening, for example, to the powerful tensions between sounds in a phrase, between phrases in the huge span of the movement—one was aware above all of a style which distinguishes his playing from what is to be heard day in and day out in the concert halls, a style which expresses a way of feeling and thinking about music, of concentrating it down to its essence, that sets him apart from other pianists. That this way of feeling and thinking is not yet fully developed, not yet equal, for example, to the demands of the slow movement of Beethoven's "Hammerklavier" Sonata, is less surprising and less important than that already in so young an artist it is as developed and forceful as it is, that already it is fully equal to the demands of the opening section of the last movement. Even now it makes Mr. Aitken lonely—amid other pianists, amid listeners with ears not for his subtle musicianship in the first movement of the Schubert but for his brilliant virtuosity in the Fuleihan Sonata. And he may expect to be lonelier.

Among further releases under the new Royale label the best are a group of records (ten-inch, $.75) offering some fine vocal music well sung by the Madrigal Singers under the leadership of Lee Jones. The works are Morley's "It Was a Lover and His Lass" and "Dainty Fine Sweet Nymph," Weelkes's "Hark All Ye Lovely Saints," and Gastoldi's "Maidens Fair of Mantua's City" (1790); Weelkes's "Sing We at Pleasure," Wilbye's "Adieu Sweet Amarillis," Morley's "Sing We and Chant It," and the Coventry Carol (1791); Morley's "My Bonny Lass She Smileth," the carol "On Christmas Night," Gevaert's "The Sleep of the Child Jesus," and John Benet's "All Creatures Now Are Merry Minded" (1793); Victoria's superb "O Magnum Mysterium" and Guerrero's "Ave Virgo Sanctissima" (1792); Vecchi's "So Ben Mi Ch'a Bon Tempo," Lassus's "Matona, Mia Cara," Praetorius's "Lo, How a Rose E'er Blooming," and the old French song "From Lyons as I Journeyed" (1794).

On two twelve-inch Royale records (577/8, $2) is Vivaldi's fine Concerto in A minor, played without distinction or grace by Eddy Brown, Roman Totenberg, and a little string orchestra. Two ten-inch records (1826/7, $1.50) offer a better performance by Messrs. Brown, Totenberg, Benno Rabinoff, and Boris Schwarz with strings led by Ernst Victor Wolff at the harpsichord, but a work—an obscure concerto by Leonardo Leo—which, after an impressive beginning, justifies its obscurity. And I advise against Alfred Mirovich's records ($.75 each) of Debussy's "Minstrels" and "The Girl with the Flaxen Hair" (1820), and "The Ox-Cart," "The Old Castle," and "The Great Gate of Kiev" from Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" (1819, 1821); and the Royale Symphony Orchestra's versions of Schubert's Unfinished and Mozart's G minor (Albums 21 and 22, $3.50 each).

The same company has issued under its Varsity label ($.35) a large number of jazz recordings by small bands. Most of them are run-of-the-mill; and of these the Varsity Seven's "Scratch My Back" and "Save It Pretty Mama" (8135), with Benny Carter, Coleman Hawkins, and Joe Sullivan, are better than average. The outstanding performances are the Jess Stacy "Breeze" (the fox-trot, not the blues) (8121), and "I Can't Believe That You're in Love with Me" and "Clarinet Blues" (8132)—the last not for the clarinet solos but for what Stacy does behind the soloists and alone. Other superb jazz performances are the Muggsy Spanier "At the Jazz Band Ball" and "Livery Stable Blues" (Bluebird 10518) and "Riverboat Shuffle" and "Relaxin' at the Touro" (Bluebird 10532); Earl Hines's piano solos, "Rosetta" and "Glad Rag Doll" (Bluebird 10555); and Mildred Bailey's "There'll Be Some Changes Made" (Vocalion 5268), with Mary Lou Williams at the piano. Jimmy Blanton, the new bass player of the Ellington Orchestra, does some playing that is astonishingly inventive and agile in his duets with Ellington, "Blues" and "Plucked Again" (Columbia 35322); but even an inventive and agile string bass is not something one enjoys listening to at length. Alec Templeton's "Phonograph Record, Player Piano, and Carmen

There are
64 VALUES
in LAFAYETTE'S
Radio Line

Whatever the radio you have in mind—portable, table model, automatic radio-phonograph combination . . . whatever the price you choose to pay, Lafayette has the set for you, and offers more for your money. More wanted features, more realism of reproduction, more cabinet beauty, more fine quality throughout. There are sixty-four distinguished models in the Lafayette line for 1940 — every [illegible] value! Send today for Catalog No. NC2 describing the complete line.

LAFAYETTE RADIO
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

[illegible] E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
24 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

THE NATION will deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Readers Service Division
The Nation - 55 Fifth Avenue - New York

Lombardo" and "Mendelssohn Mows 'em Down" (Victor 26440) are diverting but not on the level of his devastating burlesque of Walter Damrosch in "Three Little Fishies" (Victor 26402); his performance of "Night and Day" on the reverse side, which is serious, is terrible.

The Lafayette eleven-tube BB-17 for $119.95, which I have heard at last, is not a Scott twenty-tube or thirty-tube set; and if you want the sound of a Scott you will have to buy a Scott. But if you have only $119.95 to spend, the Lafayette, unlike other commercial products, is honest value and a well-sounding machine. Since the size and weight of the cabinet contribute a great deal to this sound, you will not get as good reproduction from the BB-13 for $96.50, which is the same set in a lighter cabinet. And lighter cabinets make part of the difference in the eight-tube BB-8 for $84.95 and the A.C.-D.C. twelve-tube CC-46 for $107.50, both of which, however, are also good machines for their prices. All these prices, incidentally, are for the machines without automatic record-changers.

The Magnavox radio-phonographs I heard, from the Belvedere down, sounded very poor to me. Magnavox, regrettably, no longer makes the Symphony, but it still makes its excellent table model, the Concerto.

I am informed that research in wear on the sapphire needle has led to the conclusion that this needle should not be used in a pickup with needle-point pressure of more than one ounce, which means any crystal or magnetic pickup you are likely to encounter. Use a jewel point only with a pickup especially designed for it; with the ordinary pickup use steel.

B. H. HAGGIN

FILMS

WITH "Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet" (Warner Brothers), as with "The Grapes of Wrath," Hollywood takes a great step forward. The picture is in theme and presentation so mature that it provides a deep and exciting experience. It surpasses the films of the biographical genre that we have seen before in every respect. Here are no cheap melodramatics but instead great emotions and spiritual processes presented with power and suspense. The necessary dramatic short cuts are achieved by condensation not by falsification of the historical material. The result appeals simultaneously to heart and intelligence, and is as fascinating as life itself. The picture really lets one take part in one of the momentous fights of science against disease and of a great man against the limitations of his fellow-men. John Huston, Heinz Herald, and Norman Burnside have written an original screen play which sets a new standard in many respects. It was possible for them to do this because they were allowed to handle a mature theme honestly. The producers must be congratulated for giving them the opportunity. In this connection it seems a rather crude attempt to shift the responsibility for hundreds of thousands of yards of film trash when Mr. Hays, head of the Motion Picture Producers' and Distributors' Association, confronted with the universal success of pictures like "The Grapes of Wrath" and "Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet," remarks that he does not think the producers have become appreciably more mature-minded but rather that scenario writing has very much improved.

If the authors of the script make a tense epic of the long and lonely fight of Dr. Ehrlich which resulted in the production of the effective anti-syphilis medicine "Ehrlich-Hatta 606," its presentation has been ably handled in every department. Edward G. Robinson as Dr. Ehrlich is not only better than he has ever been before, but he gives one of the greatest performances ever seen on the screen. His simplicity in portraying a great man without putting his words in quotes should be an example for other actors called to similar tasks. There is not one false touch in his moving characterization. The many outer and inner transformations which the character undergoes in a period of thirty-five years—the picture starts by showing the young, unknown doctor and ends with the old, world-famous scientist on his deathbed—are indicated so naturally that one scarcely notices them as they occur. The actor builds a character by means of many little unobtrusive details. Naive, sincere, and uncompromising in a quiet way, Dr. Ehrlich dominates his surroundings by virtue of his inner force. There is no love story, but the tenderness with which he appreciates his wife and home gives the film more true feeling than is found in a hundred romances.

William Dieterle, with excellent understanding for the atmosphere of imperial Germany, directs a supporting cast of many first-class players. Among them is Albert Bassermann, for the first time on the American screen. This greatest of German actors—in the opinion of many he is the greatest living actor—left Germany voluntarily, declining the offers Dr. Goebbels made him. His Dr. Koch is, as was to be expected, a masterpiece of imaginative acting. After this try-out Warner Brothers gave him a contract. We hope they will soon find a great part for him.

It is not easy to step down from the artistic and spiritual heights of "Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet" to the usual run of pictures. They offer at best a single performance which has to be accepted for the whole if one is not going to want to leave the theater before the end. Such a performance can be seen in the English-made "Earl of Chicago" featuring Robert Montgomery in the part of a sly, half-crazy Chicago gangster who inherits a Scottish peerage. The actor, who is much too little seen nowadays, creates within the framework of the grotesque story a believable and very entertaining character.

"Sidewalks of London" (Paramount release) shows Vivien Leigh before she became Scarlett. She and Charles Laughton have excellent moments, but the picture as a whole—about street entertainers—is rather dated.

"Castle on the Hudson" (Warner Brothers) repeats again the sickening story of Pat O'Brien attempting to reform an East Side criminal. John Garfield this time replaces James Cagney; everything else is the same.

The French picture "The Human Beast," based on Emile Zola's "La Bête Humaine," has many powerful scenes and should not be missed. Jean Gabin and Simone Simon play under Jean Renoir's direction a love story of sweeping passion and insane brutality in the best tradition of French realism.

FRANZ HOELLERING

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Letters to the Editors

What the Nazis Think

Dear Sirs: While the crew of the Columbus was detained at Ellis Island, one of the immigration officers had frequent conversations with an intelligent German petty officer of that ship. The German claimed he had a brother high in Nazi circles. Here are some notes of the talks:

Germany expects to be "sort of" victorious after an exhaustive war. Shortages will in time be made up through trade with nearby neutrals and the breaking of the British blockade by air "smashes." British tonnage losses are already far more than they publish. The Germans are inured to hardship by the long years of iron Nazi discipline. There will be no crack-up because the older people are apathetic and resigned. The Gestapo gets stronger all the time. Next to Hitler, Himmler is supreme. The ardent Nazi youths are not at the front but are on police duty in Germany and in the conquered regions. The German generals will make no attempt to rush the war to a quick conclusion, but they expect the Allied war ministries to make that fatal mistake. Göring has at last won Hitler over to that point of view. There is one chance in a thousand that they may be goaded to rashness by insulting personal propaganda emanating directly from leaders of the enemy governments. They become furious at lies that tell how luxuriously the Nazi chieftains live—coffee for Göring; cigars, meat, wine for the mighty—because envy is no small trait in the German people.

Contrary to gossip, Hitler does not contemplate suicide if Germany is beaten. He will disappear and remain in hiding for the remainder of his life. He wants to live to see a world-wide annihilation of all Jews. He is certain that this will be brought on after the war by the economic and political chaos in all countries. He believes that the United States will have a Dictator-President or a "man behind the throne" dictator by 1945 or soon after. This man will rise to power on an anti-bolshevik, anti-religious, anti-labor, and anti-Jewish-plutocracy appeal to the poor and unemployed masses. Liberalism, labor, and Jews will be held responsible for the huge national debt and the post-war industrial dislocation. Hitler feels that his propaganda will have gained such momentum by 1945 that the defenders of democracy will bow to the inevitable.

ARTHUR D. POPE

New York, February 25

The Lesser Evil

Dear Sirs: The editorial called Shadow and Substance in the February 10 issue of The Nation might better have been called The Lesser of Two Evils. You mention the horrors of Nazism and rightly advise us to steel ourselves against Nazi propaganda. At the same time you admit the questionable motives of the Allies in the war, but tell us that these are "not really relevant" to the present crisis, that we must ignore these "imperfections" or we will leave ourselves wide open for Nazi propaganda and eventual dominance.

During the 1914-18 conflict most of us were not aware of the real causes —imperialism, monopolies, etc. We believed along with The Nation in the war-to-make-the-world-safe-for-democracy hoax. After the war the real causes were exposed, and we were told that the "democracy" issue had been unimportant.

Now Europe is again at war. Fascism and Hitlerism have replaced monarchism and Kaiserism. Must the readers of The Nation wait another five, ten, or fifteen years to learn what is relevant or irrelevant in this war? Shall we allow war hysteria, fanned by British and French propaganda, to lead America into another hollow war for democracy?

MARYBELLE PIATT

New York, February 27

The Future of the "Met"

Dear Sirs: I have read with interest the article in your issue of February 17 in regard to the Metropolitan Opera. Without attempting at this time to comment in detail, I do want to point out that our present problem is one of maintaining the opera and continuing it without interruption. This campaign is not one to perpetuate the present house.

All plans for a new opera house with which I am familiar involve the expenditure of from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000. It seems to us that the raising of any such sum under present conditions would be quite impossible. Therefore the Metropolitan Opera Association, the producing company, has put forward the present plan to acquire the opera-house property, to strengthen its financial position, to make certain physical changes in the house, and to broaden its influence in a way which we hope will lead to still greater achievements for opera and music in general.

If we are unsuccessful in this effort and if we are unable to meet the present situation, then it seems that there must be an interruption in the production of opera in New York—certainly so far as the Metropolitan Opera is concerned. This, we believe, would naturally hamper any plans for the future, including the forward-looking suggestions made by a number of friends for the building of a new opera house.

As the matter stands today, more than one-third of the million dollars requested from the public has been subscribed. Approximately $125,000 of this amount has come from radio listeners in all parts of the United States and from Canada, Hawaii, British West Indies, Cuba, and Central and South America.

GEORGE A. SLOAN, Chairman,
Metropolitan Opera Fund

New York, February 26

Praise and Blame

Dear Sirs: I have found much less to criticize in The Nation since Louis Fischer and other writers joined us who are pro-socialist but anti-Stalinist. But the writer of the editorial on the recent statement of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (in the issue of February 4) is either bitterly prejudiced in respect to the Catholic church or simply did not read the document. He says it sounds like Buchman and makes fun of its emphasis on God. Well, isn't it a religious document? Then he declares, "It reads strikingly like the platform of a major political party." It does not, but if it did, how does this complaint go with the criticism that the statement is too pie-in-the-skyish? It cannot be both.

My point is that the criticism is grossly unfair and that we radicals lose by such factionalism and petty tactics. I know that the Ezekiel-Voorhis-Lauck group of planners for industrial expansion have found more support for their proposed bills in the group of Catholics around Father Ryan than among the most left-wing Protestant ministers. Obviously these Catholics advocate a pro-labor, transitional, planned, capitalist (somewhat socialized) economic order in language that does not impress Nation editors. Is this any reason for ridiculing them?

While criticizing you thus severely, I also want to commend you for carrying the suggestive articles by Lewis Corey. They are a major contribution to labor and radical thought.

FRANCIS A. HENSON

Washington, February 25

"New Masses" Under Fire

Dear Sirs: In commenting on the recent FBI raids in Detroit—a case which has since happily been dropped—The Nation wrote (issue of February 17): "Here as in the Browder case it [the FBI] seems to be looking for technical excuses to implement an anti-red drive." The Nation was right. Another case of this type is now being developed which has not been so well publicized. This is the grand-jury investigation of the New Masses.

At the beginning of the year Attorney General Murphy convoked a grand jury in Washington for the purpose of investigating a number of alleged crimes. He mentioned by name several organizations and individuals, among them two left-wing publishing houses. The newspapers proceeded to smear those named, stating that they had been charged with military espionage. So extraordinary was the procedure followed in initiating this grand-jury investigation that it drew a sharp editorial rebuke from the conservative Washington Post. Two editors of the New Masses, Joseph North and A. B. Magil, and its former business manager, George Willner, were summoned before the Washington grand jury, though there had been no mention of the magazine in Mr. Murphy's statement. The present business manager, Carl Bristel, was subpoenaed to appear before a New York grand jury in an investigation involving a totally different charge: conspiracy to violate the laws of the United States.

The questioning of these witnesses was predominantly political. Much of it was undoubtedly in violation of constitutional rights. It was clear that the grand jury had been sent on a fishing expedition in an effort to discover some technicality by which the continued publication of the New Masses could be rendered extremely difficult or impossible. Though all this may be strictly according to law, it ought to be recognized for what it is: a disguised attack on freedom of the press.

The New Masses has nothing to hide. It is a reputable magazine whose history goes back nearly twenty-nine years. It was suppressed once before—during the World War—for its political views, and it is being harassed now for the same reason. We urge readers of The Nation to protest to Attorney General Jackson and to President Roosevelt.

JOSEPH NORTH
A. B. MAGIL

New York, February 28

Anniversary Notes

Dear Sirs: On the occasion of The Nation's seventy-fifth anniversary I should like to recall to your readers a man who was one of the most militant spokesmen and writers for democracy that imperial Germany ever knew. In Heidelberg, where his body lies buried, these words were inscribed on his tombstone thirty years ago: "Dr. Theodor Barth, one who sowed the seeds of democratic ideals in our land."

In the New York Public Library can be found the complete volumes of Die Nation—the counterpart of your own outstanding journal—into which Dr. Barth breathed the finest spirit of German liberalism in politics, art, and science. Among the many well-known contributors to Die Nation were Theodor Mommsen, Ludwig Bamberger, Lasker, Lujo, Brentano, Brahms, Schlenther, and Rudolf Virchow—writers whose works are widely known and appreciated in the United States.

In 1879, when Bismarck initiated the period of protective tariffs, the free states of Hamburg, Bremen, and Lübeck began to look for a fearless and outspoken opponent of that policy. Such a man was Barth. O. G. Villard has characterized him as "the most brilliant opponent of Bismarck."

Although earlier Barth had been hostile to the Socialist Party, he came to realize that German democracy could be achieved only by active collaboration with the Social Democratic Workers' movement. The Liberal Party to which he belonged rejected that policy; indeed it formed a coalition with the Conservatives under Chancellor von Bülow, and in return for certain progressive concessions voted the notorious laws against the Polish minority. Barth's reply to this attitude of compromise was to leave the Liberal Party.

As a Christian and a liberal Dr. Barth believed in the necessity of defending civil liberties and minority rights and served for many years as president of the League to Combat Anti-Semitism.

He knew America well. In 1907 after several years of travel and study in this country he received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from Harvard University. His "American Impressions" and "Political Portraits" are of particular interest to Americans.

Now when we are looking forward with the whole democratic world to the day when Hitler's reign of barbarism will be smashed, we are confident that in the Germany of tomorrow men like Barth will come forward to bring a democratic Germany into the Federation of European States.

MARTIN SCHWARTZER

New York, February 15

CONTRIBUTORS

HARRY BLOCK is The Nation's Mexican correspondent.

FLORENCE M. BAKER, a graduate of the National University of Dublin, is now living in New York and writing for various publications.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL, formerly editor of Poetry, has published an anthology of "Literary Opinion in America."

CONSTANCE ROURKE is the author of a number of books dealing with American social and cultural history, including "Audubon," "American Humor," and "Charles Sheeler, Artist in the American Tradition."

LOVELL THOMPSON is a contributor to the Saturday Review of Literature and other periodicals.

HUGH H. DARBY is an associate in the Department of Biological Chemistry at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 150 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 16, 1940 NUMBER 11

The Shape of Things

ECONOMY WAS THROWN OUT THE WINDOW as the dictates of election year caused the Senate Appropriations Committee to add $297,000,000 to the Agriculture Department's appropriation bill. In addition to this sum, which was earmarked for parity payments and surplus commodity disposal, the committee voted to ask for a $100,000,000 RFC loan for the various farm agencies. If the action of the committee is ratified by the Senate, President Roosevelt's budget estimates will be exceeded by approximately $300,000,000. This completely obliterates the few million which have been saved by Congressional cuts and greatly accentuates the need for additional taxation as proposed in the President's budget message. Unfortunately there is no way under our representative government by which Congress can be forced to vote taxes to offset the expenditures which it authorizes with such alacrity. This makes it possible for Republicans to give benefits to voting farmers with one hand while beating the air for economy with the other. We trust that if the bill reaches the President in its present form he will have the courage to veto it.

*

THE UNRECONSTRUCTED PUBLIC-UTILITY rebels are mustering their propaganda forces for a new fight against integration. Defeated in their efforts to kill the Public Utility Holding Company Act and foiled in their subsequent attempts to stall the application of the "death sentence" clause, they are now hoping to put pressure on the SEC to nullify it. During the past week the $1,200,000,000 Commonwealth and Southern Corporation was ordered to show cause why it should not adjust its structure to comply with Section 11 of the act. Wendell Willkie, president of the corporation, whose genius for publicity none can deny, immediately issued a long statement declaring that the break-up of the C. and S. system would result "in material losses to our consumers and great destruction of values to our security holders." He therefore urged that the SEC should use its "broad discretion" to "preserve these material values rather than to destroy them." Although he did not enter into specific proposals, his glowing description of the benefits of centralized ownership and management suggested a belief that the C. and S. set-up should be left substantially unchanged. The act, as Mr. Willkie pointed out, does permit the commission to allow the retention by a holding company of more than one integrated public-utility system under certain conditions, including their location in adjoining states. But C. and S. is composed of two distinct groups of properties, one in the Southeastern states and one centered in Michigan. If each of these groups were owned by a separate holding company, it would seem that the terms of the act would be met. But we do not see how the SEC's discretion could be stretched to allow the continuance of both under one umbrella.

*

ATTACKS ON THE SEC SOONER OR LATER come to the accusation that it is interfering with private management or the sacred rights of the investor. Quite apart from the fact that public utilities are affected with a public interest and are the beneficiaries of extraordinary privileges granted by the public, the question arises of whose ox is gored. For the private interests represented by holding-company managements frequently differ from, and conflict with, the private interests of bondholders and senior security owners, who have supplied the bulk of the money on which utility empires are built. In this connection we should like to call the attention of our readers to the following comment in the March 2 issue of Bond Outlook, published by Standard Statistics Company, the leading financial-information service:

> The publicity given to the so-called "political persecution" of the utility industry has led to a general belief that the position of utility securities has been damaged by increased regulation. . . . Regulation under the Holding Company Act has strengthened materially the position of operating-company bonds, and added many safeguards thereto. . . . As an example, the SEC decision on the Consumers' Power case, in reality, was favorable to the company's bondholders, since it necessitated equity financing of future capacity expansion which would widen earnings and asset protection of the bonds.

Published weekly and copyright, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 8, 1897.

MAYOR LAGUARDIA'S LITTLE EXPERIMENT in "socialism" on New York City's transit lines may prove worse for labor than "capitalist" operation has been. The city, which already owns and operates one of the three rapid-transit systems in New York, is now about to take over the other two under a plan of "unification." Unification has been widely touted as a victory for public ownership, particularly in Wall Street circles ordinarily hostile to public ownership but glad of any chance to unload deteriorating transit securities on the city. For the people of New York the plan will mean loss of the five-cent fare; for workers on transit lines it may mean the loss of hard-won rights to collective bargaining. The Transport Workers' Union wrung recognition and contracts from the B. M. T. and the I. R. T. systems, though both had been notoriously anti-union in the past. Both lines will now be taken over by the city. The third rapid-transit system, the Independent, already operated by the city, has always refused to bargain collectively or to recognize the union, and at one time set up instead an employees'-representation plan. Mayor LaGuardia, though a friend of other people's labor, has resisted pressure to recognize the rights of his workers on the Independent, and has now publicly declared that under unification he would permit neither the right to strike nor the closed shop on the lines. His bold statement is strategically clever because it hides the main point at issue, which is not the right to strike or the closed shop but the right to bargain collectively.

*

TENNESSEE IS FAR FROM BEING THE ONLY place in the country where ignorance makes a monkey of education. Hill-billies from Morningside Heights, led by His Most Worshipful Eminence Bishop Manning, and bigots from the backwoods of Brooklyn, mobilized by the Hearst press, have raised a hue and cry against Bertrand Russell. In the world of education and enlightenment Mr. Russell is a distinguished philosopher, mathematician, and logician, but there must be several hundred thousand New Yorkers who now believe that he is a confirmed lecher, an advocate of adultery, and a believer in the nationalization of women. The storm arose when Mr. Russell was appointed professor of philosophy at City College. Bishop Manning at once seized on certain passages in "Education and the Good Life" to make it appear that Mr. Russell believed in education for a very wicked life. The campaign reached one of its high points when Monsignor Francis J. Walsh asked a gathering of Catholic policemen to join in the protest. They had had occasion to learn, he said, the full meaning of the "matrimonial triangle" by finding one corner of the triangle in a pool of blood. The Hearst press, scenting its favorite journalistic combination, sex and subversion, leaped to the fray. The Knights of Columbus girded on their armor. Behind the uproar is the fact that for the first time in years New York City has a liberal Board of Higher Education. We hope it will repudiate in no uncertain terms an attack which, if successful, would be a serious blow to academic freedom, not only in New York City but throughout the country.

*

IN PROPOSING THAT PART-TIME WORKERS be covered by unemployment insurance, a committee of the New York State Labor Department has sought to eliminate one of the primary weaknesses of New York's job-insurance system. As it has worked out so far, unemployment insurance has aided chiefly those among the unemployed who were in least need of assistance. Only persons who had been working more or less regularly at fair wages have been eligible for benefits; casual workers, employees in seasonal trades, and part-time workers have usually been ineligible. Moreover, the provision in the law barring benefits to anyone earning over $3 a week has discouraged the unemployed from seeking or accepting part-time jobs of any kind. Adoption of the committee's recommendation would provide partial benefits to any insured worker who is unemployed four or more days during a seven-day week. No account is taken, however, of part-time work which involves employment during only part of the working day. Some provision for this type of partial unemployment is obviously necessary if our state job-insurance laws are to fulfil the function for which they were designed.

*

FOR THE FUTURE HISTORIAN, AUGUST 23, 1939, the day on which the Nazi-Soviet pact was signed, may prove to be the most momentous date in the twentieth century. We therefore make no apologies to our readers for publishing yet another account of the events which culminated in this deal which shook the world. Frederick Kuh, whose article appears on page 360, is a foreign correspondent with long experience in both Germany and Britain. Unlike Louis Fischer, he believes that serious political negotiations between Moscow and Berlin did not begin until July, when Russian conversations with the Western powers seemed doomed to failure. He stresses, too, as an influence on the Soviet government's decision the many snubs received from London, including the ignoring by Lord Halifax of a direct invitation to visit Moscow personally. But the evidence he presents does not invalidate the theory previously put forward by Louis Fischer that the decisive factor drawing Germany and the U. S. S. R. together was the abandonment of appeasement by the Allies. So long as Hitler thought he could gain his eastern objectives without Allied interference, there was no inducement to him to pay a price for Soviet neutrality. It was only when he became convinced that to attack Poland meant war that he determined to woo Russia and so avoid the possibility of having to fight in east and west simultaneously. At the same time, the Russians, with fear of appeasement at their expense removed, saw a deal with Germany as safer and more likely to be profitable than a treaty with the Allies. It still remains to be seen whether by that decision the U. S. S. R. removed itself from participation in World War II or whether, as the end result of the pact, it will be dragged into the struggle against the West as a junior partner of Nazi Germany.

✶

THE GRANTING OF A NEW $20,000,000 LOAN to China by the Export-Import Bank would be welcome news if it were not for the suspicion that it is being given as a sop for our failure to impose an embargo on Japan. With the Gallup poll showing 82 per cent of the population favoring an embargo, Congressmen dare not face their constituents in an election year without doing something for China. Passage of an embargo involved possible political reprisals from the scrap-iron, oil, and copper interests. But a loan to China offers the unique advantage of permitting American business men to trade with both sides. The fact that a continuation of our sales of war supplies to Japan threatens the very existence of China, and thereby endangers the loan, is apparently a minor consideration. As the money has been put up by the government, no private interest would be affected by such a development. Meanwhile, the $20,000,000 is enough to keep China going for several months even though it is far less than the $75,000,000 which China set as the amount needed. And if the loan were accompanied by an embargo instead of a continuation of direct economic aid to Japan, it would represent an important step in the defense of American rights and a setback for aggression. An articulate public opinion might still achieve this.

✶

THE BAN ON THE SALE OF ARAB LAND TO Jews in important sections of Palestine was upheld in the House of Commons last week by a vote of 292 to 129, after the bitterest debate heard in that body since the outbreak of the war. Opposition to the plan has been widespread. Zionists attacked the restriction as a final betrayal of the Balfour Declaration. The powerful League of Nations Union opposed it as inconsistent with the terms of the mandate granted to Britain by the League of Nations. Laborites charged that the arrangement unduly favored the Arabs at the expense of the Jews, and was part of a barefaced maneuver to enlist Moslems throughout the world in support of the Allies. Most observers profess to see a link between the British policy in Palestine and that in India, where an effort is also being made to win Moslem aid. But despite the opposition—and despite a renewal of rioting in Palestine—the Chamberlain government has not wavered in its program. It is another example of the way ideals are apt to be smothered by war-time exigencies—in this instance, the necessity to offset intensive German and Italian propaganda in the strategically vital Arabian lands.

✶

SPAIN HAS BEEN RETURNED TO ITS FORMER condition by Franco's decree restoring to the grandees all land seized by the republic for distribution among the peasants. The "owners" are to decide in each case whether the collectivist peasant organizations are to be allowed to continue to work the land at rentals approved by the government. Except in the north the greater part of the agricultural land in Spain was held by large landowners, and this fact was the chief cause of discontent in former years. The failure of the Republican government to enforce its expropriation decrees greatly weakened its prestige among the peasants prior to the outbreak of the Franco revolt in 1936. The present action has undoubtedly been delayed until now for fear of provoking new uprisings. Whether the Franco regime is now strongly enough intrenched to withstand the storm of opposition which is bound to arise remains to be seen. An observer who has recently returned from Spain reports that even before this action the whole country was seething with discontent—the middle classes no less than the working class. The prisons are still full, and arrests and executions are continuing. Unemployment is widespread. Food conditions are reported to be extremely bad, except for those who have the money to buy the more expensive, unrationed foods. Under such conditions Franco would seem to be tempting fate in taking the land from the peasants. But he apparently has obligations which he dare not repudiate.

Axis Over Finland

AS WE go to press, a Finnish delegation is in Moscow talking peace terms with Stalin and the ubiquitous Herr Ribbentrop is in Rome interviewing not only Ciano and Mussolini but the Pope. At first sight there may not seem to be any clear connection between these two events, yet it is not hard to see a possible link. From the Nazi point of view Italy's non-belligerent status is far from satisfactory, and it will become infinitely less so if the Allies succeed in forcing Rome to accept their blockade regulations. The Finnish war, however, has added to the barriers between Italy and Germany, for both the Fascist government press and the Vatican have loudly and frequently expressed disapproval of the Nazis' Russian comrades. If, therefore, peace could be patched up between Russia and Finland, a first step at least would have been taken toward bringing Italy back as an active partner in the anti-pluto-democracy front.

If this maneuver is to succeed, pacification of the Vatican is essential. Mussolini himself is realist enough to suffer no qualms about shaking hands with Moscow provided there is a profit in it. But he cannot ignore altogether the feelings of the Italian people. They retched unmistakably when asked to swallow the Nazis; and to expect them, devout Catholics for the most part, to embrace the godless Russians as well, is a little too much. Unless, therefore, Mussolini can get some kind of blessing from the church he is hardly likely to agree to a tightening of Italian bonds with Berlin and through Berlin with Moscow. This is what makes the request of von Ribbentrop for a papal interview so significant. He is reported to have told the Pope that the German understanding with Russia was purely economic and that the Third Reich still stood as a barrier against the bolshevization of Europe. Does he hope to clinch this argument by showing that as a result of German pressure Moscow has agreed to a negotiated peace with Finland?

Certainly it is remarkable that the Soviet government, forgetting that it had refused to recognize any Finnish government except that of Mr. Kuusinen, should have consented to talk terms with Mr. Risto Ryti and his colleagues. That in itself must prove damaging to its prestige and suggests that the war had proved unexpectedly costly, that Allied intervention was feared, or that Berlin had urged very strongly the desirability of an early peace. Probably all three of these factors played some part in launching the negotiations.

By the time this issue of The Nation appears, the outcome of the peace conference may be known. The difficulties of reaching agreement are obvious. The Soviet government cannot afford to offer terms more favorable to Finland than those rejected last fall. Yet the Finns, desperate as their position is, are not likely to accept proposals which would enable them to be digested in two bites à la Czechoslovakia. One of the numerous rumors afloat is that their integrity might be guaranteed by Scandinavia and Germany. This would be a very astute move on the part of the Reich, for it would thus be placed in a strong position to influence Scandinavia, which would be bound to lean on it for protection against Russia.

By the same token, peace between Russia and Finland under the aegis of Hitler would be an adverse development for the Allies. Moreover, it would release for German use Russian supplies and transport facilities now tied up by the Finnish war. Speaking in the House of Commons on Monday, Premier Chamberlain declared that Britain and France had offered to aid Finland "with all available resources" provided that a direct appeal for assistance was made. This declaration may help the Finns in their negotiations, although nothing was said about how the obstacles which hitherto have prevented the Allies from doing more than deliver material to Finland were to be overcome.

These obstacles are both diplomatic and strategic. Unless a landing could be effected at Petsamo—a very hazardous undertaking involving tremendous supply difficulties—the only route for troops is by way of Norway and Sweden. But these countries, more impressed by German power to hurt them than by Allied power to protect them, and anxious not to become the war's major battlefield, still refuse to permit passage to an Allied army. Possibly, if the Soviet demands are too harsh and the war continues, this refusal will be reconsidered, but the Allied command would then be faced with the problem of how to dispatch large enough forces across the North Sea, and how to move them quickly enough into southern Scandinavia to forestall a German invasion across the shorter and safer Baltic route. If a northern front is to be established at all, it cannot be treated as a minor "sideshow." Not tens but hundreds of thousands of men would be needed to overcome the danger of another Gallipoli. And, without firm guaranties of assistance on this scale the Scandinavian states can hardly be expected to indorse a plan which, at best, would be appallingly costly for them. It must be admitted that the Allies would have real difficulty, at this stage, in diverting really massive forces to the north and are thus hardly in a position to encourage the Finns to continue fighting. Under the circumstances, it is easy to explain the gravitational pull of Berlin on the northern states, and the prospects of a new Nazi diplomatic triumph should not be minimized.

Whittling Away the Wagner Act

AS AN investigating body the Smith committee showed an ineptness that soon made it less effective than it might have been, but there is a new shrewdness apparent in its recommendations for revision of the Wagner Act. Amendments whose meaning have been too well publicized and whose consequences are therefore too well understood have been avoided. No attempt is made to write into the law a section on unfair practices by labor unions, or to forbid coercion "from any source," or to relieve employers from the need for treating with aliens in collective bargaining; the last being aimed, of course, at Harry Bridges. As late as March 1 the Wall Street Journal, in a detailed and seemingly authoritative account of the forthcoming Smith committee proposals, reported that the alien provision would be included. Wiser heads seem to have prevailed in the interval. The majority report is confined largely to proposals whose effect on enforcement of the law would be no less disastrous because they are of an obscure and technical character. If these amendments could be obtained under a "compromise" by which the committee abandoned its more obvious proposal for a new three-man board, a great advance would have been made toward the transformation of the Wagner Act from a means of helping labor into a means of hamstringing it. This, rather than outright repeal, is now the strategy of the right, as Kenneth Crawford's article in this issue indicates.

